Indeed pride, envy, jealouſy, and ſuſpicion, hurried him into many abſurd and ridiculous meaſures; he criticiſed the works of much better authors than himſelf with rudeneſs and abuſe, and being always making his attacks on ſomebody or other, became embroiled in quarrels. In 1709 he publiſhed his Appius and Virginia, which had no ſucceſs. In 1712 he wrote againſt Pope's Eſſay on Criticiſm, and the next year againſt Mr. Addiſon's Cato, which occaſioned the Narrative of Dr. Robert Norris, concerning the ſtrange and deplorable Frenzy of Mr. John Dennis, and produced a literary quarrel that was carried on with great acrimony. In ſhort, he wrote many other pieces, and died in 1733, in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age.

DENNY (Sir Anthony) knt. one of king Henry the Eighth's favorites, was the ſecond ſon of Thomas Denny, of Cheſhunt, in Hertfordſhire, eſq. and was educated at St. Paul's ſchool, London; and at St. John's college, in Cambridge. King Henry VIII. made him one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber, groom of the ſtole, and a privy-counſellor; and likewiſe conferred on him the honour of knighthood. Being in great favour, king Henry granted him in 1537 the priory of Hertford, with ſeveral other lands and manors, and afterwards conferred on him many other favours of the ſame kind. In 1546 he was commiſſioned with two other gentlemen, to ſign all warrants in the king's name; and when that prince was on his death-bed, he had the courage to put him in mind of his approaching end, and to deſire him to raiſe his thoughts to heaven, to think of his paſt life, and to call on God for mercy. The king appointed him one of the executors of his will, and one of the counſellors to his ſon and ſucceſſor king Edward VI. but he did not long ſurvive king Henry, for he died in the year 1550.

DENORES (Jason) a famous Peripatetic philoſopher, was born at Nicoſia, in the iſle of Cyprus, and was of one of the principal families of that country, but loſing all his wealth when that iſland was taken by the Turks in 1570, he went to Italy, and ſettled at Padua, where he was choſen, in 1577, profeſſor of Ariſtotle's moral philoſophy. He died in 1590 of grief, occaſioned by the baniſhment of his only ſon, for killing a noble Venetian in a quarrel. Denores was well ſkilled in the Peripatetic philoſophy, and had had a ſuperſtitious veneration for Ariſtotle. He wrote many works, ſome in Latin, and others in Italian.

DENYS, a town of France, in the iſle of France, with a famous Benedictin abbey, wherein are the tombs of the kings of France. It is five miles north of Paris. Long. 2. 26. E. Lat. 48. 56. N.

DENYS (St) the firſt biſhop of Paris, came into Gaul in the time of the emperor Decius, in the year 240, and ſuffered martyrdom there.

DENYS. See DIONYSIUS.

DENYSOT (NICHOLAS) a French poet and painter, born at Mans, in 1515, came into England, and was preceptor to Anne, Margaret, and Jane Seymur. At his return to France he publiſhed ſeveral works under the name of the count d'Alſinois, which is the anagram of his name, and died at Paris in 1559.

DEO GRATIAS (St.) was choſen biſhop of Carthage, at the deſire of the emperor Valentinian III. about the year 454, in the reign of king Genſericus. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his charity to the poor, and to captives, and died in 457.

DEPTFORD, a town in Kent, ſeated on the river Thames, four miles eaſt of London. It is conſiderable on account of the fine docks for building ſhips, and the king's yard.

DERBENT, a ſtrong town of Perſia, in Aſia, ſeated near the Caſpian Sea, and at the foot of mount Caucaſus. It is generally believed to have been built by Alexander the Great, at leaſt the ſtrongeſt part. It has often changed its maſters, having been in the hands of the Turks, the Tartars, the Ruſſians, and now in the poſſeſſion of the Perſians. It is three miles in length, and but half a mile in breadth. It extends from the verge of the ſhore due weſt to the foot of a lofty mountain, being all the way upon a declivity, and is by its natural ſituation the gates of Perſia on this ſide; for there is no paſſage to the weſt without going deep into the mountains, which are guarded by their native inhabitants, who have not yet been brought under the Perſian yoke. This place is divided into three quarters, appropriated to different purpoſes, each having their diſtinct walls, which ſerve alſo to render the ground more equal on the declivity.

The upper town, which is about half a mile ſquare, conſtitutes the citadel, and is incomparably the ſtrongeſt. No perſon is permitted to enter it except the ſoldiers, unleſs upon extraordinary occaſions. The citadel has its diſtinct governor, with whom the other does not interfere. They mount above forty pieces of cannon, but what their other ſtrength is is hard to ſay. The walls of the middle town are thirty feet high, near twenty feet thick at the foundation, and twelve or fifteen in the upper part; having a breaſt-work about three feet thick, and port-holes at convenient diſtances for muſquets, or bows and arrows. It is likewiſe defended by fifty flanking baſtions, for the moſt part ſquare, but a greater defence againſt the Tartars than an European army. The walls are made of a ſhelly ſtone, which looks like a compoſition of ſea-ſhells ſtrongly cemented together. The rocks about the town are of the ſame compoſition. The gates of the city have ſtrong, well-made arches, with ſliding holes to ſhoot arrows through. The ſtreets are not regular, nor are they paved at preſent, though they have been formerly. Many of the houſes are ſupported on one ſide by the hill, but numbers are fallen down, and the greateſt part in ruins. It is hardly poſſible to deſcribe the miſeries that this town ſuffered when Nadir Shah came in perſon againſt the Leſgees. He put out the eyes of above five hundred men, beſides the dreadful ſlaughter he made of others. Here is a magnificent moſque, which Nadir converted into a magazine; the roof is ſupported by eighty-four arches. Here are ſeveral caravanſerais, which belong to the Armenians, and are much the beſt.

The eaſtermoſt part of the lower town is waſhed by the ſea, the riſing of which has of late years, made no ſmall impreſſion on the walls. Theſe are guarded by two round baſtions, without which there was fromerly a harbour for ſmall veſſels. The lower town was long deſerted till Nadir built a palace in it, and cauſed ſeveral ſtreets to be built; and, with a view of bringing trade to the city, he made it a free port. Here Peter the Great eſtabliſhed his principal magazines, and here the Perſian ſoldiers now keep their flocks. But the Tartars, either by undermining or ſcaling the walls, frequently make incurſions by night in ſmall parties, and carry off whatever they meet with.

The cruelties which are reciprocally exerciſed between the Leſgees and Perſians are hard to be conceived. Such as are ſuſpected of being ſpies and are taken, have their eyes put out, and are turned out of the city. Many who are made priſoners in battle have their arms or legs cut off, and are left to expire in the field. The heads of the leaders are taken off, and thrown together in a heap like a pile of ſhot. On the ſouth ſide of Derbent are many vineyards and gardens, which extend near eight miles. And on both ſides, on the declivity of the hill, are a great number of ancient burying-places. There are many tomb-ſtones of eight or nine feet in length, which cover the graves, with inſcriptions not intelligible to the preſent inhabitants, Long. 50. 0. E. Lat. 42. 8. N.

DERBY, the principal town in Derbyſhire, is ſeated on the river Derwent, and is a neat large well built populous town. It has five churches belonging to as many pariſhes, but that of All-hallows is the moſt remarkable, it having a very fine tower ſteeple, thought by ſome to be the higheſt in England of that ſort. The trade of this town is not very conſiderable, but then it is inhabited by the better ſort of people, who have eſtates in the county, and there is a great deal of corn bought and ſold here. Here is the famous ſilk mill, erected by Sir Thomas Lomb in 1734. Derby is governed by a mayor, high-ſteward, recorder, nine aldermen, fourteen brethren, and fourteen common-council men. The county aſſizes are kept here, and it ſends two members to parliament. It hath two hoſpitals, and the market-days are Wedneſdays, Fridays, and Saturdays. On February 25 there is a meeting for cheeſe. On Friday in Eaſter-week there is a fair for horned cattle; another on the firſt Friday in May; a third on Friday in Whitſun-week, and a fourth on July 25. September 27 is the cheeſe fair. And on the Friday before Michaelmas-day there is a meeting by cuſtom for horned cattle. It is thirty-ſix miles north of Coventry, eighty-ſeven north of Oxford, and one hundred and twenty-ſix north-weſt and-by-north of London. Long. 1. 25. W. Lat. 52. 57. N.

DERBYSHIRE is bounded on the eaſt by Nottinghamſhire and part of Liceſterſhire, which laſt alſo bounds it on the ſouth; on the weſt by Staffordſhire and Cheſhire; and on the north by Yorkſhire. The river Erwaſh parts it from Nottinghamſhire, the Trent from Leiceſterſhire, the Trent and the Dove from Staffordſhire, and the Goit from Cheſhire. It is forty miles in length from north to ſouth, and in ſome places thirty in breadth. From an old computation it contains one hundred and ſix pariſhes, fifty-three vicarages, ſix hundreds, five hundred villages, eleven market-towns, about twenty-one thouſand two hundred houſes, and one hundred and twenty-ſeven thouſand inhabitants.

The chief rivers are the Dove and the Derwent. The Dove riſes in the Peak, and parts this county from Staffordſhire, and falls into the Trent about five miles north of Burton. It is famous for graylings and trouts. As it riſes in, and paſſes through a mountainous country, it is no wonder it ſhould ſometimes ſuddenly overflow its banks and do miſchief. The Derwent likewiſe riſes in the Peak, and croſſes the county from north to ſouth, falling into the Trent. There is a remarkable difference in the two parts of the ſhire into which it is divided by this river. On the eaſt ſide the air is wholeſome and agreeable, and the ſoil well cultivated, and fruitful in all ſorts of grain; but the land on the weſt ſide is barren, the air cold, and the weather variable. This is called the Peak, and is full of bleak mountains and craggy rocks. Though here and there is ſome graſs on the hills, and plenty in the vallies, which ſerve to feed large flocks of ſheep and black cattle. However the bowels of the hills help to make up the want of fertility on the ſurface, for they yield lead, antimony, mill-ſtones, ſcythe-ſtones, grind-ſtones, marble, alabaſter, a coarſe ſort of cryſtal, pit-coal, and iron. But what has made the greateſt noiſe, are the ſeven wonders of the Peak, which are enumerated thus:

Ædes, mons, barathrum, binus fons, antraque bina.

A houſe, a mountain, an abyſs, two fountains, and two caves.

1. The houſe called Chatſworth is the magnificent palace of the duke of Devonſhire, ſeated on the eaſt ſide of the river Derwent. It is undoubtedly a moſt beautiful ſeat; but its luſtre is greatly augmented by the dreary country and horrid mountains which ſurround it. The magnificent rooms, fine paintings, elegant ſtatues, and curious water-works in the gardens, have cauſed many a traveller to turn out of his way to take a view of theſe romantic ſcenes. In the chapel there is a picture of the Reſurrection by Vario, and in the hall a repreſentation of Cæſar ſtabbed in the ſenate. The chambers are ſtately, and richly inlaid.

In the gardens may be ſeen the ſtatues of gladiators in lively poſtures, and the ſtraining of the muſcles naturally expreſſed. In the water-works is Neptune with the ſea nymphs, which ſeem to ſport themſelves in the waters; a pond wherein ſea-horſes continually roll; a copper tree reſembling a willow, every leaf of which ſends forth water in drops; a grove of cypreſs, and a caſcade, on the top of which ſtand two ſea-nymphs, with urns under their arms, from which the water falls in the caſcade.

On the eaſt ſide of the houſe there is a high mountain planted with trees, which has the appearance of a wood riſing

riſing gradually to the top. Before the weſt front of the houſe, which is moſt beautiful, runs the river Derwent, whoſe ſtream in calm weather is gentle and ſlow, but in rainy weather, and at time of the melting of the ſnow becomes very rapid. Chatſworth is twenty miles north of Derby.

2. The mountain called Mam-Tor, is ten miles north-weſt of Chatſworth, near a village called Caſtleton, under which there are lead mines. From this the earth is continually falling down, and yet the mountain ſeems to ſuffer no decreaſe.

3. Eldenhole, two miles north of Tidſwell, is a vaſt chaſm above forty feet long, and twenty-one feet wide, which is the mouth of a pit, the depth of which could never be fathomed; a plummet once drew eight hundred and eighty-four yards of line after it without reaching the bottom, though eighty yards next the plummet were wet. On throwing a ſtone down, it is heard to ſtrike the ſides with a fainter and fainter ſound, that is at laſt gradually loſt.

4. Buxton Wells, ſo called from the town where they riſe, near the head of the river Wye, conſiſt of nine hot ſprings, which run with a conſtant ſtream into the adjacent meadows. But what creates the wonder, within two yards of them is a ſpring ſo cold, that no perſon can go into it without ſhuddering. The former is not exceſſive hot, but temperate, and its water being drank, creates an appetite, and opens obſtructions. It is alſo good in ſcorbutic rheumatiſms, nervous diſorders, and many other diſeaſes. There is a handſome ſtone-building erected over the wells, and convenient lodgings in the town for thoſe that frequent them.

5. Tideſwell is a ſpring that ebbs and flows at certain times, but not ſo conſtantly as hath been reported.

6. Pool's Hole is the ſixth wonder, and is a very remarkable cavern, near Buxton, the entrance of which is at the foot of a large mountain, called Bitmoſs: it is ſo low at firſt, that thoſe who go in, muſt creep on all-four; but, when in, it opens conſiderably, inſomuch that you may ſtand upright if you were ſix times the height of Goliah, when looking upwards, you may perceive a ſparkling enamelled roof, which, reflecting the light of the candles, darts its rays all around. After this you meet with a roaring torrent, which obliges you to turn to the right hand, and climb up a rock, from which, if you ſlip, you will probably break your neck. As you paſs you may ſee pieces of the rock, which you may fancy to be dogs, horſes, lions, or men. In another place there are ſtones like haycocks, which the natives call Fonts. On the roof there hangs a round ſtone, which they call a flitch of bacon, probably becauſe it ſhines like ſalt. The next thing you arrive at, is a ſtone with a ſpherical body, a pedeſtal, a cryſtal ſpire, and a ball, which they call Pool's lanthorn, being like that in the poop of an admiral's ſhip. But as you move forward, the torrent begins to roar as loud as a cataract, being heightened by the echoings of the cave. However, when you come near it, you may ſtep over with the greateſt eaſe. Beyond this rill there is a great tranſparent pillar of the ſame ſhining matter as the reſt Over it there ſeems to be curious folds of drapery, with ſoft flowing plaits, than which nothing can be finer; it is called the queen of Scots' pillar. Now you are obliged to croſs the brook again, and turning on your left, you aſcend a wet, ſteep, ſlippery way, above threeſcore paces; and, on the right hand, there is a ſort of a floor, from which you look downward through a hole, and ſee a candle, left at the brook, which looks like a ſtar. When you get down again, and look up at the candle left in the ſame hole, it looks like a ſtar peeping through the clouds in a dark night. After this, you are to viſit, as you come back, what they call Pool's hall, parlour, bed-chamber, withdrawing-room, cloſet, and other offices, which are only ſo named to countenance a fable, that one Pool, a robber, made this the place of his retreat.

7. The Devil's Arſe, the laſt wonder, is a ſubterraneous cave near Caſtleton, the mouth of which is ſo large, that there is a ſort of a village in it, with houſes, barns, and ſtacks of hay and turf, under the ſame ſolid roof. This is inhabited by people who are always ready with candles to guide ſtrangers into the receſſes of the cave. After you have paſt a few yards over a ſandy bottom, you come to the level of the cave, ſome paces beyond which, the roof deſcends ſo low, that people are forced to ſtoop to go under it, till at length they are forced to creep on all-fours: then the roof becomes higher, and then lower again, till you come to a brook, over which there is a difficult paſſage between the water and the rock. When you have eſcaped the danger, the roof becomes high, the room ſpacious, with handſome walls and a curious portal, with two curious columns jutting from the wall, both which have a proper baſe and capital, and ſupport a curious arch all of one piece, with all its moulding, frieze, and cornice. This leads into a handſome room, in which is a baſon full of clear water. Beſides this, there are many more ſmall grottos which appear very curious. Now you muſt turn back again to the channel, and ſqueeze between two naſty pointed ſtones, till you reach a ſecond river, four times as broad as the former, with rough waters, but fordable. However, the ſtream is ſo ſtrong you can ſcarce keep your feet, which is the more ſtrange, becauſe neither this nor the former are properly rivers, but pools, made by the fall of water. Then you paſs over a hilly furrace made by the deſcent of the petrifying water, till you come to a deſcent, and meet with an even roof, without ſo much as a crack or flaw. This room is twenty paces long, and ten feet high, having a cupula like a great bell. Juſt beyond this there is a purling ſtream which will ſcarce wet your feet. Taking this for your guide, you go between rocks and ſandy-hills on each ſide, till you come to ſomewhat that makes an aſtoniſhing noiſe, ſuch as is hardly ever heard above ground. However, you may ſoon diſcover this to be owing to a cataract of water, which falls from a hill, and then running into the windings of the cave, makes this uncouth din. You are ſtill to follow the ſtream, which will bring you to a ſtone-vault, curiouſly arched, and walled on each ſide: it is thirty paces long, thirteen wide, and ten feet high. This is full of clear water, through which you may ſee the glittering ſand at the bottom, and is called the fourth river, and is five hundred paces from the entrance. This is the bounds of the cavern, beyond which none have ever attempted to go.

Beſides theſe wonders, there are other things remarkable enough; for, a little diſtance from Pool's hole, there is a clear brook, conſiſting of cold and hot water, ſo near together, that you may put the finger and thumb of the ſame hand, the one into the hot, the other into the cold. Near the village called Birchover, in the ſame parts, is a ſtone, four yards high, and twelve about, which is ſo equally poiſed, that you may ſtir it with your little finger. In ſeveral of the mountains, there are cavities at the bottoms, called ſwallows, becauſe they receive ſeveral rivulets, which never come out again by any known vent. At Quarnden, near Derby, there are ſprings of the nature of Spa-water. At Kidlaſton there is a well, noted for curing old ulcers.

Derby is the ſhire-town, and the market-towns are Alfreton, Aſhborne, Bakewell, Cheſterfield, Dronfield, Tideſwell, and Wirkſworth.

DERBY, (JAMES STANLEY, earl of.) See STANLEY.

DERCYLLIDAS, a famous general of the Lacedæmonians, about the four hundredth year before the birth of Chriſt. He took ſeveral cities from the Perſians; and when on the point of coming to a battle, forced Tiſſaphernes, Artaxerxes's general, to ſign a treaty, by which the Perſians obliged themſelves to leave the Grecian cities in the enjoyment of their liberties, in the three hundred and ninety-ſeventh year before the Chriſtian æra.

DEREHAM, a pretty large town in Norfolk, that has ſeveral hamlets belonging to it. It has a market on Fridays, noted for woollen yarn; and two fairs, held on February 3, and September 28, for cattle and toys. It is ſeventeen miles weſt of Norwich, and one hundred north-north-eaſt of London. Long. 18. 35. Lat. 52. 40.

DERHAM, (WILLIAM) D. D. an excellent Engliſh philoſopher and divine, was born at Stowton near Worceſter, on the 26th of November, 1657, and having completed his education at Trinity college, Oxford, was, in 1682, preſented to the vicarage of Wargrave, in Berkſhire; but he did not continue there above ſeven years; for, in 1689, he was preſented to the valuable rectory of Upminſter, in Eſſex, which being at a convenient diſtance from London, gave him an opportunity of converſing with the moſt learned men in the nation, and, at the ſame time, afforded him a retirement ſuitable to his contemplative and philoſophic temper. He applied to the ſtudy of nature, to mathematics and experimental philoſophy, and was ſoon choſen a fellow of the royal ſociety, of which he was an uſeful and induſtrious member, he frequently publiſhing very valuable pieces in the Philoſophical Tranſactions. In his younger years he printed a Treatiſe of Watch and Clock-making; and in the years 1711 and 1712, preached ſixteen ſermons at Mr. Boyle's lectures, which having reduced into a new form, he publiſhed in 1713, under the title of Phyſico-Theology; or a Demonſtration of the Being and Attributes of God from his Works of Creation; and the next year he publiſhed his Aſtro-Theology, which was followed ſome years after by his Chriſtio-Theology. He was made canon of Windſor, chaplain to his late majeſty when prince of Wales, and created doctor of divinity. Beſides his own works, he publiſhed ſome pieces of that eminent philoſopher Mr. Ray; and the Philoſophical Experiments of Dr. Hooke: and being ſkilled in medicine, he was phyſician to the bodies as well as the ſouls of his pariſhioners. This great and good man having thus ſpent his life in the agreeable and improving ſtudy of nature, and made all his reſearches ſubſervient to the cauſe of religion, virtue, and humanity, died at Upminſter on the 5th of April, 1735, in the ſeventy-eighth year of his age.

DERPT, or DORPT, the capital town of the palatinate of the ſame name in Livonia, with a biſhoprick and a univerſity. It was formerly a fortified town, but the Ruſſians becoming maſters of it in 1704, razed all the fortifications. It is ſeated near the river Ambeck, ſixty-three miles ſouth-weſt of Marva, and fifty north-weſt of Pleſcow. Long. 27. 35. E. Lat. 58. 10. N.

DERWENT, a river that riſes in Derbyſhire, runs by Derby, and falls into the Trent. There is a river of the ſame name, which riſes in the north-riding of Yorkſhire, and running ſouth, falls into the Ouſe.

DESAGULIERS, (JOHN THEOPHILUS) a celebrated philoſopher, who introduced the practice of reading lectures in experimental philoſophy in this metropolis; was the ſon of the reverend Mr. John Deſaguliers, a French refugee, and was born at Rochelle on the 12th of March 1683. His father brought him, when an infant, into England, and having taught him the claſſics, ſent him to Chriſt-church college, Oxford. In 1702, he ſucceeded Dr. Kiel, in reading courſes of experimental philoſophy at Hart hall, and, in 1714, was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, of which he was a very uſeful member. About this time, the duke of Chandos made him his chaplain, and preſented him to the church of Edgware. He at length obtained a ſmall living in Norfolk, worth ſeventy pounds a-year, which he afterwards exchanged for one in Eſſex. He performed a courſe of lectures before king George I. king George II. and the reſt of the royal family; and his royal highneſs Frederic prince of Wales afterwards made him his chaplain. He was a member of ſeveral foreign academies, and correſponding member of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris. He obtained from many competitors the prize propoſed by the French king, for the beſt account of electricity. In the latter part of his life, he lived over the Great Piazza in Covent-garden, where he carried on his lectures with great ſucceſs till his death, which happened in the year 1749. He publiſhed a Courſe of Experimental Philoſophy, 2 vols 4to; and an edition of Dr. Gregory's Elements of Catoptricks and Dioptricks.

DES BARREAUX. See BARREAUX.

DESCARTES. See CARTES, (RENE DES.)

DESEADA, or DESIRADA, a ſmall iſland, and one of the Caribbees in America, being but ten miles long, and five broad. This is the firſt land that was made by Chriſtopher Columbus, in his ſecond voyage to America, who found ſome parts of it pretty fruitful, and others ſandy and barren. It breeds guanas, and a multitude of birds called men of war, which are about the bigneſs of a kite, and ſhaped like it, but their bodies are black, and their necks red, and they feed upon fiſh. Their wings are very long, and they build their neſts upon trees. There is a deep cavern in this iſland, which is almoſt full of bones and pieces of bows and arrows, with other arms of the ancient Indians. It is eighteen miles from Mary-Galant, and ten from Guadaloupe. Long. 61. 15. W. Lat. 16. 36. N.

DESIDERIUS. See DIDIUS.

DESSAW, a town of Germany, ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Elbe and Mulde, in the circle of Upper Saxony, and the province of Anhalt, of which it is the capital. There is a great caſtle, near which there is a park, and near that a good ſalmon fiſhery. The inhabitants are proteſtants, but there are a great number of Jews. It has a univerſity, and is thirty-eight miles north of Leipſic. Long. 12. 50. E. Lat. 51. 58. N.

DESBOROUGH, or DISBROWE, (JOHN) brother-in-law to Oliver Cromwell, was bred to the law, but was never like to riſe to any eminence in that profeſſion. He was clumſy in his perſon, clowniſh in his manner, and boiſterous in his behaviour, and was ſo violent a republican, that he could never be reconciled to the name or office of a king in the neareſt of his relations. He was one of the council of ſtate to the protector, general at ſea, major-general of the counties of Glouceſter, Wilts, Dorſet, Somerſet, Devon, and Cornwall. But though he enjoyed thoſe great offices under him, he abhorred his power, and was ever entering into intrigues with the republicans. This, however, ſhews, that he was not actuated by ambition, and that he was ready to ſacrifice all his temporal advantages to what he eſteemed the happineſs of his country. After Oliver's death, he was promoted to the chancellorſhip of Ireland by Richard Cromwell; but ſtill perſevering in the ſame inflexible principles, he was one of the chief inſtruments in pulling him down, and transferring his power to the army. However, he is ſaid to have been only a tool in the hand of Lambert.

DESCHAMPS, (MAGDALEN) the mother of Lewis Servin, advocate-general in the parliament of Paris, under Henry III. held a diſtinguiſhed rank among the learned women of the ſixteenth century. The Greek and Latin tongues were almoſt as familiar to her as the French, which evidently appears from the poems ſhe wrote in thoſe three languages in honour of Francis Baudouin, a famous civilian.

DESCHAMPS, (FRANCIS MICHAEL CHRISTIAN) a French poet, born in Champagne, was the author of a tragedy intitled, Cato of Utica, and a hiſtory of the French Theatre. He died at Paris in 1747.

DESMARETS, (HENRY) a celebrated muſician, born at Paris in 1662. He was page to the king's muſic, and obtained a penſion at twenty years of age. At length, having married Mademoiſelle Saint Gobert, the daughter of the preſident of the election of Senlis, by the conſent of her mother, but without that of her father, he was condemned by the chatelet to ſuffer death. He however, eſcaped into Spain, where he became ſuperintendant to the king's muſic. Fourteen years after, he went into Lorrain, where he was director of the muſic of that court. His marriage had been declared valid by the parliament. He died at Luneville in 1741. We have ſeveral of his motets and operas, that of Iphigenia, retouched by Campra, is particularly eſteemed.

DESPORTES, (FRANCIS) a French painter of the eighteenth century, was born at the village of Champigneul, in Champagne, in 1661. Having accidentally ſeen a print during an illneſs which confined him to his bed, he amuſed himſelf in drawing it; and this attempt exciting the attention of thoſe who were about him, he became deſirous of learning to paint; he was therefore placed under the care of Nicaſius, a Flemiſh painter, and at length acquired a great reputation, not only in France, but in England and Poland. He particularly excelled in painting groteſque pieces, animals, flowers, fruit, landſcapes, and hunting-pieces, and alſo excelled in portraits. The king frequently took pleaſure in ſeeing him work, and loaded him with favours. He was received into the Academy of Painting, made pictures for the tapeſtry of the Gobelins, and died at Paris in 1743.

DETHMOLD, a town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia. It is ſeated on the river Wehre, and has a caſtle pretty well fortified. There is a beautiful pleaſure-houſe in the ſuburbs, with a very handſome garden. It is fifteen miles north of Paderborn. Long. 8. 35. E. Lat. 52. 0. N.

DETRIANUS, a celebrated architect under the emperor Adrian; was entruſted with the improvement of the moſt magnificent buildings of his time. He reſtored the Pantheon, the Baſilica of Neptune, the Forum Auguſti, the Baths of Agrippina, &c.

DETTINGEN, a village of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, between Aſchaffenburg and Seelighenſtadt, remarkable for the victory gained by king George II. over the French, June 16, 1743. Long. 7. 9. E. Lat. 50. 8. N.

DEVA, a port-town on the bay of Biſcay, in Spain, twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Bilboa, and thirteen north of Placentia. Long. 2. 27. W. Lat. 43. 30. N.

DEVAUX, (JOHN) a learned ſurgeon, eſteemed for his ſkill and his writings, was born at Paris on the 27th of January, 1649. He wrote Index funereus Chirurgorum Pariſienſium ab anno, 1315, ad annum 1714, alſo ſeveral other pieces, and tranſlations of many excellent works in phyſic and ſurgery. He died at Paris on the ſecond of May, 1729, aged eighty-one.

DEUCALION, in mythology, king of Theſſaly, was the ſon of Prometheus; he governed his people with equity, but the reſt of mankind being extremely wicked, were deſtroyed by a flood, while Deucalion and Pyrrha his queen ſaved themſelves by aſcending mount Parnaſſus. When the waters were decreaſed, they went and conſulted the oracle of Themis, on the means by which the earth was to be re-peopled; when they were ordered to veil their heads and faces, to unlooſe their girdles, and throw behind their backs the bones of their great mother. At this advice Pyrrha was ſeized with horror, but Deucalion explained the myſtery, by obſerving, that their great mother muſt mean the earth, and her bones the ſtones, when taking them up, thoſe Deucalion threw over his head became men, and thoſe thrown by Pyrrha, women.

The generality of mytholiſts explain this fable by obſerving, that there have been five conſiderable deluges, and that this, which was the ſecond, happened about the 1514th, or, according to others, in the 1523d year before the birth of Chriſt. Others ſuppoſe it to be a fabulous repreſentation of Noah's flood, and ſtrengthen this conjecture by obſerving, that Noah being called Iſch haadana, or Huſbandman, thoſe words may be tranſlated into Greek, ἀγὴρ Πύρρας, Pyrrha's huſband; and that the Phœnician word Eben, ſignifies both a ſtone and a ſon.

DEVEN-

DEVENTER, a city of the United Netherlands, in the province of Overyſſel. It was formerly a hans-town, and an imperial city, and is ſtill a place of pretty good trade. It is ſtrongly fortified with walls, flanked with a great many baſtions, and ſurrounded with ditches, filled with the waters of the Yſſel. There are ſix gates, four churches, and a ſtadt-houſe, remarkable for nothing but its antiquity. The buildings are neat and handſome, and among the inhabitants there are a great many people of faſhion. The moſt remarkable ſtructure is the tower of Norenberg, which is of a round figure, built with brick and ſtone, and walls ſeventeen feet thick. The dimenſions are ſo large, that it would require a garriſon of ſeveral thouſand men to defend it. There is an academy or public ſchool pretty much frequented. It is ſeated on the eaſt ſhore of the river Yſſel, eight miles north of Zutphen, twelve ſouth of Swoll, thirty eaſt of Amersfort, and fifty five eaſt of Amſterdam. Long. 6. 5. E. Lat. 52. 18. N.

DEVEREUX, (WALTER) the firſt earl of Eſſex of that family, was the ſon of Sir Richard Devereux, knight, and the grandſon of Walter viſcount of Hereford, and was born in Caermarthenſhire in the year 1540. In the nineteenth year of his age he ſucceeded to the titles of viſcount Hereford and lord Ferrers of Chartley. In 1569, upon the breaking out of the rebellion in the North under the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, he raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, and joining the lord admiral and the earl of Lincoln, was declared marſhal of the army. The manner in which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf on this occaſion, recommended him ſo highly to the queen, that, in 1572, ſhe honoured him with the garter, and the ſame year created him earl of Eſſex. His enemies now envying the favour in which he ſtood with the queen, encouraged an inclination he diſcovered, to venture his perſon and fortune in her majeſty's ſervice in Ireland; accordingly, on the 16th of Auguſt, 1573, he embarked for that kingdom with a multitude of volunteers; but meaſures were taken by the earl of Leiceſter to diſappoint all his deſigns, and to render his endeavours to ſuppreſs the rebellion ineffectual, ſo that at laſt he returned to England, where he was far from ſtifling the juſt indignation he had conceived againſt the all-powerful favourite. But as it was the cuſtom of that great man to debaſe his enemies by exalting them, he procured an order for his return to Ireland with the title of earl marſhal of that kingdom, with promiſes that he ſhould be kept more at liberty than before; but, upon his arrival in Ireland, he found his ſituation altered ſo little for the better that he pined away with grief, and being taken ill of a flux, died on the 22d of Sept. 1576, when he was ſcarcely thirty-five years old.

This noble earl was a brave ſoldier, a loyal ſubject, a moſt diſintereſted patriot, and one of the worthieſt, honeſteſt, and beſt of men.

DEVEREUX, (ROBERT) earl of Eſſex, a brave ſoldier, a great favourite, and an unhappy victim to the arts of his enemies and his own ambition, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was the ſon of the former, and was born at Nethewood, his father's ſeat in Herefordſhire, on the 10th of November, 1567. Walter, earl of Eſſex, a little before he breathed his laſt in Ireland, recommended his ſon to the protection of Thomas Radcliffe, earl of Suſſex, and to the care of William Cecil, lord Burleigh, whom he appointed his guardian. The latter therefore ſent him, when twelve years of age, to the univerſity of Cambridge, where he applied himſelf to learning with great diligence, and at length obtained the degree of maſter of arts. His firſt appearance at court as a candidate for royal favour, was in the ſeventeen year of his age, when he had a fine perſon, an agreeable behaviour, and an affability which procured him many friends, beſides the more valuable qualities of true piety, a zeal for the public welfare, and a warmth and ſincerity in his friendſhips, which intitled him to univerſal eſteem. He by degrees ſo far overcame his reluctance to uſe the aſſiſtance of the earl of Leiceſter, who, though his father's enemy, had married his mother, that, in 1585, he accompanied him to Holland, and the next year appeared in the field, with the title of general of the horſe, when he gave ſuch proofs of his perſonal courage in the battle of Zutphen, that the earl of Leiceſter conferred upon him the honour of a knight-banneret in his camp; and, on his return to England, he was, in December 1587, made maſter of the horſe. The following year, when her majeſty aſſembled an army at Tilbury, for the defence of the kingdom, ſhe gave the command of it under herſelf, to the earl of Leiceſter, and created the earl of Eſſex general of the horſe, whom ſhe alſo made knight of the garter.

In the beginning of 1589, the earl took a very extraordinary ſtep, which though it encreaſed his reputation for courage, did no great credit to his prudence. Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake had undertaken an expedition for reſtoring Don Antonio to the crown of Portugal, which the earl beheld as an action too glorious for others to perform, while he was only a ſpectator; he therefore followed the fleet and army to Spain, and having joined them at Corunna, proſecuted the reſt of the expedition with great vigilence and valour, which however was not attended with ſucceſs, and, at the ſame time, it expoſed him to the queen's diſpleaſure. However, at his return, he ſoon recovered her majeſty's favour, from whom he received grants of very conſiderable value. He now loſt the ſupport of his father in law the earl of Leiceſter, and about this time ran a new hazard of encurring her majeſty's diſpleaſure, by his private marriage with Frances, only daughter of Sir Francis Walſingham, and the widow of Sir Philip Sidney; and though this was for the preſent paſt over, yet it is thought it was not ſoon forgotten. In 1591, he was ſent over to the aſſiſtance of Henry IV. of France, when he behaved with great bravery; but offended the queen by conferring the honour of knighthood upon many of his officers. In 1596, the queen in order to prevent the Spaniards from meditating a ſecond invaſion, ordered a fleet to be equipped for attacking Cadiz, when the command, both of the army and fleet, were jointly intruſted to the earl of Eſſex, and Charles lord Howard, then lord high admiral of England. In this expedition the earl behaved with the greateſt intrepidity; he went to the aſſiſtance of the brave Sir Walter Raleigh, and offered, if he thought it neceſſary, to aſſiſt him with his ſhip in boarding the St. Philip. The Spaniards were obliged to ſet fire to their own veſſels, and the earl of Eſſex landing his men, attacked the place with ſuch fury, that it was quickly taken, and the next day the citadel ſurrendered, when having plundered the iſland, and demoliſhed the forts, they bore away for the port of Faro, which they alſo plundered and deſtroyed. In this expedition the Engliſh took two galleons, fifteen galleys, thirteen of the enemy's moſt ſerviceable ſhips, and forty Indiamen were deſtroyed, beſides an hundred braſs guns, and vaſt quantities of ammunition were brought to England.

Theſe glorious exploits were however far from being of any great advantage to the earl, who had long found with ſorrow, that whatever favours he was capable of obtaining for himſelf, he could procure none for his friends; and in his abſence, his enemies now inſinuated to the queen, that, conſidering the earl's popularity, it would not be at all expedient for her ſervice, to receive ſuch as he recommended to civil employments; and this they carried ſo far, as even to make his approbation deſtructive to men's fortunes; the queen, however, in 1597, appointed him maſter of the ordnance; after which, he was made general, admiral, and commander in chief, in another expedition againſt the Spaniards, in which Sir Walter Raleigh took the iſland of Fayall before the earl's arrival; and the ſame year, the earl of Eſſex was created earl marſhal of England. The next year he was made lord lieutenant of Ireland, and went over with a conſiderable army to put an end to the miſeries which ſtill ſubſiſted in that kingdom; but many croſs accidents rendered it impoſſible for him to reduce the Iriſh rebels; and while he was attempting it, his enemies were making uſe of all their endeavours to ruin him, till at laſt, the earl being wrought up to a degree of madneſs by the ſubtle artifices of his enemies, he ſettled the government in the beſt manner he was able, came over to England, and appeared at court before any notice could be received of his deſign, for which he was ſuſpended from the exerciſe of all his great offices, except that of maſter of the horſe, cloſely confined and treated with great ſeverity; but in the ſummer of 1600, he recovered his liberty. The beginning of the next year he received orders to attend the council, which he declined; he then gave out that his enemies ſought his life, kept a watch in Eſſex houſe all night, and ſummoned his friends for his defence the next morning; when the queen being informed of the great reſort of people of all ranks to the earl, ſent to know his grievances; but after a ſhort conference, he ordered the noble meſſengers to be confined; and then, attended by the earls of Rutland and Southampton, the lord Sands, the lord Monteagle, and about two hundred gentlemen, went into the city, where he was joined by the earl of Bedford, the lord Cromwell, and ſome other gentlemen; but his dependence on the populace failed him; at the ſame time, the lord Burleigh attended the king of arms, and proclaimed Eſſex and his adherents traytors in the principal ſtreets. The earl then finding it impoſſible to return to his houſe by land, ſent to have the queen's meſſengers releaſed, and, with his principal attendants, returned in boats to Eſſex-houſe, which was ſoon inveſted by the earl of Nottingham, lord admiral, with a great force, to whom, after many diſputes, and ſome blood ſpilt, he and his adherents, at laſt ſurrendered, and the earls of Eſſex and Southampton ampton were the next day ſent to the Tower. On the 19th of the ſame month they were arraigned before their peers, and after a long trial were condemned for high treaſon. In ſhort, the 25th of February was fixed for the execution of the earl of Eſſex, as to which the queen was irreſolute to the laſt, and ſent orders to countermand it; but conſidering his obſtinacy in refuſing to aſk her pardon, afterwards directed that he ſhould die.

It is ſaid that queen Elizabeth, in the height of her paſſion for the earl of Eſſex, gave him a ring, ordering him to keep it, and that whatever he ſhould commit, ſhe would pardon him, when he ſhould return that pledge: and that the earl finding himſelf in the laſt extremity, applied to admiral Howard's lady, his relation, deſiring her, by a perſon whom ſhe could truſt, to return it into the queen's own hands; but her huſband, who was one of the earl's greateſt enemies, would not ſuffer her to acquit herſelf of the commiſſion: but ſome time after falling ſick, and being near her death, ſhe ſent word to the queen that ſhe had ſomething of great conſequence to communicate before ſhe died. The queen came to her bed-ſide, and having ordered all her attendants to withdraw, the lady returned, but too late, the ring, deſiring to be excuſed that ſhe did not return it ſooner: on which, it is ſaid, the queen immediately retired, overwhelmed with grief.

As to the earl of Eſſex's character, he was learned, and an encourager of learned men; he wrote with great facility and perſpicuity; was a ſincere and generous friend; was ſound in his morals, except in point of gallantry; and alike deſpiſed the meanneſs of ſuperſtition, and the folly of infidelity. He died in the thirty-fourth year of his age, leaving by his lady one ſon and two daughters.

DEVEREUX (ROBERT) ſon to the former, and the third earl of Eſſex of this family, was born in 1592, at Eſſex-houſe in the Strand, and educated at Oxford. In 1603 he was reſtored to his hereditary honours, and in 1606, when but fourteen years of age, was married to the lady Frances Howard; but as they were both too young to cohabit together, the earl was ſent to improve himſelf by travelling. His lordſhip returned in 1610, with the reputation of being one of the moſt accompliſhed men of his time, and in this ſpace the counteſs of Eſſex was become a diſtinguiſhed beauty; but in the earl's abſence had placed her affections upon the viſcount Rocheſter, and in 1613 entered a public ſuit againſt the earl for impotency, and being countenanced by king James I. obtained a divorce, and was the ſame year married again with great pomp and ceremony. The earl of Eſſex afterwards made ſeveral campaigns in the Low Countries, and at length married in England Mrs. Elizabeth Paulet, but though he had a child by her, which he owned, he was divorced from her about two years after, on account of her familiarity with one Mr. Uvedale. In 1635 he was made vice-admiral of a fleet fitted out by king Charles I. to protect the trade of England againſt the French and Dutch; and though he was in general treated by his majeſty with great coldneſs, he was, in 1639, made lieutenant-general, and ſent againſt the rebellious Scots. In 1641 he was made lord-chamberlain, and appointed lieutenant-general of all the forces on this ſide the Trent. Upon the diſturbances which followed the king's going to the houſe of commons, to demand the five members; his majeſty retired from the capital, and ordered his houſhold ſervants to attend him, but the earls of Eſſex and Holland pleading their obligations to aſſiſt in the deliberations of the houſe of peers, were removed from their reſpective employments, on which he was the next year made general of the parliament's army, in which poſt he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery and conduct on many occaſions; but was at the ſame time extremely concerned at the miſeries of his country, and deſirous of producing an accommodation. He formed a ſcheme for charging lieutenant-general Cromwell in the houſe of commons as an incendiary; but was diſſuaded from it. However, on the paſſing of the ſelf-denying ordinance, by which all the members in both houſes were to be deprived of their commands, he ſurrendered his commiſſion, on the 2d of April, 1645; but the next year being ſeized with a ſudden and violent illneſs, died on the 14th of September, 1646. The parliament directed a public funeral for him, which was performed with great ſolemnity, on the 22d of October following, in the abbey-church of St. Peter, Weſtminſter. By his death the title of earl of Eſſex became extinct.

DEVIZES, a borough town in Wiltſhire, which has two pariſh churches, beſides a chapel on the Green, and a meeting-houſe for diſſenters. It has a woollen manufacture, and makes a conſiderable quantity of malt. It was formerly a ſtrong town till it was taken by the parliament forces in the reign of king Charles I. It is governed by a mayor, recorder, eleven maſters, and thirty-ſix common-council men. It ſends two members to parliament, and the market is on Thurſdays, and the fairs on February 13, for cattle; Holy Thurſday, for cattle, horſes, and ſheep; June 13, for horſes; July 5, for wool; October 2, for ſheep; and October 20, for ſheep and hogs. It is fourteen miles weſt of Marlborough, and eighty-nine in the ſame point from London. Long. 2. 6. W. Lat. 51. 25. N.

DEVONSHIRE, a county in the weſt of England, having the Briſtol channel on the north, the Engliſh channel on the ſouth, Cornwall on the weſt, and Somerſetſhire and Dorſetſhire on the eaſt. It is ſixty-one miles long, and fifty-four broad in the wideſt place. It is divided into thirty-three hundreds, hath thirty-eight market towns, three hundred and ninety-four pariſhes, fifty-ſix thouſand three hundred and ten houſes, about three hundred and thirty-ſeven thouſand eight hundred and ſixty inhabitants, and ſends twenty-ſix members to parliament. The ſoil of this county is not naturally very fruitful, but by the help of manure it well repays the labourer's toil. The manure near the ſea coaſt is a fattening ſand, and in other places marl and lime, beſides the help the ground receives from the burning of turf.

The mountains are ſteep and rocky, and will not admit of much improvement, but then they contain mines of tin, lead, iron, and copper; or at leaſt they did formerly, though they are now in a great meaſure neglected. The glebe and ſoil is different in different parts. On the eaſtern ſide it is chalky in ſome places, and very good for ſheep and corn; but in others where it is marley it is not proper for the feeding of ſheep. However, where the blue marle abounds, it yields good paſture for cattle, and the red is good to manure barren grounds. The ſouthern parts have plenty of graſs and corn, and may be called the garden of Devonſhire: but in the north and weſt the land is more over-run with hills and moors. The county in general is well watered with rivers and brooks, which abound with fiſh, and the ſea produces herrings and pilchards, which are of great advantage for home conſumption, and for exportation abroad. There are chalybeate and other mineral waters, but of no great repute; but Laywell, near St. Mary's church, is taken notice of for its ſometimes ebbing and flowing often in an hour, and ſometimes bubbling up like a boiling pot. The water is clear, cold in ſummer, and yet never freezes in the winter.

There are here a great number of apple-trees, and the inhabitants make a great quantity of cyder of the fruit, but many drink it to ſuch exceſs, that it produces a diſtemper not unlike the dry belly-ach. However, the exportation of it in ſuch large quantities, as is done ſome years, is of great advantage to the inhabitants. This county has ſeveral trading towns and good forts; and has more boroughs than any one in England, except Cornwall.

The towns which ſend members to parliament are the city of Exeter the capital, and boroughs of Totneſs, Plimouth, hampton, Barnſtaple, Plimpton, Taviſtock, Aſhburton, Dartmouth, Borealſton, and Tiverton. The towns which did ſend members to parliament, but have now loſt that privilege, are Bradninch, Crediton, Exmouth, Fremington, Lydford, Modbury, Tingmouth, South Moulton, and Chipping Torrington.

DEUSINGIUS (ANTHONY) a learned phyſician, born at Meurs, in 1612, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſkill in the Arabic, Perſian, and Turkiſh languages. He was profeſſor of phyſic at Groningen, and wrote ſeveral works, among which is a Treatiſe on the Motion of the Heart and Blood. He died at Groningen, in 1666, aged fifty-four.

DEUX-PONTS, the duchy of, is a ſmall territory in the circle of the Lower Rhine, in Germany, ſeated in the mountains of Waſgow. It is bounded on the weſt by Lorrain, and the county of Sarbruck; on the ſouth by Alſace, and on the other ſides by the Palatinate of the Rhine. It may be about fifty miles in length, and twenty in breadth, and is divided into five bailiwicks, of which Deux-Ponts, Landſberg, Lichtenberg, and Meiſſenheim, are the principal towns. It was once in poſſeſſion of France, but in 1693 it was reſtored to the king of Sweden, who was of the houſe of Deux-Ponts. Since the death of the king of Sweden, in 1718, it has paſt through ſeveral hands, and now belongs to the dukes of Birkenfield.

DEUX-PONTS, in the language of the country called Zweybruck, is capital of the duchy of that name. It is a pretty little town, has a good caſtle, and is ſeated on the little river Erbach, between Sarbruck and Caſtel Couter, thirty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Worms, fifty-five north-by-weſt of Straſburg, and fifty-three ſouth-weſt of Mentz. Long. 5. 50 E. Lat. 49. 20. N.

D'EWES (Sir SYMONDS) knt. and bart. a judicious critic, an eminent antiquary, and accurate hiſtorian, was born at Coxden, in Dorſetſhire, on the 18th of December, 1602, and educated at Cambridge. When he was little more than thirty years of age, he had finiſhed that large and accurate work, intitled the Journals of all the Parliaments during during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, both of the Lords and Commons. This work he kept by him while he lived. In 1641 he was created a baronet. He enjoyed the friendſhip, and even the eſteem of the moſt learned men of the age, ſuch as Sir Robert Cotton, Mr. Spelman, Mr. Selden, and others. In the long parliament, which met in 1640, he ſerved as burgeſs for the town of Sudbury, in Suffolk; and though upon the breaking out of the civil war, he adhered to the popular party, yet was he one of thoſe members who were expelled the houſe of commons, among thoſe who were thought to have ſome regard left for the perſon of the king. Being thus excluded from public buſineſs, he employed the remainder of his days in arranging and digeſting his Journals, which were afterwards publiſhed, and have ever ſince been conſidered as one of the moſt faithful parliamentary hiſtories of the reign of queen Elizabeth that ever was written. He died on the 8th of April, 1650, in the forty eighth year of his age.

DEXTER (JULIUS FLAVIUS) Præfectus Prætorio, in the time of Theodoſius the Great, was the ſon of Pacianus, biſhop of Barcelona. St. Gregory dedicated his work De Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis to him. The Chronicles that have been publiſhed under the name of Dexter are a ſuppoſititious work.

DEZ (JOHN) a famous French Jeſuit, born on the 3d of April, 1643. He taught polite literature, philoſophy, mathematics, and divinity, in his ſociety; and at length became rector of the college of Sedan. The moſt known of his works are, 1. The re-union of the Proteſtants of Straſburg to the Romiſh Church, equally neceſſary for their Salvation, and eaſy according to their own Principles, in octavo. 2. The Faith of Chriſtians and Catholics, vindicated againſt the Jews, Mahometans, Socinians, &c. four volumes.

DIADOCHUS, biſhop of Photæa, in Illyricum, about the year 385, or rather 460. He wrote a Treatiſe on ſpiritual Perfection, which is ſtill extant.

DIAGORAS, a famous wreſtler, of the iſle of Rhodes. He took two of his ſons to the Olympic games, when winning the crown, they took their father on their ſhoulders, and carried him through an incredible number of ſpectators, who threw flowers upon him, applauding his glory and good fortune. Pindar wrote an ode in Diagoras's praiſe, in which he mentioned the many victories he had obtained. This ode was placed in a temple of Minerva, in letters of gold. Diagoras was living in the ſeventy-ninth Olympiad, four hundred and fifty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra.

DIAGORAS, ſurnamed the Atheiſt, a famous philoſopher, a native of Melos, who was living in the four hundred and tenth year before the Chriſtian æra. He taught philoſophy at Athens, and boldly denied there being any gods, on which the Athenians ſummoned him to give an account of his doctrine; when flying, they ſet a price on his head. He however eſcaped out of their hands; and got a-board a ſhip, but was ſoon after caſt away and drowned.

DIAMASTIGOSIS, Διαμαστίγωσις, in Grecian antiquity, a ſolemnity at Sparta, in honour of Diana Orthia, in which it was uſual to whip boys upon the altar of the goddeſs. Theſe boys were at firſt free-born Spartans; but in more delicate ages, they were frequently the offſpring of ſlaves. Theſe ſcourgings were very ſevere and cruel, for leſt the boys ſhould be ſpared out of compaſſion, Diana's prieſteſs ſtood by, holding in her hand the goddeſs's image, which was very light; but it was pretended, that if the boys were ſpared, it grew ſo ponderous that ſhe could ſcarcely ſupport it. And leſt they ſhould faint under correction, or behave unworthy the Laconian education, their parents were uſually preſent to exhort them to bear their pain with conſtancy. And ſo great was the reſolution of the boys, that though they were ſometimes whipped to death, a cry or groan was ſeldom or never heard to proceed from them. However, thoſe who died by this means were buried with garlands upon their heads, and had the honour of a public funeral.

Whence this inhuman cuſtom had its origin is not certainly known.

DIANA, in the pagan worſhip, the goddeſs of chaſtity, was the daughter of Jupiter and Latona. At her requeſt her father granted her perpetual virginity; conſtituted her queen of the woods and foreſts; and aſſigned her a guard of nymphs for her attendants. She was alſo the patroneſs of hunting, and aſſiſted women in labour.

Diana had a great variety of names. She was called Orthia by the Spartans; Orrhoſia by the Arcadians; Artemis, on account of her honour and modeſty; and Cynthia and Delia, from the place of her birth. She was alſo called Dea Triformis, or Tergemena, on account of her triple character, of Luna in heaven, Diana on earth, and Hecate in the infernal regions; under each of which characters ſhe was repreſented as of different deſcent, and eſpecially in the laſt was deſcribed of a very different form. Indeed Heſiod makes Luna, Diana, and Hecate, three diſtinct goddeſſes. See LUNA and HECATE.

The adventures of Diana make a conſiderable figure in poetic hiſtory; but for theſe ſee the articles ACTEON, MELEAGER, ALPHEUS, CHIONE, &c.

She was repreſented above the common ſtature, with a creſcent on her forehead, a bow in her hand, and a quiver at her back; with a deer-ſkin faſtened to her breaſt, and her purple robe tucked up at the knees, with golden claſps or buckles, and attended by nymphs with nets and hounds. The ſacrifices offered to her, were the firſt fruits of the earth, white hinds, oxen, and rams. The moſt magnificent of her temples was that of Epheſus, which paſſed for one of the wonders of the world, and was burnt on the ſame day in which Alexander the Great was born, in the three hundred and fifty-ſixth year before Chriſt.

It is very probable that this goddeſs was originally no more than the Lunar Iſis of the Egyptians, who was on particular occaſions repreſented with a creſcent and full moon over her head, and that her different characters under the names of Luna and Hecate, aroſe from the alterations made in the attributes of that hieroglyphical ſymbol.

DIANA (JOHN NICHOLAS DE) a Jeſuit who rendered himſelf famous by the proſecution he ſuffered for a ſermon which he preached on St. Lucifer, which was condemned by the Inquiſitors of Sardinia, who proſecuted him for thirteen years together, but at laſt a decree was paſt in his favour, on the 19th of December, 1653.

DIARBECK, DIARBEKER, AMID, CARAMIT, and CARA-HEMID, all mean the ſame place, though ſome geographers have made them two different towns. It is a city of Turky, in Aſia, and capital of Diarbeck, and is ſeated on the river Tigris, one hundred and thirty miles north of Moſul. It is a large populous trading place, and is noted for linen and cotton cloth. Likewiſe red Turky leather is better prepared there than any other place in the Levant. Here are a great number of Armenian, Neſtorian, and Jacobite Chriſtians. It is fortified in the old manner, with a double wall, the outermoſt of which is flanked with ſixty-two towers. It is one hundred and fifty miles north from Aleppo. Long. 39. 0. E. Lat 37. 30. N.

DICÆARCHUS, a famous philoſopher, orator, and geometrician, was the ſon of Phidias. He was born in Meſſina, and was a ſcholar of Ariſtotle. He compoſed a great number of excellent works, of which only a few fragments are now remaining; among which were, 1. A treatiſe to prove that men ſuffer more miſchief from one another, than from all other evils. 2. A Deſcription of the Manners of the Greeks in different Ages: and, 3. A treatiſe in which he deſcribed the Spartan republic. This treatiſe was found ſo exact and uſeful to the Spartans themſelves, that they ordered it to be publicly read to youth every year. Cicero cites ſeveral other of Dicæarchus's works, and beſtows great praiſes upon them.

DICENÆUS, an Egyptian philoſopher, who went into Scythia under the reign of Auguſtus, and inſinuated himſelf ſo far into the eſteem of the king, that he became one of his principal counſellors. He ſoftened the barbarous manners of that people; gave them laws and religious ceremonies, and was held by them in ſuch great veneration, that they pulled up their vines, and reſolved to drink no more wine, on his convincing them of the diſorders into which it threw mankind.

DICKINSON, or DICKENSON (EDMUND) a famous phyſician and chemiſt, born at Appleton, in Berkſhire, on the 26th of September, 1624. Having received the firſt rudiments of learning at Eton, he finiſhed his ſtudies at Oxford, and was at length appointed one of the phyſicians in ordinary to king Charles II. He wrote, 1. Delphi Phœnicianteſ, i. e. Delphos derived from the Phœnicians. 2. A Latin Epiſtle to Theodore Mundanus. 3. Phyſica Vetus & Vera; and left behind him a Latin Treatiſe on the Grecian Games. He died of the ſtone, on the 3d of April, 1707, in the eighty-third year of his age.

DICTATOR, in Roman antiquity, a magiſtrate choſen upon particular emergencies, as on account of a dangerous war, or ſedition, and inveſted with a ſovereign, and even abſolute authority. He had the power of life and death; of making peace or war, and raiſing or diſbanding troops, without conſulting the ſenate; he could inflict puniſhments as he pleaſed, and from his judgment there was no appeal. He was elected by one of the conſuls in the night time, on the frontiers of the common-wealth, and no where elſe; and the ordinary duration of his office was only for ſix months, during which time all other magiſtracies ceaſed, except the tribuneſhip. Whenever he appeared in public, he was attended by twenty-four lictors, which was double the number allowed to a conſul. But notwithſtanding this power, he could not go out of Italy, or even ride on horſeback during a march, without leave from the people.

This office was reputed the only ſafeguard of the commonwealth in times of danger, for four hundred years together, till Sylla and Cæſar, by aſſuming the names of perpetual dictators, converted it into tyranny, and rendered the very name odious; and therefore, upon the murder of the latter, a decree paſſed in the ſenate againſt the uſe of it upon any account whatſoever.

DICTYNNA, in fabulous hiſtory, a nymph of Crete, and one of the companions of Diana, who was alſo called Dictynna. To her was attributed the invention of nets for hunting, fowling, and fiſhing.

DICTYS (CRETENSIS) a very ancient hiſtorian, who ſerved in the Trojan war under Idomeneus, king of Crete, wrote the hiſtory of that expedition in nine books. However, the Latin Hiſtory of Dictys is allowed to be ſpurious. The beſt edition of it is that publiſhed in quarto at Paris, by Miſs Le Fevre, afterwards Madam Dacier, in 1680.

DIDIUS, or DESIDERIUS, the laſt king of the Lombards, was elected in 756, after the death of Atulphus, to whom he was conſtable; but was conquered and taken priſoner by Charlemagne, who, in 774, brought him with his family into France, where he died a ſhort time after, and by his death an end was put to the kingdom of the Lombards, which had laſted two hundred and ſix years.

DIDIUS (JULIAN) emperor of Rome, was born at Milan, of an illuſtrious family, and was the ſon of Salvius Julian, an able civilian, who was twice conſul and preſect of Rome. Didius uſurped the empire after the death of Pertinax; but was overcome by Severus, and killed in his palace on the 29th of September, 193, aged ſixty; after his having reigned only a few months.

DIDO, the daughter of Belus, king of Tyre, and the wife of Sichæus. To avoid the tyranny of her brother Pygmalion, who had put her huſband to death, ſhe fled into Africa, where ſhe built Carthage, in the eight hundred and eighty-ſecond year before the birth of Chriſt. At length Hiarbas, king of the Getuli, having demanded her in marriage, and threatening, in caſe of refuſal, to make war on the Carthagenians, Dido cauſed a pile to be erected, and after having ſacrificed victims, as if to appeaſe the manes of her huſband, aſcended the pile, and ſtabbed herſelf with a poniard in the ſight of the people. From this action ſhe obtained the name of Dido, or the Reſolute Woman, ſhe being before called Eliſa.

Virgil makes her cotemporary with Æneas, and his chronology is juſtified by the great ſir Iſaac Newton; while other learned men maintain that Æneas was never either in Carthage or Italy, and that he lived above three hundred years before Dido.

DIDYMUS OF ALEXANDRIA, ſurnamed Calcenteros, or Entrails of Braſs, on account of his indefatigable application to ſtudy, lived in the reign of Auguſtus, and, according to Seneca, compoſed four thouſand treatiſes, which acquired him great reputation.

DIDYMUS OF ALEXANDRIA, one of the moſt pious and learned authors of the fourth century, loſt his ſight at five years of age; which did not prevent his becoming very learned, by cauſing the ſacred and profane authors to be read to him. He even taught mathematics, and was thought worthy of filling the chair in the ſchool of the church of Alexandria. Didymus had St. Jerome, Ruſinus, Palladius, Iſidorus, and other great men for his diſciples. He was of Origen's ſentiments, and died, according to Palladius, in the year 398, aged eighty-five. There is ſtill extant only a Treatiſe of his on the Holy Spirit, in Latin, tranſlated by St. Jerome, and to be found in his works: ſome ſhort ſtrictures upon the canonical epiſtles, and a book againſt the Manichees.

DIE, a town of France, in Dauphiny, with a biſhop's ſee. Before the revocation of the edict of Nantz, here was an univerſity for proteſtants; as alſo a citadel which has been ſince demoliſhed. It is ſeated on the river Drome, twenty-three miles ſouth eaſt of Valence, thirty-eight north-weſt of Gap, thirty ſouth-eaſt of Grenoble, and three hundred and eighty-five ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 23. E. Lat 44. 44. N.

DIEMERBROEK (ISBRAND) a learned profeſſor of phyſic and anatomy at Utrecht, was born at Montfort, in Holland, on the 13th of December, 1609, where he acquired great reputation by his lectures and his practice, and died at Utrecht, on the 17th of November, 1674. He wrote a Treatiſe on the Plague, which is eſteemed, and ſeveral learned works in anatomy and medicine, which were printed at Utrecht in 1685, in folio.

DIEPENBECK (ABRAHAM VAN) an eminent painter, was born at Boiſleduc, and in his youth was much employed in painting on glaſs, in which he is ſaid to have excelled all his cotemporaries: afterwards entering the ſchool of Rubens, he became one of his beſt diſciples, his invention being eaſy and ingenious. He came into England, ſays the honourable Mr. Walpole, and was much employed by William Cavendiſh, duke of Newcaſtle, whoſe managed horſes he drew from the life: he alſo drew views of the duke's ſeats in Nottinghamſhire and Derbyſhire; and portraits of the duke, ducheſs, and his children. He gave deſigns for ſeveral plates prefixed to the works of both their graces; and likewiſe deſigned the prints for a book intitled the Temple of the Muſes.

DIEPPE, is a ſea-port town of Normandy, in France, ſeated at the mouth of the river Arcques, between Treport, d'Eu, and St. Valery, and fifteen miles from each. It was almoſt demoliſhed by the bombardment of the Engliſh, in 1694, but has been ſince rebuilt, after the manner of Verſailles. The ſtreets are wide, and laid in a line. The houſes are all built with bricks, and ſupported by arches. There are two public ſquares, and ſeveral fountains, but without any ornament. It has two pariſhes, ſeveral religious houſes, and the fathers of the Oratory have a college. The town is ſeparated from the ſea by a long wall and a ditch, with three towers furniſhed with cannon and mortars. The harbour is long, narrow, and crooked, and is ſixteen or eighteen feet deep at high water, and contains merchant veſſels of all ſizes. The mole is very high and ſtrongly built, and is near five hundred yards in length. It forms, with that of Polet, the entrance of the canal of the harbour. The caſtle of Dieppe is conſtructed in the antique manner, and ſtands upon a hill by the ſea-ſide. It is made up of three ſmall caſtles, which communicate with each other by draw-bridges. The proſpect from the terraces is very agreeable. The inhabitants are laborious, and conſiſt chiefly of ſeamen. The reſt are employed in the ivory manufacture, toys, and bone-lace. The ſuburb called Polet communicates with the town by a bridge of boats, and the inhabitants are as famous for their works in horn as the others in ivory. The town has twenty gates, whereof twelve are along the quay. The manufacture of tobacco and ſnuff is alſo carried on at Dieppe. It is ninety-five miles north-weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 9. E. Lat. 49. 55. N.

DIEPHOLT, a town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, ſeated at the north end of Dummer lake, thirty five miles ſouth of Bremen, ſubject to the elector of Hanover. Long. 8. 12. E. Lat 53. 20. N.

DIESSENHOVEN, a conſiderable town in Swiſſerland, ſeated on the Rhine, in the Thurgow. It is under the protection of the cantons of Zurich and Schaffhauſen. It is ſurrounded with walls, and the inhabitants are of the reformed religion. It is five miles ſouth of Schaffhauſen. Long. 7. 20. E. Lat. 47. 45. N.

DIEST, a town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in Brabant, formerly conſiderable, but now much decayed. It was taken by the duke of Marlborough in 1705, and afterwards by the French, who diſmantled it. It is noted for its manufacture of cloth and ſtockings, and for its good beer and ſauſages. It is ſeated on the river Diemer, on the confines of Liege, fifteen miles north-eaſt of Lovain, ten north-eaſt of Tillemont, and five ſouth-eaſt of Aerſcot. Long. 5. 15. E. Lat. 51. 16. N.

DIETRIC (JOHN CONRAD) a learned German writer, was born at Butzbach, in Weteravia, in 1612. After having ſtudied at Marpurg, Jena, and Straſburg, he travelled through Germany, Holland, and Denmark, and contracted an acquaintance with the moſt learned men of thoſe countries. On his return he was made profeſſor of the Greek language, and of hiſtory, at Marpurg; and at length was profeſſor at Gieſſen, where he died, in 1667. He wrote ſeveral works which are eſteemed, among theſe are, 1. The Antiquities of the Old and the New Teſtament. 2. Lexicon etymologicum Græcum. 3. Diſcurſus hiſtorico-politicus de Peregrinatione Studiorum, &c.

DIETZ, a town of Germany, in Weteravia, capital of the diſtrict of the ſame name. It is defended by a double caſtle, and is ſubject to the prince of Naſſaw Dillemburg. It is ſeated on the river Lohn, fifteen miles eaſt of Coblentz, eight north-eaſt of Naſſaw, and twenty-five north of Mentz. Long. 7. 38. E. Lat. 50. 31. N.

DIEU (LEWIS DE) miniſter of Leyden, and profeſſor in the Walloon college, in that city, was born at Fluſhing, April 7, 1590. He publiſhed a Commentary on the four Goſpels, and Notes on the Acts of the Apoſtles and the Apocalypſe of St. John, which he printed in Hebrew and Syriac, with a Latin verſion of his own, and ſeveral other learned works.

DIEUSE, a town of France, in Lorrain, between Metz and Saverne, ſeated near the lake Linder, where they take carps of a prodigious ſize. It is noted for its ſalt pits, out of which they make a great deal of ſalt. It is five miles eaſt of Marſal, and twenty three north-eaſt of Nancy. Long. 6. 45 E. Lat. 48. 50. N.

DIGBY (ſir EVERARD) memorable for his ſuffering for the powder-plot, was the ſon of Everard Digby, of Dryſtoke, in Rutlandſhire, and was born in the year 1481. He was early brought to the court of queen Elizabeth, where he received ſeveral marks of her majeſty's favour. He was alſo graciouſly graciouſly received by king James I. who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He married the daughter and ſole heireſs of William Mulſho, eſq. with whom he had a great fortune. He had the misfortune to be acquainted with ſir Thomas Treſham, a very zealous papiſt, who was continually inſtilling into him diſaffection againſt his prince, as did alſo Mr. Cateſby, who projected the ſcheme of blowing up the parliament-houſe, and ſeems to have had, in a great meaſure, the direction of that affair. He communicated that horrid ſcheme to ſir Everard, who, though he is repreſented as being of a mild temper, offered fifteen hundred pounds towards defraying the expences of the gunpowder-plot, entertained Mr. Guy Fawkes, who was to have executed it, in his own houſe, and was taken, with others of the Romiſh religion, in open rebellion, after the plot had miſcarried. It is ſaid, the principal reaſon of his engaging in this affair was his being told that the reſtoring of the catholic religion was the duty of every member, and therefore he was not to regard the favours he had received from the crown, the tranquility of his country, or the hazards he might run with reſpect to his life, his family, or his fortune. He was brought to his trial at Weſtminſter, on the 27th of January, 1605-6, and pleaded guilty. When ſentence of death was paſſed, he ſeemed much affected, and making a low bow to thoſe on the bench, ſaid, "If I could hear any of your lordſhips ſay, you forgave me, "I ſhould go the more chearfully to the gallows." To which all the lords anſwered, "God forgive you, and we "do." He was, with other conſpirators, hanged, drawn, and quartered, on the 30th of the ſame month, at the weſt end of St. Paul's church, London. Mr. Wood has the credulity to repreſent, as a thing generally known, that when the executioner had plucked out his heart, and held it up, ſaying, "This is the heart of a traitor," ſir Everard ſaid, "Thou lieſt."

DIGBY (ſir KENELM) rendered himſelf very famous in the laſt century by his valour and learning. He was born at Gothurſt, in Buckinghamſhire, July 11, 1603. His father was beheaded for being engaged in the gunpowder-plot againſt king James I. He was then but in the third year of his age; but he ſeems to have been taken early out of his mother's hands, ſince he was bred up in the proteſtant religion. His eſtate was recovered by law, it being decided that king James had no right to it. About the year 1618, he was admitted a gentleman commoner of Glouceſter hall, Oxford, where having continued between two and three years. He made the tour of France, Spain, and Italy; and returning to England in 1623, he was preſented to the king, and received the honour of knighthood.

After the deceaſe of king James, he was appointed a gentleman of the bed-chamber, a commiſſioner of the navy, and a governor of Trinity-houſe. Some diſputes happening with the Venetians, ſir Kenelm was, in 1628, ſent, as admiral, with a ſmall fleet, into the Mediterranean, and gained great honour by his bravery and conduct at Algiers, in reſcuing many Engliſh ſlaves, and attacking the Venetian fleet in the bay of Scanderoon. In 1632, he had an excellent library left him by his tutor at Oxford, which he, the next year, preſented to the Bodleian library. Till this time, ſir Kenelm continued a member of the church of England; but ſome time after, going to France, he reconciled himſelf the church of Rome, and upon that occaſion wrote an apology for his conduct to Dr. Laud, to which the archbiſhop returned an affectionate anſwer. Soon after, ſir Kenelm publiſhed a Conference with a Lady about the Choice of Religion. In the beginning of the civil wars, he exerted himſelf very vigouroufly in the king's cauſe; but was afterwards impriſoned, by the parliament's order, in Wincheſter houſe, and had leave to depart thence in 1643. He afterwards compounded for his eſtate; but was ordered to leave the nation, when he went to France, and was ſent on two embaſſies to pope Innocent X. from the queen, widow to Charles I. whoſe chancellor he then was; but, on the Reſtoration, he returned to England. Having read the writings of Des Cartes, he went to Holland to ſee that philoſopher; and having diſcourſed with him a long time without making himſelf known, M. Des Cartes, who had ſeen ſome of his works, told him, he did not doubt but he was the famous ſir Kenelm Digby. "And if you, ſir," replied the knight, "were not the illuſtrious M. Des Cartes, I ſhould "not have come over from England on purpoſe to ſee you." He alſo wrote, 1. A Treatiſe of the Nature of Bodies. 2. A Treatiſe of the Nature of Man's Soul. 3. Of the Cure of Wounds by the Powder of Sympathy, and ſeveral other works. He died June 11, 1665, and was interred in a vault, in Chriſt church near Newgate, London. The following epitaph was intended to be placed on his tomb.

Under this tomb, the matchleſs DIGBY lies,
DIGBY, the great, the valiant, and the wiſe;
This age's wonder, for his noble parts,
Skill'd in ſix tongues, and learn'd in all the arts.
Born on the day he died, the 11th of June,
And that day bravely fought at Scanderoon.
It's rare that one and the ſame day ſhould be
His day of birth, of death, of victory.

R. FERRAR.

DIGBY (JOHN) earl of Briſtol, was father of the celebrated lord Digby, and by no means inconſiderable himſelf, tho' checked by the circumſtances of the times from making ſo great a figure in various lights, as fortune and his own talents ſeemed to promiſe. Marked for a ſeaſon as a favourite by king James, he was eclipſed by the predominant luſtre of the duke of Buckingham, and traverſed by the ſame impetuoſity in his Spaniſh negociations, to which his grave and ſteady temper had adapted him. Being attacked by that over-bearing man, he repelled and worſted him, and ſhone greatly among the diſcontented in parliament; but the violences of that aſſembly ſoon diſguſted his ſolemn diſpoſition, for he that was not ſupple enough for a court, was by far too haughty for popularity; he would have been a ſuitable miniſter for Auſtrian phlegm, or a proper patriot in a diet, which would have been content to proceed by remonſtrance and memorial. A mercurial favourite and a military ſenate overſet him. In his youth he was a poet, and wrote, 1. Verſes on the Death of Sir Henry Unton, and other poems. 2. A Tract, wherein is ſet down thoſe motives and ties of religion, oaths, laws, loyalty, and gratitude, which obliged him to adhere to the king in the late unhappy wars. 3. A Tract, wherein he vindicates his honour and innocence from deſerving the injurious and mercileſs cenſure of being excepted from pardon. Theſe two pieces have the general title of his Apology, and, with an appendix to the firſt tract, were printed together with both pieces in folio, and re-printed, in quarto, in 1656. 4. An Anſwer to the Declaration of the Houſe of Commons againſt making any more Addreſſes to the King, quarto. 5. A Tranſlation of Peter du Moulin's book, entitled A Defence of the Catholic Faith, contained in the book of king James againſt the Anſwer of N. Coeffeteau. The Dedication to the King is in the name of J. Sandford, his chaplain; and there are ſeveral of his Letters in the Cabala. Mr. Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors.

DIGBY (lord GEORGE) the ſon of John Digby, earl of Briſtol, was born at Madrid, in October, 1612, and ſtudied at Oxford, where he was created maſter of arts. In the beginning of the long parliament he was diſaffected to the court; but ſoon changing ſides, became a declared enemy to the parliament, and, in 1641, was expelled the houſe, and removed into Holland. However, in a ſecret expedition to the king, he was taken by one of the parliament's ſhips, and carried to Hull; but being in ſuch a diſguiſe that his neareſt relations could not know him, he brought himſelf off very dextrouſly by his artful management of ſir John Hotham the governor. In 1643, he was made ſecretary of ſtate to his majeſty, and high ſteward of the univerſity of Oxford. In 1645, he went into Ireland, where he expoſed his life for the ſervice of the king. From thence he paſſed over to Jerſey, where the prince of Wales was, and after that into France, to tranſact ſome important affairs with the queen and cardinal Mazarine. After the king's death, he lived in exile till the Reſtoration, when he was reſtored to all he had loſt, and made knight of the garter. He then became very active in public affairs, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his enmity to lord Clarendon. He ſucceeded his father as earl of Briſtol, and died at Chelſea, on the 20th of March, 1676, aged ſixty-four. There is a volume of his Letters publiſhed. He alſo wrote Elvira, a comedy, and tranſlated the three firſt books of Caſſandra from the French. A celebrated author gives him this character: He was (ſays he) a ſingular perſon, whoſe life was one contradiction; he wrote againſt popery, and embraced it; he was a zealous oppoſer of the court, and a ſacrifice for it; was conſcientiouſly converted in the midſt of his proſecution of lord Strafford, and was moſt unconſcientiouſly a proſecutor of lord Clarendon; with great parts, he always hurt himſelf and his friends; with romantic bravery, he was always an unſucceſsful commander; he ſpoke for the teſt-act, though a Roman Catholic, and addicted himſelf to aſtrology, on the birth-day of true philoſophy.

DIGGES (LEONARD) eſq a conſiderable mathematician, born at Digges-Court, in the pariſh of Berham, in Kent, and educated at Oxford. He wrote, 1. Tectonicum, briefly ſhewing the exact meaſuring, and ſpeedy reckoning of all manner of lands, ſquares, timber, &c. quarto. 2. A geometrical treatiſe, named Pantometria, folio. 3. Prognoſtication everlaſting of right good Effect; or Choice Rules to judge the weather by the ſun, moon, and ſtars, quarto. He died about the year 1574.

DIGGES (THOMAS) ſon of the former, was educated at Oxford, and was afterwards muſter-maſter-general of the forces ſent by queen Elizabeth to the aſſiſtance of the oppreſſed inhabitants of the Netherlands. He wrote, 1. Alæ, ſive Scalæ mathematicæ. 2. An arithmetical military Treatiſe, containing ſo much of Arithmetic as is neceſſary towards wards military Diſcipline. 3. A perfect Deſcription of the celeſtial Orbs; and other works. He died on the 24th of Auguſt, 1595.

DIGGES (ſir DUDLEY) knt. eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was born in 1583, and educated at Oxford, after which he ſtudied in the inns of court, and then travelled, having firſt received the honour of knighthood. On his return home, he was employed by king James I. in ſeveral embaſſies, and had a ſeat in parliament, both in that and the beginning of the following reign, in which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal for the liberties of his fellow ſubjects, and was ſent to the Tower for being one of thoſe patriots, who endeavoured to bring George Villars, duke of Buckingham, to an account. He was afterwards made maſter of the rolls, and died on the 18th of March, 1638 9. He was the author of, 1. A Defence of Trade. 2. A Diſcourſe on the Rights and Privileges of the Subject; and other works.

DIGNANT, a town of Iſtria, in Italy, ſubject to the Venetians, and is ſeated about three miles from the ſea, and five from Puola Long 14. 5. E. Lat. 45. 10. N.

DIGNE, a town of France, in Provence, with a biſhop's ſee. It is noted for the baths which are near it. It is ſeated on the river Mardaric, thirty-five miles ſouth-by-weſt of Embrun, eighteen ſouth-eaſt of Siſteron, and three hundred and eighty-ſeven ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 27. E. Lat. 44 5. N.

DIJON, a city of France, and capital of the duchy of Burgundy, ſeated at a diſtance from the two hills Salan and Fontaines, and at the entrance of a vaſt plain, which extends twenty miles ſouthwards. On the weſt ſide is a long chain of hills, covered with vineyards, which renders Burgundy famous for excellent wine.

The city is large, handſome, and well-built, and the ſtreets are wide and ſtrait. Two ſmall rivers waſh the walls, the Ouche on the ſouth ſide, and the Suzon on the north, uniting their ſtreams after they have paſt the city. The fortifications are a ditch and twelve baſtions, with a fer de cheval to harbour a guard, which may prevent ſurprizes. Theſe are to defend the gate on the ſouth ſide. The walls are good and furniſhed with towers after the antique manner. Theſe are interrupted by nothing but a ſquare caſtle; and at each corner are four large round towers. It is flanked with two fers de cheval

The entrance into Dijon is by four gates, which are very agreeable and commodious; particularly, without the gate of Ouche, there is a cauſeway three quarters of a mile long, edged with elm trees; likewiſe, there is a fine walk, leading to St. Peter's gate, of the ſame length, planted with four rows of trees, and terminated with a park, embelliſhed with flower-pots, ſhady walks, and mazes, beyond which is a terrace on the ſide of the river Ouche, over which is a bridge. William's gate is the moſt frequented, becauſe thoſe that come and go from and to Paris paſs through it. Entering through this gate, you meet firſt with the abbey of St. Benigne, which is an old Gothic ſtructure. Next to this are two pariſh churches, of which there are ſeven in all, and a ſquare, where the executions are performed. The Cordelier's ſquare is very large and regular, but always dirty. The ſquare before the collegiate church of St. Peter is where the inhabitants take their evening's walk, and where the public rejoicings are celebrated. Here there is a fountain, adorned with the ſtatue of Hercules in bronze, after the antique.

St. Peter's church is admired for the beauty of its portico, adorned with ſculptures, and for its two towers conſtructed in the form of a dome. The front of that of Notre Dame is beautified with excellent architecture, and a very high ſteeple built in a ſingular taſte. St. John's church has a very high ſpire, and two ſmall ſteeples of the ſame figure. It is remarkable that the roof of this church is ſo contrived as to want no pillars to ſupport it. There is only another abbey for men, which is a pariſh church, and has a fine library belonging to it. There are likewiſe two abbeys for women. Adjoining to one of the churches there is a cloiſter of the canons, where they keep the miraculous hoſt, which, as is pretended, being ſtabbed by a Jew, became ſpotted with blood, which has remained ever ſince. It is kept in a gold box, adorned with jewels.

Behind the choir of St. Benigne, is a very ancient building, of a round figure, ſupported by one hundred and four pillars, and lightened only from the top, which is ſuppoſed to have been a heathen temple like the Pantheon at Rome. In the ſquare before the governor's palace is an equeſtrian ſtatue of Lewis XIV. in braſs.

The Jeſuits had a magnificent college here, and a large library. Their church is finely embelliſhed, and contains a tabernacle, a devant-autel, and ſeveral ſhrines, all of maſſy ſilver, which they ſhow on the great feſtivals. It would be endleſs to deſcribe the rarities in all the convents, nunneries, churches, and the governor's palace; therefore we ſhall only take notice that there are three large hoſpitals, one for orphans, another for pilgrims and ſtrangers, and a third for the ſick; and that the Chartreuſe is one of the richeſt and fineſt in France; likewiſe that two tombs of black marble, erected for two of the dukes of Burgundy are accounted the greateſt curioſities in Dijon.

This city has a parliament, a biſhoprick conferred in 1731, an univerſity for the ſtudy of law, an academy of ſciences, a chamber of accounts, an intendance, and a mint. It is forty-eight miles north eaſt of Autun, forty-eight weſt of Beſanzon, one hundred north of Lyons, and one hundred and ſixty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long 5. 7. E. Lat. 47. 19. N.

DILIGE, a ſtrong town in the iſland of Ceylon, where the king of Candy reſides. Long. 81. 35. E. Lat. 7. 40. N.

DILLEMBURG, a town of Germany, in Wetteravia, with a good caſtle, ſubject to the houſe of Naſſau. It is twenty-three miles north-weſt of Marpurg, forty-five north of Frankfort, and fifty eaſt of Bonn. Long. 8. 24. E. Lat. 50. 45. N.

DILLEN (JOHN JAMES) a native of Germany, and profeſſor of botany at Oxford, was the author of the following works: 1. Catalogus Plantarum circa Gieſſam ſponte naſcentium. 2. Hortus Elthamenſis, in folio. 3. Hiſtoria Muſcorum. He died in 1747.

DILLENGEN, a town of Germany, in Suabia, with an univerſity. It is ſeated near the Danube, twenty-five miles north-eaſt of Burgaw, eighteen north-eaſt of Augſburg, and eight ſouth-weſt of Newburg. Long. 11. 35. E. Lat. 48. 38. N.

DILLON (WENTWORTH) earl of Roſcommon. See ROSCOMMON.

DINAH, the daughter of Jacob and Leah, was born about the one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra. Shechem, the ſon of Hamor, king of Salem, having defiled Dinah, Simeon and Levi, in order to revenge their ſiſter, perſuaded Shechem to circumcize himſelf and his people, pretending that they would afterwards give her to him in marriage; but, ſome days after, they treacherouſly killed him, with all the Shechemites, and plundered the city.

DINAN, a town of Brittany, in France, ſeated on a mountain, and ſurrounded with a wall ſo thick that a coach may be driven upon it. It has a ſtrong caſtle and ſeveral convents, and is noted for a great fair the firſt week in Lent. It ſtands on the river Rance, fifteen miles ſouth of St. Malo, thirty north-weſt of Rennes and two hundred and eight weſt of Paris. Long. 2. 8. W. Lat. 48. 27. N.

DINANT, a town of Germany, in the biſhoprick of Liege, with a caſtle ſeated on a rock. When the French had it in their hands they made it a ſtrong place; but when they gave it back to the biſhop of Liege, they demoliſhed the fortifications in 1703. It is ſeated near the river Meuſe, in a diſtrict containing quarries of black marble, and mines of iron, thirteen miles ſouth of Namur, thirty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Mons, and forty weſt of Liege. Long 4. 48. E. Lat. 48. 38. N.

DINARCHUS, a Greek orator, was the ſon of Soſtrates, and the diſciple of Theophraſtus. He amaſſed great ſums of money by compoſing orations; but being accuſed of receiving preſents from the enemies of the republic, he fled; but was recalled about fifteen years after. He flouriſhed in the three hundred and thirty-third year before the Chriſtian æra. Dinarchus compoſed ſixty-four orations, of which there are only three remaining. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus calls this orator Demoſthenes the Savage.

DINASMONDY, a town of Merionethſhire, in North Wales, with a market on Fridays, and four fairs, on June 2, September 10, October 1, and November 13, for horſes, horned cattle, and ſheep. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth of Bela, eight eaſt of Dolgelley, and one hundred and ninety-ſix weſt-north-weſt of London. Long. 3. 55. W. Lat. 52. 36. N.

DINCKELSPIL, a town of Germany, in Suabia, is ſeated on the river Wernitz, and drives a great trade in cloth and ſauſages. It is forty miles north-weſt of Newburg, and thirty-eight ſouth weſt of Nurenburg. Long. 11. 30. E. Lat. 49. 2. N.

DINGELFING, a town of Germany, in the circle of Bavaria, ſeated on the river Iſer, twenty miles eaſt of Landſhut. Long. 12. 38. E. Lat. 48 39. N.

DINGLE, a port town, in Ireland, in the county of Derry, and province of Munſter, ſeated on Dingle Bay, ſeventy-four miles weſt of Limerick. Long. 7. 17. W. Lat. 52. 0. N.

DINGWEL, a parliament-town in Scotland, ſeated on the frith of Cromarty, in the county of Roſs, fifteen miles weſt of Cromarty. Long. 13. 20. W. Lat. 57. 45. N.

DINOCRATES, a celebrated Macedonian architect, made himſelf known to Alexander the Great by appearing before him dreſſed like Hercules, in a lion's ſkin; when he propoſed to that prince to cut mount Athos into the form of a man, man, holding in his left hand a great city, and in his right a cup that ſhould receive the waters of all the rivers running from that mountain, and pour them into the ſea. Alexander did not approve this deſign; he however retained Dinocrates, and employed him in building the city of Alexandria.

DINOTH (RICHARD) was born in Normandy, and lived in the ſixteenth century. He publiſhed, among other Latin books, the Hiſtory of the Civil Wars raiſed on account of religion in France and the Netherlands.

DINUS, a famous civilian, born at Mugello, in Tuſcany, taught civil law at Bologna, in the third century, with extraordinary reputation. Pope Boniface VIII. employed him in the compilation of the Sextus Decretatium. He died at Bologna in 130[illegible] with vexation at not having been made a cardinal. He wrote ſeveral works, the moſt eſteemed of which is his Commentary on the Rule of Right, on which Charles du Moulin wrote excellent notes.

DIO CASSIUS, a famous Greek hiſtorian, a native of Nicea, a city of Phrygia, was governor of Pergamus and Smyrna, and commanded in Africa and Pannonia. In the year 229 he was raiſed by Alexander Severus to the dignity of conſul; but not being agreeable to the troops, was obliged to retire to the place of his birth, where he ended his days. He compoſed a Roman Hiſtory in Greek, a part of which only has been handed down to us. He is accuſed of partiality againſt Pompey, Cicero, Seneca, and ſeveral other great men. He is chiefly eſteemed for the ſpeeches he puts into the mouths of Agrippa and Mecænas, when Auguſtus adviſed with them whether he ſhould preſerve the empire, or reſtore the ancient government.

DIO CHRYSOSTOM, that is Golden Mouth, a celebrated orator and philoſopher of Greece, in the firſt century, was born at Pruſa in Bithynia. He attempted to perſuade Veſpaſian to quit the empire; was hated by Domitian; but acquired the eſteem of Trajan. This laſt prince took pleaſure in converſing with him, and made him ride with him in his triumphal chariot. There are ſtill extant, eighty of Dio's orations, and ſome other of his works: the beſt edition of which is that of Hermand Samuel Raimarus, in 1750, in folio.

DIOCLESIAN, emperor of Rome, was born at Salona, or according to others, at Dioclea in Dalmatia, about the year 245, of a very obſcure family, but raiſing himſelf by his valour and conduct to the higheſt employments, he was declared emperor after the death of Numerianus, on the 17th of September, 284. He with his own hand killed Aper, who had put Numerianus to death, and was confirmed on the throne by the death of Carinus, who was killed by his own officers in a great battle, in which he had the advantage. Diocleſian aſſociated to the empire his friend Maximianus Hercules; raiſed a cruel perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, which only ſerved to encreaſe their number; created Conſtans and Galerius Maximianus Cæſars; and abdicated the throne with Maximianus Hercules, his colleague, in 305; after which he retired to Salona, where he lead a private life, and placed his happineſs in the cultivation of a garden. But Conſtantine having put his ſons Maximianus and Maxentius to death, Diocleſian, who had always a great affection for them, was ſo afflicted, that he refuſed all nouriſhment, and died of hunger, in the year 313, aged ſixty-eight. The æra of the martyrs under Diocleſian began on the 29th of Auguſt, 284.

DIODATI (JOHN) a famous miniſter and divinity profeſſor at Geneva, in the ſeventeenth century, wrote 1. A Tranſlation of the Bible into Italian. 2. A Tranſlation of the Bible into French; and 3. A French Tranſlation of Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent. He died at Geneva, in 1652, aged ſeventy-three.

DIODORUS SICULUS, a celebrated hiſtorian, under the reigns of Julius Cæſar and Auguſtus, was thus named from his being a native of Agyrium, in Sicily. He ſpent fifty years in compoſing his Bibliotheca Hiſtorica, and travelled into Europe and Aſia to perfect it. This important work, which Diodorus Siculus compoſed in Greek, contained forty books, of which there are only fifteen remaining. The ſtyle is ſimple, and extremely fit for hiſtory. The beſt edition of it is that of Amſterdam, 1745, in two volumes, folio.

DIODORUS, biſhop of Tyre, in the fourth century, on whom St. Athanaſius beſtows great encomiums in a letter addreſſed to him.

DIODORUS of Antioch, a learned biſhop of Tarſus, in 378, was the maſter of St. Chryſoſtom and Theodorus of Mopſueſta. St. Baſil repreſents him as a very holy biſhop, and an invincible defender of the faith, in which he is followed by St. Chryſoſtom and the firſt council of Conſtantinople. St. Cyril, on the contrary, conſiders him as the forerunner of Neſtorius. Diodorus of Antioch was one of the firſt who adhered to the literal ſenſe of Scripture; but all his works are loſt, except ſome letters, and a few fragments.

DIOGENES of Apollonia, in the iſland of Crete, held a conſiderable rank among the philoſophers who taught in Ionia, before Socrates appeared at Athens. He was the ſcholar and ſucceſſor of Anaximenes, and in ſome meaſure rectified his maſter's opinion concerning air being the cauſe of all things. It is ſaid that he was the firſt who obſerved that air was capable of condenſation and rarefaction. He paſſed for an excellent philoſopher, and died about the four hundred and fiftieth year before the Chriſtian æra.

DIOGENES the Cynic, a famous philoſopher, the ſon of Iceſius, a banker of Sinope, in Pontus, being baniſhed with his father for coining falſe money, retired to Athens, where he ſtudied philoſophy under Antiſthenes. He added new degrees of auſterity to the ſect of the Cynics, and never did any philoſopher carry ſo far a contempt for the conveniences of life. He lodged in a tub, and had no other moveables beſides his ſtaff, wallet, and wooden bowl which laſt he threw away on ſeeing a boy drink out of the hollow of his hand. Diogenes was however far from being endowed with humility; for he treated mankind with a ſovereign contempt, and thought himſelf ſuperior to all other philoſophers. Alexander the Great being at Corinth, went to ſee him, and preſſed him to let him know what he would have, promiſing to grant him whatever he would aſk; but Diogenes rejecting the offers of that prince, only deſired him to ſtand away, and not intercept the ſun from him: when that monarch, admiring his greatneſs of ſoul, cried, That if he was not Alexander, he would chuſe to be Diogenes. He had great preſence of mind, as appears from his ſmart ſayings, and quick repartees, which generally contained a good deal of poignant wit. Indeed he was one of thoſe extraordinary perſons who verify the maxim, that there is no great wit, who does not diſcover in his actions a degree of folly; which made Plato ſay, that Diogenes was Socrates run mad. He paſſed a great part of his life at Corinth, in the houſe of Xeniades, who had bought him of ſome pirates, and made him preceptor to his children. He was ſuperintendant of the family of that rich Corinthian, and his friends being willing to purchaſe him: "You are fools," ſaid he, "the lions are not the ſlaves of "thoſe who feed them; but they are the ſervants of the "lions." He therefore plainly told Xeniades, that he ought to obey him, as people obey their governors and phyſicians. The moſt ſhameleſs and inexcuſable circumſtance in his life, was his plunging himſelf into acts of impurity in the open view of the world. He died about the three hundred and twentieth year before the Chriſtian æra; but authors are not agreed as to the manner of his death, however it is the common opinion, that he ſtifled himſelf by holding his breath. He had for his diſciples Onеſicrites, Phocion, Stilpo of Megara, and ſeveral other great men. His works are loſt.

DIOGENES, ſurnamed the Babylonian, was born at Seleucia, near Babylon. He was ſcholar to Chryſippus, and wrote ſeveral works. His reputation muſt have been very great, ſince the Athenians deputed him ambaſſador to Rome, with Carneades, the chief of the Academics, and Critolaus, the chief of the Peripatetic ſchool, in the one hundred and fifty-fifth year before the birth of Chriſt. He ſhewed great moderation on the following occaſion: when an inſolent young fellow ſpat upon him, as he was earneſtly diſcourſing againſt anger: he bore it patiently and wiſely: "I am not "angry," ſaid he, "but yet I doubt whether I ought not "to be angry." This was preaching by example. He died in the eighty-eighth year of his age.

DIOGENES LAERTIUS, a Greek hiſtorian, in the ſecond century, under the reign of Alexander Severus, was born at Laerta, a ſmall town in Cilicia, and was of the ſect of the Epicureans. There are ſtill extant of his, ten books on the Lives of the ancient Philoſophers, which it is ſaid he compoſed for Arria, a woman beloved by the emperor. The beſt edition of his works is that of Amſterdam, with the notes of Menage, in 1692, in quarto.

DIOGENIAN of Heraclea, in Pontus, a celebrated Greek grammarian, in the ſecond century, ſome of whoſe works are ſtill extant.

DIOMEDE, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Thrace, and the ſon of Mars and Cyrene, was poſſeſſed of a ſtud of wild horſes that breathed fire, and were conſtantly fed with human fleſh, their maſter, for that purpoſe, putting to death all the ſtrangers that came in his way. Hercules killed this tyrant; gave him a prey to his horſes, and having ſlain ſome of them, brought the reſt to Euryſtheus.

DIOMEDES, king of Etolia, the ſon of Tydeus, and the moſt valiant of the Grecian heroes, next to Achilles and Ajax, ſignalized himſelf at the ſiege of Troy againſt Æneas and Hector, and carried off the palladium.

DIOMEDES, a celebrated grammarian, more ancient than Priſcian, ſince he frequently quotes him. He wrote three books, which are ſtill extant, De Orationis partibus & vario Rhe-

Rhetorum Genere, which have had ſeveral editions, but that of Putſchius, in 1605, paſſes for the beſt.

DIONIS (PETER) a famous ſurgeon, born at Paris, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſkill in his profeſſion, and by his works, the principal of which are, 1. A Courſe of Operations in Surgery, the beſt edition of which is that of 1736, in octavo. 2. The Anatomy of Man, the beſt edition of which is that of 1728, by Devaux; and 3. A Treatiſe on the Manner of aſſiſting Women in Child-birth. He died on the 11th of December, 1718.

DIONYSIA, in Grecian antiquity, feſtivals in honour of Bacchus. See ORGIA.

DIONYSIUS, tyrant of Heraclea, in Pontus, maintained himſelf in his tyranny, by cringing to Alexander the Great, and was oppoſed by Perdiccas; but after the death of the latter, which happened in the three hundred and twenty-firſt year before the birth of Chriſt, he took the title of king, and lead a quiet and voluptuous life. It is ſaid that he ſlept ſo ſound, that they were obliged to run needles into his fleſh to awake him, and that he gave audience in armour, in order the better to ſet off the largeneſs of his face and body.

DIONYSIUS I. tyrant of Syracuſe, rendered himſelf famous by his vices and cruelty. He was the ſon of Hermocrates, a common citizen of Syracuſe; but being made general of the Syracuſans, againſt the Carthaginians; he got rid of the other generals his colleagues, and rendered himſelf abſolute maſter of that ſtate, in the four hundred and fifth year before the incarnation of our Lord, after which he drove the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and ſacked the city of Reggio. He had a great deſire to paſs for a wit and a poet, and invited philoſophers and other learned men to his court; but they laughed at him, and ridiculed his verſes. He rendered himſelf deteſted for his impiety in plundering ſeveral temples, and at length became cruel and diſtruſtful; which, it is ſaid, induced him to build a ſubterranean houſe, into which none, not even his wife and children, were ſuffered to enter, till they had ſtripped themſelves entirely naked, for fear they ſhould conceal arms under their cloaths. He however, notwithſtanding all his precaution, died a violent death, in the three hundred and eighty-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra, aged ſixty-three, after a reign of thirty-eight years. He compoſed ſeveral works, none of which have been preſerved.

DIONYSIUS II. ſurnamed the Younger, tyrant of Syracuſe, ſucceeded his father in the three hundred and eighty-ſixth year before Chriſt; but his cruelty having occaſioned his being driven from thence, in the three hundred and fifty-ſeventh year before the ſame æra, he retired to Locri, whence his acts of violence and infamous debaucheries occaſioned his being expelled. He however remounted the throne by treachery; but Dion and Timolion dethroned him a ſecond time, in the three hundred and forty-third year before the Chriſtian æra. He then retired to Corinth, where, it is ſaid, being reduced to great poverty, he was obliged, in order to gain ſubſiſtence, to teach a ſchool; but there are ſome who maintain that this laſt circumſtance in his life is fabulous.

DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSENSIS, a celebrated hiſtorian, and one of the moſt judicious critics of antiquity, was born at Halicarnaſſus, and went to Rome after the battle of Actium, in the thirtieth year before the Chriſtian æra, and ſtaid there twenty-two years, under the reign of Auguſtus. He there compoſed, in Greek, his Hiſtory of the Roman Antiquities, in twenty books, of which the firſt eleven are only now remaining; this is a very exact and excellent work. There are alſo ſtill extant ſeveral of his critical works. The beſt edition of the works of this author is that of Oxford, in 1704, in Greek and Latin, by Dr. Hudſon.

He ought not to be confounded with Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, another famous hiſtorian, who lived in the time of Ptolemy Epiphanes, and Philometor, about one hundred and eighty years before the Chriſtian æra, and whoſe works are loſt.

DIONYSIUS, a learned geographer, to whom is attributed a Periegeſis, or Survey of the Earth, in Greek verſe. Some ſuppoſe that he lived in the time of Auguſtus; but Scaliger and Saumaſius place him under the reign of Severus, or Marcus Aurelius. He wrote many other works; but his Periegeſis is the only one we have remaining, the beſt and moſt uſeful edition of which is that improved with notes and illuſtrations by Hill.

DIONYSIUS the Areopagite, thus named from his being one of the judges of the Areopagus, was converted by St. Paul. He became the firſt biſhop of Athens, and ſuffered martyrdom about the year 95. Several works have been attributed to him, all of which are ſuppoſititious.

DIONYSIUS (St.) biſhop of Corinth, flouriſhed under the reign of Marcus Antoninus, and is ſuppoſed to have ſuffered martyrdom about the year 178. He wrote ſeveral letters, ſome remarkable fragments of which have been preſerved by Euſebius.

DIONYSIUS of Alexandria, one of the moſt learned biſhops of the third century, ſucceeded Heracles in the patriarchate of Alexandria in 247. He ſignalized himſelf by his zeal and charity during the perſecution of the church, and died on the 17th of December, 264. All his works are loſt, except ſome fragments, and a canonical letter.

DIONYSIUS, biſhop of Rome, was a Roman, and raiſed to that ſee after the death of St. Sixtus, on the 22d of July, 259. He governed the church with wiſdom; diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his charity to the Chriſtian captives, and died on the 26th of December, 269. There are none of his writings remaining that are genuine, except a fragment of a letter, written in the name of the Roman ſynod to Dionyſius of Alexandria, on his being accuſed of an error oppoſite to that of the Sabellians.

DIONYSIUS, biſhop of Milan, maintained in the council of that city, in 355, the faith of the council of Nice. He afterwards ſubſcribed the condemnation of St. Athanaſius, and was at length baniſhed by the emperor Conſtantius into Cappadocia, where he died ſome time after.

DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS, or the Little, was thus named from the ſmallneſs of his ſtature. He was born in Scythia, and went to Rome, where he renewed the paſcal cycle of ninety-five years, and was the firſt who introduced the manner of reckoning years from the birth of Chriſt. He died about the year 540. Several of his works are ſtill extant, the principal of which is a Collection of Canons, which he compoſed at the requeſt of Stephen, biſhop of Salona DIOPHANTUS of Alexandria, an excellent mathematician, paſſes for the inventor of algebra. He lived under the reign of Antoninus, about the middle of the ſecond century. There are ſtill extant ſeveral of his books on arithmetic, which are greatly eſteemed.

DIOSCORIDES (PEDACIUS) a famous phyſician, born in Cilicia, in the reign of Nero, followed firſt the profeſſion of arms, and at length applied himſelf to the knowledge of ſimples. We have ſeveral of his works which are eſteemed.

DIOSCORUS, a famous patriarch of Alexandria, ſucceeded St. Cyril in 444. He revived the old quarrel againſt the patriarch of Antioch, about the primacy, and defended the opinions of Eutyches, which he cauſed to be approved by the council held at Epheſus in 449. At his return to Alexandria he excommunicated pope Leo; but the year following he was depoſed by the council of Conſtantinople, and was ſummoned to appear at the general council of Chalcedon, in 451; when refuſing to appear, he was unanimouſly condemned. The emperor confirmed his depoſition, and baniſhed him to Gangrea in Paphlagonia, where he died, in 458.

He ought not to be confounded with Dioſcorus the Younger, patriarch of Alexandria, in 517; nor with the antipope Dioſcorus, a deacon of the church of Rome, who oppoſed pope Boniface II. in 529, and died ſome days after.

DIOSCOURIA, Διόσκουρια, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival in honour of Caſtor and Pollux, who were reputed to be the ſons of Jupiter. It was obſerved by the Cyrenæans, but more eſpecially by the Spartans, in whoſe country thoſe heroes were ſaid to be born. The ſolemnity was full of mirth, they drank wine plentifully, and diverted themſelves with ſports, of which wreſtling matches always made a part. Potter's Antiq.

DIRCE, in fabulous hiſtory, the wife of Lycus, king of Thebes, whom he married after he had divorced Antiope: ſhe perceiving that Antiope was with child, and ſuſpecting that her huſband ſtill kept her company, put her in priſon; whence Jupiter releaſed her, and ſhe was delivered of Amphion and Zethus, who afterwards ſlew Lycus, and tying Dirce to the tail of a wild bull, ſhe was dragged about till the gods pitying her, turned her into a fountain, which was called by her name.

DIRCHAW, a town of Pruſſia, in the palatinate of Culm, ſeated on the river Viſtula, between Dantzick and Ghnief. Long. 19. 25 E. Lat. 54. 3. N.

DIROIS (FRANCIS) a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, and canon of Avranches, at the end of the ſeventeenth century, wrote in favour of the Formulary, and alſo a work in French, intitled Proofs and Prejudices for the Chriſtian and Catholic Religion, againſt the falſe religions and atheiſm, in quarto.

DISCORD, in pagan worſhip, a goddeſs before whom the antients offered up their petitions to be delivered from that evil. She was commonly repreſented with ſnakes on her head inſtead of hair; a burning torch in one hand, and in the other three ſcrolls, on which were written ſuits, wars, and confuſions. The poets ſay, that this goddeſs being offended that ſhe was not invited to the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, as all the other gods and goddeſſes were, threw a golden apple amongſt them, which ſet them at variance; on which Jupiter baniſhed her out of heaven.

DISMA, an iſland of Japan, ſeparated from Nangueſaqua by a narrow canal. The Dutch have a factory there, with a rich magazine and trade there yearly.

DISS, a town of Norfolk, ſeated on the river Waveney, on the ſide of a hill, with a market on Fridays. The fair is on October 28, for cattle and toys. It is twenty-two miles ſouth of Norwich, and ninety-two north of London. Long. 1. 16. E. Lat. 52. 25. N.

DITHMARSH, a territory of the circle of Lower Saxony, in Germany, and in the duchy of Holſtein. It is ſeated on the Baltic Sea, between the rivers Elbe and Eider. It is a low country full of ditches and marſhes. It had formerly counts of its own, and the inhabitants preſerved their privileges till 1559. John, king of Denmark, attempted to conquer it in 1501, and when he thought himſelf ſure of the poſſeſſion, they opened their ſluices, and forced the Danes to retire. They loſt in this war above four thouſand men. But Frederick II. was more ſucceſsful in the year abovementioned. At preſent the king of Denmark poſſeſſes that part of it which lies to the ſouth, and contains the towns Meldorf, Branſbuttle, and Bockenburg. The north part belongs to the duke of Holſtein, and contains Hoyde, the largeſt town in the country, with Lunden and Hambus.

DIU, a town in the Eaſt Indies, in an iſland of the ſame name, three miles long, and two broad. It is ſeparated from the continent by a narrow channel, over which there is a ſtone bridge, and is the ſtrongeſt place belonging to the Portugueſe in the Eaſt Indies. It is pretty large, and fortified by a high ſtone wall, with baſtions, well furniſhed with cannon to flank it, and a deep moat, hewn out of a hard rock, to defend it on the land ſide, which is about one third of the city. The other two parts are fortified by nature, having the ocean full of dangerous rocks and high cliffs, which hinder the approach of ſhips on that ſide, and a rapid deep river on the north-eaſt ſide, which affords a good harbour for ſhips. This is ſecured by two caſtles, one of which is ſo large, that it can bring one hundred large cannon to bear on the mouth of the harbour. The other is made uſe of as a magazine for powder and other military ſtores. There are many ſtately buildings of free ſtone and marble, and five or ſix fine churches, decorated with paintings and images, beſides pagods and convents. It was plundered in 1670 by the Muſcat Arabs, and had not in 1718 above two hundred Portugueſe; but there are forty thouſand Banians. The weather in this iſland is very hot in the day, and cool in the night; and the air is wholeſome enough for thoſe that have been accuſtomed to live in it. However, there is now but little trade here, nor yet in the adjacent parts, it now being diverted into other channels. Long. 70. 28. E. Lat. 21. 37. N.

DIVALIA, in antiquity, a feſtival, the ſame with Angeronalia. See the article ANGERONALIA.

DIVINI (EUSTACE) a celebrated Italian artiſt, of the ſeventeenth century, excelled in making teleſcopes, but wrote againſt Huggens's Diſcovery of Saturn's Ring; Mr. Huggens replied, and made new obſervations, which put his diſcovery beyond all doubt. Divini was living in the year 1663.

DIUL, a ſea-port town of Aſia, in the province of Tatta or Sinda, ſeated on the weſt ſide the river Sinde or Indus, on the Indian ocean. It was a place of good trade formerly, but is now little frequented. It is ſixty miles weſt of the city of Tatta. Long. 68. 58. E. Lat. 26. 11. N.

DIXMUDE, a fortified town in the Auſtrian Netherlands, ſeated on the river Iperlee. The country about it is noted for good butter and cheeſe. It is eight miles from Newport and Furnes, and ten north-weſt of Ypres. Long. 2. 38. E. Lat. 51. 15. N.

DIZIER, a town of France, in Champagne, ſeated on the river Margne, fifteen miles eaſt of Vitry, thirteen ſouth-weſt of Bar-le-Duc, and ninety-five eaſt of Paris. The road between this town and Vitry is one of the fineſt in Europe. Long. 5. 12. E. Lat. 48. 35. N.

DOBELIN, a town of Poland, in the province of Courland, forty miles weſt of Mittaw. Long. 23. 25. E. Lat. 57. 20. N.

DOBRZIN, a town of Poland, in Mazovia, ſeated on a rock, near the river Viſtula, thirteen miles north-weſt of Pleſkow, and thirteen eaſt of Vadiſlaw. Long. 20. 0. E. Lat. 52. 38. N.

DOBSON, (WILLIAM) an eminent limner, and hiſtory-painter, called by king Charles I. the Engliſh Tintoret; was born in London in the year 1610, and was early put apprentice to one Mr. Peake, a ſtationer and dealer in pictures; where he had the advantage of copying from Titian and Vandyck. How much he improved from the latter may be ſeen in all his works, no painter having ever come ſo near to the perfection of that excellent maſter. Vandyck ſeeing a picture of his in the window of a ſhop on Snow-hill, was ſo ſtruck with it, that he enquired for the author, and found him at work in a poor garret, from whence he took, and generouſly preſented him to king Charles I. who took him under his protection, kept him with him at Oxford, all the time his majeſty continued in that city, and not only ſat to him ſeveral times for his picture, but obliged the prince of Wales, prince Rupert, and moſt of the lords of his court to do ſo too. Mr. Dobſon, however, being ſomewhat looſe and irregular in his way of life, was far from improving the many opportunities he had of making his fortune, and died very poor in 1647, at his houſe in St. Martin's Lane.

DOCIMASIA, δοκιμασια, in Grecian antiquity, a probation of the magiſtrates and perſons employed in public buſineſs at Athens, when they were obliged publicly to give an account of themſelves in the forum. Among the queſtions aſked them were the following, whether they had been dutiful to their parents, had ſerved in the wars, and had a competent eſtate.

DOCKUM, a ſtrong town of the United Provinces, in Frieſland. It is a neat agreeable place, and hath a handſome town-houſe, built on the ſide of the great canal, over which there is a fine bridge. It is fortified with a rampart of earth, which hath its ditches and baſtions, and is ſeated at the mouth of the river Avers, ten miles north-eaſt of Lewarden, and twenty-three north-eaſt of Gronningen. Long. 6. 15. E. Lat. 53. 30. N.

DOD, (JOHN) an eminent divine among the diſſenters, in the reign of James I. He received his education at Jeſus college in Cambridge, where he became diſtinguiſhed for his learning and piety, and was particularly eminent for his knowledge of the Hebrew language. Nothing was ever objected to this meek and humble man, but his being a puritan. He was, from his Expoſition of the Ten Commandments which he wrote in conjunction with Robert Cleaver, commonly called the Decalogiſt. His ſayings have been printed in various forms, and many of them on two ſheets of paper, are ſtill to be ſeen, paſted on the walls of cottages. He died in 1645, aged ninety-ſix.

DODBROOK, a town of Devonſhire, ſeated near the ſpring-head of a ſmall river, which ſoon after, falls into the ſea; it is but a ſmall place, but it has a conſiderable market on Wedneſdays for fat and lean cattle. It is eight miles weſt of Dartmouth, ſixteen weſt-by-ſouth of Plymouth, and two hundred and eighteen weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 4. 0. W. Lat. 50. 12 N.

DODDRIDGE, (PHILIP) D. D. an eminent Preſbyterian miniſter, was the ſon of Daniel Doddridge, an oil-man in London, where he was born on the 26th of June, 1702; and having completed the ſtudy of the claſſics in ſeveral ſchools, was, in 1719, placed under the tuition of the reverend Mr. John Jennings, who kept an academy at Kilworth, in Leiceſterſhire. He was firſt ſettled as a miniſter at Kilworth, where he preached to a ſmall congregation in an obſcure village. But on Mr. Jennings's death, ſucceeded to the care of his academy; and ſoon after was choſen miniſter of a large congregation of Diſſenters at Northampton, to which he removed his academy, and where the number of his pupils encreaſed. He inſtructed his pupils with the freedom and tenderneſs of a father, and never expected nor deſired that they ſhould blindly follow his ſentiments, but encouraged them to judge for themſelves. He checked any appearance of bigotry and uncharitableneſs, and endeavoured to cure them by ſhewing what might be ſaid in defence of thoſe principles they diſliked. He died at Liſbon, where he went for the recovery of his health, and his remains were interred in the burying-ground belonging to the Britiſh factory there, and a handſome monument was erected to his memory in the meeting-houſe at Northampton, at the expence of the congregation, on which is an epitaph written by Gilbert Weſt, Eſq. He wrote, 1. Free Thoughts on the moſt probable Means of reviving the Diſſenting Intereſt; 2. The Life of Colonel James Gardiner; 3. Sermons on the Education of Children; 4. The Riſe and Progreſs of Religion in the Soul; 5. The Family Expoſitor, in 6 vols. 4to, &c. and ſince the author's death, a volume of his Hymns have been publiſhed, and his Theological Lectures. Several of his works have been tranſlated into Dutch, German, and French.

DODOENS, or DODONEUS, (RAMBERTO) a learned phyſician to the emperors Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. was born at Malines, and died in 1585, aged ſixty-eight. He wrote ſeveral works.

DODONÆUS, in pagan worſhip, an epithet given to Jupiter, from his temple in the foreſt of Dodona, where was the moſt famous, and, it is ſaid, the moſt ancient oracle of all Greece. In this foreſt, it was pretended, that the pigeons, and the very oaks, ſpoke and delivered oracles.

DODONIDES, in pagan worſhip, the ſeven daughters of Atlas, and the nurſes of Bacchus, who are ſaid to have anciently ciently inhabited the temple of Dodona, whence they took their name. Theſe are ſuppoſed to have delivered the oracles; but in later ages this office was intruſted to three old women.

DODSLEY, (ROBERT) an eminent bookſeller and ingenious author, was born at Mansfield, in Sherwood-foreſt, Nottinghamſhire, in 1703. He was not indebted to education for his literary fame, for he had little knowledge of any of the learned languages, as he himſelf informs us.

O, native Sherwood! happy were thy bard,
Might theſe his rural notes, to future times,
Boaſt of tall groves, that nodding o'er thy plain,
Roſe to their tuneful melody. But ah!
Beneath the feeble efforts of a Muſe,
Untutor'd by the lore of Greece or Rome;
A ſtranger to the fair Caſtalian ſprings,
Whence happier poets inſpiration draw,
And the ſweet magic of perſuaſive ſong,
The weak preſumption, the fond hope expires.

At his firſt ſetting out in life, he was a livery-ſervant to a perſon of quality; but his excellent natural genius, his eager thirſt after knowledge, and his early paſſion for books, ſoon raiſed him to a higher ſphere. His dramatic entertainment, entitled the Toy-Shop, was exhibited at Covent garden theatre, in 1735, with great applauſe, and the merit of this piece recommended him to the notice of Mr. Pope, who from that time continued his warm friend and patron. In the year following, he produced the King and the Miller of Mansfield, which was received with equal favour. From the ſucceſs of theſe attempts, he was enabled to take up the buſineſs of a bookſeller; and, in this ſtation, Mr. Pope's recommendation, and his own merit and good ſenſe, ſoon procured him not only the countenance of perſons of the firſt abilities, but alſo of thoſe of the firſt rank, and in a few years raiſed him to the greateſt eminence in his profeſſion. His ſucceſs and elevation only ſerved to diſplay the amiableneſs of his character in a fairer light; for he ſtill retained his native modeſty, humility, and integrity, the warmeſt gratitude to his benefactors, and the moſt active zeal to encourage genius and learning. He alſo wrote, 1. Sir John Cockle at Court. 2. The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green. 3. The Triumph of Peace, a maſque. 4 Cleone, a tragedy. 5. Melpomene, or the Regions of Terror and Pity. 6. The Oeconomy of Human Life. 7. Public Virtue, a Poem, &c. Several of the above works he publiſhed together, in one volume, octavo, under the modeſt title of Triſles. He likewiſe publiſhed a Collection of Poems, by different hands, in ſix volumes, duodecimo; and a Collection of old Plays, in twelve volumes of the ſame ſize. He died at Durham, where he was on a viſit to Mr. Spence, in 1764, at ſixty-one years of age.

DODWELL (HENRY) a learned writer, born at Dublin, in October, 1641, and finiſhed his ſtudies in Trinity college, in that city. He obtained the eſteem of the learned in England, and, in 1688, was elected Camden's profeſſor of hiſtory by the univerſity of Oxford, but was deprived of that employment in 1691, for refuſing to take the oaths to king William and queen Mary. He wrote, 1. An Account of the Greek and Roman Cycles. 2. An Epiſtolary Diſcourſe, concerning the Diſtinction between Soul and Spirit, in which he endeavoured to prove that the ſoul is naturally mortal, and that immortality is conferred by baptiſm. 3. Diſſertations on St. Cyprian. 4. Diſſertations upon the Age of Phalaris and Pythagoras; and many other works. He died at Shotteſbrooke, on the 7th of June, 1711, in the ſeventieth year of his age, and was buried in the chancel of the church there, where a monument is erected to him.

DOE, a town of France, in Anjou, remarkable for the palace of the ancient dukes of Aquitain, the ruins of which are ſtill to be ſeen; for its fairs, and for its handſome fountain. It is ten miles from the river Loire, and eleven weſt of Saumure. Long. 0. 25. W. Lat. 47. 12. N.

DOEG, an Edomite, who, in order to advance himſelf by his treachery, at the court of Saul, told that prince, that David going to Nob, had joined in a conſpiracy with Ahimelech, the prieſt, againſt him. On which Saul, being enraged, ſent for Ahimelech, and not only cauſed him to be ſlain, but eighty-five other prieſts, by the hand of Doeg. He alſo laid waſte Nob, the city of the prieſts, and put to death all the men, women, and children, in about the 1061ſt year before the Chriſtian æra. However, Abiathar, the ſon of Ahimilech, eſcaped, and flying to David, told him of the melancholy event that had happened.

DOEL, a town of Dutch Brabant, ſeated on the weſt ſide of the river Scheld, oppoſite to Lillo, and nine miles north-weſt of Antwerp. Long. 4. 5. E. Lat. 51. 20. N.

DOESBURG, a town of the United Provinces, in the county of Zutphen, and province of Guelderland. It is ſmall, but well peopled, and very ſtrong, both by art and nature, having the river Yſſel on one ſide, and a moraſs on the other, and is only to be approached by a narrow neck of land. It is ten miles ſouth of Zutphen, Long. 5. 55. E. Lat. 52. 3. N.

DOGADO, a province of the ſtate of Venice, in Italy. It is bounded by the Peleſina on the ſouth, by the Paduano on the weſt, by the Treveſan on the north, and by the Gulph of Venice on the eaſt. It comprehends the coaſt, which advances but a little way into the country, and ſeveral ſmall iſlands near it; and of which Venice is the capital, as well as of the whole ſtate. The iſlands are, Chioggia, which yields a large quantity of ſalt; Malomoco, where the duke formerly reſided, and is properly the port of Venice. It has been lately made a free port, like Leghorn. Marano is a town which takes up the whole iſland in which it was built, and in which is the famous manufacture of glaſs. It contains many magnificent palaces of the noble Venetians. Paleſtrina is the largeſt and moſt populous of thoſe iſlands, where the moſt conſiderable Venetians have their houſes of pleaſure. The chief town is of the ſame name. St. Georgio Maggiore belongs to the Benedictine monks, in whoſe church ſeveral of the doges of Venice are buried. St. Helena has a convent, which belongs to the fathers of the Mount of Olives. Lido is a long narrow iſland, which ſerves as a dyke to the city of Venice, preſerving it from violent tempeſts; and has a caſtle, and a harbour, where the Venetian gallies ride in ſafety.

DOL, a town of Brittany, in France, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated five miles from the ſea, in a country which abounds with hemp, corn, and apples, eighteen miles ſouth-eaſt of St. Malo, eighteen north-weſt of Antrian, thirty north weſt of Rheims, and one hundred and ninety weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 50. W. Lat. 48. 40. N.

DOLABELLA (PUBLIUS CORNELIUS) a famous Roman, ſon-in-law to Cicero, took the part of Julius Cæſar againſt Pompey, and was at the battles of Pharſalia, Africa, and Munda. He was tribune, conſul, and governor of Syria. Having put to death, at Smyrna, Trebonius, governor of Aſia Minor, one of the murderers of Julius Cæſar, he was declared an enemy of the public; and being ſome time after beſieged by Caſſius, in the city of Laodicea, and reduced to the neceſſity of either killing himſelf, or ſurrendering, he choſe the former, and died in the forty-third year before the Chriſtian æra.

DOLBEN, (JOHN) archbiſhop of York, in the ſeventeenth century, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the early pregnancy of his parts at Weſtminſter ſchool, and was, in 1640, elected a ſtudent of Chriſt-church, in Oxford. In the civil war, when that city was made a garriſon for the king, he entered a volunteer into the royal army, and acquitted himſelf ſo well in his military capacity, that he was ſoon made an enſign, and was preſent at the ſiege of York, and the battle of Marſton moor, where he was dangerouſly wounded in his ſhoulder by a muſket-ball. He was afterwards advanced to the rank of a major. But upon diſbanding of the army, he again applied to his ſtudies, and having entered into holy orders, was, upon the Reſtoration, preferred to a canonry of Chriſt-church. He was afterwards made archdeacon of London, clerk of the cloſet to the king, and dean of Weſtminſter. In 1666 he was advanced to the biſhoprick of Rocheſter, and afterwards tranſlated to York. He was a man of great generoſity, candour, and benevolence, and was juſtly admired as a preacher. He died on the 11th of April, 1686.

DOLCE (LEWIS) a celebrated Italian poet, born at Venice, in 1508, diſcovered great political talents, and his works have great ſweetneſs and elegance, and the thoughts are lively and delicate; but he diſcovers too much negligence. He made many tranſlations from the Greek and Latin authors, and died in 1568.

DOLCE-AQUA, a town of Piedmont, capital of a marquiſate of the ſame name, with a good caſtle. It is ſeated on the river Nervia, in a country very fertile in wine and oil. It is five miles north of Vintimilla. Long. 7. 5. E. Lat. 43. 52 N.

DOLCIGNO, a ſtrong town of Turky in Europe, in Upper Albania, with a biſhop's ſee. It may contain ſeven or eight thouſand ſouls, and is a place of good trade. It has a ſtrong caſtle, and a good harbour. It is ſeated on the river Drin, ten miles ſouth of Antivari, and twenty ſouth-weſt of Scutari. Long. 19. 27. E. Lat. 41. 54. N.

DOLE, a town of France, in the Franche Compté, of which it is the moſt conſiderable next to Beſanzon. The ſtreets are broad and ſtrait, and full of large ſtructures. The palace, where the parliament formerly ſate, is remarkable for its grandeur and magnificent apartments. The palace of the chamber of accounts, the univerſity, the colleges of St. Jerome and of the Jeſuits, deſerve the attention of the curious. The church of Notre Dame is the moſt conſiderable: it is ſeated on an eminence, for which reaſon, its tower may be ſeen at a conſiderable diſtance: the great altar is adorned with fine columns and marble ſtatues, greatly eſteemed. The convent of the Cordeliers, and of the nuns of the Viſitation, are worth ſeeing.

The

The antiquities of Dole are, the Square des Arenes, where the Romans exhibited their public ſpectacles and combats: near the river are the remains of a ſtately palace, with ſeveral large towers: near the fountain of the Gougeans there are likewiſe two aqueducts, of the like antiquity. It is ſeated on the river Doux, twenty-five miles ſouth-weſt of Beſanzon, thirty ſouth-eaſt of Dijon, ſixty-ſix north-weſt of Geneva, and one hundred and ninety-five ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 35. E. Lat 47. 6. N.

DOLEGELLY, or DOLGETH, a town of Merionethſhire, in North Wales, with a market for proviſions on Tueſdays. It hath, or had, a manufacture in cottons. The fairs are, May 11, July 4, September 20, October 9, November 22, and December 16; all for horned cattle, ſheep, and horſes. It is ſeated on the river Avon, in a vale of the ſame name, and at the foot of a great mountain, called Cader Idris, which is three miles high. It is thirty-ſix miles north-weſt of Welſh Pool, forty-ſix ſouth-eaſt of Caernarvon, and two hundred and five north-weſt of London. Long. 4. 16. W. Lat. 53 14. N.

DOLERA (CLEMENT) biſhop of Foligni, and a learned cardinal of the order of St. Francis, of which he was general, was born at Moneglia, and died at Rome, on the 6th of January, 1568. His principal work is intitled, Compendium Theologicarum Inſtitutionum.

DOLET (STEPHEN) a learned humaniſt, born at Orleans, in 1509, endeavoured to reform the Latin ſtyle. He was a printer, poet, and grammarian. He wrote an apology for the ſect of the Ciceronians, againſt Eraſmus, which drew upon him the reſentment of Scaliger. Dolet having aſſerted ſome things contrary to the popiſh religion, was thrown in priſon; but at the interceſſion of the learned Caſtellanus was ſet at liberty, on his promiſing for the future to be a good catholic; but not keeping his word, he was impriſoned a ſecond time, and burnt at Paris, on the 3d of Auguſt, 1549, in the the thirty-eighth year of his age. The moſt conſiderable part of his works are, 1. Commentarii Linguæ Latinæ, two volumes, folio, which is ſcarce. 2. De Re Navali. 3. Carminium, libri iv. 4. Letters, which are ſcarce, and wrote in a very ſingular taſte.

DOLON, a famous Trojan, who was taken by Ulyſſes, and killed, as he was going to the Grecian camp, in quality of a ſpy.

DOLTABAD, a town in the province of Balaguate, in the Eaſt Indies, belonging to the Great Mogul. It is ſurrounded with a free-ſtone wall, with battlements and towers, mounted with cannon. It has three forts, beſides a palace and tower, on a hill in the middle of the town. It is ſeated within land, twenty miles north of Aurengabad, ninety ſouth of Brampour, and one hundred and eighty eaſt of Bombay. Long. 75. 53. E. Lat. 19. 15. N.

DOMAT, or DAUMAT (JOHN) advocate to the French king in the preſidial ſeat of Clermont, in Auvergne, and one of the moſt learned and judicious civilians in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Clermont, on the 30th of November, 1625. He diſcharged the duties of the above poſt during thirty years, with ſuch juſtice, integrity, capacity, and diſintereſtedneſs, that he acquired a general eſteem, and became in a manner the arbiter of all the great affairs in the province. The confuſion he obſerved in the laws, made him form the deſign of treating them in their natural order; on this plan he formed his excellent work on the civil laws, which has immortalized his memory; and which has had ſeveral editions in France, in four volumes, 4to, and been ſeveral times printed in Engliſh, in two volumes, folio. Domat died at Paris, on the 14th of March, 1696, aged ſeventy-one.

DOMBES, a territory of France, bounded by Breſſe on the eaſt, Maconnois on the north, Beaujolois on the weſt, and Lyonnois on the ſouth. It is twenty-three miles in length, and almoſt as much in breadth. The ſovereign has power over life and death, coins money, and levies what he pleaſes on his ſubjects. The country is very fertile and pleaſant. It has a parliament of its own, and Trevoux is the capital city.

DOMENICHINO, whoſe true name was Dominico Zampieri, was a celebrated painter, born at Bologna, in 1581. He was at firſt a diſciple of D. Calvert, the Fleming; but ſoon quitted his ſchool for that of the Caracci, he being inſtructed at Bologna by Ludovico, and at Rome by Hannibal, who had ſo great a value for him, that he took him to his aſſiſtance in the Farneſe gallery. He was extremely laborious and ſlow in his productions, and applied himſelf to his work with ſuch thought and ſtudy, that he is ſaid never to touch his pencil till he found a kind of enthuſiaſm upon him. His talent lay principally in the correctneſs of his ſtyle, and in expreſſing the paſſions and affections of the mind, in both which he was admirably judicious. He was likewiſe well ſkilled in architecture, on which account pope Gregory XV. made him chief architect of the apoſtolical palace. He had, however, the misfortune to find enemies in all places wherever he came, and particularly at Naples, was ſo ill treated by thoſe of his own profeſſion, that having agreed among themſelves to diſparage all his works, they would hardly allow him to be a tolerable maſter; and were not content with frightening him from that city, but afterwards, upon his return thither, never left perſecuting him, till they had quite wearied him out of his life, and were even ſuſpected to have poiſoned him. He died in 1641, at ſixty years of age.

DOMFRONT, a town of France, in Normandy, ſeated on a mountain, twenty five miles north-weſt of Alençon, and one hundred and forty weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 37. W. Lat. 48. 34. N.

DOMINGO (ST.) otherwiſe called HISPANIOLA, is partly inhabited by Spaniards, and partly by French. It was diſcovered by Chriſtopher Columbus, in his firſt voyage, in 1592. He called it at firſt Hiſpaniola, that is, Little Spain; but its capital town being built in 1594, and called St. Domingo, this name was extended to all the iſland, and has now no other name among the inhabitants and traders. It is about one thouſand miles in compaſs directly round, neglecting the bays and other inequalities. It was divided by the natives into five parts, by ſome called kingdoms; that where Columbus firſt landed had the name of Marien. At this place he built a ſmall fort, and called it Natividad, putting in thirty men and a commander, while he returned to Spain. But theſe pillaged the Indians, took away their wives, and committed ſeveral other acts of injuſtice; for which reaſon, the natives killed the garriſon, and burnt the fort: inſomuch, that Columbus at his return was obliged to build a ſtronger place by the ſide of a river, fit for the reception of ſhips; and, in 1494, he conſtructed the town of St. Domingo, and ſeveral others.

The ſoil of this iſland is exceeding fruitful, and agrees with all ſorts of vegetables and trees that are ſown and planted in it. In the foreſts there are trees of various kinds, of a prodigious height and thickneſs. The fruits are larger, better, and more juicy, than in the neighbouring iſlands. There are ſavannahs or meadows of a prodigious extent, that nouriſh millions of horned or black cattle and wild horſes, and hogs, the race of thoſe which the Spaniards brought out of Europe. There is no country in the world where there is finer and more numerous rivers, abounding with fiſh. There are mines of gold, ſilver, and copper, which were formerly very rich, and would prove of great advantage ſtill, if they were well worked; but they are concealed by the Spaniards, leſt they ſhould invite other Europeans to make a conqueſt of the iſland, inſomuch that they poſſeſs treaſures without putting them to any uſe, and let a vaſt quantity of land lie untilled, which might maintain prodigious numbers of people, more ſkilful and more laborious in the improvement of land.

The moſt common trees are, cabbage-trees, palm-trees, elms, oaks, pines, jeniphah, caramite, acajou or cedar, the maho-tree, the acoma-tree, braſil, and other dying woods, and the manchineel, the apple of which is poiſon. But here it muſt be noted, that thoſe trees with Engliſh names differ greatly from thoſe of Europe, though perhaps they may agree in ſome properties. The common fruits are, ananas or pine-apples, bananas, grapes, oranges, lemons, citrons, toronias, limes, dates, apricots, guavas, caramite plums, jeniphah cherries as large as apples, and the abelcoſe, which yields a fruit as big as a melon.

The wild black cattle were killed for many years by the buccaneers and hunters, for their hides and tallow, of which great quantities were exported to Europe. With regard to the feathered kind, there is a ſort of fowls in the woods, equal to our poultry, which the Spaniards call pintadoes, and a great number of parrots and parroquets. Here is alſo the carpenter-bird, ſo called from its pecking holes in trees; the labrero, a ſort of cormorant, men of war birds, and others, which they improperly call ravens, ducks, teal, and many more, proper to theſe parts. The ſerpents are of various kinds, but not venemous; and they have the inſects called chegoes, muſkettoes, fire flies, crickets, and centipes. It is worth remarking, that when the Spaniards firſt diſcovered this iſland, there were no four-footed animals upon it but dogs that could not bark.

The principal produce of this iſland at preſent is ſugar, which is reckoned exceeding good. They have likewiſe tobacco, guaiacum, aloes, caſſia, and china-root.

The natives of St. Domingo, as before obſerved, were extirpated by the Spaniards; ſo that the preſent inhabitants are French and Spaniards, beſides the Blacks, which are much more numerous than either. The mixture of the European men with the Negro women has produced ſeveral other diſtinctions, as, Mulattoes, Meſtices, Albatraces, &c. But thoſe are always moſt eſteemed when they are moſt remote from the black original, and that diſagreeable tincture begins to wear out. However, there is this difference between the French and Spaniards, that the French will apply to work themſelves, and the Spaniards lead a lazy indolent life, depending on their ſlaves entirely for their ſubſiſtence.

With regard to the aſpect of the country in general, it hath been obſerved, that there are mountains in the middle over-run with foreſt-trees; and other mountains more barren, wherein were the mines; that there are ſeveral woods, and groves of timber and fruit-trees; and that no iſland whatever hath more ſafe and commodious harbours. It is divided into two parts; the ſouth-eaſt, which is ſubject to the Spaniards; and the north-weſt, which belongs to the French. The chief towns in the Spaniſh diviſion are, St. Domingo, Higuey, Zibo, Cotuy, Azo, and Conception. Thoſe belonging to the French are Petit Guaves, Port Lewis, and Cape St. Francois.

They have no winter here, but generally heavy rains and tempeſts, when the ſun is vertical, in July and Auguſt, which render the air cool, and the climate tolerable. The faireſt ſeaſon is when the ſun is moſt remote, and then the morning is the hotteſt part of the day; for towards noon the ſea breeze begins to blow pretty briſkly, and continues till the evening. From October to April, at the change and full of the moon, they have north and north-weſt winds in the adjacent ſeas; and December and January are ſtormy, though this is their fair ſeaſon. The more conſtant trade-wind blows from the north-eaſt.

DOMINGO, the capital of an iſland of the ſame name in the Weſt Indies, is ſeated in that part belonging to the Spaniards, on the ſouth ſide of the iſland, and has a commodious harbour. The town is built in the Spaniſh manner, with a great ſquare in the middle of it, about which are the cathedral, and other public buildings. From this ſquare run the principal ſtreets, in a direct line, they being croſſed by others at right angles, ſo that the form of the town is almoſt ſquare. The country on the north and eaſt ſide is pleaſant and fruitful; and there is a large navigable river on the weſt, with the ocean on the ſouth. It is the ſee of an archbiſhop, an ancient royal audience, and the ſeat of the governor. It has ſeveral fine churches and monaſteries, and was ſo well fortified, that a fleet and army ſent by Oliver Cromwell, in 1654, could not take it. The inhabitants are Spaniards, Negroes, Mulattoes, Meſtices, and Albatraces; of whom about a ſixth part may be Spaniards. It had formerly about two thouſand houſes, but it is much declined of late years. The river on which it is ſeated is called Ozama. Long. 69. 30. W. Lat. 18. 25. N.

DOMINICA, one of the Caribbee iſlands in the Weſt Indies, is about thirty-nine miles in length, and thirteen in breadth. It is twenty-ſix miles north of Martinico, and one hundred and forty north weſt of Barbadoes. It belongs to the Engliſh. Long. from 61. 55. to 61. W. Lat. 15. to 15. 30. N.

DOMINIC (St.) ſurnamed the Ruſty, a famous hermit in the ſixth century, ſo called from his wearing iron armour for his back and breaſt, next his ſkin. He retired to an hermitage in the Appenines, where he led a very auſtere life; and at length put himſelf under the direction of Peter Damianus. It is ſaid, that he every day repeated two or three pſalms, while he was giving himſelf fifteen thouſand laſhes, by way of penance. He died on the 14th of October, 1060.

DOMINIC (DE GUZMAN) the founder of the order of Preaching friars, was born at Calarvega, in the dioceſe of Oſma, in Caſtile, in 1170, and was the ſon of Felix de Guzman, a gentleman of a noble and ancient family in Spain. It is ſaid, that his mother, when ſhe was with child of him, dreamed that ſhe had a dog vomiting fire in her womb. After having performed his ſtudies at Placentia, he was canon and then archdeacon of Oſma, and at length profeſſor of divinity at Placentia, which employment he quitted, in order to go and preach in Galicia, Caſtile, and Arragon. He afterwards preached with great zeal againſt the opinions of the Albigenſes; and endeavoured to prove, that if they would not be converted by reaſon, it ſhould be done by ſword and fire. The pope gave him the poſt of inquiſitor of Languedoc. St. Dominic founded his order at Thouloufe, which was approved, in 1216, by Honorius III. He perſuaded the ſame pope to eſtabliſh a reader, or maſter, of the ſacred palace at Rome, and was the firſt perſon inveſted with that office. He ſent ſeveral of his order to different places, in order to preach and defend the faith againſt the ſuppoſed heretics; and at length died at Bologna, on the 6th of Auguſt, 1221, aged fifty-one. He was canonized by pope Gregory IX. in 1295.

DOMINIC of San Geminiano, one of the moſt famous civilians of the fifteenth century, compoſed a Commentary on the Sixth Book of the Decretals, and other works.

DOMINIS (MARC ANTONY DE) archbiſhop of Spalatro. He in his youth entered among the Jeſuits; but afterwards quitting that order, was made biſhop of Segni, and at length archbiſhop of Spalatro, in Dalmatia; but being informed againſt by the inquiſition under Paul V. the proteſtants invited him into England, where he ſtaid from the beginning of the reign of James I. to 1622, when, at at the requeſt of the Spaniſh ambaſſador, he returned to Rome, where he abjured his former opinions, and begged pardon in a public conſiſtory; but on ſome ſuſpicions was confined a ſhort time after, in the caſtle of St. Angelo, where he died, in 1625, aged ſixty four. He wrote a famous work, De Republica Eccleſiaſtica, which was cenſured by the Sorbonne, in 1611; and a ſmall treatiſe, De Radiis Viſûs & Lucis.

DOMITIA LONGINA, daughter of the illuſtrious Corbulo, left her huſband to become the miſtreſs of the emperor Domitian, who afterwards ſolemnly married her. He divorced her, for falling in love with a player; but as he could not live without her, ſoon recalled her again.

DOMITIAN (TITUS FLAVIUS) emperor of Rome, and the laſt of the twelve Cæſars, was the ſon of Veſpaſian, and was born on the 24th of October, 51. He ſucceeded the emperor Titus, his brother, on the 13th of September 81, and at firſt gave great hopes that his reign would be happy. He was well made, of an advantageous ſtature, diſcovered a regard to decency, and appeared of a mild and engaging temper. He beſides publiſhed ſeveral good laws, embelliſhed the city of Rome with magnificent edifices, reſtored the libraries that had been burnt, and carried on a ſucceſsful war againſt the Catti, the Germans, and Daci; but he at length abandoned himſelf to cruelty, and the moſt infamous debaucheries. He raiſed the ſecond perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, and took the name of God and Lord. Domitian was accuſtomed to retire into his cloſet, where he amuſed himſelf in catching flies, and running them through the body with a ſharp bodkin. He was preparing himſelf for giving new inſtances of his cruelty, when he was killed by Stephen, his wife Domitia's freedman, on the 18th of September, 96, in the 44th year of his age.

It is ſaid, that at the very hour in which this prince was aſſaſſinated at Rome, Apollonius Tyanæus, haranguing the people at Epheſus, cried, 'Strike the tyrant, ſtrike the tyrant;' but this has the air of a fable. Domitian became bald very young, by his debaucheries; a defect which gave him great uneaſineſs, and therefore he would not be repreſented ſo on his medals.

DOMME, a town of France, in the Upper Perigord, ſeated on a mountain near the river Dordogne. Long. 1. 19. E. Lat. 45. 58. N.

DOMITZ, a ſtrong town, in the circle of Lower Saxony and dutchy of Mecklenburg, ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Elbe and Elve, twenty-five miles ſouth of Schwerin. Long 11. 41. E. Lat. 53. 30. N.

DOMNUS or DOMNIO I. a Roman, was elected pope ſoon after the death of Deus-dedit, on the firſt of November, 676, and died on the 11th of April, 678. Anaſius mentions a comet which appeared during three months, under his pontificate.

DOMNUS II. a Roman, ſucceeded pope John XIII. on the 20th of September, 972, and died three months after.

DON, the river formerly called Tanais, riſes in the province of Rezan, in Ruſſia, and running ſouth-eaſt, paſſes by Woronetz, till it approaches near the river Wolga, where Peter the Great attempted to cut a canal between the two rivers; then it turns to the ſouth-weſt, and falls into the Palus Meotis, near the city of Aſoph.

DONALDSON (WALTER) born at Aberdeen, in Scotland, bore ſome rank among the learned men of the ſeventeenth century. He was profeſſor of natural and moral philoſophy, and of the Greek tongue, in the univerſity of Sedan. He wrote, among other things, a work, intitled, Synopſis Oeconomica.

DONAT, a town of France, in La Marche, ſeated on the river Seve, twenty-five miles from Limoges, and eight from Bellac. Long. 1. 11. W. Lat. 46. 10. N.

DONAT, a fortreſs in Dutch Flanders, ſeated a little to the weſt of Sluys. Long. 3. 12. E. Lat. 51. 23. N.

DONATO (JEROME) a noble Venetian, of great learning, who lived at the end of the fifteenth century, and publiſhed a tranſlation of Alexander Aphrodiſeus's book De Anima. He died at Rome, in 1513, after he had reconciled the differences between the republic of Venice and pope Julius II.

DONATO, an excellent architect and ſculptor, was born at Florence, and embelliſhed that city with his works. Among theſe are particularly admired a baſſo-relievo of the Annunciation of the Bleſſed Virgin, in the church of the Holy Croſs; a Judith, cutting off the head of Holofernes; and ſeveral other maſter-pieces, which he performed by order of the grand duke de Medicis. The ſenate of Venice choſe him to erect, at Padua, an equeſtrian ſtatue, in bronze, of Gatamellata, general of the Venetian armies.

DONATO (ALEXANDER) a learned Jeſuit, of the ſixteenth century, was born at Sienna. He wrote a good deſcription of ancient and modern Rome, and other works. He died at Rome, on the 23d of April, 1640.

DONATO (MARCELLUS) count of Ponzano, and knight of St. Stephen, was born at Florence. He had conſiderable employments at Mantua, and died in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. He wrote Scholia in Latinos Romanæ Hiſtoriæ Scriptores.

DONATUS, biſhop of Caſæ Nigræ, in Numidia, began the ſchiſm of the Donatiſts, in 309, and was one of thoſe who depoſed Cecilian, biſhop of Carthage, in 311; but was himſelf excommunicated and depoſed, by pope Melchiades.

DONATUS, biſhop of Carthage, ſucceeded Majorinus, biſhop of that city, about the year 316, and gave his name to the Donatiſts, who maintained that the perſons in the Trinity were of the ſame ſubſtance; yet the Son was inferior to the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt to the Son. Donatus was an able, eloquent, and virtuous man; but was charged with inſupportable pride. He died in exile, about the year 355.

DONATUS (ÆLIUS) a famous grammarian, lived at Rome, in 354. He was one of St Jerome's maſters, and compoſed Commentaries on Terence and Virgil, which are eſteemed.

DONAWERT, a ſtrong town of Germany, in the circle of Bavaria, on the frontiers of Suabia. It has been taken and retaken ſeveral times in the wars of Germany, and was formerly an imperial city, but at preſent is ſubject to the duke of Bavaria. Long. 10. 32. E. Lat. 48. 32. N.

DONCASTER, a town in Yorkſhire, with a market on Saturdays. It is an ancient, well built town, governed by a mayor, recorder, and ſix aldermen. The fairs are on April 5, Auguſt 5, Nov. 26, and Monday before Old Candlemas-day, for horſes, cattle, ſheep, and pedlary. It is ſeated on the river Don, thirty-ſeven miles ſouth of York, and one hundred and ſixty north-by-weſt from London. Long. 1. 0. E. Lat. 53. 30. N.

DONCHERRY, a town of France in the Rhetelois, ſeated on the river Meuſe, three miles from Sedan. Long. 5. 0. E. Lat. 49. 42. N.

DONDUS (JAMES) a famous phyſician and mathematician of Padua, in the fourteenth century, invented a very curious clock, and diſcovered the ſecret of making ſalt of the ſpring-water of Abano, in the Paduan. He and his ſon John Dondus wrote ſeveral works.

DANEAU (HUGH) in Latin Donellus, one of the moſt learned civilians of the ſixteenth century, was born at Chalons, on the Soane, in the year 1537. His ſchoolmaſter, a ſevere man, and a great whipper, ſo diſheartened him, that neither threats nor promiſes could make him return to ſchool; but at laſt being afraid he ſhould be put apprentice to a ſwineherd, he applied himſelf to his ſtudies, and was made doctor of the civil law, at Bourges, in 1551, and profeſſed that ſcience in the ſame city with Duaren, Hotman, and Cujacius. He with difficutty eſcaped the violence of the murderers in the maſſacre of St. Bartholomew, in 1572, by flying into Germany; after which he taught at Heidelberg, Leyden, and Altorp, where he died, on the 4th of May, 1591, aged ſixty-four. He had ſo happy a memory, that he knew the whole Corpus Juris by heart. He wrote ſeveral works; the moſt eſteemed of which are thoſe which treat of laſt wills and teſtaments.

DONGOLA, DUNGALA, or DANKALA, the capital of all Nubia, is ſeated on the eaſtern bank of the river Nile, upon the declivity of a dry ſandy hill. The houſes are ill built, and the ſtreets half deſerted, and filled with heaps of ſand, occaſioned by floods from the mountains. The caſtle is in the very center of the town, and is large and ſpacious; but the fortifications are inconſiderable; however, it ſerves to keep the wandering Arabs in awe, who feed their cattle in the open country, paying a ſmall tribute to the king. It contains about ten thouſand houſes, which are mean and low, being moſtly of timber, with mud walls. Long. 31. 20. E. Lat. 19. 10. N.

DONNE (JOHN) D. D. an eminent poet and divine, born at London, in the year 1573. He ſtudied at Oxford and Cambridge, and afterwards at Lincoln's Inn. His parents were of the Romiſh religion, and uſed their utmoſt efforts to keep him to it; but having examined the controverſy between that and the proteſtant church, he choſe the latter. He travelled into Italy and Spain, where he ſtaid ſeveral years, and ſoon after his return to England, was made ſecretary to ſir Thomas Egerton, keeper of the great ſeal; but five years after marrying privately Anne, the daughter of ſir George More, then chancellor of the garter, he was not only diſmiſſed from his place, but thrown into priſon; but ſir George being at laſt reconciled, he was ſet at liberty, and his father-in-law not only forgave his daughter, but allowed her a decent fortune. In 1614, he entered into holy orders, was made chaplain to his majeſty, and doctor of divinity. In 1617, he was choſen preacher to the ſociety of Lincoln's Inn; and, in 1621, was made dean of St. Paul's, and had afterwards ſeveral other preferments in the church. He wrote, 1. a work intitled the Pſeudo-Martyr. 2. Devotions upon emergent Occaſions. 3. The ancient Hiſtory of the Septuagint, tranſlated from the Greek of Ariſteus, quarto. 4. Three volumes of Sermons, folio; a conſiderable number of poems; and other works. He died on the 31ſt of March, 1631, and was interred in St. Paul's cathedral, where a monument was erected to his memory. His writings ſhew him to be a man of incomparable wit and learning; but his greateſt excellence was ſatire. He had a prodigious richneſs of fancy, but his thoughts were much debaſed by his verſification. He was, however, highly celebrated by all the great men of that age.

DONNINGTON. See DUNNINGTON.

DONZELINUS (JEROM) a learned Italian phyſician, born at Orzinuovi, in the territory of Breſcia, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century, and tranſlated, from the Greek into Latin, Galen's Treatiſe de Ptiſana, and eight orations of Themiſtius, and alſo wrote, Conſilia & Epiſtolæ medicæ.

DONZY, a town of France, capital of the Donziois, a ſmall diſtrict in the Nivernois, eight miles from Coſne, and twenty-three miles from Nevers. Long. 3. 0. E. Lat. 47. 22. N.

DOOLITTLE (THOMAS) an eminent non-conformiſt miniſter, was born at Kidderminſter, in Worceſterſhire. Mr. Baxter, thinking him a promiſing youth, ſent him to Pembroke hall in Cambridge, where he made ſuch a proficiency in learning as fully anſwered his expectation. Before the act of uniformity took place, he was miniſter of St. Alphage, in London, and afterwards kept a private academy in Monkwell-ſtreet, Cripplegate, where he continued to preach, and trained up ſeveral miniſters of conſiderable note. He had the character of a ſerious and affectionate preacher, and publiſhed books of practical divinity, almoſt till the time of his death. His Treatiſe on the Sacrament, has perhaps, been oftener printed than any other book on that ſubject; and his Call to Delaying Sinners has gone through many editions. He died on the 1ſt of June, 1707.

DOPPELMAIER (JOHN GABRIEL) a celebrated German mathematician, born at Nuremberg, in 1671. After having ſtudied with great ſucceſs, he viſited Holland and England, and returning to Nuremberg, was made profeſſor of mathematics. He was a member of the Royal Society of London, and of the academies of Berlin and Peterſburg, and died in 1750. He wrote many works in German, on aſtronomy, mathematics, and geography; and likewiſe ſome in Latin, as Nova Methodus parandi ſciaterica Solaria. 2. Phyſica Experimentis illuſtrata, quarto. 3. Atlas cæleſtis, folio. In the laſt years of his life, he made curious experiments on electricity, which he communicated to the public; he alſo tranſlated, from the Engliſh into Latin, the aſtronomical tables of Strebius, in quarto.

DORCHESTER, the county town of Dorſetſhire, is a large and well-built corporation-town, governed by a mayor, a recorder, two bailiffs, ſix aldermen, and ſix capital burgeſſes. It has a market on Saturdays, and ſends two members to parliament. It has three handſome ſtreets, and as many pariſh-churches, with a free-ſchool, and ſeveral alms-houſes. The ſtreets are neatly paved, and the buildings regular, being for the moſt part built with ſtone, ſince the dreadful fire, which almoſt conſumed the whole town, in 1613. The aſſizes and quarter-ſeſſions for the county are kept here. It is pleaſantly ſeated on the river Froom, on a riſing ground, in the midſt of pleaſant fields and ſpacious downs, and has ſeveral good inns for the entertainment of travellers. It ſends large quantities of beer to London, which is greatly eſteemed. The fairs are on February 12, for cattle of all ſorts and ſheep, Trinity Monday, and July 5, for ditto and lambs, and Auguſt 5, for ditto, wool, and leather. It is fifty-two miles eaſt-by-ſouth of Exeter, and one hundred and twenty-four weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 2. 35. W. Lat. 51. 10. N.

DORDOGNE, a river of France, which riſes in the mountain d'Or, in Lower Auvergne, runs through Guienne, and joins the Garonne, near Bourg ſur Mer, twelve miles below Bourdeaux.

DORIA (ANDREW) one of the moſt famous admirals in the ſixteenth century, was born at Oneglia, on the 30th of November, 1466, of a noble and ancient Genoeſe family. He ſerved at firſt in the army of pope Innocent VIII. and afterwards in that of the king of Naples and the duke of Urbino. At his return to Genoa, he obtained the command of the gallies, and at length went into the ſervice of the French king Francis I. who made him admiral of the ſeas of the Levant, and general of his gallies. Doria performed ſignal ſervices for that monarch, and on the 28th of April, 1528, defeated the emperor's fleet in the port of Naples. Some time after, he ſided with the emperor Charles V. took ſeveral French gallies, prevailed on the Genoeſe to revolt, and drove the French garriſon out of Genoa. Doria at length ſpread terror through the Grecian ſea, took Patras and Coron from the Turks, in 1532, and gained a famous naval victory over them. At his return, Charles V. made him prince of Melfi, and knight of the golden fleece. Doria alſo ſerved this prince in his expeditions to Tunis, Algiers, Italy, and Provence. He generouſly refuſed the ſovereignty of his country, chuſing rather to be its deliverer and protector than its ſovereign. He repreſſed the conſpiracy of John Lewis de Fieſchi, count of Lavagna, a young man of great courage and of an illuſtrious family, who periſhed in the enterprize. In ſhort, Andrew Doria, after being of great ſervice to his country, and diſtinguiſhing himſelf by a great number of brave actions, died at Genoa, on the 25th of November, 1560, aged ninety-four. The Genoeſe erected a ſtatue to his honour. He ought not to be confounded with Anthony Doria, another celebrated general in the reign of Charles V. who wrote a hiſtory of his time, which is eſteemed.

ſpread

DORIGNY (ſir NICHOLAS) an eminent painter, and engraver, was born in France, and was a ſon of Michael Dorigny, by a daughter of Vouet the painter. His father dying while he was very young, he was brought up to the ſtudy of the law, which he purſued till he was about thirty years of age, when being examined, in order to be admitted to plead, the judge finding him difficult of hearing, adviſed him to relinquiſh a profeſſion to which one of his ſenſes was ſo ill adapted. He took the advice, and having a brother a painter, he reſolved to embrace the ſame occupation, and ſhut himſelf up a year to practiſe drawing; then going to Rome, and receiving inſtructions from his brother, he followed painting for ſeveral years; when, having acquired great freedom of hand, he was adviſed to try etching. Being of a flexible diſpoſition, he applied to that art for ſome years, when looking into the works of Audran, he found he had been in a wrong method, he took up the manner of the latter, which he purſued for ten years; but when he had done many plates, and particularly the gallery of Cupid and Pſyche after Raphael, he imagined that he had not learned the right uſe of the graver, and deſpairing of giving his works the harmony and perfection to which he aſpired, he returned to the pencil. However, after two months, he was perſuaded to apply to the graver, and receiving ſome hints from one that uſed to engrave the writing under his plates, he conquered that difficulty, and after finiſhing ſeveral plates, engraved Raphael's Transfiguration, which raiſed his reputation above that of all the maſters of his time. Some Engliſhmen of rank becoming acquainted with him at Rome, perſuaded him to come to England and engrave the cartoons. He arrived in 1711, and it was at firſt propoſed that he ſhould engrave them at the queen's expence; but he aſking four or five thouſand pounds, a ſtop was put to that deſign; yet the queen gave him an apartment at Hampton-court, with neceſſary perquiſites. He however undertook and finiſhed the work by ſubſcription, at four guineas a ſet, and preſented two ſets to king George I. who gave him a purſe of one hundred guineas, and afterwards conferred on him the honour of knighthood. At length, his eyes beginning to fail, he retired to France, in 1724. Horace Walpole's Catalogue of Engravers.

DORIS, in fabulous hiſtory, a ſea-nymph, the daughter of Oceanus and Thetis, married her brother Nereus, and became the mother of the Nereids.

DORMANS, a town of France, in Champagne, ſeated on the river Marnay, between Epernay and Chateau-Thierri. Long. 3. 47. E. Lat. 49. 3. N.

DORNA (BERNARD) a famous civilian in the thirteenth century, was born in Provence, and wrote, among other works, a Treatiſe de Libellorum Conceptionibus.

DORNAVIUS (GASPARD) a learned Lutheran, born at Zigenrick, in Voigtland, was a phyſician, hiſtorian, orator, and poet. He received the degree of doctor of phyſic, at Baſil, and, in 1608, became rector of the college of Gorlitz. Seven years after, he was rector of Bethuen in Sileſia; but that kind of life not being agreeable to him, he went to court, where he was made counſellor and phyſician to the princes of Brieg and Lignitz. He wrote, 1. Amphitheatrum Sapientiæ Socraticæ joco-ſeria, two volumes, folio. 2. Homo Diabolus, hoc eſt, Auctorum veterum & recentiorum de Calumniæ Natura & Remediis ſua Lingua Editorum Sylloge. 3. Glaſeri Hiſtoria univerſalis Dornavii, Gnomis illuſtrata. 4. Menenius Agrippa, ſive Corporis humana cum Republica Comparatio. 5. De Incremento Dominationis Turcicæ, &c. He died in 1631.

DORPIUS (MARTIN) a learned Dutchman, the friend of Eraſmus, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his virtue and erudition. He taught at Louvain, wrote ſome treatiſes, and died on the 31ſt of May, 1525.

DORSET (THOMAS SACKVILLE, earl of). See SACKVILLE.

DORSETSHIRE is bounded on the north by Somerſetſhire and Wiltſhire, on the weſt by Devonſhire, on the eaſt by Hampſhire, and on the ſouth by the Britiſh Channel. It is about fifty-two miles in length, and twenty-five in breadth, where broadeſt. It ſends twenty members to parliament, has twenty-two market-towns, two hundred and forty-eight pariſhes, twenty-one thouſand nine hundred and forty houſes, and one hundred thouſand inhabitants. It is divided into twenty-nine hundreds.

The air of this county is generally good and wholeſome; it is ſharp on the hilly parts, and mild and pleaſant near the coaſts. The ſoil is generally ſandy, and yet indifferently fruitful, eſpecially in the vallies between the green hills. The principal rivers are the Stour, the Frome, the Piddle, the Lyddon, the Dereliſh, and the Allen, which afford plenty of fiſh, particularly trout, tench, and eels; here are ſeveral good ports, to which merchandiſe is brought, and near which are caught herrings, plaice, thornbacks, ſoals, and lobſters. The rocks abound with ſamphire, which makes an excellent pickle, and eringo, whoſe roots, when candied, are a fine reſtorative ſweetmeat. The downs and hills are covered with large flocks of ſheep, whoſe fleſh is ſweet and delicate, and the wool fine. The valley abounds with cattle; and the land produces corn, hemp, and flax. Here are alſo plenty of fowls and birds, as ſwans, geeſe, ducks, burranets, pheaſants, partridges, wood-cocks, pigeons, ſpar-hawks, gulls, and many other kinds. In the iſle of Portland, there are quarries of ſtone, which is much uſed for building churches, and other ſtructures in London. The iſle of Purbeck has quarries of ſtone and marble, and is full of heaths and woods, which are well ſtocked with fallow deer. In many parts of the county, is found ſtone fit for building, and for making plaiſter of Paris, and fine tobacco-pipe clay, which is exported to diſtant parts of England. The towns which ſend members to parliament are Pool, Dorcheſter the ſhire-town, Lyme-Regis, Weymouth and Melcombe Regis, Bridport, Shafteſbury, Wareham, and Corfe-Caſtle. The other market-towns are Cranborne, Blandford, Beminſter, Abbotſbury, Bere, Cerne, Everſhot, Frampton, Sherborne, Milton, Stalbridge, Winborne, and Sturminſter. The markets at ſome of theſe places are diſcontinued.

DORSTEN, a town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, and in the eſtate of the elector of Cologne, ſeated on the river Lippe, twenty miles north-eaſt of Duyſburg, fifty north of Cologne, and thirty-eight ſouth-weſt of Munſter. Long. 6. 38 E. Lat. 51. 27. N.

DORT, or DORDRECHT, a city of Holland, placed in the firſt rank in the aſſembly of the States. It is ſeated in a ſmall iſland formed by the rivers Meyſe, Merue, Rhine, and Linghe. The Meuſe, on which it ſtands, gives it a good harbour, and ſeparates it from the iſlands of Iſſelmonde and Ablas. It is divided from Beyerland by a canal. The harbour is very commodious for the merchandizes which come down the Rhine and the Meuſe, which keep it in a flouriſhing condition. Its ſtrength conſiſts in being ſurrounded with water. Its walls are old, they being defended by round towers, which are marks of their antiquity. It is very rich, and well built with brick, and had formerly the excluſive right of coining money. It is at preſent the ſtaple town for wines, particularly Rheniſh.

It was detached from the main-land, in 1421, on the 17th of November, by a flood, occaſioned by the breaking down the dyke, which overwhelmed ſeventy villages, and about an hundred thouſand perſons. However, by time and the induſtry of the inhabitants, a great part of the land is recovered. The principal church is dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and has a very lofty tower, which has three hundred and twenty-five ſteps to go up to the top. It has two principal canals, namely the New and Old Haven, by which heavy-loaded veſſels may enter into the city. Over the Old Haven is a large bridge well-built with brick. The body of tradeſmen and ſome other communities have the right of chooſing the magiſtrate who governs the town. This city abounds greatly with fiſh, and particularly ſalmon.

Dort was almoſt reduced to aſhes in the year 1457, there being then conſumed two thouſand houſes, with the halls, hoſpital, and church of Notre Dame. For this reaſon, they are now well provided with fire-engines and watchmen to prevent the like diſaſter for the future. This city is famous for the meeting of the clergy called the ſynod of Dort, in which the Calviniſts obtained a ſentence againſt the Arminians, who were called the Remonſtrants. The diſpute between the contending parties occaſioned ſtrange diſorders, ſkirmiſhes, and murders, in moſt of the principal cities. In conſequence of this, thoſe miniſters who would not ſubſcribe to the decree of the ſynod were baniſhed, of whom there were above an hundred. It is ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Rotterdam, fifteen north-weſt of Breda, and thirty-eight ſouth-by-weſt of Amſterdam. Long. 4. 36. E. Lat. 51. 30. N.

DORTMUND, a large, well-built, populous, fortified town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, and county of Marck. Moſt of the inhabitants are of the proteſtant religion, and have an illuſtrious ſchool belonging to them only, founded in 1543. It is ſeated on the river Emſer, thirty-five miles ſouth-weſt of Munſter, and thirty-eight north eaſt of Cologne. Long. 5. 58. E. Lat. 51. 30. N.

DOSITHEUS, a famous general of the Jews, was the ſon of Bacenor. He defeated the army under Timotheus; routed Gorgias, and took him priſoner; but, as he was carrying him off, one of the enemy's cavalry ſtruck him on the ſhoulder with his ſabre, of which wound Doſitheus died, in the one hundred and ſixty-third year before the Chriſtian æra, after his having been of great ſervice to his country.

DOSMA DELEGADO (RODERICK) canon of Badajoz, was well ſkilled in the eaſtern languages, and died in 1607. His principal works are Commentaries, in Latin, on the Evangeliſts, Pſalms, Canticles, &c.

DOSSOS, two famous painters of Ferrara, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by the good guſto of their colouring, and eſpecially by their landſcapes, which are very fine. They were employed by Alphonſo, duke of Ferrara, who honoured them with his favour. They were leſs happy in the court of Franceſco Maria, duke of Urbino, who employed them in working in freſco in his new palace, but was ſo far from being ſatisfied with their painting, that he deſtroyed it. This, indeed, was the worſt of their productions; but they kept up their reputation notwithſtanding this diſgrace, and produced ſeveral beautiful pieces. The elder of them growing old, the duke of Ferrara allowed him a penſion for his ſubſiſtence. He died at a great age; and his younger brother, whoſe name was Battiſta, ſurviving him, performed many good pieces after his elder brother's death.

DOU (GERARD) of Leyden, an excellent painter in the ſeventeenth century, was the diſciple of Rembrandt; but his manner of working was very different from that of his maſter. He painted little figures in oil, which he finiſhed as highly as if they had been as big as the life. He always drew after nature, and viewed his originals in a convex mirror; and, as he took a great deal of pains, his works ſeem almoſt as perfect as nature herſelf, without loſing any thing of the freſhneſs, union, or force of colouring, or of the claro oſcuro. The common height of his pictures did not exceed a foot; yet his price was ſometimes ſix hundred, ſometimes eight hundred, and ſometimes a thouſand livres each picture, according to the time he ſpent about it, though he only reckoned after the rate of a livre an hour; but he did few portraits of the nobility, becauſe they had not the patience to ſit ſo long as he would have them.

DOU, a river of France, has its ſource at Montjura, near the priory of Mothe, and paſſes on to Franchemont, Mandeurre, Chatelet, L'Iſle, Clerveaux, Baume les Nones, Beſanzon, Dole, and falls into the Saone, at Verdun, a town of Burgundy.

DOUAY, a city of the Low Countries, in French Flanders, is of an oval figure, and ſeated on the river Scarpe. It is larger than Liſle, but has not one-third of the inhabitants. It is well fortified, and covered by a large inundation, and by the fort of Scarpe, which is at the diſtance of three quarters of a mile. It contains ſeven pariſhes, has ſix gates, and is cut in two by the river Scarpe, which runs through the middle. The walls are irregular, and defended by antique round towers, a large ditch, full of water, and a good covered way. In the ditch, there are a great number of half-moons, made of earth, and diſpoſed at proper diſtances, ſome of which are caſed with ſtone. Before the glacis is an advanced ditch, and ſtill farther, the inundation above mentioned. Towards Artois, there is a great horn-work, whoſe front is fortified with a half-moon, and a covered way. On the ramparts are ſeveral cavaliers of earth, in the form of baſtions. The fort of Scarpe is ſeated on the river of the ſame name, and is within cannon-ſhot of Douay. It is a regular pentagon, ſurrounded with a ditch full of water, in which there are three half-moons, fortified with a covered way and a glacis. Beyond the glacis is another advanced ditch, with a great inundation. On the Scarpe, within ſight of the fort is a ſluice, fortified with a caſed half-moon, and joined to a ditch and a covered way. There are ſtreets, which lead from each of the gates to the market-place, where there is a venerable old town-houſe, adorned with the ſtatues of the earls of Flanders, in which the magiſtrates who govern the town aſſemble, and are renewed every thirteen months. Here alſo are held ſeveral courts for the dependencies of Douay, which contain about thirty villages. An univerſity was erected here, in 1560, by Philip III. king of Spain. It contains ſixteen colleges, and has profeſſors in all faculties, out of which is choſen annually the rector, or principal of the univerſity. Here is likewiſe a ſeminary of Engliſh Roman Catholics, and two Engliſh convents for men, among many others for the natives of the country. It was taken by the French in 1667, by the allies in 1710, and the French retook it in 1712. It communicates with Deule by a canal, and is fifteen miles north-weſt of Cambray, thirteen eaſt of Arras, thirty-three ſouth-weſt of Mons, and one hundred and thirteen north of Paris. Long. 3. 10 E. Lat. 50. 22 N.

DOVE, a river which divides Derbyſhire from Staffordſhire, and falls into the Trent near Burton.

DOVER, a town of Kent, and one of the cinque ports, enjoying great privileges. Its ſituation is very romantic, it lying in a great valley, and the only one on this coaſt where the water is admitted within the cliff, which is here very high; and at this place, a running brook diſcharges itſelf into the ſea. The Roman city Dubin was to the ſouth of the brook, and the Roman road, called Watling-ſtreet, enters it, coming very ſtrait from Canterbury over Barham Downs, where it is very perfect. This city was an oblong ſquare, and ſome of the walls ſtill remain. The churches are of a very antique building, and that of St. Martin's is collegiate, being the ruins of a venerable pile. It was built in the form of a croſs, and that part of the priory which remains is now a farm-houſe. The Maiſon Dieu, which is over-againſt it, and where the Knights Templars lodged, when they came into or went out of the kingdom, is turned into a ſtore-houſe. The piers that form the haven, or large baſon, are coſtly great works. Above it is a fort, with four baſtions, of modern date; and the broad beach, which lies at the mouth of this great valley, is very delightful. The caſtle is the ſtrongeſt place in the world of an old fortification, for it takes up thirty acres of ground. It is an amazing maſs of walls, ditches, arches, embattlements, mounts, and other contrivances to render it impregnable. In queen Anne's wars, they kept fifteen hundred priſoners in this caſtle; but they have ſince carried away the timbers and floors, inſomuch that it is not now fit for that uſe. The braſs gun, called queen Elizabeth's pocket-piſtol, is a great curioſity it being twenty-two feet in length; it requires fifteen pounds of powder, and carries a ball ſeven miles; it is alſo excellently wrought. One part of the fortifications conſiſts of a large circular work, in which ſtands the old church, ſaid to be built by the firſt Chriſtian king of the Britons. The greateſt curioſity here is the Pharos, or Roman watch tower, which ſtands at the weſt end of the church; its deſign is ſimple, and yet it is very well contrived. The baſe is octangular without, and ſquare within, and it was originally much higher than it is at preſent. Upon four of its ſides are narrow windows, handſomely turned with a ſemicircular arch of Roman brick. The height of what is left is forty feet, and there are eight windows on each ſide; but it is now made no uſe of. On the other high cliff, oppoſite to this, beyond the town, has been another pharos, the bottom part of which is ſtill left, and called the Devil's Drop. Dover had formerly ſeven churches, which are now reduced to two. It is governed by a mayor, twelve jurats, and thirty-ſeven common-council-men, and has two markets weekly, on Wedneſdays and Saturdays. It ſends two members to parliament, who have the title of barons of the cinque ports. The channel between France and England is here not above twenty-one miles over, for which reaſon, there is, in time of peace, a packet-boat ſtationed, which goes between Dover and Calais, and is a ſafe and eaſy paſſage. It has only one fair, on November 22, for wearing apparel and haberdaſhery ware. It is fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Canterbury, and ſeventy-two eaſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 1. 24. E. Lat. 51. 8. N.

DOUGLAS, the principal town of the Iſle of Man, it having lately increaſed both in trade and buildings. The harbour, for ſhips of a tolerable burthen, is the ſafeſt in the iſland, and is much mended by a fine mole that has been lately built. It is ſeated on the eaſtern ſide. Long. 4. 25. W. Lat. 54. 7. N.

DOUGLAS (JAMES) earl of Morton, and regent of Scotland, was the ſecond ſon of ſir George Douglas, of Pinky, brother to Archibald, earl of Angus. He was at firſt educated ſuitably to his rank; but upon his father's being obliged to fly into England, he was forced to live privately in the north of Scotland, and to conceal himſelf the more effectually from the king, who was exaſperated againſt his father, he aſſumed the name of Innes, and ſerved a gentleman in the quality of a ſteward for many years; but after the death of James V. his father and other relations being reſtored, he appeared under his proper character, and ſoon after married the lady Mary Douglas, the ſecond daughter of James, earl of Morton, and had the honour, as well as the eſtate, ſettled on him and his heirs by his lordſhip, and upon this marriage immediately became maſter of Morton. In 1544, he held out the caſtle of Dalkeith, till after the battle of Pinky, when he was obliged to ſurrender it, and was carried priſoner to England. Upon his return home, he lived in retirement till the year 1553, when, upon the death of his wife's father, he came to the title and full poſſeſſion of the earldom of Morton. When the French were expelled the country by the assistance of the English, he and the earl of Glencairn were sent ambassadors to thank queen Elizabeth for her seasonable supplies, and to establish a firm peace between the two kingdoms; and during this embassy, the earl fixed himself so highly in the favour of that princess, that her friendship towards him continued to the last.

Upon queen Mary's return from France, where she had been educated, to ascend the throne of Scotland, he was appointed one of the privy-council, and on the 7th of January, 1563, was made lord high chancellor. In 1566, he had a principal hand in the death of Rizio, Mary's favourite, he entering the court with an hundred and sixty men, and seizing all the gates, kept them while king Henry went, with Ruthven and a number of armed men, to accomplish the murder; after which, the queen, who had scarce the liberty of choice left, was prevailed on to admit Morton and Ruthven into her presence, and to grant them the promise of a pardon. Soon after, the queen prevailed on the king to dismiss the guards placed on her person, and to escape with her. Thus was Morton, who was remarkable for wisdom and cunning, now basely deserted by Henry, who denied his knowledge of the conspiracy by public proclamations, and being also ungenerously abandoned by his party, he was obliged to fly from his native country, to resign the highest office, and to part with one of the most opulent fortunes in the kingdom. He, however, soon procured his pardon by means of the earl of Bothwell, though he was never admitted again to any degree of favour with the queen: yet he had so great a share in the confidence of Bothwell, that the latter opened to him his design of murdering the king, and requested his assistance in it; but this he absolutely refused, and was actually twenty miles from the place when that shocking tragedy was acted. He likewise made use of his utmost efforts to bring Bothwell to punishment; and upon that earl's marriage with the queen, he entered into an association, with others of the nobility, for the preservation of the young prince.

Upon her majesty's marriage with Bothwell, the flight of that nobleman, and the queen's being taken prisoner, and obliged to resign the government to the young prince her son, the earl of Morton was restored to his post of lord high chancellor, and, in 1568, was appointed one of the commissioners for the king of Scots to treat with queen Elizabeth's deputies, on their reasons for deposing queen Mary. After this, the earl of Morton had the principal management of all affairs in Scotland, and having defeated the queen's forces in several skirmishes, he was, after the death of the earl of Mar, in 1572, chosen regent of the kingdom. He now settled a profound peace at home, contracted a strict alliance with England, took care to recover and manage to the best advantage the revenue of the crown, and suppressed the disorders that subsisted in every corner of the kingdom; but lost the reputation due to these important services by his avarice, delinquents were forced to compound for their lives by the payment of exorbitant fines; the current coin was debased; licences were sold for carrying on prohibited branches of commerce; unusual taxes imposed, and the clergy, who placed a confidence in him, were induced to resign to him a third of their livings, in consideration of advantages which they could never obtain. By these means he drew upon him the general hatred, which rendering him very uneasy in his government, he, in March, 1578, resigned the regency. This was certainly a very imprudent step; for being thus divested of power, he soon found himself exposed to all the designs of his enemies, who prosecuted his destruction with unrelenting rigour. Morton delivered himself from this danger by seizing Stirling-castle, and making himself master of the king's person, and immediately resumed his former authority. An event so unexpected occasioned great consternation, and his enemies now saw it necessary for their own safety to enter into terms of accommodation with him. Morton, in token of reconcilement, having invited the leaders of the opposite party to a great entertainment, lord Athol, the chancellor, was soon after taken ill, and died within a few days. The symptoms and violence of the disease gave rise to strong suspicions of his being poisoned; and though the physicians, who opened his body, differed in opinion as to the cause of the distemper, the chancellor's relations publicly accused Morton of that odious crime. He however broke all the designs of his enemies; but at length the earl of Lennox becoming the favourite of the young king, measures were taken for his destruction. Captain Stewart entered the council-chamber while the king and nobles were assembled, and falling on his knees, accused Morton of being accessary in the conspiracy against the life of his majesty's father, and offered to verify this charge by legal evidence, on which the earl was confined first to his own house, and afterwards to Edinburgh castle, from whence he was removed to Dumbarton. Queen Elizabeth now interposed in his behalf, notwithstanding which he was brought to his trial on the 1st of June, 1581, and condemned. The next day he confessed to the ministers who were sent to him from the king, that the earl of Bothwell had proposed to him the murder of his majesty's father, and pressed him to concur in the execution, and added, "As I neither consented to this treasonable act, "nor assisted in the committing of it, so it was impossible "for me to reveal or prevent it. To whom could I make "the discovery? The queen was the author of the enter-"prize; Darnly was such a changeling, that no secret "could be safely communicated to him; Huntly and Both-"well, who bore the chief sway in the kingdom, were "themselves the perpetrators of the crime." Upon this, his sentence was changed from hanging to beheading, which was executed the same day. On the scaffold his behaviour was calm, his countenance and voice unaltered; and after some time spent in devotion, he suffered death with the intrepidity which became the name of Douglas. His head was placed on the public jail of Edinburgh; and his body, after lying till sun-set on the scaffold, covered with a beggarly cloak, was carried by common porters to the usual burial place of criminals; none of his friends durst accompany it to the grave, or discover their gratitude and respect by any symptoms of sorrow. Robertson's History of Scotland.

DOUJAT (JOHN) a learned doctor and professor of law in the university of Paris, was born at Toulouse. He was received into the French academy in 1650, and became professor to the dauphin. His works acquired him the esteem of the learned, and procured him considerable pensions from the court, the clergy, and the chancellors of France. He died at Paris, on the 27th of October, 1688, aged seventy-nine. He wrote, 1. Prænotiones canonicæ & civiles, which is esteemed the best of his works. 2. An History of the Canon and Civil Laws. 3. Lancelot's Institutions of Canon Law, with notes. 4. An Abridgment, in French of the Greek and Roman History, drawn from Velleius Paterculus; and, 5. Notes on Livy, for the use of the dauphin.

DOULENS, a town of France, in the province of Picardy, seated on the river Anthie, fifteen miles north of Amiens, and eighteen west of Arras. Long. 2. 22. E. Lat. 50. 12 N.

DOUSA, or VANDER DOES, (JANUS) an excellent Dutch poet, lord of Nortwick, in Holland, where he was born, on the 5th of December, 1545, distinguished himself by his learning and courage. Being made governor of Leyden by the prince of Orange, in 1574, he defended that city with with great bravery against the Spaniards, whom he obliged to raise the siege. The university of Leyden being founded the following year, he was made first curator, of which employment he was highly worthy, on account of his profound erudition. He composed, 1. Poems. 2. Notes on Sallust, Petronius, Tibullus, and Catullus. 3. The Annals of Holland; and other works, which made him be called the Varro of Holland. He died at the Hague, of the plague, on the 12th of October, 1604, aged fifty-nine. He left four sons, all of whom were men of learning and distinguished merit. 1. JANUS, a poet, philosopher, and mathematician, who was keeper of the library at Leyden, where he died in 1597, aged twenty-six. 2. GEORGE, skilled in the languages, who went to Constantinople, and published an account of his travels. 3. FRANCIS, who, in 1600, published the Epistles of Julius Cæsar Scaliger, with his Commentaries on Aristotle's History of Animals. 4. THEODORE, lord of Berkensteyn, who enjoyed several posts, and published, in 1614, the Chronicle of George Logotheta, with notes, and, in 1638, Farrago Ethica variarum Linguarum, variorumque Auctorum, &c.

DOWN, a county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, bounded on the east and south by St. George's Channel; on the west by the county of Armagh; and on the north by the county of Antrim. It lies opposite to the Isle of Man, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, and the north part of it fronts the Mull of Galway, in Scotland, and is about forty-four miles from it. It is about forty-four miles in length, and thirty in breadth, containing seventy-two parishes, fourteen thousand and sixty protestant, and five thousand two hundred and ten popish families, that is nineteen thousand two hundred and seventy in all. It sends fourteen members to parliament, two for the county, and twelve for the following boroughs, Down-Patrick, Newry, Newtown, Killeleagh, Bangor, and Hillsborough.

This county is rough and full of hills, and yet the air is temperate and healthy. The soil naturally produces wood, unless constantly kept open and ploughed; and the low grounds degenerate into bogs and mois, where the drains are neglected. But by the industry of the inhabitants it produces good crops of corn, particularly oats, and where marl is found, barley. This last is exported from Killogh to Dublin. The staple commodity of this county is the linen manufacture, of which the people in the northern part part greatly feel the benefit, being freed by it from a wretched condition, too viſible among the lower ſort in other parts of the kingdom, where no trade has been introduced. There is little room to doubt but this county will ſoon be wealthy and flouriſhing as well as populous.

The higheſt hills are the mountains of Mourne, the baſe of which terminates on the ſea ſhore: that called Clive Donah is three miles in a gradual aſcent, and half a mile perpendicular. They are reckoned to be as high as any in the kingdom, and are land-marks for ſailors. They afford variety of plants and many ſprings, and ſerving as a common to the county, they produce a great number of cattle in the ſummer time. One of the hills above Newcaſtle has good quarries for mill-ſtones. In another, called Diamond Mount, are found a ſort of cryſtals of a ſmoaky colour. The goats on theſe mountains feeding on medicinal herbs, give ſalutary milk, which, turned into whey, is preſcribed by phyſicians for ſcorbutic and nephritic diſorders, and in April, May, and June, for diſeaſes of the lungs. For which reaſon they are much frequented by the gentry of both ſexes.

There is a ſort of a pearl fiſhery in the river Ban, but it turns to little account. The pearls are found in freſh water muſcles, of a larger ſize than thoſe of the ſea, for which reaſon the poor people make uſe of the ſhells for ſpoons. The fiſh of this muſcle is of a blackiſh green colour, and cuts like an oyſter, but ſoon corrupts, and is of an inſipid nauſeous taſte. The ſhells are faſtened together by two cartilages, one at each end, and in this they differ from the oyſter and ſcallop, which have only one in the middle. Theſe muſcles lie ſometimes open in part, putting out a white fin like a tongue out of the mouth, which directs the eye of the fiſher to find them, for otherwiſe they look like the black ſtones in the river. The back of the ſhells above the hinges on which the valves open are broken and bruiſed, and diſcover the ſeveral cruſts that form the ſhell. The inſide of the ſhells are of a pearly colour, eſpecially when firſt opened. The pearl lies in the leſſer end of the ſhell, at the extremity of the gut, and out of the body of the fiſh, and between the two films that line the ſhells. The ſhells which contain the beſt pearls are twiſted, wrinkled, or bunched, and thoſe that are very ſmooth have none. The moſt common way of taking them by the poor people, is when the river is low, and the water clear; and then they either feel them with their feet, or take them with wooden tongues, or thruſt ſharp ſticks into the opening of the ſhells, and ſo take them up. However, this fiſhing is very low at preſent, there being very few muſcles with pearls to be met with, and thoſe in very deep water.

Beſides the Ban, there is the river Lagan, which riſes in the hills above Dromore, Dromore Maralin, and Litburn Belfaſt, and falls into Carickfergus bay.

DOWN, or DOWN-PATRICK, a town of Ireland, in the county of Down, is one of the moſt ancient in that kingdom. It is a market town and a biſhoprick, ſaid to be erected in the fifth century by St. Patrick, but is now united to the ſee of Connor. Within two hundred paces of the town, on the aſcent of a hill, are the ruins of an old cathedral, remarkable for the tomb of St. Patrick, the founder, in which they ſay the bodies of St. Bridget and St. Colomb are alſo laid. The town which is ſeated on the ſouth corner of Lough Coin, now called the Lake of Strangford, is adorned with ſeveral handſome public buildings; the pariſh church, a ſeſſions houſe, the dioceſe ſchool, an alms-houſe for old decayed proteſtants, and an Engliſh ſchool for forty children, who are cloathed and brought up in the proteſtant religion. As alſo an alms-houſe for three clergymen's widows, who have each twenty pounds a year, a barrack for a troop of dragoons, and a large market place. Among the hills, and in many iſlands, are flights of ſwans, and other water fowl, and the Lough abounds with ſalmon, mullets, and other ſea fiſh. About a mile from this town is St. Patrick's well, which many people frequent to drink at ſome ſeaſons of the year, and others to perform a pennance injoined them by the popiſh prieſts. The linen manufacture is carried on here as it is in ſeveral places in this county. It is five miles from Killogh. Long. 5. 50. W. Lat. 54. 23. N.

DOWNETON, or DUNKTON, a town in Wiltſhire, with a market on Fridays. It ſends two members to parliament, and is ſeated on the river Avon, ſix miles ſouth-weſt of Saliſbury, and eighty-four weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 2. 50. W. Lat. 51. 5. N. The fairs are April 20, and October 2, for ſheep and horſes. It is a very ancient borough by preſcription, and is governed by a mayor, choſen yearly at the court-leet of the lord of the manor.

DOWNHAM, a town in the county of Norfolk, with a market on Saturdays. Every Monday morning there are ſeveral hundred firkins of butter brought here, and ſent up the river Ouſe to Cambridge, from whence it is brought to London under the denomination of Cambridge butter. It is ſeated on the river Ouſe, thirty-five miles weſt of Norwich, eleven ſouth of Lyn, thirty-five north of Cambridge, and eighty-ſeven north of London. The fairs are on April 27, for horſes and toys, and November 2, for toys. Long. 0. 30. E. Lat. 52. 40. N.

DOWNS, a road near the coaſt of Deal, in Kent, through which the ſhips paſs in going out from London, and returning back. Here likewiſe the men of war ſometimes rendezvous.

DRABICIUS (NICHOLAS) a famous enthuſiaſt, born at Straſnitz, in Moravia, about the year 1587. He was admitted miniſter in 1616, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by ſetting up for a prophet, and publiſhing his Viſions, foretelling the downfall of the houſe of Auſtria, and the pope, and that the arms of the proteſtants in Hungary would be attended with the moſt aſtoniſhing ſucceſs. However, he lived to ſee his predictions contradicted by the event.

DRACO, an ancient Athenian legiſlator, about ſix hundred and twenty-four years before the Chriſtian æra, made ſuch rigorous laws, that Demades ſaid, they had been written in blood, and not with ink. Solon aboliſhed them on account of their ſeverity. It is ſaid that Draco was ſmothered in the theatre, in receiving the acclamations of the people, under the great quantity of robes and other marks of eſteem that were on all ſides thrown upon him.

DRACONITES (JOHN) a learned proteſtant miniſter, born at Carloſtadt, in Franconia, wrote Commentaries on ſome of the Prophets, and other works. He alſo undertook a Polyglotte Bible, which he did not live to finiſh. He died on the 18th of April, 1566.

DRACONTIUS, a Chriſtian poet, about the middle of the fifth century, wrote a poem on the Work of the Creation in ſix Days, and an Elegy addreſſed to the emperor Theodoſius the Younger.

DRAGUIGNAN, a town of France, in Provence, ſeated on the river Pis, in a fruitful pleaſant country, ten miles north-weſt of Frejus, and thirty-eight north-eaſt of Toulon. Long. 6. 39. E. Lat. 43. 34. N.

DRAGUT, rais or captain, a famous corſair of Barbary, was born of poor parents at Charaballac, a ſmall village of Natolia, and was at firſt domeſtic to a corſair named Arays. His figure pleaſed Barbaroſſa, who made him his favourite, and at length gave him a galley, and a patent for being captain. Dragut did great miſchief to the Chriſtians, under the reign of Soliman II. emperor of the Turks. In 1550 he infeſted the ſeas of Sicily and Tuſcany, but was taken with thirteen of his gallies, by Jannetin Doria, nephew to the celebrated Andrew Doria. Dragut obtained his liberty when Barbaroſſa went into Provence; Barbaroſſa lending him three thouſand crowns to pay for his ranſom, which Jannetin Doria was too avaricious to refuſe. Dragut at length ravaged Calabria, diſperſed the Spaniſh fleet, made a deſcent on the iſland of Corſica, and took Tripoly, Gozzo, an iſland near Malta, and Reggio; gave chace to Andrew Doria, took five of his gallies, and ſunk two others; but ſoon after theſe great exploits, he found himſelf weakened by the retreat of the Ottoman army, and purſued by Andrew Doria, who had then increaſed his ſtrength, and now ſhut up Dragut in the canal of Barbary. To extricate himſelf out of ſo dangerous a ſituation, he haſtily erected a fort at the mouth of the canal, in which he raiſed a battery of four large pieces of cannon, which kept the Chriſtian gallies out of their reach. Taking advantage of the time he gained by this expedient, he, by the aſſiſtance of his own men, and thoſe of the country, lightened his gallies, and got them upon the land; and by means of rollers, conveyed them to another canal, where he ſpeedily fitted them up; and having, during the night, drawn his garriſon from the fort, ſteered into the open ſea, where it was impoſſible for Andrew Doria to come up with him. By this brave action, of which hiſtory affords no other example but that of the Tarentines, who were adviſed to make uſe of the ſame expedient by Hannibal, Dragut delivered himſelf from danger. He died in 1665, of a wound he had received at the ſiege of Malta, when he went to the aſſiſtance of Soliman.

DRAKE (ſir FRANCIS) one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed of the naval heroes, in the glorious reign of Elizabeth, was born near Taviſtock, in Devonſhire, in the year 1545. He rendered his name immortal, and encreaſed the reputation of England at ſea, by the moſt glorious ſucceſs in ſeveral expeditions againſt the Spaniards, taking rich ſhips, plundering and burning Spaniſh towns in America; and by being the firſt commander in chief, and the firſt Engliſhman who ſailed round the world: for which he was knighted at Deptford by queen Elizabeth, on board his own ſhip, April 4, 1581, which was preſerved as a monument of his glory, and at laſt, upon its decay, a chair was made out of its planks, and preſented to the univerſity of Oxford, where it is ſtill preſerved. After receiving the above honour, he, in 1585, ſailed again to the Weſt Indies, and took the cities ties of St. Jago, St. Domingo, Carthagena, and St. Auguſtin. In 1587 he proceeded to Liſbon, with a fleet of thirty ſail, and having intelligence of a large fleet aſſembled in the bay of Cadiz, which was to have made a part of the Spaniſh armada, he entered that port; burnt there upwards of ten thouſand ton of ſhipping; and then having intelligence of a large carrack expected at Tercera from the Eaſt Indies, he ſailed thither, and though his men were in want of proviſions, by fair words, and large promiſes, he prevailed on them to endure theſe hardſhips for a few days; within this ſpace the Eaſt India ſhip arrived, which he took and carried home in triumph. In 1588, ſir Francis Drake was appointed vice-admiral, under the lord Howard, high admiral, when he made prize of a large galleon, and had a great ſhare in deſtroying the Spaniſh armada. In ſhort, he was at length joined in commiſſion with ſir John Hawkins, and ſent again to diſtreſs the Spaniards in the Weſt Indies; but this expedition proved unfortunate, and this worthy and brave admiral died, on the 28th of January, 1595-6, before his return.

DRAKE (JAMES) a political writer and phyſician, born at Cambridge, in the year 1667, and educated in that univerſity. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing the Hiſtory of the laſt Parliament, begun at Weſtminſter on the 10th of February, 1700, for which he was proſecuted by order of the houſe of lords, but acquitted. He afterwards raiſed the rumour of the church being in danger, by publiſhing the Memorial of the Church of England, which was cenſured by both houſes, and burnt by the hands of the common hangman. He alſo wrote a news paper, intitled Mercurius Politicus, for which he was proſecuted in the Queen's Bench, but acquitted. He wrote ſeveral other works, among which was his New Syſtem of Anatomy, in two volumes, octavo, and died on the 2d of March, 1706-7.

DRAKENBORCH (ARNOLD) profeſſor of hiſtory and eloquence at Utrecht, made himſelf known by ſeveral works, and particularly his fine edition of Titus Livy, in quarto.

DRAPPIER (GUY) licentiate of the Sorbonne, and curate of St. Saviours, at Beauvais, was the author of ſeveral works, and died on the 3d of December, 1716, aged ninety-two.

DRAVE, a large navigable river, which riſes in the archbiſhoprick of Saltſburg, in Germany, and running ſouth-eaſt through the province of Stiria, afterwards divides Hungary from Sclavonia, and falls into the river Danube at Eſſeck.

DRAYTON, or MARKET-DRAYTON, a town in Shropſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays. It is ſeated on the river Torn, ſixteen miles north-eaſt of Shrewſbury, and one hundred and fifty-three north-weſt of London. The fairs are on the Wedneſday before Palm-Sunday, September 19, and October 24, for horned cattle, horſes, ſheep, pigs, hempen and woollen cloth. Long. 2. 30. W. Lat. 52. 50. N.

DRAYTON (MICHAEL) a famous poet, in the reigns of queen Elizabeth, king James I. and king Charles I. was born at Harſhull, or Hartſhill, in Warwickſhire, in the year 1563, and educated at Cambridge. His love of poetry, it is ſaid, diſcovered itſelf very early; for even in the tenth year of his age, he expreſſed, we are told, an extreme anxiety to know what ſtrange kind of creatures theſe poets were; and deſired his tutor, that if he could, he would make him of all things a poet. At what time however he began to diſtinguiſh himſelf by his poetical compoſitions is difficult to determine. He wrote, 1. Several paſtorals. 2. A work intitled Poly Olbion. 3. The Battle of Agincourt. 4. The Miſeries of Queen Margaret. 5. Nymphidia, or the Court of Fairies, a maſter-piece in the groteſque kind. 6. The Queſt of Cynthia, another beautiful piece. 7. The Moon-Calf; and many other poems. He died in 1631. To his memory a monument was erected in Weſtminſter-abbey, on which is the following inſcription and epitaph, which were formerly in gold letters; but are now almoſt obliterated.

MICHAEL DRAYTON, eſq. a memorable poet of his age, exchanged his laurel for a crown of glory, Anno 1631.

Do pious marble! let thy readers know
What they, and what their children owe
To Drayton's name, whoſe ſacred duſt
We recommend unto thy truſt;
Protect his memory, and preſerve his ſtory;
Remain a laſting monument of his glory;
And when thy ruins ſhall diſclaim
To be the treaſurer of his name:
His name, that cannot fade, ſhall be
An everlaſting monument to thee.

DRELINCOURT (CHARLES) miniſter of the church of Paris, was born at Sedan, July 10, 1595. He was admitted miniſter in the year 1618, and diſcharged his function near Langres, till he was called by the church of Paris, in 1620. His ſermons were extremely edifying, and he was of great ſervice to the proteſtant church by the fruitfulneſs of his pen, whether we conſider his books of devotion, or thoſe of controverſy. In the former there is ſuch a vein of piety, that religious minds have always been wonderfully edified by them. His Conſolations againſt the Fear of Death; his Charitable Viſits, in five volumes, and his Sermons in three volumes have been greatly admired. Some of theſe have paſſed through above forty editions, and have been tranſlated into Engliſh, High and Low Dutch, and Italian. He died on the 3d of November, 1669.

DRELINCOURT (CHARLES) ſon of the proceeding, was born at Paris, February 1, 1633, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the practice of phyſic, as well in the army commanded by marſhal de Turenne, in Flanders, as at Paris, and was afterwards choſen profeſſor of phyſic at Leyden, where he died, May 31, 1697.

DRESDEN, the capital city of the electorate of Saxony, in Germany. It is ſeated on the river Elbe, which divides it into two parts. One part is called Old Dreſden, and the other the New Town, in the German Language, New Stadt. They are joined together by a ſtone bridge, ſupported by nineteen piers, and ſix hundred and thirty paces in length. As this bridge was too narrow for the crowds of people that were continually paſſing and repaſſing, king Auguſtus, in 1730, cauſed two walks for foot paſſengers to be built, one on each ſide, in a very wonderful manner, the one for thoſe that go into the city, and the other for thoſe that return back. Theſe are bordered with iron palliſadoes, of curious workmanſhip. Upon this bridge a gilded crucifix is placed. Dreſden is ſurrounded by ſtrong and handſome fortifications, and might boaſt that it never had been taken, nor yet beſieged: but this glory was put to an end on December 19, 1745, by the king of Pruſſia, who then became maſter of it, and entered it in triumph the next day.

All the houſes of this city are built with ſquare free ſtone, and are almoſt all of the ſame height. They have ſtone from the neighbourhood of Pirna, about ten miles from this city, which is readily brought down the Elbe. They have lately finiſhed a large handſome church for the Roman Catholics, which is placed between the Elbe, the bridge, and the caſtle. In general the houſes are high and ſtrong, the ſtreets wide, ſtrait, well paved, clean, and well illuminated in the night; and there are large ſquares, diſpoſed in ſuch a manner, that Dreſden may paſs for one of the handſomeſt cities in the world.

When you enter Old Dreſden from Meiſſen, on the right you ſee a large houſe called the Palace of the Indies. It is three ſtories high, and full of curious porcelain from China and Japan, which being old and uncommon, render it the richeſt magazine of ſuch rarities in theſe parts. The value is ſaid to amount to a million of crowns. The goods of this houſe are all brought from the Eaſt Indies, one part conſiſts of feathers of different colours, all natural, which are wrought with ſo much art, that you would take it for a beautiful flowered ſatin. To this palace there belongs a garden, which hath a proſpect over the Elbe. It is adorned with ſtatues of white marble, brought from Rome.

Near this magnificent palace is the college of cadets, which is a magnificent ſtructure, and which the ſtates of Saxony have cauſed to be built to maintain two companies of cadets, who are all gentlemen of this country, and are here inſtructed in the ſciences proper for perſons of quality to learn. Farther in the ſtreet where this ſtands is an amphitheatre, where they exhibit the combats of wild beaſts which are here in great numbers, ſuch as lions, tygers, bears, and in ſhort all ſorts of fierce animals from the four quarters of the globe. The palace or caſtle is near the bridge, at the entrance into the New Town; but as it is ancient and ordinary, it is not worth taking notice of on the outſide. But the inſide deſerves attention. The room of ſtate is furniſhed in a very ſuperb manner; the great gallery is full of curioſities, as antique buſts, vaſes, and pictures.

The royal treaſury, called the Green Vault, or the Green Magazine, is within the palace, and conſiſts of three vaulted rooms, which contain immenſe riches, ſuch as gold, jewels, and diamonds. Beſides, there are different ornaments made up of brilliant diamonds, rubies, emeralds, pearls, ſapphires, and other precious ſtones. Each ornament is complete, and formed into coat-buttons, loops for hats, ſword and couteau-hilts, canes, ſleeve-buttons, ſhoe-buckles, girdle-buckles, ſnuff-boxes, watch-caſes, etwees, pocket-books, in ſhort all ſorts of trinkets that can poſſibly be imagined. All theſe rich curioſities appear to the greateſt advantage through the cryſtal caſes in which they are put, and placed in exact order.

To this palace belongs a garden, which is but of ſmall extent, and might more properly have been called a ſquare. It is ſurrounded with buildings of free-ſtone, which ſerve as green-houſes for the orange trees. Theſe are all upon a level, and ſerve to ſupport ſix large pavilions, three of which are placed to front the entrance, two are on the ſides, and one is built on the portico at the entrance. They all communicate with each other by means of a platform, bordered with balluſtrades, and adorned with ſtatues. Near this is a large palace built by the king, for a favourite miſtreſs. It is richly adorned, but the rooms are too ſmall, and the architecture mean.

The palace of Hoyhm is the moſt conſiderable ſtructure in Dreſden. The elector's ſtables are not far from this palace, and are well worth ſeeing. They contain the moſt curious and beautiful horſes, of every ſort, and have each an iron rack, and a copper manger. Over the ſtables are rooms full of handſome equipages, conſiſting of ſaddles, ſuperb houſings, and magnificent harneſſes. Many of theſe harneſſes are in the Turkiſh faſhion, adorned with ſilver, and inriched with jewels.

The arſenal is not ſo fine as that of the king of Pruſſia's, though it is much boaſted of here. There are ſeveral rooms full of arms, among which there are four hundred pieces of braſs cannon, and ancient armour. The ſuburbs of Dreſden are of a large extent, but contain nothing curious except the elector's garden and palace; as alſo the palace of Turky, ſo called becauſe it is furniſhed after the Turkiſh manner.

In the New Town there is the equeſtrian ſtatue of Auguſtus II. as large as the life. It is made of bronze, and has the face turned towards Poland. When you aſk a curious traveller what he likes beſt in this city, he will tell you, the elector's ſtables, the cabinet of curioſities, the arſenal, the garden called Zuinger, the mint, the palace of the Indies, the green magazine, the elector's library, and the great garden without the city. But however we muſt not forget to mention ſome of the rarities in the cabinet of curioſities, theſe are mechanical working tools, exquiſitely wrought, many curious pieces of workmanſhip in coral and agate; cups made of mother of pearl, an oſtrich made out of its own ſhell, with golden feathers, a linen purſe which is incombuſtible, ſilver ore, almoſt pure from the mines of Friburg, an hundred and twenty heads carved on the outſide of a cherry-ſtone, ſeveral unpoliſhed topazes, ten inches in diameter, emeralds an inch in diameter, as they grow in the rock, &c. In the library there are a great variety of contrivances in clock-work, as a horſeman riding, a ſhip under ſail, a centaur running and ſhooting, and a crab crawling on the table. Near the ſtables there is a long arched walk, with the pictures of ſeveral favourite horſes, and over it a gallery where all the dukes and electors of Saxony are drawn both in their robes and military habits.

With regard to eccleſiaſtical affairs, there are two conſiſtories, on which the two univerſities depend; beſides which there is a high eccleſiaſtical council, which conſiſts only of three perſons, theſe are the preſident of the ſecret council, the preſident of the ſuperior conſiſtory, and the firſt chaplain of the elector belonging to the church in the palace. The principal church in the city is called the Holy Croſs, which hath a ſuperintendant. It is a ſuperb ſtructure, and the ſteeple is ſo ſolidly built, that ſeveral pieces of cannon may be planted upon it.

Though this city is in a low ſituation, yet it hath agreeable proſpects. It is ſupplied with a prodigious quantity of proviſions, not only out of the neighbourhood, but from Bohemia, which are brought every market-day, which is once a week. The Dreſden China ware, or rather porcelain, has been noted ſome time for a curious manufacture. It is ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Meiſſen, forty ſouth eaſt of Leipſick, and ſeventy-five north-weſt of Prague. Long. 13. 34. E. Lat. 51. 12. N.

DRESSERUS (MATTHEW) born at Erfort, the capital of Thuringia, Auguſt 24, 1536, raiſed himſelf a conſiderable name among the learned. He taught polite literature in ſeveral univerſities, and wrote a work, entitled Rhetorica Inventionis, Diſpoſitionis, & Elocutionis Exemplis ſacris & profanis quam plurimis illuſtrata, and other works. He died at Leipſic, October 5, 1607.

DREXELIUS (JEREMIAH) a Jeſuit celebrated for his piety, and writings, was born at Augſburg, and became preacher in ordinary to the elector of Bavaria. He wrote ſeveral pious and practical pieces, which have been printed together in two volumes folio; and died on the 19th of April, 1638, aged fifty-ſeven.

DREVET (PETER) the name of two excellent French engravers, the father and ſon, who, in particular, engraved admirable portraits, after the celebrated Rigaud. Peter Drevet, the ſon, was a member of the Royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and died at Paris in 1739, at forty two years of age. Claude Drevet, their relation and pupil, diſtinguiſhes himſelf in the ſame art.

DREUX, a town in the Iſle of France, remarkable for its antiquities, and for the battle which was fought in December, 1562, between the Papiſts and the Proteſtants, wherein the former gained the victory. Some think it took its name from the prieſts of Gaul, called the Druids, in the times of Paganiſm. It conſiſts of two pariſhes, St. Stephen's, and Notre Dame, called the Great Church, which is pretty well built. It is ſeated on the river Blaiſe, at the foot of a mountain, on which is a ruined caſtle, eighteen miles north-weſt of Chartres, forty-five weſt of Paris, and fifty ſouth-eaſt of Rouen. Long 1. 27. E. Lat. 48. 44. N.

DRIEDO (JOHN) in Low Dutch Driedoen, was born at Turnhout in Brabant, and at length became profeſſor of divinity, in the univerſity of Louvain, curate of St James's, and canon of St. Peter's in that city. He oppoſed Lutheraniſm with great vigour, and publiſhed ſeveral controverſial pieces on grace, free will, &c. He died on the 4th of Auguſt, 1535.

DRIESEN, a ſtrong town of Germany, in the New March of Brandenburg, cloſe to the fortreſs Drono, which is ſurrounded with a marſh, on the ſide towards Poland. It was taken by the Swedes, in 1639, who reſtored it in 1650. It is ſeated on the river Warte, twenty miles eaſt of Landſberg. Long. 16. 1. E. Lat 52. 48. N.

DRINO, a port town of Turky, ſeated on a bay in the Gulph of Venice, to which it gives its name, ſixty miles ſouth-eaſt of Raguſa. Long. 20. 12. E. Lat. 42. 0 N.

DRINO, a river of Turky in Europe. It riſes in Mount Marinæi, on the frontiers of Albany, and falls into the Gulph of Drino, which makes part of the Gulph of Venice.

DRIVERE (JEREMIAH) in Latin Triverius, profeſſor of phyſic at Louvain, wrote ſeveral works, and died in 1554, aged fifty-two.

DROGHEDA, the chief town in the county of Lowth, which is in the province of Leinſter, in Ireland, ſeated in a bay of the ſame name. It has a market, a fair, and a good harbour; but it requires a pilot to guide a ſhip into it. The town is old and indifferently built; but populous, and has ſome trade. It is divided into two parts, by the river Boyn, over which there is a bridge. They have ſome trade to the north parts of England, and are ſupplied with a large quantity of coals from Whitehaven, which are diſtributed round about by land, as well as ſent up the river Boyne. It was bravely defended againſt the rebels in 1641. After the ceſſation of arms, it was taken by the duke of Ormond and the earl of Inchiquin, but was retaken by Cromwell, in 1649, after a ſtorm and a ſtout reſiſtance, in which above four thouſand men in arms were put to the ſword. It was garriſoned by king James, in 1689, but was ſurrendered to king William after the battle of the Boyne. It is three miles weſt of the Iriſh channel, and twenty-three north of Dublin. Long. 6. 17. W. Lat. 53 45. N

DROITWICH, a town in Worceſterſhire, with a market on Fridays. It contains about four hundred houſes, and is noted for excellent white ſalt. It is governed by a bailiff, a recorder, a juſtice, and four burgeſſes, and has four churches, namely, St. Peter's St. Nicholas, St. Andrew's, and St. Doderhill. It ſends two members to parliament. The fairs are on Good Friday, October 28, and December 21, for linen-cloth and hats. It is ſixteen miles north of Worceſter, thirty two ſouth of Coventry, and one hundred and ſeventeen north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 16. Lat. 52. 20.

DROMORE, a market town of Ireland, in the county of Down, and province of Ulſter, with a biſhop's ſee. The church at this place is neat and decent, but there is no cathedral ſervice performed in it. The two alms-houſes for clergymens' widows were erected by the contributions of the biſhops and clergy. The dioceſe ſchool is kept here, and the Proteſtant ſchool for the education of poor children. The river Lagan divides the town; at the eaſt end of which is a mount, which is always green. It is an ancient fortification, and deſerves the notice of thoſe that paſs this way. There are many linen weavers in and near this town; and the turnpike-road, from Dublin to Belfaſt, paſſes by here. It is twelve miles ſouth of Belfaſt, and ſeventy north of Dublin. Long. 6. 15. W. Lat. 54. 28 N.

DRONFIELD, a town in Derbyſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, and four fairs, on January 10, April 24, and July 15, for ſheep and cattle; and on September 1, for cheeſe. It is ſeated in a bottom, and has a free ſchool. It is twenty-three miles north of Derby, five South of Sheffield, ſeven north of Cheſterfield, and one hundred and fifty three north-north-weſt of London. Long. 1. 35. W. Lat. 53. 17. N.

DRONTHEIM, a town of Norway, capital of the government of the ſame name. It is ſeated near the Gulph of Drontheim, in a neck of land, and is a large well built place. Many of the townſmen are rich. It was the place of abode of the antient kings of Norway; and was formerly an archbiſhoprick, and at preſent is the ſee of a biſhop. The cathedral is dedicated to St. Olaus, and was heretofore a magnificent ſtructure, and the moſt ſuperb in all the North; but it was conſumed by fire in 1530, except the choir. Drontheim is ſtrongly fortified, and has a ſpacious harbour;

harbour; but there are ſeveral rocks under water. They have lately eſtabliſhed a college in this city. It is three hundred and forty miles north-by-weſt of Copenhagen, and two hundred and ſeventy north-weſt of Stockholm. Long. 10. 55 E. Lat. 63. 16. N.

DRONTHEIM, a government in Norway, bounded on the ſouth by the government of Bergen, on the north by that of Wardhus, on the weſt by the Northern Ocean, and on the eaſt by the mountains which divide it from Sweden. The air of this diſtrict is not exceſſive cold, eſpecially towards the ſouth, where it is fulleſt of people; but it has no conſiderable place, except Drontheim, which is the capital.

DROUIN (N.) doctor of the Sorbonne, was the author of a treatiſe in Latin on the ſacraments, which was printed after his death, at Venice, in 1737, in two volumes, folio.

DRUIDS, in antiquity, the prieſts of the ancient Britons, who performed not only the public and private ſacrifices, and were the expoſitors of what concerned religion; but were the arbiters of all differences, whether of a public or private nature; and if any private perſon, or even magiſtrate refuſed to abide by their deciſion, he was looked upon as impious, and forbid to aſſiſt at the ſacrifices. Great numbers of youth put themſelves under their diſcipline; theſe they taught in verſe, and made them get their poetical inſtructions by heart. Their principal doctrines were the immortality and tranſmigration of ſouls; the virtue and power of the gods; the motion of the ſtars; the magnitude of the earth, and the nature of things. They had a particular veneration for miſletoe, and the oak that produces it: had their ſacred groves of oak; and with great cruelty ſacrificed human victims. In ſhort, the Druids had one who preſided over the reſt; and, when he died, one of their body was choſen his ſucceſſor.

DRUMBOTE, a town of Ireland, in the county of Monaghan, and province of Ulſter, ſeated eight miles weſt of Dundalk. Long 6 43. W. Lat. 54. 5. N.

DRUMLANERK, a town of Scotland, in the county of Nithſdale, ſeated on the river Nith, fifteen miles north of Dumfries. Long. 3. 35. W. Lat. 55. 13. N.

DRUMMOND (WILLIAM) a polite writer, born in Scotland, on the 13th of November, 1585, was the ſon of ſir John Drummond, gentleman uſher to king James VI. He had his education at Edinburgh, and afterwards being ſent into France, ſtudied the civil law at Bourges: but his genius leading him to polite literature, he returned to Scotland, and ſettling at his agreeable ſeat at Hawthorndon, wrote his Cypreſs Grove, and a poetical piece, called Flowers of Sion; but the death of an amiable lady, whom he was going to marry, afflicted him ſo deeply, that he again went abroad, and travelled through Germany, France, and Italy, where he converſed with the learned, and made a choice collection of the beſt ancient Greek, and modern Spaniſh, French, and Italian books. On his return to Scotland, he wrote his Hiſtory of the five ſucceſſive Kings of Scotland, of the name of James; his Irene; and other works. He died in 1649, and all his pieces were collected and printed together in folio, at Edinburgh, in 1711.

DRUSBICKI (GASPER) a Poliſh Jeſuit, and twice provincial of the province of Poland, entered that ſociety Auguſt 24, 1609, at twenty years of age. He wrote De Paſſione Jeſu Chriſti Filii Dei: Faſciculus Exercitionum & Conſideracionum de Precipuis virtutibus Chriſtianæ fidei: and other works. He died April 2, 1660.

DRUSENHEIM, a town of Alſace, ſeated on the river Moter, near the Rhine, four miles from Fort Lewis, and fifteen from Straſburg. Long. 8. 6. E. Lat. 48. 40. N.

DRUSILLA, the daughter of Agrippa I. king of the Jews, lived in the beginning of the firſt centry, and was but ſix years old at the death of her father. She was betrothed to Epiphanes, ſon of Antiochus, king of Comagena; but this marriage was diſſolved before it was conſummated, becauſe Epiphanes refuſed to embrace the Jewiſh religion. However, Azizus, king of the Emeſeni, turned Jew, and was circumciſed to obtain her. She was exquiſitely beautiful, and was no ſooner ſeen by Felix, but he fell in love with her, and offered her marriage, when ſhe conſented, and left Azizus and her religion at the ſame time. She had a ſon named Agrippa, who periſhed with her in an eruption of mount Veſuvius. It was before her and Felix that St. Paul preached of juſtice, chaſtity, and the laſt judgment.

DRUSILLA (JULIA) daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born at Treves, and married Lucius Caſſius. When very young, ſhe committed inceſt with her brother, Caligula, who was ſurpriſed in the act before he was of age to wear the toga virilis. Caligula afterwards took her from Lucius Caſſius, her huſband, lived publicly with her, as if ſhe had been his lawful wife, and when ſhe died, A. D. 40, gave into the moſt impious extravagancies to honour her memory. Dio relates, that ſhe was alſo married to Marcus Æmilius Lepidus.

DRUSIUS, or DRIESCHE (JOHN) one of the moſt learned Proteſtant divines of his time, was born at Oudenard in Flanders, on the 28th of June, 1550. He ſtudied in Flanders, and in England; obtained great ſkill in the Hebrew language; and at length taught at Leyden and Franeker. He wrote, 1. Notes on the moſt difficult paſſages in the Old Teſtament. 2. A Collection of the Fragments of Hexaples. 3. An Hebrew Grammar, and other works, which are eſteemed. He died on the 12th of February, 1616.

DRUSIUS (JOHN) the ſon of the former, was a prodigy of learning for his years. He was born at Franeker, in 1588, and at five years of age began to learn the Latin and Hebrew tongues. At ſeven he explained the Hebrew Pſalter, ſo exactly, that a Jew, who taught Arabic at Leyden, was extremely aſtoniſhed. At nine he read the Hebrew without points, ſpoke Latin as readily as his mother tongue, and had ſome knowledge of the Engliſh. At ſeventeen he made a ſpeech in Latin to James I. king of Great Britain, in the midſt of his court. He had a lively genius, a ſolid judgment, a ſtrong memory, an agreeable temper, and a ſingular turn of piety. He died of the ſtone, at twenty-one years of age, at the houſe of Dr. William Thomas, dean of Chicheſter, who allowed him a conſiderable ſalary, leaving ſeveral works, among which are many letters in Hebrew, verſes in the ſame language, and notes on the Proverbs of Solomon.

DRUSUS (MARCUS LIVIUS) a famous Roman of the illuſtrius family of Druſus, which was fruitful in great men. He was diſtinguiſhed by his wit, eloquence, and courage; but was exceſſively ambitious; he revived the laws of the Gracchi, concerning the diſtribution of Lands; inſulted the conſul Philippus, who oppoſed his deſigns, and was murdered by one Varius, in the court of his own houſe.

DRUSUS (NERO CLAUDIS) the brother of Tiberius, was one of the greateſt men whom the Roman empire ever produced; he was an able warrior, a wiſe counſellor, and poſſeſſed a ſurpriſing degree of modeſty, civility, and induſtry. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſucceſs in war: during his queſtorſhip with his brother, he ſubdued the Rhetians. He afterwards marched into Gaul, where he reduced ſome provinces which had revolted. He then defeated the Germans, who had paſſed the Rhine; routed the Sicambri in their own territories; gained a naval victory againſt the Bructeri on the Ems; ſubdued the people of Frieſland, and was the firſt Roman general who embarked upon the Northern Ocean. Upon his return to Rome, he obtained the prætorſhip: when departing to purſue his ſucceſſes in Germany, he ſubdued ſeveral nations as far as the Weſer, which gained him, at Rome, the triumphal ornaments; the honour of an ovation, and the dignity of proconſul. He was afterwards raiſed to the conſulſhip, when, returning into Germany, he puſhed his conqueſts as far as the Elbe; and was giving the Roman people the greateſt hopes, when he died of a fracture in his leg, occaſioned by his horſe falling on him, when thirty years of age, and nine years before the Chriſtian Æra. Tiberius, his brother, and his father-in-law, Auguſtus, pronounced funeral orations to his honour. Druſus left by Antonia, the daughter of Marc Antony, three children; Germanicus, Claudius, and Livia.

DRUSUS, the ſon of Tiberius, by Vipſania, his firſt wife, imitated the vices of his father; yet retained a ſtrict friendſhip for Germanicus, his couſin german, and adopted brother. He appeaſed the legions that mutinied in Pannonia, after the death of Auguſtus: fomented the diviſions which ſprung up among the Germans: made conſiderable advantage of them; and was conſul with his father in the year of Rome 774, A. D. 23; but having given a box on the ear to Sejanus, who had criminal converſation with his wife, he, in conſort with that lady, procured Druſus to be poiſoned by the eunuch Lygdus, in the year 23.

DRUSUS, the ſon of Germannicus and Agrippina, was, by the recommendation of Tiberius, advanced to public poſts before he was of competent age; but was afterwards oppreſſed and impriſoned, by the artifices of Sejanus; and after the death of that favourite, was to ſuch a degree abandoned to the rage of hunger, that he gnawed the flocks of his mattreſs, and thus dragged on life till the ninth day, when he died in the year 33. After his death Tiberius had the cruelty to accuſe him to the ſenate.

DRYADES, in Pagan mythology, nymphs or goddeſſes of the ſecond rank, who inhabited the woods and foreſts, reſiding in their particular trees, with which they were thought to be coeval. The oak was generally their choice, whence they received their name from δρῦς, an oak. See HAMADRYADES.

DRYANDER (JOHN) a famous phyſician and mathematician, born at Wetteren, in the landgravate of Heſſe, taught at at Marpurg, and died there on the 20th of December, 1560. He wrote ſeveral phyſical and mathematical works, which are eſteemed.

DRYANDER (JOHN) a proteſtant martyr, born at Burgos in Spain. Being at Rome, and ſpeaking his ſentiments too freely, he was accuſed as an heretic, condemned, and burnt in the year 1545.

DRYDEN (JOHN) one of the moſt eminent Engliſh poets of the ſeventeenth century, was the ſon of Eraſmus Dryden, third ſon of ſir Eraſmus Dryden, bart. He was born at Oldwincle, in Huntingdonſhire, on the 9th of Auguſt, 1631; educated at Weſtminſter ſchool under Dr. Buſby; and was from thence, in 1650, elected a ſcholar of Trinity college in Cambridge. During his ſtay at ſchool, he tranſlated the Third Satire of Perſius, for a Thurſday-night's exerciſe. In 1658, he publiſhed his Heroic Stanzas, on the late lord protector; and in 1660, a Poem on the Reſtoration of king Charles II. The ſame year he publiſhed his Poem to the king, on his coronation. In 1662, he addreſſed a poem to the lord chancellor Hyde; and the ſame year publiſhed a ſatire on the Dutch. His next piece was his Annus Mirabilis. In 1668, Mr. Dryden, upon the death of Sir William Davenant, was made poet laureat, and hiſtoriographer to Charles II. and the ſame year publiſhed his Eſſay on Dramatic Poeſy. His firſt play, entitled The Wild Gallant, appeared in 1669, and was followed, in the ſpace of twenty-five years, by twenty-ſix others, which have been ſince publiſhed in ſix volumes, duodecimo. In 1679, was publiſhed an Eſſay on Satire, written jointly by Mr. Dryden, and the earl of Mulgrave. This piece, which was firſt handed about in manuſcript, contained reflections on the duchеſs of Portſmouth, and the earl of Rocheſter; they, it is ſaid, ſuſpecting Mr. Dryden to be the author, hired three men, who took their opportunity to cudgel him in Will's coffee-houſe, in Covent-garden. Mr. Dryden next publiſhed his Abſalom and Achitophel, his Medal, his Religio Laici, Hind and Panther, Ode on St. Cecilia's day, &c. Soon after the acceſſion of King James II. he turned Roman catholic, which occaſioned his being diſmiſſed from the office of poet laureat, at the Revolution. Mr. Dryden alſo wrote a Tranſlation of Freſnoy's Art of Painting: a tranſlation of all Virgil, and ſeveral other original pieces and tranſlations. Mr. Dryden was remarkable for his modeſty and his humane diſpoſition. His poems are juſtly admired, and would have been ſtill more perfect, had he not been obliged to write for bread: ſome of theſe, and particularly his Ode on St. Cecilia's day, are, perhaps, the moſt perfect pieces in any language. This great poet died on the 1ſt of May, 1701, and was interred in Weſtminſter Abbey, where a monument has been ſince erected over him, by John late duke of Buckingham. Mr. Dryden married the lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the earl of Berkſhire, by whom he had three ſons, Charles, John, and Henry.

There are ſome circumſtances relating to Mr. Dryden's funeral, which being of a very extraordinary nature, we cannot forbear inſerting them. The day after his death, Dr. Sprat, then biſhop of Rocheſter, and dean of Weſtminſter, ſent word to the lady Elizabeth Howard, Mr. Dryden's widow, that he would make a preſent of the ground, and all the other abbey fees. The lord Hallifax likewiſe ſent to her, and to Mr. Charles Dryden, her ſon, offering to defray the expences of our poet's funeral, and afterwards to beſtow five hundred pounds on a monument in the abbey: which generous offers were accepted. Accordingly, on the Sunday following, the company being aſſembled, the corpſe was put into a velvet herſe, attended with eighteen mourning coaches. When they were juſt ready to move, the lord Jefferies, ſon of the lord chancellor Jefferies, with ſome of his rakiſh companions, coming by, aſked whoſe funeral it was, and being told it was Mr. Dryden's, proteſted that it ſhould not be buried in that private manner; that he would have the honour of the interment, and would beſtow one thouſand pounds on a monument in the abbey for him. Then running up ſtairs with ſeveral of the gentlemen to the lady Elizabeth, who was ſick in bed, his lordſhip repeated what he had ſaid below; but the lady abſolutely refuſing her conſent, he fell on his knees, vowing never to riſe till his requeſt was granted. The lady was ſo ſurpriſed that ſhe fainted away; when lord Jefferies, pretending to have gained her conſent, ordered the body to be carried to Mr. Ruſſel's, an undertaker, in Cheapſide, and to be left there till farther orders.

Mean while the abbey was lighted up, and the ground opened, the choir attending, and the biſhop waiting ſome hours for the corpſe to no purpoſe. The next day Mr. Charles Dryden waited upon the lord Hallifax and the biſhop, and endeavoured to excuſe his mother by relating the truth; but they were too much exaſperated to hear him. Three days after, the undertaker, receiving no orders, waited on lord Jefferies, who turned it off as a jeſt, and told him that he might do what he pleaſed with the corpſe. The undertaker now waited on the lady Elizabeth, who deſired a day to conſider of what muſt be done. Mr. Dryden immediately wrote to lord Jefferies, who returned for anſwer, that he knew nothing of the matter, and would be troubled no more about it. He then applied again to lord Hallifax and the biſhop of Rocheſter, who abſolutely refuſed to do any thing in the affair.

While the family was in this diſtreſs, Dr. Garth ſent for the body to the college of phyſicians, and propoſed a funeral by ſubſcription; and about three weeks after Mr. Dryden's deceaſe, Mr. Garth pronounced a Latin oration over the body, which was conveyed from the college, attended by a numerous train of coaches, to Weſtminſter abbey. After the funeral, Mr. Charles Dryden ſent lord Jefferies a challenge, which was not accepted; and Mr. Dryden publicly declaring that he would watch every opportunity to fight him, his lordſhip left the town, and Mr. Dryden could never meet him after.

DRYOPE, in fabulous hiſtory, a beautiful nymph, raviſhed by Apollo, and afterwards married to Andræmon, went, with her child Amphiſus in her arms, to a lake, and plucked off a bough of the lotos tree to pleaſe her infant ſon, on which the tree ſhed blood, and ſhe herſelf was transformed into a lotos tree.

DUAREN (FRANCIS) profeſſor of civil law at Bourges, in the ſixteenth century, was the firſt of the French civilians who cleared the civil law from the barbariſm of glоſſegraphers, in order to introduce the pure ſources of the ancient juriſprudence. He was a proteſtant, and publiſhed ſeveral works, which are printed together in folio.

DUBLIN, a city of Ireland, and capital of the whole kingdom. It is very ancient, and yet was but little known to the Engliſh till they attempted a conqueſt of the country, and became maſters of it. Not long after an Engliſh colony was ſent by Henry II. from Briſtol, who gave them this city, with all the liberties and free cuſtoms which thoſe of Briſtol enjoyed from the king. From that time it began to flouriſh remarkably, and was always noted for its loyalty to the kings of England. The ſituation of Dublin is very agreeable, having plains on the weſt, hills on the ſouth, and a navigable river, called the Liffy, running through it into Dublin haven on the eaſt. This river is but fifteen miles in length, from its ſpring to the ſea. Dublin is the largeſt, beſt built, and moſt populous city in the king's dominions, London only excepted, it being at leaſt equal to Edinburgh and Briſtol put together. Some compute three hundred thouſand inhabitants, which is not at all ſtrange, if there were two hundred thouſand in king Charles's reign, as is affirmed, it being a place of very great reſort from all parts of Ireland; eſpecially conſidering the additional buildings and the ſuburbs which encreaſe every day. There are continual alterations made, much after the manner of London, inſomuch that a former deſcription of this place would by no means ſuit its preſent condition. It is the great mart and centre of commerce for the whole kingdom, eſpecially for the communication of trade with England. And though Cork is the chief place of trade to foreign parts, and for the exportation of proviſions to the Weſt Indies, yet Dublin far exceeds it in the importation of merchandiſe, either directly from abroad, or by the way of England, and hath the greateſt part of the inland trade; for from hence as from a centre all ſorts of goods are diſperſed throughout the kingdom. It is ſupplied with coals from Whitehaven, in Cumberland, and from Swanzy, in Wales, in ſuch plenty, that two hundred ſail of colliers may be ſeen in the road at a time. It is pity there is a bar of ſand at the mouth of the bay.

Trinity college was founded on May the 13th, 1591, and made a univerſity by queen Elizabeth, which is the only one in Ireland. It ſtands on the ſame ſpot where Allhallows monaſtery was formerly placed, and was furniſhed with a good library at firſt, which has been continually encreaſing ever ſince, and the college has been enlarged and improved, particularly by a gift of three thouſand pounds, by king William, in conſequence of an addreſs of the parliament, and has been lately rebuilt in a magnificent manner. Dublin is the ſee of an archbiſhop, who has a palace in the ſuburbs of St. Patrick, ſo called from the cathedral dedicated to that ſaint. It is remarkable for the curious workmanſhip on the inſide, for its arched roof, ſtone pavements, and high ſteeple. It has a dean, a chanter, a chancellor, a treaſurer, and twenty-two prebendaries.

In the heart of the city is a collegiate church called Chriſt-church, though dedicated to the Holy Trinity, to which the lord lieutenant and lords juſtices always go in ſtate. The whole number of pariſh churches is thirteen. It is well known that Dublin is the ſeat of the government in Ireland, and that the governor is a viceroy, called the lord lieutenant, who reſides in the caſtle. The town-houſe or guild-hall, is the place where cauſes are tried before the mayor, mayor, and in the ſame place is the tholſel or exchange, which is a handſome ſtructure, built at the charge of the city in 1683. We need not mention the cuſtom-houſe, for a place of ſuch great trade cannot be without one, and this is a noble building. There is near three hundred hackney coaches, which ply for fares as in London.

This city was formerly governed by a provoſt, but in 1409, Henry IV. gave the citizens the privilege of chuſing a mayor every year, and two bailiffs. Edward VI. changed their bailiffs into ſheriffs, and Charles II. in 1665, allowed the mayor to aſſume the title of lord, and gave five hundred pounds to ſupport the dignity, and a collar of SS. This being loſt when king James was in Ireland, another was given by king William, of near one thouſand pounds value. Every third year the city and ſuburbs are ſurveyed by the lord-mayor and citizens, in a grand cavalcade. The incorporated trading companies are twenty-four, viz. 1. merchants; 2. taylors; 3. ſmiths; 4. barber-ſurgeons; 5. bakers; 6. butchers; 7. carpenters; 8. ſhoe-makers; 9 ſadlers; 10. cooks; 11. tanners; 12. tallow-chandlers; 13. ſkinners and glovers; 14. weavers; 15. ſheer-men and dyers; 16. goldſmiths; 17. coopers; 18. felt-makers; 19. ſtationers, cutlers, and painter-ſtainers; 20. bricklayers and plaiſterers; 21. hoſiers; 22. curriers; 23. brewers and malſters; 24. joiners and wainſcotters.

The charitable foundations are, 1. The Blue-coat Hoſpital, erected in 1680, for the educating, maintaining, cloathing, and putting out apprentice to trades, or the ſea ſervice, the ſons of the reduced citizens of Dublin, containing about one hundred and ſixty boys. 2. The Royal Hoſpital of Kilmainham, a ſtately quadrangular fabrick, near the Liffy, built in 1685, at the charge of the army, for maimed and ſuperannuated ſoldiers, of whom there are about five hundred, and the officers have handſome ſalaries, much after the manner of Chelſea. 3. A work-houſe, founded in 1703, for employing and maintaining the poor of Dublin. 4. Dr. Stevens's hoſpital, where all ſick and wounded perſons, who ſtand in need of charity, and are curable, are received, and maintained till they are well. 5. Mercers charitable hoſpital, in Stephen's ſtreet, ſupported by ſeveral charitable contributions, where abundance of ſuch ſick and lame perſons as are curable, and are proper objects, are relieved. Above ſixty at one time have been ſupplied with diet, lodging, waſhing, and medicines, beſides a great many out-patients, who come daily to be dreſſed. The phyſicians and ſurgeons ſerve without fee or reward. 6. The charitable Infirmary, on the Inns quay, was opened in 1728, where a great number of wounded, maimed, and diſeaſed perſons are relieved. Here forty are conſtantly maintained and ſupplied with all neceſſaries, and attended by phyſicians and ſurgeons, beſides a great number of out-patients. There are other charitable foundations of leſs note.

Dublin is ſixty-five miles weſt of Holyhead, two hundred ſouth-weſt of Edinburgh, and three hundred and thirty north-weſt of London. Lat. 53 10. E. Long. 6. 32. W.

DUBLIN, is a county of Ireland, bounded on the eaſt by the Iriſh ſea; on the weſt by the county of Kildare; on the north by Eaſt Meath and the river Hanny; and on the ſouth by the river Bray, which parts it from Wicklow. It is in length twenty-ſix miles, and in breadth fifteen. The ſouth parts are mountainous, and but little cultivated; the reſt is level and fruitful. It is the beſt cultivated part of this country. It ſends ten members to parliament, two for the city, two for the univerſity, two for the county, two for Swords, and two for Newcaſtle.

DUBOIS (JEROME) an excellent painter, born at Bois le Duc, flouriſhed at the end of the ſixteenth and the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. Expreſſion, force, and variety of characters, joined to his colouring, in all which he excelled, render his pictures ſo valuable, that a very great price is given for them.

DUBOS (JOHN BAPTIST) a learned and ingenious French author, born at Beauvais, in 1670. He finiſhed his ſtudies at Paris, and at length was intruſted with the management of ſeveral important affairs in Italy, England, and Holland. At his return to Paris, he had a prebendary given him; afterwards he had a penſion of two thouſand livres, and the abbey of Notre Dame at Reſſons, near Beauvais. He died at Paris, when perpetual ſecretary of the French academy, on the 23d of March, 1742. His principal works are, 1. Critical Reflections on Poetry and Painting, the beſt edition of which is that of 1740, in three volumes, duodecimo. 2. A critical Hiſtory of the French Monarchy in Gaul, the beſt edition of which is that of 1743, two volumes, quarto.

DUC (FRONTON DU) in Latin Fronte Ducæus, a learned Jeſuit, born at Bourdeaux, in 1558, obtained the eſteem of the learned for his ſkill in the Greek tongue, and in eccleſiaſtical hiſtory. He taught at Pontamouſſon, at Bourdeaux, and at Paris, where he died, on the 25th of September, 1624, aged ſixty-ſix. He publiſhed, 1. An edition of the Works of St. John Chryſoſtom, which is eſteemed. 2. An edition of Nicephorus Calliſtus, which is alſo eſteemed; and other works. He was the beſt tranſlator, and moſt excellent critic of his time.

DUCANGE. See FRESNE.

DUCAS, a learned Greek, who wrote an hiſtory of what paſſed under the laſt emperors of Conſtantinople, till the ruin of that city. This work, which is eſteemed, was printed at the Louvre, in 1649, with the Latin tranſlation and notes of Bouillaud.

DUCHAL (JAMES) D. D. a late pious and learned diſſenting miniſter, was born in Ireland, and finiſhed his ſtudies at the univerſity of Glaſgow, which afterwards, from a regard to his merit, conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity. He reſided ten or eleven years at Cambridge, as the paſtor of a ſmall congregation there; where he enjoyed his beloved retirement, the advantage of books, and of learned converſation, which he improved with the greateſt diligence. On Mr. Abernethy's removal from Antrim, he ſucceeded him there, and on that gentleman's death, he ſucceeded him as miniſter of the diſſenting meeting-houſe in Wood-ſtreet, Dublin. In this ſituation he continued till his death, which happened on the 4th of May, 1761, when he had completed his ſixty-fourth year. He publiſhed a volume of excellent Diſcourſes on the preſumptive arguments in favour of the Chriſtian religion, and many occaſional tracts; and after his death were publiſhed a number of his Sermons, in three volumes, octavo.

DUCHAT (JACOB LE) an eminent writer, born at Metz, on the 23d of February, 1658. In 1701 he retired to Berlin, where he obtained ſome conſiderable poſts, and was member of the Academy of Sciences. He carried on a correſpondence by letter with Mr. Boyle, whom he aſſiſted with many remarks for his Critical Hiſtory, and died at Berlin, on the 25th of July, 1735, aged ſeventy-eight. He publiſhed new editions of the Confeſſion of Sancy; of the Journal of Henry III. of the Satire of Menippius; of the Works of Rabelais; of the Apology for Herodotus, &c. with remarks; and a collection intitled Ducatiana, printed after his death, in two volumes, octavo.

DUCHE DE VANCY (JOSEPH FRANCIS) a French poet, born at Paris, on the 29th of October, 1668. He applied himſelf very early to poetry, which, joined to the goodneſs of his temper and his wit, introduced him to the knowledge of the court, and he became page to Lewis XIV. He then compoſed his pious hiſtories, hymns, and divine ſongs; ſome tragedies, and other pieces. He was made a member of the Academy of Inſcriptions and Belles Lettres, and died at Paris, on the 14th of December, 1704, aged thirty-ſeven.

DUCK (ARTHUR) a learned civilian, was born in Devonſhire, in the year 1580, and completed his ſtudies in the univerſity of Oxford. He travelled into France, Italy, and Germany, and at his return was made chancellor of the dioceſe of Bath and Wells; after which he was made chancellor of London, and at length maſter of the requeſts. In 1640 he was elected member of parliament for Minehead in Somerſetſhire, and ſoon after ſiding with king Charles I. ſuffered greatly in his fortune, in the time of the Rebellion. In 1648 his majeſty ſent for him to Newport, in the Iſle of Wight, to aſſiſt in treating with the parliament commiſſioners, but that treaty having no effect, he retired to his houſe at Chiſwick, near London. He was an excellent civilian, a tolerable poet, and was well verſed in hiſtory. He died in 1649, and left behind him Vita Henrici Chichele, &c and De Uſu & Authoritate Iuris Civilis Romanorum in Dominiis Principum Chriſtianarum: a valuable work, that has been ſeveral times printed at home and abroad.

DUCK (STEPHEN) who from a threſher became a poet, was born about the beginning of the preſent century, and was taught reading, writing, and arithmetic. Being taken from ſchool in his fourteenth year, he was for ſeveral years engaged in the moſt laborious employments of a country life. However, he read ſometimes, and thought oftener; for he panted after knowledge; and having almoſt loſt his arithmetic, grew uneaſy at his having forgot any thing he had learnt. Though he was then twenty four years of age, was married and at ſervice, and had neither books nor money, he by working longer than other day-labourers, found means to buy, firſt a book of vulgar arithmetic, then one of decimal, and a third of meaſuring land; all which he made himſelf a tolerable maſter of, in the hours he could ſteal from ſleep, after the labours of the day. At length a friend of his, who had been two or three years at ſervice in London, returned, bringing with him ſome books; theſe were a Milton's Paradiſe Loſt, the Spectators, and Seneca's Morals, Telemachus, and another piece by the ſame hand; Addiſon's Defence of Chriſtianity, an Engliſh Dictionary, an Ovid, and a volume of Shakeſpeare's Plays. Stephen alſo read three or four other plays, ſome of Epictetus, Waller, Dryden's, Virgil, Prior, Hudibras, and the London Spy.

By theſe helps he ſoon grew ſomething of a poet, and ſomething of a philoſopher. He had from his infancy a turn for poetry; but received a much higher reliſh for it by reading Milton twice or thrice over, by the help of a dictionary. The Spectators improved his underſtanding more than any thing, and the copies of verſes ſcattered in them, helped on his natural bent, and made him, while at work ſometimes, attempt to turn his thoughts into verſe, and at laſt venture them on paper. This took air; and Stephen, whom the country people before thought a ſcholar, was now ſaid to be able to write verſes. His fame reached the ears of the neighbouring clergymen and gentlemen, who, upon examining him, found that he had a great deal of merit, and gave him money to encourage him to go on. At length ſome of his poems falling into the hands of a lady of quality, who attended on the late queen Caroline, they were read to her majeſty, who took him under her protection, and ſettled an annual penſion upon him. He now ſtudied the Latin tongue, and was at length preferred to the living of Byfleet in Surry, where he became a popular preacher, till at length he had the unhappineſs to loſe his ſenſes; and becoming lunatic, in the year 1756, threw himſelf into the Thames from a bridge near Reading, and was drowned.

DUDERSTADT, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Brunſwick, belonging to the elector of Mentz. The number of Roman catholics is much greater than the proteſtants, for which reaſon theſe laſt go to a neighbouring village to attend divine ſervice. The beer which is brewed here is very good, and is tranſported into ſeveral neighbouring provinces The town is ſeated on the river Wipper, fifteen miles eaſt of Gottingen, thirty-eight north-eaſt of Caſſel, and one hundred and thirty north-eaſt of Mentz. Long. 10. 6. E. Lat. 51. 41. N.

DUDITH (Andrew) a very famous divine, and one of the learned men who made moſt noiſe in the ſixteenth century, was the ſon of Jerome Dudith, a gentleman of Hungary, and born at Buda, on the 6th of February, 1533. He diſcovered a lively ſpirit, and a great diſpoſition for the ſciences from his infancy. Andrew Sbardellat, his uncle on the mother's ſide, who was biſhop of Vaccia, educated him with care in the catholic religion, upon which Dudith took the ſurname of Sbardellat. After having ſtudied in Germany, and in ſeveral univerſities of Italy, he travelled through France, England, the Netherlands, and Germany, and every where obtained the eſteem of the learned. At length, in 1560, he repaired to the court of Vienna, where the emperor Frederick II. gave him the biſhoprick of Tina, and made him one of his council. A ſhort time after, he was ſent to the council of Trent, in the name of the emperor and of all the Hungarian clergy. He arrived there in January, 1562, and in April following pronounced a diſcourſe ſo eloquent, that it was heard with the utmoſt pleaſure; but it was not the ſame with another ſpeech on the 16th of July, when, though he ſhewed much zeal for the pope, and declaimed with great violence againſt Luther, he ſpoke with ſuch freedom on the neceſſity of the biſhops reſiding in their dioceſes, in favour of the marriage of eccleſiaſtics, and of communion in both kinds, that the legates, apprehending that he would draw a great number of the prelates to his opinion, wrote to the pope, that he was become a dangerous perſon, and that it was neceſſary he ſhould leave Trent. The pope ſollicited the emperor to recall him, which he did; but Ferdinand being far from blaming his conduct, gave him the biſhoprick of Chonat, in Hungary. After the death of that prince, he was ſent into Poland by Maximilian II. whither he had before been ſent by Ferdinand. He there privately married Reyna Strazzi, one of the queen's maids of honour, and reſigned his biſhoprick; but notwithſtanding his marriage, the emperor granted him his protection, and made him keep his other employments. He was, however, cited to Rome, excommunicated, and condemned to the flames as an heretic. Dudith having loſt his wife, by whom he had three children, married, in 1579, Elizabeth Sborowitz, a lady of an illuſtrious family of Poland, and the widow of the count John Zarnow. He was ſent ſeveral times into Poland, to cauſe the emperor to be elected king. He at length publicly embraced the reformed religion, and ſettled at Breſlaw, in Sileſia, where he died on the 23d of February, 1589, at fifty-ſix years of age.

He had a fine perſon, and a majeſtic appearance, was affable, obliging, regular in his conduct, charitable to the poor, and beneficent with reſpect to all mankind. He was ſo great an admirer of Cicero, that he wrote all his works three times over with his own hand. He was acquainted with ſeveral languages, and was well ſkilled in hiſtory, philoſophy, mathematics, medicine, the civil law, and divinity; and left a great number of works, the principal of which are, 1. Diſſertationes de Cometis. 2. Two Speeches pronounced at the council of Trent; an Apology to the emperor Maximilian II. a Treatiſe in Favour of the Liberty of Marriage, &c. quarto. 3. Notæ duplices in Fauſti Socini Diſp. de Baptiſmo. 4. Queſtio ubi vera & Catholica Eccleſia Chriſti invenitur. 5. A Letter againſt the Condemnation of Heretics to capital Puniſhment. 6. Letters and Poems in Latin. 7. The Life of Cardinal Pole, tranſlated into Latin from the Italian of Lewis de Beccatelli. &c.

DUDLEY, a town of Worceſterſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and three fairs, on May 8, for cattle, wool, and cheeſe; Auguſt 5, for lambs and other cattle; October 2, for horſes, cattle, wool, and cheeſe. Though it belongs to this county, it is ſeated within Staffordſhire, and has a ſmall tract of land belonging to it. The inhabitants have a conſiderable trade for nails and other iron ware It is ſix miles ſouth of Wolverhampton, ten weſt of Birmingham, ſixteen eaſt of Bridgenorth, and one hundred and twenty north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 5. W. Lat. 52 30. N.

Dudley (Edmund) a celebrated lawyer and able ſtateſman in the reign of Henry VII. was the grandſon of John Sutton, baron of Dudley, and knight of the garter, by his ſecond ſon ſir John Dudley, and was born ſome time in the year 1462. He ſtudied in the univerſity of Oxford, from whence he removed to Gray's Inn, where he became diſtinguiſhed for his knowledge of the laws. In 1504, he was made ſpeaker of the houſe of commons. He was, however, charged with being guilty of great extortion, in raiſing money to fill the king's coffers; and king Henry VII. was ſcarcely dead, when Mr. Dudley was ſent to the Tower, the clamour of the people againſt him being ſo great, that this ſtep was thought abſolutely neceſſary to quiet them. He was the ſame year tried and found guilty of high-treaſon, but was not executed till Auguſt 18, 1510, when he, together with ſir Richard Empſon, were beheaded on Tower-hill, in the forty-eight year of his age.

Dudley (John) baron of Malpas, viſcount L'Iſle, earl of Warwick, and duke of Northumberland, and reputed by many of our hiſtorians the moſt powerful ſubject that ever flouriſhed in this kingdom, was the ſon of the former, and was born in 1502. In 1511, the parliament reverſed the attainder of his late father, and, in 1524, he attended Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, in his expedition to France, where his behaviour procured him the honour of knighthood. He afterwards accompanied cardinal Wolſey in his embaſſy to France, and ſome time after was made maſter of the armoury in the Tower. In 1536, he was ſheriff of Staffordſhire. In 1542, he was created viſcount L'Iſle, and at the next feſtival of St. George, was elected knight of the garter, and was ſoon after made lord high admiral for life. The next year he ſailed to Scotland with a fleet of two hundred ſail, with which he performed great ſervices. In 1543, Bologne being beſieged by Henry VIII. in perſon, he embarked for France, and was preſent at moſt of the attacks. Upon the place being taken, the king gave him the charge of it, with the title of his lieutenant; and, on the 9th of October, he repulſed the dauphin, who, with an army of fifty thouſand men, endeavoured to retake that town. In 1465, the king, for the more effectually carrying on the war with France, created him by patent general and commander of all his forces at ſea, upon which landing five thouſand men on the French coaſt, he burnt Treport and ſome villages, and returned with the loſs of only one man. The king gave him large grants of church-lands, and finding his health declining, nominated him in his will one of his ſixteen executors.

Edward VI. having aſcended the throne, and the earl of Hertford, his uncle, having got himſelf declared protector, lord viſcount L'Iſle reſigned his poſt in favour of ſir Thomas Seymour the protector's brother, and was the ſame day created earl of Warwick, and made great chamberlain of England, and had a grant of the caſtle and manor of Warwick. A rebellion then breaking out in Norfolk, at the head of which was Ket, the tanner, who had 10,000 men, the earl of Warwick was ordered to march againſt them, and ſoon gained a complete victory, killing about 1000 men. Ket, however, ſoon after re aſſembled all his forces, and marched towards him; but, juſt as they were ready to engage, he informed them, that he was ſorry to ſee them diſcover ſuch courage in ſo bad a cauſe; but that, notwithſtanding what had paſſed, they might depend on the king's pardon, upon delivering up their leaders. To which they anſwered, that he was a nobleman of ſuch worth and generoſity, that if they might have this aſſurance from his own mouth, they were willing to ſubmit. Upon this the earl went to them and gave them his word, when, flinging down their arms, they delivered up Robert Ket and his brother William, with the reſt of their chiefs, who were ſoon after hanged. After he, by his arts, had cauſed the protector to be ſent to the Tower, he was again made high admiral; and upon his ſurrendering the office of great chamberlain of England, the king was pleaſed to make him ſteward of his houſhold. In 1551, he was conſtituted earl marſhal of England, and was alſo made lord warden of the Northern Marches, and the ſame year created duke of Northumberland. He was likewiſe elected chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, and was enriched by prodigious grants from the king. His majeſty being in a declining ſtate of health, the duke projected the ſetting his daughter-in-law, the lady Jane Grey, married to his fourth ſon, lord Guildford Dudley, on the throne, and therefore prevailed on the king to ſet aſide his ſiſters, Mary and Elizabeth. On the 6th of July, the king died; and on the 10th, he cauſed the lady Jane to be declared queen. The lady Mary had retired into Norfolk, where ſhe was joined by ſeveral of the nobility and a great number of people, on which the duke of Northumberland, accompanied by ſeveral noblemen, and an army of two thouſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot, marched againſt her as far as St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk; but finding his troops diminiſhing, and the people unwilling to ſtir in his favour, and that he received no ſupplies from London, he retired back to Cambridge. On the 19th, queen Mary was proclaimed in London; and receiving advice of it the next day, he immediately ordered her to be proclaimed at Cambridge, and, while it was performing, flung up his cap, and cried, "God ſave queen Mary!" Soon after, he received letters from the council, requiring him to diſband his troops, upon which he gave leave to every man to depart, which was no ſooner done than he was arreſted by a ſerjeant at arms: but other letters coming for every man to go his way, the duke claimed that privilege, and was ſet free; but was the next morning arreſted in the queen's name, by the earl of Arundel. On the 25th of July, he was confined in the Tower, and on the 18th of Auguſt was arraigned in Weſtminſter-hall, with John earl of Warwick, his ſon, and William Parr, marquis of Northampton, before the duke of Norfolk, high-ſteward; and being condemned, was, on the 22d of Auguſt, brought to the ſcaffold, where, having declared, that notwithſtanding his having pretended to be a zealous proteſtant, he had always been of the church of Rome, and that he died in the catholic faith, he was beheaded, and his body, with the head, were buried in the Tower.

Mr. Granger obſerves, that he was a man of parts, courage, and enterprize; but fraudulent, unjuſt, and of unrelenting ambition; and though he had eight ſons, none of them had any lawful iſſue.

DUDLEY (lady JANE.) See GREY (lady JANE.)

DUDLEY (AMBROSE) baron L'Iſle, and earl of Warwick, was the ſon of John duke of Northumberland, and was born about the year 1530 or 1531. During the reign of king Edward VI. he obtained much credit at court, but at that prince's deceaſe, being in arms in behalf of lady Jane, he was attainted, and received ſentence of death, but was afterwards pardoned for life. In 1557, diſtinguiſhing himſelf in the Low Countries, an act was paſſed for reſtoring the whole family in blood. On the acceſſion of queen Elizabeth, he immediately became one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſons of her court, and was ſoon created baron of L'Iſle, and earl of Warwick. He was afterwards made the queen's lieutenant in Normandy, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage and conduct. In 1569, he, together with the lord Clinton, were appointed jointly and ſeverally the queen's lieutenants in the North, upon the rebellion which broke out under the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, which, by his care and vigilance, was happily ſuppreſſed. In 1570, the queen granted him the office of chief butler of England, and the next year he was choſen one of the privy council. In the laſt years of his life he endured great pain in his leg from a wound he had received in defending Newhaven againſt the French, and at length conſented to an amputation, which proving unſucceſsful, he died ſoon after at Bedford-houſe, Bloomſbury, on the 20th of February, 1589, when he was about the age of threeſcore, and was interred in the chapel of the Bleſſed Virgin at Warwick, where a curious monument was erected to his memory.

DUDLEY (ROBERT) baron of Denbigh, and earl of Leiceſter, was brother to the former. During the reign of king Edward VI. he enjoyed ſeveral poſts of honour and profit; but in the firſt year of queen Mary was condemned for high-treaſon, but afterwards pardoned, and even raiſed to the poſt of maſter of the ordnance. On the acceſſion of queen Elizabeth, he became one of her principal favourites; he was immediately made maſter of the horſe; and on the 4th of June, 1559, was inſtalled knight of the garter; ſworn of the council, and ſoon obtained prodigious grants from the crown. On the 28th of September, 1564, he was created baron of Denbigh, and the next day earl of Leiceſter. In 1576 happened the death of Walter earl of Eſſex, which drew upon this peer a ſuſpicion of his having cauſed him to be poiſoned, more eſpecially after his marriage with the counteſs of Eſſex was known. In 1585, he was made captain general of all ſuch forces as ſerved, or ſhould ſerve in the Low Countries; and the next year ſome exploits were performed againſt the Spaniards, which highly raiſed the reputation of the Engliſh troops, and yet the ſtates were far from being ſatisfied with the earl's conduct. The next year the earl of Leiceſter went again to Holland, when the loſs of Sluys renewing the miſunderſtanding between the ſtates and the earl, they refuſed to eſtabliſh him in that abſolute authority, which had been conferred upon him at his firſt arrival. This greatly exaſperated the earl againſt them. However the queen thought proper to recall him; and the earl, finding at his return, an accuſation preparing againſt him by the lord Buckhurſt, and ſome other of his enemies, implored the queen's protection, and earneſtly beſought her "not to receive him with diſgrace at his return, "whom ſhe had ſent out with honour; nor bring him to "the grave, whom ſhe had raiſed from the duſt," when the queen was ſo pacified, that ſhe received him again into favour. So that when it was expected he ſhould have given in his anſwer, he took his place at the council-table. The ſecretary, beginning to read his accuſation, he roſe up and interrupted him; complained of being injured, and declared, that his public commiſſion was limited by private inſtructions. In ſhort, by his power with her majeſty, he ſo far prevailed, that a cenſure was paſſed upon the lord Buckhurſt, who was confined to his houſe for ſeveral months. In 1588, the whole nation being alarmed with the apprehenſions of the Spaniſh armada, the queen aſſembled an army at Tilbury, of which the earl of Leiceſter was made lieutenant-general, her majeſty declaring, that ſhe herſelf would be general. However, he died the ſame year, on the 4th of September, when he was about the age of fifty-ſix.

DUDLEY (Sir ROBERT) as he was called here, and as he was ſtyled abroad, earl of Warwick and duke of Northumberland, was one of thoſe great geniuſes that are ſent into the world to be a bleſſing to mankind. He was the ſon of the former by the lady Douglas Sheffield, and was born at Sheen, in Surry, in 1573, where he was carefully concealed, to prevent the queen's knowledge of the earl's engagements with his mother. He ſtudied at Oxford, when his father dying, left him the bulk of his eſtate. He was at this time one of the fineſt gentlemen in England, and having a particular turn to navigation, fitted out a ſmall ſquadron at his own expence; ſailed to the river Oronoke, and took and deſtroyed nine ſail of Spaniſh ſhips; and in 1595 he attended the earl of Eſſex, and the lord high admiral of England, in their glorious expedition againſt the Spaniards, when, for his gallant behaviour at the taking of Cadiz, he received the honour of knighthood. He now endeavoured to prove the legitimacy of his birth, in order to be intitled to his hereditary honours; when being overpowered by the intereſt of the counteſs dowager of Leiceſter, he applied for a licence to travel, and being well received at the court of Florence, reſolved to continue there, notwithſtanding his receiving a letter of recall, on which his whole eſtate was ſeized by king James I. and veſted in the crown. He diſcovered at the court of Coſmo II. great duke of Tuſcany, thoſe great abilities for which he had been admired in England, and was at length made chamberlain to his ſerene highneſs's conſort. He there contrived ſeveral methods of improving ſhipping, introduced new manufactures, and by other ſervices obtained ſo high a reputation, that at the deſire of the archduchеſs, the emperor Ferdinand, in 1620, created him a duke of the holy Roman empire. He afterwards drained a vaſt tract of moraſs between Piſa and the ſea, and raiſed Leghorn, which was then a mean, pitiful place, into a large and beautiful town, improving the haven by a mole, which rendered it both ſafe and commodious, and having engaged his highneſs to declare it a free port, he, by his influence and correſpondence, drew many Engliſh merchants to ſettle and ſet up houſes there, which was of very great ſervice to his native country, as well as to the Spaniards. He was alſo the patron of learned men, and held a high place himſelf in the republic of letters. His moſt celebrated work is his Del Arcano del Mare, in two volumes, folio.

DUELLIUS (CAIUS) a Roman conſul, in the 259th year before the Chriſtian æra. He vanquiſhed the Carthaginian fleet, and was the firſt Roman to whom a naval triumph was granted. A column was alſo erected to his honour, with a fine inſcription.

DUERSTADT, a town of the United Provinces, in the principality of Utrecht, ſeated on the river Leck, fourteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Urecht. Long. 4. 0. E. Lat. 52. 10. N.

DUGARD (WILLIAM) a very eminent ſchool-maſter, born at Bromſgrove in Worceſterſhire, in the year 1606. After being maſter of a ſchool at Stamford, and at Colcheſter, he was choſen head maſter of Merchant Taylors ſchool, in London; but being concerned in printing Salmaſius's Defence fence of king Charles I. he was deprived of his ſchool, in 1649-50, and impriſoned in Newgate, his wife and children turned out of doors, and a printing-preſs of his ſeized; he was, however, ſoon after releaſed, and reſtored to his former place. He publiſhed a ſhort Treatiſe of Rhetoric, and ſome ſelect Dialogues of Lucian, for the uſe of his ſcholars, and died in the year 1662.

DUGDALE (Sir WILLIAM) an excellent antiquary and hiſtorian, was born at Shuſtoke in Warwickſhire, on the 12th of September, 1605. After being at the free-ſchool in Coventry till he was near fifteen years of age, he returned home to his father, who had been educated at Oxford, and inſtructed him in civil law and hiſtory. Having diſtinguiſhed himſelf early by the ſtudy of antiquities, he ſoon became acquainted with all the famous antiquarians, and was recommended by ſir Henry Spelman to Thomas, earl of Arundel, earl marſhal of England, who cauſed him to be created a purſuivant at arms extraordinary, by the name of Blanch Lyon, and afterwards he was made Rouge Croix purſuivant in ordinary, and in 1644 was created Cheſter herald. He waited upon the king at the battle of Edge-hill, and afterwards at Oxford, where he continued with his majeſty till the ſurrender of that gariſon to the parliament, in 1646. Upon the reſtoration of king Charles II. He was advanced to the office of Norroy king at arms, and in 1676 was created Garter king at arms. He wrote, 1. A ſhort View of the late Troubles in England. 2. Origines Juridiciales, or Hiſtorical Memorials of the Engliſh Laws. 3. The Antiquities of Warwickſhire. 4. The Hiſtory of St. Paul's Cathedral. 5. The Baronage of England, two volumes, &c. and in conjunction with Mr. Dodſworth, 4. Monaſticum Anglicanum. He died on the 10th of February, 1685-6.

DUGUET (JAMES JOSEPH) a learned prieſt of the Oratory, born at Montbriſon, on the 9th of December, 1649. He taught philoſophy at Troyes; but was frequently obliged to change the place of his abode, and to remove from one country to another, on account of his oppoſition to the Conſtitution Unigenitus, and died at Paris, on the 25th of October, 1733, aged eighty-four. He wrote a great number of books in French, the principal of which are, 1. Pious and Moral Letters, nine volumes, duodecimo. 2. The Conduct of a Chriſtian Lady. 3. The Education of a Prince, quarto, &c.

DUILLIUS. See DUELLIUS.

DUISBURG, a town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, and duchy of Cleves, belonging to the king of Pruſſia. It has a proteſtant univerſity, founded in 1655. The fortifications are demoliſhed. It is ſeated on the river Roer, near the Rhine, thirteen miles north of Duſſeldorp, forty ſouth-eaſt of Cleves, and thirty-five north-weſt of Cologne. Long. 6. 14. E. Lat. 51. 24. N.

DULVERTON, a town in Somerſetſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and two fairs, on July 10, and November 8, for cattle. It is ſeated on a branch of the river Ex, over which is a ſtone-bridge of five arches. It ſtands on a ſolitary and hilly moor, containing about one hundred and fifty houſes, with ſeveral inns. It is twelve miles ſouth of Minehead, twenty-ſeven weſt of Bridgewater, and one hundred and ſeventy weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 3. 40. W. Lat. 51. 3. N.

DUMBLAIN, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Monteith, remarkable for the battle of Sheriff-Moor, which is near this town, between the Engliſh, commanded by the duke of Argyle, and the earl of Marr, the head of the rebellious Scots, in which the latter were defeated. It is five miles north of Sterling, thirty north-weſt of Edinburgh, and four hundred and twenty north-by-weſt of London. Long. 3. 47. E. Lat. 56. 12. N.

DUMFERLING, a parliament-town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Fife. Here was formerly a magnificent abbey, and a palace of the kings of Scotland, in which the princeſs Elizabeth, daughter of James II. was born. She was mother of the princeſs Sophia, from whom the preſent royal family are deſcended. It is fifteen miles north-weſt of Edinburgh, thirteen from the ſea, and four hundred north-by-weſt of London. Long. 2. 48. W. Lat. 56. 13. N.

DUMFRIES, the chief town of Nidiſdale, in Scotland, and the principal in this part of the country. It is ſeated near the mouth of the river Nid. The tide which flows up the river ſix miles, brings ſmall veſſels cloſe to the quay. The ſtreets are large, and it is a place of trade, which is much encreaſed ſince the Union. The market place is large, and the markets and fairs good. There is a ſtone bridge over the river leading to Galloway, which hath thirteen arches. They have an act of parliament which lays a duty of two pennies Scots on every pint, about equal to two quarts Engliſh, of beer, within the town and liberties, to diſcharge a debt contracted by defending the town againſt the rebels, in 1715. As alſo a duty upon goods imported and exported; which likewiſe was to enable them to build a new church. This town is the ſeat of a preſbytery, to which eighteen pariſhes belong, and the place where the provincial ſynod meets. It is ſixteen miles ſouth-by-weſt of Edinburgh. Long. 3. 10. W. Lat. 54. 50. N.

DUNBAR, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Mid-Lothian, memorable for the victory obtained by Oliver Cromwell, in 1650, over the Scots. It is twenty-five miles eaſt of Edinburgh, and twenty north-weſt of Berwick. Long. 2. 22. W. Lat. 55. 58. N.

DUNBARTON, the chief town of Lenox, or Dunbartonſhire, in Scotland. It is a royal burgh, and is ſeated at the influx of the river Leven, out of Loch Lomond, into the Clyde. About half a mile from the town is a caſtle, which is ſtrong both by art and nature, it being ſeated on a rock, very ſteep on all ſides, except towards the river Clyde, with a high watch-tower on one of its heads, and on the other, which is lower, ſeveral ſtrong towers. It has but one narrow ſteep aſcent to it between the two heads, with ſteps cut out of the rock, by which only one man can paſs at a time. The Leven river on the weſt, and the Clyde on the ſouth, ſerve inſtead of ditches, and eaſtward lies a moraſs, which at every tide is overflowed with water. This town is the ſeat of a preſbytery, containing ſeventeen pariſhes. It is ſixteen miles north-weſt of Glaſgow, and forty five north-weſt of Edinburgh. Long. 4. 32. W. Lat. 56. 30. N.

DUNCAN (DANIEL) an eminent phyſician of a Scots family, ſtudied philoſophy at Toulouſe, and practiſed phyſic with reputation at Montaubon, the place of his birth. He wrote in French, 1. A new and methodical Explication of animal Actions. 2. Natural Chemiſtry: and 3. The Knowledge of animated Bodies from Chemiſtry and Mechanics. He died at London in 1735, at eighty-ſix years of age.

DUNCANNON, a fort in the county of Wexford, and province of Leinſter, in Ireland, ſeated on the river Roſs. It commands the river inſomuch that no ſhip can paſs to Waterford or Roſs, without its permiſſion. Here are barracks for three companies of foot. A narrow neck of land ſhoots out from hence to the very mouth of the river, whereon ſtands a high tower called Hook Tower, and a light-houſe to direct ſailors into the mouth of the river. It is ſix miles eaſt of Waterford. Long. 6. 30. W. Lat. 52. 10. N.

DUNDALK, a port-town of Ireland, in the county of Lowth, and province of Leinſter, ſeated on a bay of the Iriſh Sea of the ſame name. It is ſeventeen miles north of Drogheda. Long. 6. 47. W. Lat. 54. 28. N.

DUNDEE, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Forfar, or Angus, is a royal burgh. It is a pretty town, and is ſeated in a pleaſant plain, on the frith of Tay, and is the ſeat of a preſbytery, containing eighteen pariſhes. The earl of Montroſe attacked it in the time of the civil wars, but was vigorouſly repulſed by the inhabitants, who afterwards fortified it with ditches; and yet general Monck took it by ſtorm, though garriſoned by eleven thouſand ſoldiers, beſides the inhabitants. All that he found in arms he put to the ſword, and carried off a great booty, becauſe the neighbouring inhabitants had ſent their effects thither for ſecurity, and there were ſixty ſail of ſhips in the harbour, who all ſubmitted. In 1731 they procured the continuance of a former act of parliament, which laid a duty of two pennies Scots on every pint of ale ſold within the town and liberties, to repair the harbour, to rebuild the tolbooth, to pave the ſtreets of the town, to diſcharge its debts, and to provide ſchool maſters for the children. It is fourteen miles north-weſt of St. Andrew's. Long. 2. 48. W. Lat. 56. 26. N.

DUNEBURG, or DUNAMUNDA, a town of Livonia, ſeated on the north ſhore of the river Dwina. It is ſeventy miles ſouth-eaſt of Riga. Long. 25. 32. E. Lat. 56. 36. N.

DUNGANNON, the chief town of the county of Tyrone, in the province of Ulſter. It is a place of ſome ſtrength, and ſeated on a hill. The rebels in 1641 maſſacred great numbers of proteſtants in and about this place, and committed ſtrange cruelties on men, women, and children. In 1649 Cromwell took this town from the rebels. It is eleven miles north of Armagh. Long. 7. 5. W. Lat. 54. 28. N.

DUNGARVON, a town of the county of Waterford, in the province of Munſter, and kingdom of Ireland. It ſtands on a bay of the ſame name, has a commodious harbour for ſhips, and is a walled town, with a caſtle; but is a place of little conſequence, and leſs buſineſs. It is twenty-two miles ſouth-weſt of Waterford. Long. 7. 55. W. Lat. 51. 57. N.

DUNGENESS, a cape or head land on the coaſt of Kent, five miles ſouth of Romney.

DUNKELD, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Perth, ſeated on the north ſide of the river Tay. It was a biſhop's ſee, and the remains of the cathedral are yet viſible. It is the chief market-town of the Highlands, and is the ſeat of a preſbytery, containing twenty pariſhes. It is remarkable for the defeat of the Highlanders, who took up arms in defence fence of the late king James. The rebels made it a place of arms in 1716. It is twelve miles north of Perth. Long. 3. 18. W. Lat. 56. 36. N.

DUNKIRK, a port-town of French Flanders, ſeated in a ſandy ſoil; and is of greater note for its importance in theſe latter times than for its antiquity. At firſt it was only a hamlet, conſiſting of a few fiſhermen's houſes. But it encreaſed by degrees till at length it had a caſtle in 1322, which was demoliſhed by the rebels in Flanders, but was rebu lt, and afterwards demoliſhed. At length Charles V. emperor of Germany, built a caſtle there for the defence of the port, in 1538. This likewiſe was entirely demoliſhed, except a tower, which is ſtill to be ſeen. Then the Engliſh became maſters of it, but were driven away by the French in 1558. France delivered it up to Spain by the treaty of Chateau-Cambreſis. It was inveſted by the French in 1646, who took it after ſeventeen days ſiege. But it ſoon after was retaken by the Spaniards. In the year 1658, after the Spaniards were beaten by the French, this town was the firſt fruits of the victory, for it ſurrendered thirteen days after, and was put into the hands of the Engliſh, agreeably to a treaty between the two nations. Four years after, that is in 1662, the French bought it of king Charles II. and have kept it ever ſince. In 1664 the French king began to alter and repair the caſtle, and employed thirty thouſand men about it. In which time they levelled ſeveral hills which commanded the place, the citadel was finiſhed, fort Lewis was erected, and a bank of ſand was cut through a thouſand yards in length, which ſtopped up the port, and a canal was cut, which would admit a man of war of ſixty guns. This canal was formed by two moles of timber work, of two thouſand yards in length, and about eighty yards diſtant from each other. At the head of theſe moles, two wooden caſtles were erected, the one called Chateau Verd, the Green caſtle; the other Chateau de bonne Eſperance, the caſtle of Good Hope. Theſe were two batteries, which would hold fifty pieces of cannon, and which, in 1695, prevented a bombardment. Afterwards two forts of ſtone work were erected near the city, which communicated by means of a wooden bridge. After this there were other forts erected at different diſtances; and a baſon was cut, which would contain ſeveral men of war, and other ſhips. Then there were other fortifications added both on the ſea and the land ſide; and a new ſuburb was built for a place for ſeamen to lodge in, with magnificent barracks, a ſea arſenal, and ſeveral other buildings. Likewiſe ſeveral cavaliers were thrown up one upon another to defend the road.

Dunkirk is five thouſand three hundred and eighty-two yards in compaſs, without comprehending the lower town, and by an account which was taken in 1697, it had one thouſand ſix hundred and forty houſes, and thirteen thouſand two hundred ſouls. The ſtreets are wide, ſtrait, and well paved; the houſes are almoſt all of brick, and very high. St. John's church is the principal, the choir of which is large and well adorned. It hath fifteen chapels, of which that of St. George is remarkable for an excellent painting of that ſaint. The Jeſuits church in Notre Dame ſtreet is a fine ſtructure. There are ſeveral convents for monks and nuns, and a ſquare with fine houſes on all ſides. But this town received a vaſt alteration by the treaty of Utrecht, for in conſequence of this the fortifications were demoliſhed, and the port deſtroyed; which has greatly decreaſed the number of the inhabitants. It is fifteen miles north-eaſt of Gravelines, fifteen ſouth-weſt of Newport, twenty-five north-eaſt of Calais, twenty-five ſouth-weſt of Oſtend, forty-five weſt of Ghent, fifty eaſt of Dover, and one hundred and fifty-five north of Paris. Long. 2. 27. E. Lat. 51. 2. N.

DUN LE ROY, a town of France, in Berry, ſeated on the river Aurone, eighteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Bourges, twenty-five ſouth-weſt of Nevers, and one hundred and twenty-eight ſouth of Paris. Long. 2. 39. E. Lat. 46. 53. N.

DUNMOW, an ancient and large town, in the county of Eſſex, pleaſantly ſeated on an aſcent. It was formerly noted for its priory, and has at preſent a good market for corn on Saturdays. Its fairs are on May 6, and November 8, for cattle. It is thirteen miles north of Chelmsford, and thirty-eight north-eaſt from London. Long. 0. 27. E. Lat. 51. 45. N.

DUNNEGAL, a town of Ireland, capital of the county of Dunnegal, in the province of Ulſter. It is ſeated on the bay of Dunnegal, twelve miles north of Balliſhannon. Long. 8. 17. W. Lat. 54. 35. N.

DUNNINGTON, a town in Lincolnſhire, with a market on Saturdays. The fairs are on May 26, for horſes, flax, and hemp; Auguſt 17, for horſes only; September 6, for cattle, flax, and hemp; October 17, for horſes, cattle, flax, and hemp. It is twenty ſeven miles ſouth eaſt of Lincoln, and one hundred and ſixteen north of London. Long. 0. 7. W. Lat. 52. 55. N.

DUNNOSE, a cape or point of land, on the ſouth coaſt of the Iſle of Wight.

DUNNOTER CASTLE, a caſtle of Scotland, in the ſhire of Aberdeen, agreeably ſituated on an eminence on the ſea-coaſt. It belongs to the earl-marſhal, and is twelve miles ſouth of Aberdeen. Long. 1. 47. W. Lat. 56. 57. N.

DUNROBIN CASTLE, a ſeat of the earl of Sutherland, ſituated on the ſea coaſt, in the ſhire of Sutherland, twenty-one miles north of Cromarty. Long. 3. 36 W. Lat. 57. 50. N.

DUNS (JOHN) more known by the name of Duns Scotus, a famous divine, of the order of St. Francis. According to the common opinion, he ſtudied at Oxford, afterwards he went to Paris, where he took his degrees, and taught with ſuch reputation, that he was ſurnamed the Subtile Doctor. He afterwards went to Cologne, where he died, on the 8th of November, 1308. Duns Scotus was a voluminous writer; the beſt edition of his works is that of Lyons, in ten volumes, folio. He maintained opinions contrary to thoſe of Thomas Aquinas, which produced two parties in the ſchools, called the Thomiſts and Scotiſts.

DUNS, a market-town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Mers, ſeated twelve miles weſt of Berwick upon Tweed. Duns Scotus, the famous ſchool-man, is ſaid to have been born here. Long. 2. 15. W. Lat. 55. 42. N.

DUNSTABLE, a town in Bedfordſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays. It is ſeated on a chalky hill, and has ponds in the ſtreet, which are never dry, though only ſupplied with rain water. It is remarkable for ſeveral good inns, it being a great thoroughfare on the northern road. It conſiſts of four ſtreets, interſecting each other at right angles, and in the center ſtood one of thoſe beautiful croſſes of queen Eleanor, which was deſtroyed by the enthuſiaſts in the time of the civil wars. The fairs are on Aſh-Wedneſday, May 22, Auguſt 12, and November 12, all for cattle. It is twelve miles north-weſt of St. Albans, and thirty-four north-weſt of London. Long. 0. 29. W. Lat. 51. 50 N.

DUNSTAN (St.) archbiſhop of Canterbury, was born about the year 924. In the reign of Edred he was abbot of Glaſtonbury. King Edgar gave him the biſhoprick of Worceſter, and frequently conſulted him. At length, he was made archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the pope's legate in England. He was the firſt Engliſh prelate that oppoſed the marriage of the clergy. He is ſaid to have been a good muſician, painter, and engraver; and to have amuſed himſelf with joinery, turning, and ſmithery, in the laſt of which he was ſuppoſed to be employed, when, according to the legend, he ſeized the devil by the noſe with a red-hot pair of tongues. He died at Canterbury, in 988.

DUNSTER, a town in Somerſetſhire, with a market on Fridays, ſeated on a low ground on the Briſtol Channel. It is ſurrounded on all ſides by hills, except on that next the channel. It contains about four hundred houſes, has a handſome church with a fine tower, and a fair on Whit-Monday. It is eighteen miles north-weſt of Taunton, thirty-five north of Exeter, and one hundred and ſixty-four weſt of London.

DUNWICH, a town of Suffolk, ſeated on the German Ocean, with a market on Saturdays, and ſends two members to parliament. It is twenty-ſeven miles north eaſt of Ipſwich, forty-ſix eaſt-by-ſouth of Bury, and one hundred north-eaſt of London. It has a fair on St. James's day, for toys. Lon. 1. 48. W. Lat. 52. 25. N.

DUPERRAY (MICHAEL) a learned advocate in the parliament of Paris. He wrote, 1. A Treatiſe on Tythes; 2. Another, on Marriage; 3. A Treatiſe on the primitive Patrons and Curates; and many other works. He died on the 25th of April, 1730, aged near ninety.

DU PIN. See PIN.

DUPLEIX (SCIPIO) hiſtoriographer of France, was born at Condam, in 1569. He wrote an Hiſtory of France, a Roman Hiſtory, and other works, which are not eſteemed: the beſt of his works is a Courſe of Philoſophy, printed in 1607, which was one of the firſt publiſhed in France. He died at Condam, in 1661, aged ninety-one.

DUPPA (BRIAN) ſucceſſively biſhop of Chicheſter, Saliſbury, and Wincheſter, was born at Lewiſham, in Kent, March 10, 1588-9, and educated at Oxford. After ſeveral preferments in the church, he was made chaplain to king Charles I. and in 1638 he was made tutor to Charles, prince of Wales, and afterwards to his brother, the duke of York: about the ſame time, he was nominated to the ſee of Peterborough, in 1641 was tranſlated to the ſee of Saliſbury, and in 1660 to the rich biſhoprick of Wincheſter, and made lord almoner. He was a very handſome man, of a graceful deportment, and of an irreproachable life. During the Interregnum he lived in retirement, at Richmond; and was then hoſpitable, generous, and charitable, to a degree beyond his fortune. He is ſaid to have received fifty-thouſand pounds for fines ſoon after his tranſlation to the ſee of Wincheſter, when he remitted no leſs than thirty thouſand pounds to his tenants, and at his death left ſixteen thouſand pounds, to be expended in acts of charity and munificence. He left legacies to Chriſt-church, and All-Souls college, in Oxford, and to the several cathedrals in which he sat as bishop, and founded an alms-house, at Richmond. King Charles II. asked his blessing on his knees, as he lay on his death-bed. He died on the 26th of March, 1662. He wrote, 1. The Soul's Soliloquie, and Conference with Conscience; 2. A Guide for the Penitent; 3. Holy Rules and Helps to Devotion; and published two of his sermons.

ſeveral

DUPRE (MARY) surnamed the Cartesian, from her taste for Des Cartes's Philosophy, was the daughter of John Desmaretz de St Sorlin, member of the French Academy, and was born at Paris. Roland Desmaretz, her uncle, finding that she had a happy genius, a fondness for learning, and an extraordinary memory, took upon himself the care of her education; and she made a rapid progress in learning Latin, Greek, poetry, rhetoric, and philosophy; and having a taste for the sciences, she cultivated them during her whole life. When her uncle died, in 1653, she resolved to learn the Italian. She wrote and spoke with great purity of language. She was a good poetess, and kept up a literary correspondence with the most learned men of her time. Some of her poems are printed in the Collection of Choice Pieces, by P. Bouhours.

DURANCE, a river in France, which rising in the Alps, runs west along the confines of Dauphiny and Provence, then passing south by Sisteron, and afterwards west through Provence, falls into the Rhone, a little below Avignon. Its inundations sometimes do a great deal of damage.

DURAND, a learned monk, in the eleventh century, was the author of an Epistle on the Eucharist, against Berenger. William the Conqueror paid great regard to his advice, and gave him public marks of his esteem.

DURAND DE ST. POURCIEN, a Dominican monk, thus named from a borough of that name, in Auvergne, became doctor of Paris, master of the sacred police, and at length bishop of Meaux, where he died, in 1333. He was one of the most famous divines of his time. He wrote a Commentary on the Four Books of Sentences, and a treatise De Origine Jurisdictionum.

DURANDUS (WILLIAM) born at Puimoisson, in Provence, in the thirteenth century, was one of the most able lawyers of his time. Pope Martin made him one of his nuncios, and then bishop of Mende and Languedoc. Before this he wrote his Speculum Juris, which gave him the name of Speculator: his second piece was his Rationale Divinorum Officiorum. He wrote several other works.

DURANGO, a town of Spain, in the province of Biscay, noted for a manufacture in cutlery ware. It is ten miles south-east of Bilboa. Long. 2. 36. W. lat. 43. 18. N.

DURANGO, a town of North America, in New Biscay, which makes part of New Spain, and has a bishop's see. It is seated in a fruitful country, where there are salt-works. Long. 106. 20. W. Lat. 24. 30. N.

DURAS, a town of France, in Guienne and in Agenois, seated on a small river. Long. 0. 15. E. Lat. 45. 42. N.

DURANT (GILES) a celebrated advocate in the parliament of Paris, in the time of the League, and one of the best French poets before Malherbe. He wrote odes, songs, elogies, &c. and translated or imitated a part of the Latin poems of his friend John Benesous, under the title of Imitations tirées du Latin de Jean Bonefous, avec autres Amours, et Mélanges Poétiques; and of these Imitations there have been many editions. The verses to his godmother, on the death of his ass, which died of a violent death at the siege of Paris, in the flower of his age, passes for a master-piece, in the ironical and ludicrous style. This is to be found in the ingenious work he published, under the title of the Satyrs of Menippus. Durant's works were printed in 1594, and he was living in 1599.

DURAVEL, a town of France, in Querci, seated on the river Lot, in the confines of the Agenois. Long. 1. 5. E. Lat. 45. 40. N.

DURAZZO, an ancient and celebrated town of Turky in Europe, in Albania, with a bishop's see. It has a good harbour in the Gulph of Venice, forty-eight miles south-west of Scutari, eighteen south-west of Croia, seventy-five south-east of Otranto, and sixty north-east of Brindisi. Long. 20. 15. E. Lat. 41. 25. N.

DURBUY, a town of the Low Countries, capital of a county of the same name, in the duchy of Luxemburg. It was ceded to France in 1681, which rendered it back in 1698. It is seated on the river Outre, twenty-five miles south of Liege, thirty-three east of Namur, and thirty north-east of Dinant. Long. 5. 28. E. Lat. 50. 20. N.

DURCKEIM, a town of Germany, in the Palatinate, thirteen miles north-east of Newstadt, and thirteen north-west of Spire. Lon. 7. 55. E. Lat. 49. 26. N.

DURELL (Dr. JOHN) a learned divine, was born at St. Helier's, in the isle of Jersey, in 1625, and studied at Merton college, in Oxford; but when that city came to be garrisoned for king Charles I. Mr. Durell, after a stay of two years, retired into France, and studied at Caen, in Normandy, and afterwards about two years at Saumur. But after the reduction of the isle of Jersey, by the parliament forces, in 1561, he having been concerned in its defence, was expelled from thence; upon which he withdrew to Paris, where he received episcopal ordination from the hands of Thomas, bishop of Galloway, in Scotland. He afterwards became chaplain to the duke de la Force, father to the princess of Turenne, in which station he continued about eight years. At the Restoration he came over to England, and officiated at the Savoy for several years, became chaplain to his majesty, successively prebendary of Salisbury, canon of Windsor, prebendary of Durham, and, at length, was created doctor of divinity and dean of Windsor. He wrote, A View of the Government and public Worship of God, in the Reformed Churches beyond the Seas; and, A Vindication of the Church of England, against the unjust and impudent Accusations of the Schismatics, 4to. He died on the 8th of June, 1683.

DUREN, a town of Germany, in the circle of Westphalia and duchy of Juliers, seated on the river Roer. It is a well fortified town, and the best in the whole duchy. It was formerly a free imperial city; but was subjected to the duke of Juliers, in 1407. The emperor Charles V. took it by assault, in 1543. It is thirteen miles south of Juliers, and twenty-five south-west of Cologne. Lon. 6. 20. E. Lat. 50. 46. N. It is now subject to the elector Palatine.

DURER (ALBERT) a celebrated painter, was born at Nuremberg, in the year 1741; and by the instructions of his father, a curious jeweller, the precepts of Michael Wolgemuth, a considerable painter, and the rules of geometry, architecture, and perspective, he became the most excellent of all the German masters. Though his manner or design is generally hard, stiff, and ungraceful, and his gusto Gothic; yet he obtained the admiration of the greatest masters, both by his paintings and his prints. Vasari, in the life of Mark Antonio observes, that "if so excellent, so exact, "and so universal a man as Albert Durer, had been born in "Tuscany, as he was in Germany, and had formed his "studies according to those beautiful pieces he had seen at "Rome, he would have proved the best painter of all Italy, "as he was the greatest and most accomplished genius "which Germany ever produced." His principal works were painted at Prague, in the palace of the emperor Maximilian I. who had such a particular regard for his singular merit, that he presented him with a coat of arms, as the badge of nobility. He was also much in favour with the emperor Charles V. He was no less distinguished by his prints than by his paintings; the former being had in great esteem all over Italy, and copied at Venice by the above Marc Antonio, and so much esteemed, even by Raphael himself, that he hung them up in his own chamber, and used frequently to lament the misfortune of so great a genius being brought up in a country where nothing was to be seen that could excite in him noble ideas. He was a man of solid good sense, and was of a modest and agreeable temper; whence he was beloved by every body, and happy in all places, except at home, where the penurious and sordid temper of the miserable shrew his wife is said to have shortened his days. He died in 1538, aged fifty-seven. He wrote a treatise on Geometry, Perspective, Fortification, and the Proportions of human Bodies.

D'URFEY, (THOMAS) an eminent English songster and dramatic writer, was born in Devonshire, and bred to the law, which he soon forsook, that he might be more at liberty to write plays and songs. He wrote many of the former, with various success; but his chief talent seems to have lain in writing songs, which he would do to the most difficult tunes; and he was much admired for singing his own compositions, on which account he received many favours from persons of the highest rank: The duke of Albemarle had him frequently at his table, to divert his company that way: and even crowned heads condescended to admit him to their presence, and seemed not a little diverted by him; for he not only sung before that merry monarch Charles II. but before king William and queen Anne. Mr. Addison wrote the sixty-seventh number of the Guardian in favour of Mr. D'Urfey, who was then grown old and poor, to procure a full house to a play of his, that was to be acted for his benefit; and concludes it with observing, that the public could not do a kindness to a more diverting companion, or a more chearful, honest, and good-natured man. He was buried at St. James's, Westminster, with this inscription, on a stone erected to his memory, TOM D'URFEY died Feb. 26, 1723.

DURHAM, the county of, is bounded on the north-west by Northumberland, on the east by the German Ocean, on the north by Yorkshire, and on the west by a part of Cumberland and Westmoreland. It is forty miles from east to west, and thirty-five from north to south. It contains nine market-towns, one hundred and eighteen parishes, sixteen rivers, twenty bridges, twenty-one parks, four castles, fifteen thou-thouſand nine hundred and eighty-ſix houſes, ninety-ſix thouſand nine hundred and eighty inhabitants, and ſends four members to parliament, two for the county, and two for Durham. The market-towns are, Durham, Auckland, Stockton, Sunderland, Darlington, Hartlepool, Stainthorp, Bernard-caſtle, and Walſingham.

The air of this county is generally very good, eſpecially on the eaſtern ſide; but on the weſtern and in the hilly parts it is ſharp and cold. Here likewiſe the land is barren, and the hills without graſs. The rivers Tyne and Tees almoſt encompaſs the whole county, except on the eaſt ſide; and the Were riſes in the mountains near the weſtern point, and runs ſouth-weſt to Auckland, then it turns north, and paſſes by Durham, and, holding on its courſe, falls into the ſea at Sunderland. Theſe, with the ſmaller rivers, abound with fiſh, particularly ſalmon. In general this country abounds with paſtures and corn-fields, but is moſt famous for its coal-mines, which ſupply London and other parts with excellent coals, which go under the common name of Newcaſtle coals, though dug up in another county. At Salt-water Haugh, near Butterſby, about a mile and a half from Durham, in the middle of the river Were, ariſes a ſalt ſpring, chiefly to be ſeen in the ſummer-time, when the water falls to one ſide of the channel; for in the winter it is loſt among the freſhes. The water bubbles up forty yards in length, and ten in breadth; and that which is ſalteſt iſſues out of a rock, upon the ſurface of which, in a hot day, is often found a perfect ſalt. This water, as ſoon as it comes out of the rock, is as ſalt as any brine can be; and though it be little in quantity in compariſon of the freſh water, it is ſtrong enough to cauſe a brackiſhneſs an hundred yards below it. This brine has been boiled, and found to contain a great quantity of bay-ſalt, which, though not ſo palatable, is as uſeful as ordinary ſalt. It tinges all the ſtones near it with a red colour.

This county, or biſhoprick, as it is commonly called, had anciently a petty king, or palatine of its own, who called a parliament of his own barons which made acts, raiſed ſubſidies, and did many other things proper to his own government; and was therefore looked upon as an exempt juriſdiction, and did not ſend members to parliament, like other counties. And though an act of parliament made in the reign of Henry VIII. abridged this ſee of many of its ancient liberties, and ſtripped it of the moſt eſſential branches of its palatine power; yet it ſtill continued to ſend no members to parliament, though the biſhops held no parliament of their own after that time, nor indeed ſome time before, that cuſtom having become obſolete. The firſt return of members to parliament was in 1654 and 1656, and was then omitted till the 31ſt of Charles II. for which purpoſe an act of parliament was paſt.

It is commonly ſaid, that there are mines of lead, iron, and quarries of marble in this county; but they are entirely neglected on account of the coals, which are of much greater benefit than thoſe could be.

DURHAM, the capital city of the county of Durham, is ſeated upon an eminence, near a pleaſant valley, and is ſurrounded with walls. The ſuburbs, without the walls, reach as far as the plain. It is almoſt encompaſſed by the river Were, and contains ſix pariſh-churches, beſides the cathedral. This laſt is handſomely decorated, and is well worth a traveller's notice. The caſtle, mentioned in the preceding article, ſtands in the middle of the town, between two ſtone bridges; the one upon the river, on the eaſt ſide, the other on the weſt. From the caſtle northward lies the market-place, and St. Nicolas's church; from whence the ſuburbs ſhoot out to the north-eaſt for a good way, within a winding of the river; as alſo others on both ſides, beyond the river, leading towards the bridges, each of which has a church. On the north ſide of the cathedral is the college, where the prebendaries reſide, and on the ſouth ſide is the college-ſchool.

Durham is governed by a mayor, recorder, and twelve aldermen, and as many common-council, who have inferior officers. The choice of members of parliament is in the corporation, citizens, and freemen, who at a late poll were above a thouſand. It was firſt incorporated by biſhop Pudſey, in the reign of Richard II. who granted to his burgeſſes of Durham, that they ſhould be free from toll, and have the ſame privileges as the town of Newcaſtle. The ancient government was by bailiffs of the borough of Durham, which, in the time of biſhop Nevil, before the year 1457, began to be called bailiffs of the city of Durham, and mention was then made of alderman. Biſhop Matthew changed the name of alderman into that of mayor, and that of burgeſſes into aldermen. In Auguſt 25, 1684, their liberties being reſigned into the hands of biſhop Crew, he procured them a new charter, dated March 7th, 1684, in the firſt year of James II. by the name of the mayor, aldermen, &c. of the city of Durham, confirming their former privileges. They act in the name and by the authority of the biſhop of Durham; and on their fair days keep a court of pye-powder.

Their market is on Saturdays, and their fairs, March 31, for three days; on the firſt for horned cattle, the ſecond for ſheep and hogs, and on the third day for horſes; on Whit-Tueſday and September 15 for the ſame. It ſends two members to parliament. It is fourteen miles ſouth of Newcaſtle, ſeventy-ſeven of Berwick upon Tweed, ſeventy north of York, and two hundred and fifty-ſeven north-by-weſt of London. Long. 1. 14. W. Lat. 54. 50. N.

DURLACH, a town of Germany, in the circle of Swabia, and territory of Baden. It is ſeated at the foot of a mountain called Thurnberg. The French in 1689, made dreadful ravages about this country with fire and ſword. Formerly there was a univerſity here, which is now dwindled to a college, the former having been transferred to Carlſrouhe. Here is a palace, and fine gardens, called the caſtle of Carlſburg, where the margraves formerly reſided. It is ſeated on the river Gieſen, fifteen miles north-eaſt of Baden. Long. 8. 20. E. Lat 48. 58. N.

DURSLEY, a town in Glouceſterſhire, with a market on Thurſday, and two fairs on Monday 6, and December 4, for cattle and pedlar's ware. It is ſeated on or near a branch of the river Severn, and formerly had a caſtle, which is now in ruins. It is a cloathing town, and chiefly inhabited by men belonging to that buſineſs. It is a pretty conſiderable place, with a large church; and in the church-yard riſes a ſpring, which drives a mill within half a mile of the town. It is a corporation, and is governed by a bailiff, and four conſtables. It is twenty-two miles north-north-eaſt of Briſtol; fourteen ſouth ſouth-weſt of Glouceſter, and one hundred and ſeven weſt-by north of London. Long. 2. 20. W. Lat. 51. 40 N.

DURY, (JOHN) in Latin Duræus, a proteſtant divine, born in Scotland in the ſeventeenth century, laboured with great zeal for the re-union of the Lutherans and Calviniſts. He wrote a plan of re-union; a work intitled, Aliquot Theologorum Galliæ & trium Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ Epiſcoporum; and ſome others.

DUSSELDORP, a town of Weſtphalia, capital of the duchy of Berg. It has been the place of reſidence of the elector Palatine; but the preſent elector could never reſolve to remove his court hither, though the palatinate has ſuffered ſo much. Here the river Duſſel falls into the Rhine. The elector's palace or caſtle is a fine building, adorned with excellent pictures, among which is that of the laſt judgment, painted by Rubens, which ſurpaſſes all the reſt in price and beauty. The town is neatly built, and well fortified, but has no ſuburbs. They have a ſeminary for poor ſcholars under the direction of the Jeſuits, which is a very fine building, as well as the collegiate church of St. Martin, remarkable for the tombs of the ancient dukes of Juliers and Berg. Add to theſe the ſtatutes of marble and braſs, after the beſt models of Italy. The elector had a deſign of aggrandiſing this town, for, in March 1709, he iſſued out a declaration, which granted great privileges to thoſe that would come and ſettle here; but it has had little or no effect. It is twenty-three miles north-weſt of Cologne; twenty-three north-eaſt of Juliers, and ſixty-three ſouth-weſt of Munſter. Long 6. 24. E. Lat. 51. 12. N.

DUTLINGEN, a town of Germany, in Swabia, with a bridge over the Danube, and a caſtle without the town, ſeated on a mountain. There are rich iron mines in the neighbourhood. It is thirty miles ſouth-eaſt of Schaffhauſen, and twenty-three north-weſt of Conſtance. Long. 8. 52. E. Lat. 48. 8. N.

DUUMVIRI, in Roman antiquity, a general name given to thoſe magiſtrate and officers, where two were joined together; as the DUUMVIRI CAPITALES, who were judges in criminal cauſes; they were members of the public council, and had two lictors to walk before them: but though theſe judges had great power and authority, yet in capital caſes, it was lawful to appeal from their ſentence to the people, who alone had the power of condemning a citizen to death. The DUUMVIRI MUNICIPALES, were two magiſtrates in ſome of the cities of the empire, anſwering to the conſuls of Rome; only their office laſted five years, on which account they were frequently called Quinquinales magiſtratus; they had officers who walked before them, carrying a ſmall ſwitch; and ſome of them aſſumed the privilege of having lictors, bearing before them axes and the faſces, or bundles of rods. The DUUMVIRI NAVALES were commiſſioners of the fleet, whoſe duty conſiſted in giving orders for the fitting of ſhips, granting commiſſions to the officers of the navy, &c. And the DUUMVIRI SACRORUM were two officers choſen out of the nobility, and appointed to look after the Sybils books; but their number being afterwards encreaſed to ten, ten, and then to fifteen, they were thence called Decemviri and Quindecemviri.

DUYVELAND, one of the iſlands of Zealand, in the United Provinces, eaſt of the iſle of Schonen, from which it is divided by a narrow channel.

DWINA, a great river of Muſcovy, which riſes in the duchy of Wologda, where it has the name of that province, afterwards it receives the river Suchana, and paſſes on to Waſh, Ouſtiough, the capital of the province of the ſame name, and entering that of Dwina, it takes its name, waſhes Archangel, and a little after falls into the white ſea by two mouths.

DWINA, a province of Muſcovy, ſeated near the White Sea, of which the moſt remarkable places are Archangel, St. Nicolas, and Colmogrod.

DWINA, the name of a river which riſes in Luthiania in Poland, and running north-weſt, divides Luthania from Courland, and falls into the Baltic ſea at the Dunamunder Fort, a little below Riga.

DYER, (Sir JAMES) an eminent lawyer in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was born at his father's ſeat of Roundhill, in Somerſhetſhire, about the year 1511. He was gradually raiſed to ſeveral preferments in the law, and, in 1559, was appointed chief juſtice of the common-pleas, which office he enjoyed with great reputation for twenty-four years. He wrote a large book of Reports, and a Reading upon ſeveral ſtatutes, and died on the 24th of March 1581.

DYER, (JOHN) an eminent poet, born in the year 1700, was the ſecond ſon of Robert Dyer, Eſq. of Aberglaſney, in Carmarthenſhire, in South Wales, and ſtudied at Weſtminſter-ſchool; and afterwards ſettled with Mr. Richardſon, an eminent painter in Lincoln's-inn-fields, he being fond of drawing from his childhood, and his imagination ſtrong and glowing. He afterwards travelled into Italy, and viſited moſt of the cities there, wherein any remains of antiquity are to be found; but chiefly reſided at Rome, whence he drew the materials of that inſtructive and moral poem called, The Ruins of Rome. On his return to England, he entered into the church, and was preſented to the living of Coningſby in Lincolnſhire; and ſoon after to another in the neighbourhood. His poetical works that were publiſhed are, 1. Grongar-hill, 2. The Ruins of Rome; 3. The Fleece, &c.

DYLE, a river of the Auſtrian Netherlands, which riſing in Brabant, runs north by Louvain, and having received the Demer, runs weſt by Mechlin, and falls into the Scheld at Rupelmond.

DYSART, a parliament-town of Scotland, in the county of Fife, ſeated on the north ſide of the Forth, eleven miles north of Edinburgh. Long. 3. 5. W. Lat. 56. 10. N.

E.

EACHARD, (JOHN) D. D a learned Engliſh divine, was of a good family in Suffolk, and born about the year 1635. He finiſhed his education at Catharine hall, Cambridge, of which he became maſter in 1675, and the year following was created doctor of divinity by the royal mandate. He wrote, 1. The Grounds and Occaſions of the Contempt of the Clergy and Religion enquired into; 2. Some Obſervations upon the Anſwer to an Enquiry into the Grounds and Occaſions of the Contempt of the Clergy; 3. A Dialogue between Philautus and Timothy, &c. He died about the year 1696, and in 1705, his works were collected and printed in one volume 8vo.

EACHARD, (LAWRENCE) an eminent Engliſh hiſtorian and divine; was the ſon of a clergyman, and born at Baſſam, near Beccles in Suffolk, about the year 1671, and ſtudied at Chriſt's college, Cambridge, after which he was preſented to the livings of Welton and Elkinton, in Lincolnſhire. He was afterwards made a prebendary of Lincoln; in 1712, he was inſtalled arch-deacon of Stowe, and was preſented by king George I. to the livings of Rendleſham, Sudborn, and Alford, in Suffolk, at which places he lived eight years in a continued ill ſtate of health. Being adviſed to go to Scarborough for the waters, he got as far as Lincoln, where, declining very faſt, he was unable to proceed, and there going to take the air, he died in his chariot on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, 1730. He wrote, 1. A Hiſtory of England; 2. A General Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; 3. A Hiſtory of the Revolution; 4. An Engliſh Tranſlation of Plautus and Terence; 5. Maxims extracted from Archbiſhop Tillotſon's Works; 6. A Gazetteer, or Newſman's Interpreter; and, 7. A Roman Hiſtory from the Foundation of Rome till the Time of Conſtantine.

EAGLE, (MARY) a woman famous for the great quantity of milk in her breaſts, lived at Little Worley, in Staffordſhire, and was viſited by the curious and learned Dr. Plott, who atteſts from his own knowledge, that beſides what her child ſucked, ſhe could draw two quarts of milk from her breaſts every day, with which ſhe could have made two pounds of butter a-week, ever ſince ſhe was brought to-bed, which was about five months when the doctor ſaw her. He mentions an inſtance of a like nature from Borellius, in one Mary Carron, a taylor's wife of Bologne, who could afford milk enough every day for the nouriſhment of two children, and make butter beſides; which ſhe did at the deſire of an apothecary, who uſed it as a great noſtrum againſt conſumptions.

EARNE-LAKE, or LOUGH EARNE, a great lake of Ireland, in the county of Fermanagh, and province of Ulſter, extending thirty miles in length, at the narrow part of which ſtands Inniſkilling, a town remarkable for the bravery of its inhabitants on the ſide of king William, ſoon after the Revolution in England.

EASINGWOULD, a town in the north-riding of Yorkſhire, with a market on Fridays, and has two fairs, July 5, and September 25, for horned cattle, horſe, ſheep, linen, and woollen cloth. It is ten miles north-weſt of York, and ſix ſouth-eaſt of Burroughbridge. Long. 0. 58. W. Lat. 54. 12. N.

EAST-MEATH, a county of Ireland, having the counties of Cavan and Lowth in the north and north eaſt, Kildare on the ſouth-weſt; Weſt-Meath and that of Dublin and the ocean on the Weſt. It lies on the north-weſt circuit of Ireland, and is thirty two miles from north to ſouth, and twenty-five from eaſt to weſt. It ſends fourteen members to parliament, that is, two for the county, and two each for the following towns, viz. Trim, Athboy, Navan, Kells, Duleck, and Ratoath, of which Trim is the principal. It is a plain populous county, abounding in corn and cattle.

EATON. See ETON.

EAUSE, an ancient town in Gaſcony, in Armagnac, and capital of the ſmall diſtrict called Eauſen. It is eighteen miles ſouth-weſt of Condom, and ten north-weſt of Auch. Long. 0. 7. W. Lat. 43. 56. N.

EBDOME, Ἑβδόμη, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival held on the ſeventh day of every lunar month, in honour of Apollo, to whom all the ſeventh days were ſacred, becauſe on one of them he was born. At this ſolemnity the Athenians ſung hymns to Apollo, and carried in their hands branches of laurel, with which they alſo adorned their diſhes. Potter's Antiq.

EBEDJESSU, the ſame with Abdiſſi. See the article of ABDISSI.

EBENFURT, a town of Germany, in the archduchy of Auſtria, with a caſtle. It is ſeated on the river Leyte, on the confines of Hungary, twenty-four miles ſouth of Vienna. Long. 19. 5. E. Lat. 47. 50. N.

EBERNBERG, a caſtle built on a rock, in the palatinate of the Rhine, a country of Germany. It is ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Nawe and Alſen, thirteen miles ſouth-eaſt ſouth-eaſt of Crouſnach, and eighteen north-weſt of Binghen. Long. 7. 30. E. Lat. 49. 53. N.

EBERSDORFF, a houſe of pleaſure belonging to the court of Vienna, in Lower Auſtria. It is ſeated on the Danube, thirteen miles eaſt of Vienna. Long. 16. 17. E. Lat. 48. 30. N.

EBERSTEIN, a town of Germany, in the circle of Swabia. It has an ancient caſtle, where the counts of Eberſtein formerly reſided. It now belongs to the margraves of Baden, who are deſcended from the eldeſt branch It is ſix miles ſouth of Baden. Long. 7. 39. E. Lat. 48. 30. N.

EBIONITES, a ſect thus called from Ebion, who is ſuppoſed to have lived about the year 72, and againſt whom ſome ſuppoſe St. John wrote his goſpel. The Ebionites maintained that Jeſus Chriſt was only a mere man, deſcended from Joſeph and Mary. They received no other goſpel but that of St. Matthew, which they had in Hebrew, but it was maimed and interpolated. They rejected the reſt of the New Teſtament, and eſpecially the Epiſtles of St. Paul, but had ſeveral apocryphal books, as St. Peter's Travels. They maintained that the ſeventh and firſt days of the week were equally holy: they bathed themſelves every day, like the Jews, and celebrated their myſteries every year with unleavened bread. Theſe miſtaken people at laſt united with the Helſeſaites.

EBREUL, a town of France, in Auvergne, ſeated on the river Scioule, eight miles from Riom, and thirteen from Clermont, and has a famous Benedictine abbey. Long. 3. 5. E. Lat. 46. 5. N.

EBRO, one of the moſt famous rivers of Spain. It riſes in Old Caſtile, near the town of Feuntibre, croſſes part of Biſcay, and Navarre, and all Arragon; and having ſeparated Catalonia from the kingdom of Valencia, falls into the Mediterranean ſea, where ſeveral ſmall iſlands are at its mouth. It receives ſeveral rivers in its courſe, of which Arragon, and the Segre are the chief. It waſhes Lagrona and Calhora, in Caſtile, Tudello in Navarre, where it begins to be navigable, Saragoſſa, Arragon, Mequinza, and Tortoſa in Catalonia, but a boat cannot go up the ſtream higher than this laſt place, it is ſo very rapid.

EBROIN, mayor of the palace to Clotaire III. at firſt gained the affections of the French; but at length having uſurped the whole authority from queen Batilda, he behaved with extreme cruelty. Coltaire dying in 670, Ebroin ſet Thierri on the throne; but the grandees declaring for Childeric II. confined Ebroin in a monaſtery. After the death of Childeric II. in 673, Thierri re-mounted the throne, and had Leudeſe for his mayor of the palace. Ebroin, however, cauſed Leudeſe to be aſſaſſinated; ordered that the eyes of St. Leger, biſhop of Autun, ſhould be out; and obliged king Theirri to acknowledge him as his mayor of the palace. Ebroin's tyranny then knew no bounds; but he was at length murdered in 681, by a lord named Hermanfroi, whoſe eſtate he had ſeized.

ECCARD, (JOHN GEORGE) a famous hiſtorian and antiquary, born at Duingen, in the duchy of Brunſwick, on the 7th of September, 1674. He acquired the eſteem of M. Leibnitz, who procured for him the chair of profeſſor of hiſtory at Helmſtadt, and he was afterwards profeſſor at Hanover; but quitting that place in 1723, he embraced the poniſh religion; and afterwards going to Wurtzburg, was made epiſcopal counſellor, hiſtoriographer, keeper of the archives, and librarian. He died in 1730. He was the author of Corpus Hiſtoricum Medii ævi. and a great number of other works.

ECCHELLENSIS, (ABRAHAM) a learned Maronite, profeſſor of the Syriac and Arabic languages at the Royal College at Paris. He was ſent for from Rome, and employed, together with Gabriel Sionita, in M. le Jay's edition of the Polyglotte Bible; but Gabriel quarrelling with Ecchellenſis, laid his complaints, before the parliament, and cruelly defamed him, which was an affair that made much noiſe. Ecchellenſis was alſo attacked by M. Flavigny, doctor of the Sorbonne, and ſeveral ſevere pieces were publiſhed againſt each other. The congregation de propaganda fide, aſſociated him about the year 1636, with thoſe they employed in making an Arabic tranſlation of the Scriptures. He was at length recalled from Paris, and made profeſſor of the eaſtern languages at Rome. The grand duke Ferdinand II. then employed him in tranſlating into Latin the fifth, ſixth, and ſeventh books of Apollonius's Conics, in which he was aſſiſted by John Alfonſo Borelli, who added commentaries to it. Abraham Ecchellenſis died at Rome in 1664. He publiſhed ſeveral works, among which are, 1. Eutychius Vindicatus, againſt Selden and Hottinger; 2. Remarks on the Catalogue of the Chaldee Writers, compoſed by Ebedjeſſu, and publiſhed at Rome in 1653, &c.

ECCLESHALL, a town of Staffordſhire, with a ſmall market on Fridays. The biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry has a ſeat here, called Eccleſhall Caſtle. It is ſeated on the river Sow, ſix miles north-weſt of Stafford, and one hundred and forty two north-weſt of London. Their fairs are on Mid-lent Thurſday, Holy Thurſday, Auguſt 5, and the firſt Friday in November, all for cattle, ſheep, and ſaddle-horſes. Long. 2. 12. W. Lat. 52. 48. N.

ECCLESTON, an inconſiderable town in Lancaſhire, which has or had a market on Saturdays, but has no fair. It is two hundred and five miles from London, a little to the weſt of Whittle, in the mid-way between Wiggan and Preſton. Long. 2. 36. W. Lat. 53. 40. N.

ECDUSIA, Ἐκδυσία, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival obſerved by the Phæſtians in honour of Latona. Its origin is ſaid to be as follows: Galatea, the daughter of Euriſtius, was married to Lamprus, a citizen of Phæſtus in Crete, who being of an honourable family, but unable to provide competent fortunes for his daughters, commanded his wife, if ſhe was brought-to bed of a daughter, immediately to put her death, and then went to look after his flocks. Before his return Galatea was delivered of a daughter, but her maternal affection induced her to ſecure the infant, by calling it Leucippus, and telling her huſband was a boy. At length being no longer able to conceal the artifice, ſhe went to the temple of Latona, and with great earneſtneſs entreated the goddeſs, that if it were poſſible, the girl might be transformed into a boy, when Latona, being moved with compaſſion, granted her requeſt.

ECHARD. See EACHARD.

ECHIUS, or ECKIUS, (JOHN) doctor and profeſſor of divinity in the univerſity of Ingolſtadt, was a native of Swabia, and rendered himſelf famous by his zeal and writings againſt Luther, and other proteſtants of Germany. His principal works are, 1. A Manual of Controverſies; 2. A Treatiſe againſt the Articles propoſed at the Conference of Ratiſbon in 1541; and, 3. Two Treatiſes on the Sacrifice of the Maſs. He died at Ingolſtadt in 1543, aged fifty-ſeven.

ECHO, in fabulous hiſtory, a nymph who was ſent by Jupiter to amuſe Juno by her tales, whenever he was engaged in a new amour, and by that means prevented his being diſcovered; but the jealous goddeſs finding out the deceit, deprived her of the uſe of ſpeech, and only left her the power of pronouncing the laſt word in a ſentence; the nymph afterwards falling in love with Narciſſus, and being unable to expreſs her paſſion, fled to the covert of the woods and caves, where pining away till ſhe had nothing left but bones and voice, the former petrified, and the laſt is found in caves. Others ſay this effect was produced from her being ſlighted by Pan, by whom ſhe had had a daughter called Iynge.

ECIJA, a town of Spain, in the province of Andaluſia, ſeated on the river Xenil, over which there is a handſome ſtone bridge. It was formerly more conſiderable than it is at preſent, having been the ſee of a biſhop, which it loſt by the misfortunes of the times, after the invaſion of the Moors. The land about it is fruitful, and produces every thing neceſſary for life. But the chief riches of the inhabitants proceed from hemp, cotton, and wool, in which trade they are aſſiſted by the river Xenil, which waſhes the walls, the water of which is excellent for the waſhing of wool. It is twenty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Cordoua, and forty-eight eaſt of Seville. Lon. 5. 15. W. Lat 37. 21. N.

ECKEREN, a village in the Auſtrian Netherlands, and province of Brabant, remarkable for the obſtinate battle fought near it between the French and Dutch in 1703, where the Dutch general Opdam being ſeparated from his army, informed the States they were intirely defeated: but the Dutch ſtill maintained their ground, being commanded by general Slangenburg, and repulſed the French; whereupon Opdam was broke and diſgraced. It is five miles north of Antwerp, twenty-three ſouth-weſt of Bredda, and twenty ſouth-eaſt of Bergen-op-zoom. Long. 4. 21. E. Lat. 51. 32. N.

ECKTERNACH, a town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in the province of Luxemburg, ſeated on the river Sure, eighteen miles north of Luxemburg. Long. 6. 27. E. Lat. 49. 55 N.

ECLUSE, a ſmall but ſtrong town of the Dutch Low Countries, in the county of Flanders, with a good harbour and ſluices. The Engliſh beſieged it in vain in 1405, and the people of Bruges in 1436. But the Dutch, commanded by count Maurice of Naſſau, took it in 1644. It is defended by ſeveral forts, and is near the ſea, three miles north-weſt of Ardanburg, and nine north-eaſt of Burges. Long. 3. 10. E. Lat. 50. 25. N.

ECLUSE, (CHARLES DE L') in Latin Cluſius, a famous phyſician born at Arras, travelled into Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, and England. The emperors Maximilian II. and Rodolphus II. gave him the charge of their phyſic garden; and he was afterwards profeſſor of botany ny at Leyden, where he died on the fourth of April, 1609, aged eighty-four. He wrote ſeveral works, which are publiſhed together in 2 vols.

E D I

EDAM, a town in Holland, noted for its cheeſe, of which it ſells large quantities. It is ſeated on the Zuiderzee, five miles from Horn, and eight from Amſterdam. Long. 4. 50. E. Lat. 52. 33. N.

EDBALD, king of Kent, was the ſon of Ethelbert, the firſt Chriſtian Saxon king, and reigned in the ſeventh century. No ſooner was his father dead than he relapſed into heatheniſm, and married his father's ſecond wife; upon which a great part of his people forſook Chriſtianity. He fell into a phrenzy, but at length recovering his ſenſes, he diſſolved his inceſtuous marriage, and re-embraced Chriſtianity. He died in the year 640, leaving the kingdom of Kent to his ſon Eucombert.

EDELINCK, (Gerard) a famous engraver, born at Antwerp, where he was inſtructed in drawing and engraving, and ſettled at Paris, in the reign of Lewis XIV. who made him his engraver in ordinary. Edelinck was alſo counſellor in the Royal Academy of Painting. His print of the Holy Family, copied from Raphael, thoſe of Alexander viſiting the Family of Darius, and the Penitent Magdalen, from le Brun, are particularly admired. His works are particularly eſteemed for the neatneſs of the engraving, the brilliant caſt, and the prodigious eaſe with which he did every thing, and to this is owing the great number of plates we have of his, among which are excellent portraits of a great number of illuſtrious men of his time. He died in 1707, at an advanced age, at the Hotel Royal at the Gobelins, where he had an apartment. He had a brother named John, who was a ſkilful engraver, but died young.

EDEMA, (Gerard) an aminent painter, was, according to Vertue, born in Frieſland, but according to Graham at Amſterdam. He was the ſcholar of Everding, whoſe manner he followed, and came to England about the year 1670. As he delighted in rocky views, falls of water, and ſcenes of horror, he made voyages to Norway and Newfoundland, to collect ſubjects for his pictures among theſe wildneſſes of nature; yet he had no talent for figures and buildings, and where he wanted theſe, he was aſſiſted by Wyck. Edema loved his bottle too well, which occaſioned his dying at Richmond about the year 1700.

EDEN, a river which riſes in Weſtmoreland, on the confines of Yorkſhire, and running north by Appleby and Carliſle, falls into the Solway Frith, ſix miles weſt of that city.

EDGAR, king of England, aſcended the throne in the year 959, at ſixteen years of age, but was not crowned till he was thirty. He was juſt, candid, religious, and a great friend to the monks: he was however given to women, and forced Wilfrida out of a nunnery to be his concubine, but being reproved by St. Dunſtan, ſubmitted to a ſeven years penance. He fitted out a prodigious fleet for the ſecurity of the coaſt, freed the country from robbers, puniſhed ſuch magiſtrates as ſuffered themſelves to be corrupted; travelled through the country to adminiſter juſtice, and changed the annual tribute of ſpecie and cattle, paid by the Welſh, into three hundred wolves' heads, and by that means cauſed the entire deſtruction of thoſe ravenous beaſts. He reigned ſixteen years, and died in 975. He was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Edward II.

Edgar, the eighty-ninth king of Scotland, was the ſon to Malcolm III. The nobility and people being diſſatisfied with their king Duncan's adminiſtration, Donald of the Iſles cauſed him to be murdered; but having betrayed the weſtern iſles to the king of Norway, the people ſent for Edgar from England, who ſoon put Donald's party to the rout, and impriſoned him till he died, ſo that Edgar came to the crown by the unanimous conſent of the ſtates. This prince was reſpected by the good, aud feared by the bad. He reigned nine years, and died in 1098.

EDGHILL, a place near Keynton, in Warwickſhire, rendered memorable for the firſt battle that was fought in the civil wars between the Royaliſts and Parliamenterians, where Charles I. was in perſon, on Sunday, 23d of October, 1642. It is ten miles north-weſt of Banbury, and twelve ſouth of Warwick. Long. 1. 27. W. Lat. 52. 9. N.

EDGWORTH, or Edgware, a town in Middleſex, with a market on Thurſday, and a fair on May 4, for horſes and cows. It is ten miles north-weſt of London. Long. 0. 14. W. Lat. 51. 37. N.

EDINBURGH, the metropolis of Scotland, is not only the moſt conſiderable place in theſe parts, but the chief city of that kingdom. The Romans could not well have made choice of a better ſpot for a fortification; for the rock on which the preſent caſtle is ſeated is inacceſſible on all ſides except the eaſt. The firſt building of a fort here ſeems to have given riſe to the town, and to have encouraged the neighbours to have fixed under the protection of it. Inſomuch that the houſes gradully encreaſing, have brought it down to the very foot of the aſcent towards the eaſt, and made it an entire Scotch mile in length, and half a mile in breadth. The aſcent upon which the city ſtands, has on the north ſide a pool, called the North Loch, and was formerly guarded by another on the ſouth, called the South-Loch, as appears from the leaſes of ſome houſes of St. Ninians's Row, which was let with the privilege of a boat annexed. But this was drained ſeveral years ago. The city has ſix gates, the principal of which, towards the eaſt, called the Nether-bow, was magnificently rebuilt in the year 1616, and adorned with towers on both ſides.

The ſtreets run the whole length of the town, the Highſtreet which extends from the caſtle to the abbey, is ſaid to be the broadeſt in Europe, and all built of hewn ſtone, ſix or ſeven ſtories high, with ſaſh-windows. But then it muſt be remembered, that each ſtory is a diſtinct houſe, and has a particular owner, and has one ſtair-caſe common to them all. Timber houſes were prohibited long ago by an act of the town-council, on account of the many fires that have happened. Not only the private but the public buildings exceed thoſe in any other part of the kingdom. In the middle of the city is St. Giles's church, the cathedral, built of hewn ſtone, adorned with ſtone pillars and vaultings. It is ſo large as to be divided into three churches, each of which has a pariſh; beſides which, they have the South or Grey Friar's church, in the church yard of which, among many other curious monuments, is that of Sir George M'Kenzie. It is the common burying-place of the city. The Trone kirk or church was built in 1641. The collegiate church of the Sacred Trinity was built by Mary of Gueldres, king James the Second's queen. The Lady Yeſter's church was built and endowed by one of the lady Yeſters; and there is another very beautiful, the lateſt built of all. To theſe we muſt add two chapels, St. Magdalen's and St. Mary's, with another at the foot of the Canon-gate.

The hoſpitals are St. Thomas's and Heriot's. In the firſt, the poorer ſort of inhabitants are maintained, and have their proper chaplain. Heriot's hoſpital is ſo called from George Heriot the founder, who was jeweler to James VI. It is a ſtately fabric, like a palace. In the inner frontiſpiece is the ſtatue of the founder; and round about the houſes are pleaſant gardens, adorned with large walks and greens. It is a nurſery for boys, where the children of the poorer citizens have their education, till they are fit for the public ſchools and colleges.

Near the cathedral church is the parliament-houſe, ſtanding a great court, which on one ſide is encloſed with the upper and lower exchange, and with very ſtately buildings. Here is one of the higheſt houſes perhaps in the world, mounting ſeven ſtories above the parliament-cloſe, and being built on the deſcent of a hill, the back part is as far below it, ſo that from the bottom to the top one ſtair-caſe aſcends fourteen ſtories high. In the middle of the Parliament-cloſe or court is the ſtatue of Charles II. in braſs, upon a ſtately pedeſtal, erected at the charge of the city.

On the ſouth ſide is the college of king James the Sixth, founded in the year 1580, and endowed with all the privileges of an univerſity. The precincts are large, and the whole is divided into three courts, adorned on all ſides with excellent buildings, two lower and one higher, which is as large as both the others. They have their public ſchools, and a common hall, wherein divinity, Hebrew, mathematics, and medicine are taught. Their library is well ſtored with printed books, and has ſome manuſcripts. Under that is the king's printing houſe. The profeſſors have neat and handſome lodgings, and the ſtudents good gardens for their recreation.

The royal palace, called Holy Rood Houſe, is at the bottom of the Canon-gate, and has four courts; the outer court, which is as big as all the reſt, has four principal entries. It is ſurrounded on all ſides with handſome gardens, and on the ſouth lies the king's park, which has a great variety of medicinal plants. The entry of the palace is adorned with great pillars of hewn ſtone, and a cupola in the faſhion of a crown above it. The fore part is terminated by four high towers, two towards the north erected by James V. and the reſt by Charles II. The inner court has piazzas round it, all of hewn ſtone. But above all, the long gallery is moſt remarkable, it being adorned with the pictures of all the kings of Scotland from Fergus I.

About a hundred years ago the magiſtrates were at great expence to bring one of the beſt ſprings in Scotland into the city, which they did by leaden pipes, from a hill about three miles diſtant, and to make it more convenient, they erected ſeveral fountains in the middle of the high ſtreet, to ſerve the town with water. There is a college of juſtice, which hath its dean of faculty, and they try all their candidates.

didates King Charles the Second likewiſe erected a college of phyſicians here, giving them by patent under the great ſeal, an ample juriſdiction within the city and liberties, appointing the judicatures to concur with them in the execution of their decrees, and by a latter grant they have the liberty of profeſſing phyſic, and no one can commence doctor of phyſic regularly in this univerſity, without being examined by them. There are now public profeſſors of every branch of medicine, and Edinburgh has as famous a ſchool for that ſtudy as any in Europe.

The city is ſurrounded by an old Roman wall on every ſide, except towards the north, where it is ſecured by the North Loch. The ſtreet called the Cow-gate ſtreet is on one ſide the High ſtreet, and lies much lower, it is ſo called becauſe the cattle are drove through it to and from the Graſs-market, and there is an entrance into it from the city on the eaſt ſide, through a gate of the ſame name. One of the ſouth gates near the college is called the Potter-Row-Port, and is the entrance from the ſuburb termed the Potter-Row. The Weſt port gives entrance from a ſuburb below the caſtle. The North gate is at the lower end of the North Loch, and is the entrance from a ſuburb called Mutter's Hill and Leith. The principal port or gate, called the Nether Bow, leads from the High ſtreet to the Canon-gate. The chief ſtreet or High ſtreet being on the ridge of a hill, there are lanes run down the declivity on each ſide, which they call Winds, and are very narrow. In the Canon-gate ſtreet are ſeveral handſome houſes, where the nobility reſided when the court was kept here. The tolbooth is near the weſt end of the great church, and is a common priſon for debtors and criminals. The bank is at the foot of a cloſe on the north ſide of the land market. On the north ſide of the city, in a bottom, is the phyſic-garden, which contains a great variety of medicinal plants; and in this garden botanical lectures are read at the proper ſeaſon of the year.

In 1738 there was an hoſpital erected here for ſick and lame patients, like thoſe of London, which has met with great encouragement, and is well attended.

The city is governed by a lord provoſt, and four bailiffs, who, beſides the power of aldermen in the government of the city, have that of ſheriffs. Beſides which there is a common-council, which conſiſts of twenty-five perſons. All theſe are choſen annually, and the provoſt, dean of guild, and treaſurer are to be merchants. Beſides, no man is to be choſe provoſt, bailiff, dean of guild, or treaſurer, without having been a year or two member of the common-council. No man is to continue in the council above a year or two at a time, except he be member of it by virtue of a ſuperior office. The bailiffs are to be choſen indifferently out of twelve candidates propoſed, and none is to be elected deacon of the fourteen incorporated trades, except he has been maſter of his trade two years at leaſt, and none muſt continue deacon above two years at a time.

The fourteen incorporated trades are ſurgeons, goldſmiths, ſkinners, furriers, hammer-men, wrights, maſons, taylors, bakers, butchers, cordwainers, weavers, wakers or fullers, and bonnet makers. The magiſtrates are choſen annually on the Tueſday next after Michaelmas-day, by thirty-eight perſons, whereof twenty are to be merchants and tradeſmen. And the ſaid magiſtrates, with the town-council, are to have the adminiſtration of the government, except in ſome few reſerved caſes, as the election of magiſtrates, the dean of guild and treaſurer, and letting leaſes, giving boundaries of places, and other public matters; in which caſes they are to take advice of the fourteen deacons of trades. None of the corporated trades are to make any bye-laws among themſelves, without the conſent of the magiſtrates and town council. The auditors of the accounts are to be choſen by an equal number of merchants and tradeſmen. The lord provoſt, dean of guild, and treaſurer, are not to continue longer than one or two years at a time, and the bailiff is to be one year bailiff, one year old bailiff, and to be one year free of office. The trained bands of the city conſiſt of ſixteen companies, beſides a ſtanding company of the town guards.

Before the Union the parliament uſed to meet here, as the general aſſembly ſtill does. Here likewiſe the ſupreme courts of juſtice are held. It is a diſadvantage to Edinburgh that moſt of their great men attend on the court and parliament in London; but then the linen manufacture is in a very flouriſhing condition, and the people in general are more addicted to trade than they were formerly. It was the ſee of a biſhop till epiſcopacy was aboliſhed. Thoſe of the epiſcopal perſuaſion now aſſemble in meeting-houſes. It is four hundred meaſured or Engliſh ſtatute miles north-by-weſt from London. Long. 3. 2. W. Lat. 55. 57. N.

EDISTON Rock, a rock ſeated in the Engliſh channel, ſixteen miles ſouth of Plymouth, in Devonſhire, on which is a light-houſe, erected for the direction of ſhips going in and out of the channel.

EDMONDES, Edmonds, or Edmunds, (Sir Thomas) knt. was born at Plymouth, in Devonſhire, about the year 1565, and was initiated into public buſineſs under ſir Francis Walſingham, ſecretary of ſtate; after which he rendered himſelf famous by his embaſſies to ſeveral courts, and particularly to France. He died on the 20th of September, 1639. Several of his letters and papers, together with abſtracts of the reſt, have been publiſhed by the Rev. Dr. Thomas Birch, in a work intitled An hiſtorical View of the Negociations between the Courts of England, France, and Bruſſels, from the year 1592 to 1617.

EDMUND I. king of England, was ſon to Edward the Elder, and ſucceeded his brother Ethelſtan, in the year 941. He cleared Mercia of the Danes, ſubdued Northumberland and Cumberland, which laſt he beſtowed upon the king of Scots, to engage him to aſſiſt him in his wars by ſea and land. In 946, as he feaſted with his nobles in Glouceſterſhire, he was ſtabbed by a robber, whom he had baniſhed. His two ſons Edwin and Edgar, being thought too young to ſucceed him, Edred his brother aſcended the throne.

Edmund, ſurnamed Ironſide, from his wonderful ſtrength, was born in 1016. He was the third ſon of king Ethelred II. and the eldeſt at the time of his father's death; when he was proclaimed king at London. He was one of the braveſt men of that age; but had the misfortune to be oppoſed by enemies who were too powerful. He however gained three complete victories over the Danes, commanded by Canute, whom he obliged to raiſe the ſiege of London. But not making a proper uſe of theſe advantages, and being impoſed upon by the counſels of Edric his brother-in-law, who ſought his friendſhip only to betray him, he was afterwards defeated by Canute, when his affairs were in ſo wretched a ſituation, that his friends were obliged to leave him, and ſubmit to the conqueror. Edmund however did not deſpair, but collected together ſuch of his ſubjects as continued faithful, in order to engage the enemy, and perceiving Canute at the head of his army, rode before his own troops to meet him, when a furious battle enſued, in which, neither having the advantage, they agreed to divide the kingdom between them. The unhappy Edmund however enjoyed his ſhare but a few days, for the villain Edric, his brother-in-law, got him aſſaſſinated, in 1017, by two of his domeſtics; from the hopes of gaining the favour of Canute by this baſe action; but that prince, inſtead of rewarding him, ordered his head to be cut off, and placed on one of the higheſt gates of London.

Edmund (St.) archbiſhop of Canterbury, was eſteemed by pope Innocent III. who raiſed him to that high preferment; but falling into diſgrace with Henry II. king of England, he retired to France, where he died, on the 16th of November, 1240. He wrote a work which is ſtill extant, intitled Speculum Eccleſiæ.

EDRED, king of England, ſucceeded Edmund I. in 946. The Danes, upon his aſcending the throne, revolted, and gained over to their ſide Malcolm, king of Scotland; but Edred marching into Northumberland, obliged them to ſue for peace. Upon this Malcolm concluded a peace with Edred, and paid him the ſtipulated homage. Edred then attacked the Danes in Northumberland, and made a terrible ſlaughter of them. The Northumbrians then caſt themſelves upon Edred for mercy, upon which he placed Edric their king, who had fled into Scotland, on the throne; but obliged him to pay him tribute. But the Danes lying in ambuſh for him, as he was returning towards Weſſex, ſuddenly fell on his rear. At which, being greatly exaſperated, he returned, diveſted Northumberland of its royalty, and reduced it to a province; making earl Oſulf, an Engliſhman, the firſt governor. Edred being now king of all England, governed his kingdom in perfect tranquility, and turning his thoughts entirely to religion, by the advice of Dunſtan, abbot of Glaſtonbury, rebuilt his church and abbey, and alſo Croyland and Abington monaſteries. Edred died in 956, in the tenth year of his reign, and was ſucceeded by Edwy.

EDWARD, ſurnamed the Elder, king of England, was the eldeſt ſon of Alfred, and aſcended the throne in the year 900. He was inferior in learning to his father, but equalled him in valour, piety, and the love he bore his ſubjects. He conquered the Welch, defeated the Danes, whom he kept in ſubjection, obliged Conſtantine II. king of Scotland to ſue for peace, and do him homage, and having reigned twenty-four years died in 925, and was ſucceeded by Athelſtan.

Edward, ſurnamed the Younger, king of England, was the ſon of Edgar, by his firſt wife Egelfleda, and aſcended the throne in 975. In his reign began the declenſion of the Saxon glory. The moſt remarkable particulars that happened at this time were a great famine, and the inteſtine broils which agitated the whole kingdom, on account of a quarrel between the ſecular prieſts and the monks. King Edward,

E D W

Edward, after a reign of three years, was murdered, by means of Elfrida, his ſtep-mother, who, on his calling at her houſe to pay his reſpects to her, when hunting, perſuaded him to drink a cup of wine, and while he was drinking on horſeback, cauſed him to be ſtabbed, in order to make way for her ſon Ethelred, who ſucceeded to the throne.

EDWARD, ſurnamed the Confeſſor, king of England, ſucceeded Hardicanute in 1042. He had been driven out of the kingdom by the Danes, and retired into Normandy, where Godwin, earl of Kent, went in ſearch of him, and having brought him to England, gave him his daughter in marriage, and by his influence placed him on the throne, though Edward, the ſon of Edmund Ironſide, was ſtill living. On being crowned he remitted the Daniſh tribute, which had been extremely heavy, and which the people had groaned under for thirty-eight years; but on the other hand, he raiſed to high poſts the Normans, who had been kind to him in his exile, and thus paved the way for the Norman conqueſt. But what occaſioned the greateſt troubles in this reign was the following incident. Euſtace, count of Bologne, returning from a viſit to king Edward through Canterbury, one of his harbingers inſolently offering to lodge in a houſe by force, was ſlain; on which the count going with his whole train to the houſe where his ſervant had been killed, not only ſlew the perſon who had done it, but eighteen more who defended him, upon which the townſmen running to arms, revenged their death, by the ſlaughter of twenty-one of his ſervants, wounded moſt of the reſt, and he himſelf with one or two eſcaped with difficulty. The count enraged, haſted back to the king, and made the court ring with his clamours. When Edward, being highly exaſperated, ſent for earl Godwin, and commanded him to raiſe forces, and treat the citizens of Canterbury as enemies. The earl, aſtoniſhed at his partiality againſt his own ſubjects, endeavoured to moderate his reſentment, and adviſed him to have recourſe to juſtice, and not to puniſh the innocent with the guilty. By this advice he incurred the king's diſpleaſure, and therefore, for his own ſecurity, raiſed forces out of his own and his ſon's earldoms, on pretence that they were deſigned againſt the Welſh. But the king comprehending his real deſign, ordered him and his ſon to make their appearance before him and the lords unarmed, which they refuſing, were baniſhed, and the queen, the earl's daughter, ſhut up in a monaſtery. After this William duke of Normandy came to England, was received with extraordinary reſpect, and led about to ſee the caſtles and cities, as if it was intended they ſhould ſhortly be his own, and returned highly pleaſed with his entertainment. At length earl Godwin appeared on the coaſt with a formidable navy, which obliged king Edward to agree to a reconciliation; when Godwin, his ſon, and the queen, were reſtored to their former honours, and the Normans baniſhed the kingdom. Edward afterwards by his generals vanquiſhed Macbeth, the tyrant of Scotland, and in 1065 ſubdued South Wales.

When peace was reſtored to his dominions, he cauſed all the good laws made by his predeceſſors to be collected, and adding others of his own, formed them into one body, and called them the Common Law of England. He built Weſtminſter-abbey, with a ſepulchre in it for himſelf, and alſo erected the church of St. Margaret, which ſtands near it. Yet in many inſtances, beſides thoſe already mentioned, he ſhewed himſelf a miſguided and cruel prince; for he ſeized the poſſeſſions of queen Emma his mother, allowing her only a ſmall penſion for life, and though he had no children to ſucceed him, he refuſed to cohabit with Editha his queen, under the pretence of his religious veneration for chaſtity. He is however repreſented as an admirable ſaint, and was the firſt king of England who pretended to have the miraculous power of curing the king's evil with his touch. He died on the 5th of January, 1065, in the ſixty-fourth year of his age. It is ſaid that he left his crown to William duke of Normandy; at leaſt that duke founded his claim on that pretence. But he was immediately ſucceeded by Harold II. ſon to the earl of Godwin.

EDWARD I. king of England, ſurnamed Long Shanks, was the ſon of Henry III. and was born at Wincheſter, in 1239. He was taller by the head than the generality of men; and his perſon was well made, ſtrong, and handſome; but his legs being rather too long, he thence obtained the name of Long Shanks. He carried on a cruſade againſt the Saracens, where, with only ten thouſand Engliſhmen, he ſtruck a general panic into the infidels. He there narrowly eſcaped being murdered by an aſſaſſin who wounded him in the arm with a poiſoned dagger; and it is ſaid that he owed his life to the affection of Eleanor his wife, who was with him, and ſucked the venom out of the wound. While he was on his return from Paleſtine he heard of the death of his father, which happened in 1272, and arriving in England with his queen, they were both crowned on the 19th of Auguſt, 1274. He began his reign by confirming the Magna Charta; by making a ſtrict enquiry into the affairs of his kingdom, and rectifying the coin which had been adulterated by the Jews. He then defeated and ſlew Lewellyn, king of Wales, who had revolted, and afterwards ſummoning a parliament at Ruthen, it was there reſolved that Wales ſhould be united to England: when ſome of the Welſh nobles telling the king that he would never peaceably enjoy their country, till they were governed by a prince of their own nation, he ſent for the queen to lie-in at Carnarvon, where being delivered of a prince, the ſtates acknowledged him for their ſovereign, and ſince that time the eldeſt ſons of the kings of England have borne the title of prince of Wales. Soon after, queen Eleanor dying at Grantham, in Lincolnſhire, the king erected a croſs at every place where the corpſe reſted in the way to Weſtminſter.

Edward then carrying his arms into Scotland, took Berwick, Dunbar, and Edinburgh; and John Baliol their king repairing to Edward, renewed his oath of fidelity, and put the whole kingdom in his power. But while Edward was endeavouring to recover ſome dominions he had loſt in France by treachery, the brave William Wallace roſe up in defence of his country, and having ſuddenly diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh of all the ſtrong places they held, was declared regent of the kingdom; on which Edward haſtily returned from France, advanced into Scotland at the head of a powerful army, and defeated Wallace, who, ſeveral years after, was betrayed into the hands of the Engliſh, and ſent to London, where Edward treated him with unpardonable ſeverity, and made that great hero ſuffer the death of a traitor. Edward thrice conquered Scotland, and at length vowed that he would deſtroy that kingdom from ſea to ſea, but was ſeized with a dyſentery, and died in the little town of Burgh, on the 7th of July, 1307, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign, and was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey.

It is remarkable that Edward had ſo great a regard for the laws, that he publicly impriſoned his ſon, the prince of Wales, for breaking into the park of the biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry.

EDWARD II. king of England, was born at Caernarvon, and ſucceeded his father Edward I. in 1307, at twenty-three years of age. Inſtead of following the prudent example ſet him by his father, he recalled Pierce Gaveſton, whom that prince had baniſhed. Then marrying Iſabella, the daughter of the French king, they were both crowned at Weſtminſter, on the 24th of February, 1308. His ridiculous fondneſs for Gaveſton occaſioned innumerable diſputes, till at length the barons had recourſe to arms, and Gaveſton was beheaded. In the mean time the Scots obtained three victories over the Engliſh, and made themſelves maſters of every place in Scotland.

This weak prince now raiſed the two Spencers, father and ſon, to the ſummit of power; but they being baniſhed by the parliament, the king, in a rage, levied an army, took ſome caſtles from the barons, and recalled his two favourites. Afterwards, he invaded Scotland; but wanting proviſions, returned without ſtriking a blow: on which Bruce, king of Scotland, purſued him to York, and, after having deſtroyed twenty thouſand of the Engliſh, conſented to a peace. The two Spencers ſoon incurred the general hatred; and queen Iſabella flying to France with her ſon, the nobility ſent for her; when landing, and proceeding towards London with a numerous army, the king fled into the weſt; ſhe ſtill purſued him, and he ſet ſail for Ireland; but was driven back into Wales, and being taken, was ſent priſoner to the queen. Hugh Spencer, the father, was hanged and quartered, without a trial, and the young Spencer was hanged on a gallows fifty feet high.

The queen, now forgetting all the obligations of nature and duty, was entirely governed by Mortimer, earl of March, whom ſhe took to her bed: and the king being obliged to reſign the crown in 1327, in the forty-third year of his age and the twentieth of his reign, his ſon Edward was proclaimed king. After which, the late ſovereign was treated with the greateſt indignities, and at laſt inhumanly murdered; for ſome aſſaſſins having covered him with a feather-bed, held him down, while others conveyed a horn-pipe up his body, through which they thruſt a red-hot iron, and thus burnt his bowels.

EDWARD III. one of the greateſt and moſt celebrated kings of England, was born at Windſor, and was placed on the throne on the 26th of January, 1327, at fourteen years of age, while his father, Edward II. was living. Though a regency was appointed by the parliament, the queen and Roger Mortimer had the ſole authority; and influenced by them, the young king not only renounced all his pretenſions to Scotland, but gave his ſiſter in marriage to David Bruce, king of the Scots: yet afterwards becoming ſenſible of the queen's ill conduct, he confined her for life, and and cauſed Mortimer, earl of March, to be hanged at Tyburn. He then broke the truce with Scotland, invaded that kingdom, won four battles in a ſhort time, and obliged king David to fly with his queen into France, when he ſet up Edward Baliol in his room. Edward now laid claim to France; for Charles, his mother's brother, dying, Philip of Valois had poſſeſſed himſelf of the kingdom, alledging the Salic law; but Edward aſſerted, that the Salic law, in excluding females from the ſucceſſion, did not exclude their male iſſue, on which he grounded his title. His firſt campaign paſſed without bloodſhed; but he took the title of king of France, and quartered his arms with the flours de lis, adding the motto, Dieu et mon droit, or, God and my right. However, in his next attempt he defeated the French fleet, and deſtroyed or took three hundred and ſeventy of their ſhips, and thirty thouſand men. He then beſieged Tournay; but being called home to oppoſe the Scots, concluded a truce for one year, with Philip king of France. In the next campaign he ravaged all the country, up to the walls of Paris, and his ſon, the Black Prince of Wales, at ſixteen years of age, won the glorious battle of Creſſy, in which the French were defeated, with incredible ſlaughter; they loſing eleven princes, and thirty thouſand common ſoldiers, a greater number than the whole army of the conquerors, whoſe loſs was very inconſiderable. Six weeks after this, the queen defeated the Scots, and took king David priſoner. Theſe memorable victories were obtained in the year 1346. Edward then laid ſiege to Calais, and having reduced it by famine, returned to England. He ſoon after ſent his ſon the Black Prince, who, after taking ſeveral towns, totally routed the French army, commanded by king John, who had ſucceeded Philip; and in this glorious battle, which was fought near Poictiers, took the king, many nobles, and a multitude of private men priſoners, though the French army was ſix times as numerous as the Engliſh. Thus Edward had the honour of having two kings his priſoners at the ſame time, John of France, and David Bruce, king of Scotland, who were both treated with great reſpect. The king of Scotland, who reſided at Odiham, in Hampſhire, was afterwards ranſomed for one hundred thouſand marks; and the French king, who lived at the Savoy agreed to pay for his ranſom five hundred thouſand pounds, and a conſiderable extent of country.

Charles king of France afterwards carried on a war with Edward, when the Engliſh were driven from all the places they had ſo bravely conquered, to which the death of the Black Prince greatly contributed.

Edward III. endeavoured to excite a ſpirit of induſtry among his ſubjects, who, blind to the advantage of their ſituation, and ignorant of the ſource from which opulence was deſtined to flow into their country, totally neglected commerce, and did not even attempt thoſe manufactures, the materials of which they furniſhed to foreigners. By allowing Flemiſh artizans to reſide in his dominions, as well as by many wiſe laws for the encouragement and regulation of trade, he gave a beginning to the woollen manufactures of England, and firſt turned the active and enterprizing genius of his people towards thoſe arts, which have raiſed the Engliſh to the higheſt rank among commercial nations. Edward alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by inſtituting the order of the Garter; and having ſettled the ſucceſſion, died at Richmond, in Surry, on the 21ſt of June, 1377, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age and the fifty-firſt of his reign, and was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey. He was ſucceeded by Richard II. the ſon of Edward the Black Prince.

EDWARD THE BLACK PRINCE, ſo called from his wearing black armour, was the eldeſt ſon of Edward III. and queen Philippa, and was born on the 13th of June, 1330. Before he was ſeven years of age, his father created him duke of Cornwall, when he was the firſt duke created in England. Upon this occaſion he received a grant of the ſtannaries or duties on tin, in Cornwall. In the thirteenth year of his age he was created prince of Wales, the king inveſting him with a coronet, a gold ring, and a ſilver rod, and adding lands of conſiderable value in Wales, to enable him to maintain the dignity of a prince. When he was juſt turned of ſixteen, he attended his father in the wars in France, commanded the firſt line or battalion in the famous battle of Creſſy, and he alone obtained the honour of that glorious victory. The king of Bohemia, who had joined king Philip, loſt his life in the action; and his ſtandard, on which were three oſtrich feathers, with the motto in golden letters, Ich dien, that is, I ſerve, being brought to the prince, he placed the oſtrich feathers in his own coronet, with the ſame motto. He obtained another memorable victory near Poictiers, with an army of eight thouſand men, over ſixty thouſand French, took John, their king, with his ſon Philip, priſoners, and brought them in triumph to London, at the ſame time treating them with the greateſt politeneſs and humanity. The battle of Najarra too added to the luſtre of his military fame, by which he reſtored to the throne of Caſtile Don Pedro, who had been depoſed by his baſtard brother. It is obſerved of this prince, that he never engaged in any ſiege or battle in which he was not victorious; and that his juſtice, clemency and generoſity, the ſweetneſs of his diſpoſition, his affability and condeſcenſion, rendered him the delight of mankind. He died while his father was living, in the forty-ſixth year of his age.

EDWARD IV. king of England, was the ſon of Richard, duke of York, and diſputed the crown with Henry VI. who was of the houſe of Lancaſter. Between theſe two families a great number of battles were fought, with different ſucceſs; but at length Edward obtained the crown, in 1461, by gaining a ſignal victory over Henry VI. whom he forced to fly into Scotland, with Margaret of Anjou, his conſort. He afterwards gained another victory over the ſame unhappy prince, who, after his ſecond defeat, came into England in diſguiſe, and being ſeized, was carried to London, with his legs tied under his horſe's belly, and then confined in the Tower.

The earl of Warwick had chiefly contributed to raiſe Edward to the throne; but that prince employing him to negociate a marriage for him in France, and in the mean time marrying Elizabeth, the widow of Sir John Grey, with whom the earl was in love, that nobleman was ſo exaſperated, that he raiſed a rebellion, in which he twice defeated the king's forces, and afterwards took his majeſty priſoner, and confined him in Middleham caſtle; from whence he eſcaped, and joining the lord Haſtings, in Lancaſhire, returned to London, when another battle enſued, and Warwick being defeated, was obliged to fly into France; but ſoon after landing at Dartmouth with a few troops, he ſoon increaſed them to ſixty thouſand men; upon which Edward alſo raiſed a numerous army at Nottingham; but as his enemies were advancing, the cry of king Henry being raiſed in his camp, Edward fled, and eſcaped into Flanders. Warwick then took Henry out of the Tower, and cauſed him to be acknowledged king of England. But Edward afterwards returning with a ſmall force, was received at London with acclamations of joy; and the unhappy Henry being again ſeized, was once more confined to the Tower. Edward then marched againſt the earl of Warwick, and routed his army, in a great battle, near Barnet, where the earl himſelf was ſlain, with ſeventeen thouſand of his men. Some time after, the queen having aſſembled an army, king Edward defeated her, near Tewkſbury, and took her priſoner, with her ſon prince Edward, the duke of Somerſet, &c. The prince being carried to the conqueror's camp, Edward aſked him, "Why he was ſo raſh as to enter the kingdom in arms;" when boldly anſwering, that "he came to recover his right, unjuſtly uſurped," Edward had the brutality to ſtrike the brave youth in the mouth with his gauntlet, on which his attendants ſtabbed him with their daggers. Thus they maſſacred an amiable prince, in the eighteenth year of his age; and ſoon after, king Henry, his father, was murdered in the Tower, or, as other ſay, died with grief, in the fiftieth year of his age. Queen Margaret, after being four years confined in the Tower, was ranſomed by her father, for fifty thouſand crowns. Edward cauſed his brother, the duke of Clarence, to be drowned in a butt of ſack. Edward being now at peace, ſpent his time in indolence and debauchery, and in corrupting the wives of the citizens. His favourite miſtreſs was Jane Shore. He died at Weſtminſter, on the 9th of April, 1483, in the forty-ſecond year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign.

EDWARD V. king of England, was the eldeſt ſon of Edward IV. whom he ſucceeded, in 1483, at twelve years of age. He was at Ludlow when his father died; but being ſent for to London, he was lodged in the biſhop of London's palace, where, on the 4th of May, he received the oaths of the principal nobility, and his uncle Richard, duke of Glouceſter, was made protector of the king and kingdom. He obliged the queen to deliver up to him the duke of York, the king's brother, and ſent them both to the Tower, under the pretence of their waiting there till every thing was prepared for the coronation, at which the proceſſion was uſually made from thence to Weſtminſter. Mean while the duke of Glouceſter, by the aſſiſtance of the duke of Buckingham, ſir John Shaw, lord mayor of London, and Dr. Shaw his brother, had the two young princes declared illegitimate, affirming that in all likelihood their father was alſo a baſtard; and then cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged king of England; pretending to accept the crown with great reluctance; though he had put to death lord Haſtings for no other crime, but his being warmly attached to the young king; however, as that nobleman was greatly beloved by the people, Glouceſter pretended that his ambition and ſorceries endangered the kingdom; the queen and Jane Shore were accuſed as his colleagues, and the latter was taken into cuſtody, but was ſoon after releaſed on doing penance. Sir Robert Brackenbury enbury, lieutenant of the Tower, refuſing to comply with Richard's cruel deſigns, he for one night only gave the command of that fortreſs to ſir James Tyrrell, and he procured two villains, who, in the dead of the night, entered the chamber where the princes lay, and ſmothered them in bed. Thus died Edward V. after a reign of only three months. The bodies of the young king and his brother were buried under the ſtair-caſe, where their bones were diſcovered one hundred and ninety-one years after, and by order of king Charles II. depoſited in Weſtminſter-abbey, and a ſmall monument erected to their memory in Henry the Seventh's chapel.

The honourable Mr. Walpole has however endeavoured, with great ſtrength of reaſon, and by the evidence of cotemporary writers, to vindicate Richard from moſt of theſe crimes; and to ſhew that they were calumnies invented to pleaſe king Henry VII.

EDWARD VI. king of England, and the only ſon of Henry VIII. and Jane Seymour, aſcended the throne at nine years of age, at which time he was well ſkilled in the Latin and French tongues, and had obtained ſome knowledge of the Greek, Italian, and Spaniſh. His perſon was very beautiful; he had great ſweetneſs of temper, and in that early age was remarkable for his piety and humanity. He was committed to the care of ſixteen perſons, whom Henry had nominated regents of the kingdom, and governors of his ſon; the principal of whom was the earl of Hertford, the king's uncle by the mother's ſide, who was ſoon after created duke of Somerſet.

The young queen of Scotland was now demanded in marriage for king Edward, but the ſame propoſal being made by France, in behalf of the dauphin, ſhe was ſent into that kingdom, on which the duke of Somerſet invaded Scotland, routed the Scots army at Muſſelburgh, and though the duke's forces amounted only to eighteen thouſand men, and the Scots to thirty thouſand, the latter were defeated with the loſs of fourteen thouſand killed, and one thouſand five hundred priſoners; but what is very improbable the Engliſh are ſaid to have loſt no more than fifty-one horſemen, and one foot ſoldier.

Henry had left the Reformation very imperfect; but Somerſet and his friends, aſſiſted by archbiſhop Cranmer, made uſe of this opportunity to improve it: private maſſes were now therefore laid a-ſide, the Bible was tranſlated into Engliſh, and prayers read in the ſame language. Yet Joan Bocker embracing the opinions of the German baptiſts, was burnt as an heretic; but the young king ſet his hand to the warrant with tears in his eyes, telling archbiſhop Cranmer, That if he did wrong, ſince it was in ſubmiſſion to his authority, he ſhould anſwer to God for it.

However, the above alterations occaſioned great diſturbances in ſeveral parts of the kingdom; ſome of which were ſuppreſſed by force of arms, and others by proclamations for a general pardon. Mean while the great power of the duke of Somerſet raiſed him many enemies, the chief of whom was Thomas lord Seymour; but articles of accuſation being exhibited againſt him, he was attainted in parliament, and then condemned and beheaded, without being brought to an open trial. However, the duke of Somerſet himſelf was ſome time after impeached, and charged with a deſign to ſeize the king, and to impriſon the earl of Warwick; for this he was condemned, and the young king being in a manner forced to ſign the ſentence, he was executed ſome time after. The earl of Warwick, now duke of Northumberland, ſucceeded to the earl of Somerſet's power, and at length, on the king's being taken ill of the meazles, married the lord Guilford Dudley, his fourth ſon, to the lady Jane Grey, eldeſt daughter to the duke of Suffolk, and perſuaded Edward to ſettle the crown on her, his ſiſters, Mary and Elizabeth, having been both declared illegitimate during the life-time of their father; and the prince, hoping to ſave the Reformation from impending deſtruction, appointed her his ſucceſſor, and ſoon after died, on the 6th of July, 1553, in the 16th year of his age, and the 7th of his reign. See the article GREY (Lady JANE).

Though Edward died ſo young, he left ſeveral writings, among which Mr. Walpole mentions, 1. The Sum of a Conference with the Lord Admiral, written with his own hand, and extant among the Aſhmolean manuſcripts. 2. A Method for the Proceedings of the Council, in his own hand, in the Cotton library. 3. His Arguments againſt the Pope's Supremacy, &c. in French, of which there is an Engliſh tranſlation, printed in 1682. He himſelf drew the rough draught of a ſumptuary law, which is preſerved by Stryp:, and an account of a progreſs he made. There are alſo ſome ſpecimens of his Latin Epiſtles and Orations, and of two other books written by him; the firſt before he was twelve years of age, againſt the abuſes of popery, which is dedicated to the protector his uncle. It is corrected by his French tutor, and atteſted by him to be of the king's own compoſition. The other is a tranſlation into French, of ſeveral paſſages of Scripture, preſerved in the library of Trinity college, Cambridge.

There have been ſeveral other princes in Europe of the ſame name.

EDWARDS (THOMAS) a famous divine and writer, in the ſeventeenth century, and a bitter enemy to the Independants, was educated at Cambridge, and though he afterwards conformed, he himſelf ſays, that he was always a puritan in his heart. He preached at Hertford, and at ſeveral churches in and about London. He wrote, 1. Reaſons againſt the Independent Government. 2. Antapologia: or a full Anſwer to the Apologetical Narration of Mr. Goodwin, &c. 3. Gangræna, or a Catalogue and Diſcovery of many of the Errors, Hereſies, Blaſphemies, and pernicious Practices of the Sectaries of this Time, vented and acted in England. 4. A Treatiſe againſt Toleration; and other works.

EDWARDS (Dr. JONATHAN) a famous Engliſh divine, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by engaging in moſt of the controverſies of his time. He was educated at Jeſus college, in Oxford; took his degrees in the regular way, and on the 2d of November, 1686, was elected principal of that college. He was a man of great abilities and learning, was a ſtrenuous advocate for Calviniſm, and treated all his opponents with great bitterneſs and acrimony.

EDWY, or EDWIN, king of England, was the ſon of Edmund, and ſucceeded Edred in 956, and was no ſooner ſeated on the throne, than he ordered Dunſtan, who had been treaſurer to the late king, to bring in an account of the ſums intruſted to him; but this he refuſed, alledging that it had been laid out for pious uſes. Upon this, the king's council were for dropping the affair, for fear of the people, who had a great opinion of Dunſtan's ſanctity, and an extraordinary veneration for the monks, and therefore branded thoſe who ſpake againſt them as impious and profane. However, to mortify the abbot, the monks were turned out of ſome benefices they had invaded, and the ſecular prieſts reſtored. The monks, upon this, vented the moſt bitter invectives; on which Dunſtan, who was ſuppoſed to be the chief author of theſe clamours, was baniſhed, or as ſome ſay, retired voluntarily to a monaſtery in Flanders. The monks now loudly exclaimed againſt the government of the young king, whom they repreſented as the moſt impious of men. This ſoon cauſed an inſurrection in Mercia, when Edgar the king's brother headed the rebels, and having ſeized that part of the country, marched into Northumberland and Eaſt Anglia, where he was joined by the Danes. Edwy not imagining it was in the power of the monks to do ſuch miſchief, was unprepared to quell the rebellion: and was only able to keep Weſſex, which preſerved its fidelity to him, and was forced to deliver up all the reſt, of which Edgar was choſen the head, with the title of king of Mercia. Edwy, vexed at his being thus deprived of his dominions, fell into a deep melancholy, which put an end to his life, after he had reigned a little above four years, and was buried at Wincheſter.

EFFERDING, a town of Germany, in Upper Auſtria, eight miles from Lintz. It has a caſtle, and belongs to the biſhop of Paſſau. There is good hunting in the neighbourhood. Long. 13. 44. E. Lat. 48. 0. N.

EGBERT the Great, the laſt king of the Saxon heptarchy, and the firſt king of all England, was the ſon of Alemund, and of the royal family of Weſſex. Brithric having uſurped the crown, he was ſentenced to loſe his head; but happily eſcaping the fury of his enemies, he fled to Offa, and afterwards to Charlemagne, king of France, and the founder of the Weſtern Empire. But Brithric being murdered in 801, he returned to Britain, where he was received with joy, and crowned king of Weſſex. Having learned in the ſeveral European courts the arts of peace and war, he ſecured the affections of his people by his juſtice and clemency, and by their aſſiſtance, conquered the Britons who inhabited the coaſts of Cornwall and Wales. In 823 he defeated Witglaph, king of the Mercians, and having conquered his kingdom, he, in 825, ſubdued the kingdoms of Kent, Eaſt Anglia, and Eſſex. Two years after he advanced againſt the Northumbrians, who ſubmitted without oppoſition, and the next year he became the ſole monarch of South Britain. He remained in the peaceable poſſeſſion of his extenſive dominions till the year 833, when the Danes made a deſcent into England, and defeated the army he ſent againſt them; but they did not long enjoy the fruits of their victory; for two years after Egbert routed them, drove them back to their ſhips; and during his reign they never dared to return. Having enjoyed his conqueſts about eight years, he died, in 836, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Ethelwulf.

EGER, a river of Bohemia, which has its ſource in Fichtelberg, in Franconia, and running eaſtward falls into the Elbe.

EGERIA, or ÆGERIA, a nymph held in great veneration by the Romans. Numa Pompilius made the people believe that he had compoſed the laws and religious ceremonies of Rome by her advice and aſſiſtance.

EGERTON (THOMAS) lord chancellor, natural ſon of ſir Richard Egerton, of Ridley, in Cheſhire, knt. where he was born, about the year 1540. He was educated at Brazen-noſe college, Oxford, from which he removed to Lincoln's Inn, and became a counſellor of great practice. In 1581 queen Elizabeth conſtituted him her ſollicitor-general; afterwards her attorney-general, and at length keeper of the great ſeal. In the firſt year of king James he was advanced to the degree of a baron, by the title of lord Elleſmere, and made lord-chancellor of England, and in the fourteenth of the ſame reign was raiſed to the dignity of viſcount Brackley. He wrote a ſmall book, intitled Certaine Obſervations concerning the Office of the Lord-Chancellor. A Speech in the Exchequer Chamber: and left behind him four manuſcripts of choice collections on the Prerogative Royal. He publiſhed, 1. Privileges of Parliament. 2. Proceedings in Chancery. 3. The Power of the Star-Chamber. He died March 15, 1616-17.

EGGELING (JOHN HENRY) a learned antiquary, born at Bremen, travelled into moſt of the kingdoms of Europe, and was at length ſecretary to that imperial city, which employment he diſcharged with great reputation, and died on the 15th of February, 1713, aged ſeventy-four. He wrote ſeveral works.

EGINHARD, or EGINART, ſecretary to the emperor Charles the Great, was a German, he rendered himſelf famous by his wit and his writings. He is eſteemed the moſt ancient hiſtorian of that nation, and a very elegant writer for a man of the ninth century. It is ſaid that he was beloved by Imma, the emperor's daughter, for whom he alſo had entertained a very great affection. One night he crept to the princeſs's apartment, knocked ſoftly at the door, and was admitted into her chamber. He deſigned to have retired before break of day; but to his great amazement, found that it had ſnowed very much, and was afraid leſt the print of his feet ſhould betray him; when mentioning his uneaſineſs to the princeſs, after a ſhort conſultation, ſhe offered to take him upon her ſhoulders, and carry him to ſome diſtance. The emperor, who had paſſed that whole night without ſleeping, roſe very early; and looking out of the window, ſaw his daughter ſtaggering under her burthen, and as ſoon as ſhe had ſet it down, make all the haſte ſhe could back again. He was moved with admiration and grief; but however, reſolved to diſſemble. Mean while Eginhard, perſuaded that the affair could not long remain a ſecret, went and threw himſelf at the emperor's feet, to beg his permiſſion to retire, alleding that his long ſervices had not been rewarded. The emperor anſwered, that he would think of it, and appointed him a certain day, on which he would acquaint him with his determination. The day being come, he ſummoned his council together, gave them a particular account of what he had ſeen, and aſked their advice, how he ſhould act in an affair which was ſuch a diſgrace to his family. Several of them voted for a ſevere puniſhment, while others, having duly weighed the affair, beſought the emperor to determine it himſelf, according to his divine wiſdom. When he obſerved, that if he puniſhed Eginhart, he ſhould rather enereaſe than leſſen the diſhonour of his family, and deſiring that he might be called in, told him that the complaints he had made of not being paid for his long ſervices, ſhould be anſwered by his having his daughter in marriage, who had carried him ſo kindly on her ſhoulders. He then ſent immediately for the princeſs, and gave her a portion ſuitable to the daughter of ſo great a prince. There are however ſome writers who ſuſpect this account to be fabulous; but it is recorded in the Chronicon Lauriſhamenſe, publiſhed by Freker, among the Rei Germanicæ Scriptores. In the year 814 Charlemagne died; when Eginhart and Imma parted, by mutual conſent, though they ſtill retained a very tender affection for each other. He became ſucceſſively governor of ſeveral abbies. She died in the year 836, and Eginhart was deeply afflicted at her loſs. He having acquired great reputation for his piety and learning, died about the year 844. His principal works are, 1. The Life of Charlemagne. 2. The Annals of France. 3 Letters, &c. His ſtyle is pure; and more florid than that of the other writers of his time.

EGNATIUS (JOHN BAPTIST) one of the moſt learned men of the ſixteenth century, taught the Belles Lettres with great reputation at Venice, his native country, and wrote in Latin, 1. A ſhort Account of the Lives of the Emperors from Julius Cæſar. 2. The Origin of the Turks. 3. Obſervations upon Ovid. 4. Explications of Tully's familiar Epiſtles; and ſeveral other works. He died on the 4th of July, 1553.

EGRA, a ſtrong town of Bohemia, formerly imperial, but now ſubject to the houſe of Auſtria. It contains a great number of able artificers, and is famous for its mineral waters. Wallenſtein, the emperor's general, was aſſaſſinated here, in 1634. The French became maſters of this town in 1741, but afterwards being blocked up, they were forced to capitulate on September 7, 1743. It is looked upon as a town of the greateſt conſequence in Bohemia, except Prague. It is ſeated on a river of the ſame name, ninety-five miles weſt of Prague, thirty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Culembach, and two hundred and five north-weſt of Vienna. Long. 12. 30. E. Lat. 50. 21. N.

EGREMONT, a town in Cumberland, with a market on Saturdays, and one fair on September 19, for horſes and horned cattle. It is ſeated not far from the ſea, on the banks of a river, over which it hath two bridges, and had formerly the privilege of ſending members to parliament, which now is loſt. It is fourteen miles ſouth-weſt-by-ſouth of Cockermouth, and thirty-nine on the ſame point from Carliſle; and two hundred and ninety-ſeven north-weſt of London. Long. 3. 15. W. Lat. 54. 30. N.

EGYPT, a country the moſt famous in prophane hiſtory of any part of the globe, eſpecially in the earlieſt ages of the world. Arts and ſciences flouriſhed here, while the reſt of the earth lay buried in the darkneſs of ignorance; and from hence Greece derived her learning which rendered her afterwards ſo famous. This was the country from from whence they drew their laws, their religion, and a great part of their cuſtoms. Few are ignorant that conquerors have come out of Egypt who have vanquiſhed great part of the world. It has furniſhed fabulous hiſtory with a Hercules, and the ſacred ſtory with kings, who have been formidable for their proweſs and exploits. It is likewiſe known, that it has itſelf been conquered by the different princes of Aſia; that its inhabitants have been led into captivity, and its cities abandoned, inſomuch, that an Arabian author has affirmed, that the fruitful river Nile run acroſs Egypt forty years, and not one ſingle man the better for it.

It was into Egypt that Joſeph, one of the ſons of Jacob, was ſold by his brethren for a ſlave, and afterwards became ſo powerful and famous, than even the Mahomedans themſelves have him in veneration to this very day. Hither Jacob retired with his family to follow the fortune of his beloved ſon, where his poſterity increaſed ſo prodigiouſly, even after they were made ſlaves, and kept in ſuch hard bondage, that they made their eſcape by a miracle, and in proceſs of time, were conducted to take poſſeſſion of Canaan, a land flowing with milk and honey. It is known to every one that Moſes was their leader, of whom ſuch wonderful things are related in the ſacred writings.

Egypt is bounded on the eaſt by the Red-Sea, and the iſthmus of Suez; on the north by the Mediterranean; on the weſt by Barbary, and the deſart of Barca, and on the ſouth by Nubia, and the kingdom of Sennar.

The Nile, after having traverſed Abyſſinia and Nubia, enters Egypt to the ſouth, a little above the great cataract, and under the tropic of Cancer; thence it runs directly north for about ſix hundred and twenty-ſix miles, till it falls into the Mediterranean ſea, in which it depoſits its water and its mud. When the Nile enters Egypt it has two chains of mountains on each ſide, without ever deſerting it. That to the weſt keeps it company till it falls into the ſea at Roſetta, which is thirty-eight miles diſtant from Alexandria. The other chain on the eaſt, which is three days journey from the Red-Sea, attends the Nile as far as Cairo, where opening, the river divides and forms the famous Delta. This being the only river in the country, the inhabitants were obliged to build towns on riſing grounds, either natural or artificial, near the banks of the Nile; ſo that upon the overflowing of the river, theſe reſemble iſlands, which, at ſuch times, have no communication but by means of boats. Hence Egypt chiefly extends in length, it being only between a hundred and two hundred miles in breadth from eaſt to weſt, and in ſome places not near ſo much.

It ſeldom rains in Egypt, and never when the wind blows from the eaſt, on account of the high mountains, which will not permit the clouds to paſs over them. No rain can come from the ſouth-weſt, becauſe this wind paſſes over the thirſty plains of Libya, and conſequently brings nothing but ſhowers of ſand. The ſame from the eaſt. Near the ſea it ſometimes rains with a ſouth-weſt, weſt, or north wind, but it ſeldom reaches Cairo, much leſs Upper Egypt. Beſides, it ſeldom or never rains but at ſun-ſetting, for then the wind is commonly down. All the rain that falls in a whole year, never equals a ſhower of two hours duration in Europe. When it comes, which ſometimes will not happen in three or four years, at Cairo, it is accounted a great bleſſing, and the very children will run about the ſtreets in it with exultations of joy.

The Arabian authors ſay, a man needs nothing but a ſhirt in the coldeſt ſeaſon of the year, which is in ſome ſenſe true, true, for moſt of the Egyptian mechanics have nothing to wear, winter or ſummer, but a pair of linen drawers. However, people of rank have ſuch conveniences in building their houſes, that when they are at home, they may be as cool as they pleaſe at any time of the year. It is worth obſerving, that thunder is as rare as rain, though the weather be ever ſo hot; and that earthquakes are not very frequent, though it is probable, when they do happen, they muſt run from one end of Egypt to the other; for the whole country, properly ſpeaking, is nothing but a great ſolid rock, in which nature has wrought a canal for the paſſage of the Nile. Thoſe that dig but a little way in the earth, or turn up the ſand, always find a hard rock, except in the Delta, which was probably formed of the mud of the Nile.

It is ſomewhat ſurpriſing, that the ſeaſons ſhould be in ſo ſmall a ſpace, more forward in the moſt diſtant part of Upper Egypt by two months, than the Delta; ſo that when the harveſt is quite ripe above Eſſenic, it is ſtill green at Roſetta. Likewiſe near the cataracts the inhabitants are half black, whereas in Lower Egypt, they are only tawney. It is no wonder that ſo agreeable a country ſhould have a multitude of inhabitants. It is obſerved, that they formerly have reckoned eighteen thouſand cities; but Euſebius makes them twenty thouſand in the reign of Amaſis. Their decreaſe has been owing to the devaſtations of the wars, and yet the magnificent ruins of columns, temples, walls, and palaces, are a ſtanding proof of what there has been in times paſt. But how great has been the alteration! There is now ſcarce a town in Egypt incloſed with walls. Cairo has none, and the new town of Alexandria, Roſetta, Damietta, and Mantubo, the moſt celebrated places of Egypt, which contain a multitude of inhabitants, are nothing but open places. From Roſetta to Cairo, and from Cairo to Damietta, the villages are almoſt together along the banks of the Nile. Many of theſe are adorned with public buildings, and contain between two and three thouſand ſouls each. And, according to the common opinion, there is at leaſt twenty thouſand large villages in Egypt.

The ancient inhabitants of the country were the native Egyptians, which are now called Coptes, which is only a corruption of Egbypt, as it was pronounced by the Greeks. The Perſians, the Greeks, the Romans, and the Arabians, have been ſucceſſively introduced in their turns. The inhabitants at preſent conſiſt of Coptes, Moors, Arabs, Turks, Greeks, Jews, Armenians, Syrians, Maronites, and Franks; whence it may be readily comprehended how different the Egyptians of the preſent time are from the ancient people who performed ſo many wonders. The Coptic language is now entirely loſt among them.

Beſides the people who live in towns and villages, there is another ſort who inhabit the fields on the borders of the Deſerts, particularly thoſe near the Nile. They dwell in tents, and change their places of abode as often as they find it convenient; that is, when they are obliged to ſeek for freſh paſture. Theſe are called Bedwins, of whom there are two millions in all Egypt. In November, December, and January, when graſs is plenty, they flock from all parts, to the diſtance of a thouſand miles beyond the Deſerts; add to this, that Egypt is a place of refuge for all ſorts of people, and of all conditions, who are daily flocking thither from the neighbouring countries.

This famous country towards the weſt, is defended by the deſert plains of Libya; the paſſage over which is not only very difficult, but very dangerous, as well from the want of water and proviſions, as the wild beaſts that are to be met with.

Egypt, as divided by the Nile, conſiſts of two parts, the Oriental, and Occidental. The Oriental part is comprehended between and the mountains of the Red-Sea, or Arabic gulph; and the Occidental between the ſame river and the Libyan mountains. According to this diviſion, the land to the north, comprehended between the two arms of the Nile, will make a third part. Others divide Egypt into the Upper and Lower: and the Upper will contain all the land on both ſides the Nile, from the rocks of Nubia, as far as Cairo. The Lower begins at Cairo, and comprehends all the Delta.

The pyramids of Egypt have in all ages been accounted one of the wonders of the world; but when they were built, or on what account, authors differ ſo much, that nothing certain can be concluded. They are certainly of very great antiquity, and perhaps the moſt ancient ſtructures on the globe. However, moſt are of opinion they were deſigned for the ſepulchres of ſome of their ancient kings. There are ſeveral of thoſe pyramids in the Deſerts, but thoſe taken moſt notice of by travellers are only three, two of theſe are pretty equal in magnitude, but the third is much leſs; however, the meaſures and obſervations are confined to one only, it being ſuppoſed to be the largeſt, and has a ſmall cavity on the inſide. They ſtand about nine miles ſouth-weſt from Cairo, on the ſide of the Deſert, upon a ſolid rock, to which there is a very gradual and eaſy aſſent. This ſituation makes them ſeem higher than they really are. For if, as Mr. Graves affirms, the great pyramid is made up of four equilateral triangles, each ſide of which is ſix hundred and ninety-three feet, then the perpendicular height will be only four hundred and ninety feet, not four hundred and ninety nine, as in the printed account; then likewiſe each ſide of the pyramid at the baſe or bottom is ſix hundred and ninety-three feet. This no doubt is very accurate, but whether the height is ſo or not may be queſtioned, becauſe we are not informed how it was meaſured, eſpecially as Pere Elzear determined the height to five hundred and twenty Paris feet, which are equal to five hundred and ſixty-five Engliſh, and this was taken as Thevenot informs us, both mathematically and mechanically. The whole area the pyramid ſtands upon takes up four hundred and eighty thouſand, two hundred and forty-nine feet, or eleven acres of ground.

The aſcent to the top of the pyramid on the outſide is by the ſteps, the lowermoſt of which is four feet in height, and three in bread, ſo that when the ſtones were intire, a man might walk all round on the pyramid on the firſt ſtep. Theſe riſe one above another in the ſame manner to the very top. This is not a point as it ſeems to be below, but an area, each ſide of which is thirteen feet and about a quarter: It is made of nine ſtones, beſides two which are wanting at the angles.

On the north ſide, aſcending thirty feet along an artificial bank of earth, there is a ſquare and narrow paſſage leading into the pyramid, through the mouth of which they enter with tapers in their hands, and then deſcend as it were down a ſteep hill. The breadth of the entrance is near three feet and a half, and the deſcent is ninety-two feet and a half, but ſo low towards the bottom, that people are forced to creep along on their bellies. The walls are all ſmooth and even, and the joints exceeding cloſe. From thence, on the left hand, they climb up a ſteep and maſſy ſtone, eight or nine feet high, and then enter the lower end of the firſt gallery, whoſe pavement is of poliſhed marble of a whitiſh colour. The ſides and roof are of rough ſtone, and the breadth and height about five feet. This gallery is an hundred and ten feet in length. At the end of this begins the ſecond gallery, which is a curious and very ſtately piece of work: It is divided from the former by a wall, through which there is a ſquare hole of the ſize of that at the entrance. On the right hand of this there is a circular wall of three feet diameter, lined with white marble, and ſquare holes on each ſide for the fixing of the feet and hands, ſo as to deſcend with eaſe. It is now but twenty feet deep, it being filled up with rubbiſh. From hence going ſtrait forward fifteen feet there is another ſquare paſſage, opening againſt the former, and of the ſame bigneſs. The ſtones are very maſſy, and exquiſitely joined, and ſeem to be of ſpeckled marble. From hence going a hundred and ten feet upon a level, you come an arched vault, or little chamber, which ſtands eaſt and weſt, and is not quite twenty feet long, ſeventeen broad, and fifteen high. The walls are plaiſtered, and the roof is covered with large ſmooth ſtones, which make a kind of an arch. Returning back from hence the ſame way, on getting through the ſquare narrow paſſage, and going ſtrait on in the ſame line as the ſecond gallery, and aſcending a pavement of about one hundred and fifty-four feet, it brings you to another gallery made on all ſides with white poliſhed marble, with ſuch cloſe joints, that they are ſcarce diſcernible with the naked eye. On each ſide there are benches of poliſhed ſtone, near two feet broad, and as much high, between which the paſſage is almoſt three feet and a half. The whole breadth is about ſeven feet, and the height twenty-ſix. Through another ſquare hole of the ſame dimenſions with the former, you come into a cloſet, lined with ſpeckled Thebaic marble, and then to another ten feet high, ſeven feet long, and three and a half wide. It is ſeparated from the former by a ſpeckled marble ſlab, placed in two mortices, and reaching within two feet of the cieling. Through another ſquare paſſage of the ſame ſize as the former, and nine feet long, all of Thebaic marble, exquiſitely cut, you come to a rich and ſpacious room in the center of the pyramid. The floor, the ſides, and the roof, are all made of vaſt tables of Thebaic marble: it is thirty-four feet and one-third in length, ſeventeen and one fifth in breadth, and nineteen and a half in height. The roof is covered with nine ſtones, which lie quite acroſs, like ſo many beams, and conſequently muſt be of a ſtupendous length. In this is a hollow piece of marble, ſuppoſed to be deſigned for a tomb; it is made of the ſame ſort of marble as the reſt of the room, which has black, red, and white ſpots, and is uſually called Porphyry. It has no ſculpture, engraving, relief, or emboſſment.

The

The ſecond pyramid is equal in dimenſions to the former, and by the ſides of it has rooms or houſes cut out of the ſolid rock, ſuppoſed to be for the habitation of the prieſts. The third pyramid is leſs than either of the former, and there are eighteen or twenty more ſcattered up and down in the Deſert; one of theſe which is ſaid to be as large as the pyramid firſt mentioned, may be aſcended in the ſame manner, and has an entrance on the north ſide. Near the firſt pyramid is a phynix cut out of the ſolid rock, on which it ſtands, and from which it has never been ſeparated. It is twenty-ſix feet high, and from the earth to the chin is fifteen feet, and yet all the features are in proportion. It is all of one entire ſtone. There are ſeveral fables told concerning it, that are not worth repeating.

The ruins of Memphis, the city ſo much celebrated of old, are ſome miles ſouth of the pyramids, and at the entrance of the plain of Mummies; this plain is thirty-ſix miles in circumference, and is a flat rock covered with ſand. In caverns cut into this rock were depoſited the embalmed bodies of the Egyptians which we now call Mummies. Thoſe that travel into Egypt for curioſity generally cauſe one of theſe caverns to be opened to view their poſition, and the cere-cloths in which they are wrapped. Many of theſe have been brought away and ſold to the curious in all parts of Europe. They are generally found in coffins of ſtone or ſycamore-wood, which is not ſubject to decay, and which are adorned with hieroglyphics. Near Memphis was the lake Meris, which was like a little ſea, and on which one hundred thouſand boats were ſaid to be continually rowing. What remains of it is now called Birka Caron, or the Lake of Charon. It was ſupplied with water by a canal from the Nile, the cutting of which is aſcribed to Joſeph, as were all other great works. On the weſt ſide of this canal, and to the ſouth of the lake, ſtands the palace of Charon, formerly called the Labyrinth, of which there are magnificent ruins yet remaining. It was built of marble, and was remarkable for its prodigious number of windings and turnings.

In Upper Egypt we find the ruins of Thebes or Dioſpolis, where there are now two coloſſuſes ſtanding upon two rocks. Cana, or Kona, or Coptain, was formerly called Coptos, but is now inhabited by the better ſort of Arabs. Naſia, or Aſna, or Aſena, is a fortreſs built upon a hill. Eſſena, or Aſſuana, is near the cataracts of the Nile; Swaken near the Red-Sea; Coſſira, a harbour on the Red-Sea, and ſome others. In this part of Egypt there are many ruins of magnificent temples, and other famous ſtructures, which are a plain proof of the grandeur of the inhabitants of this country in former ages. The greateſt calamity which befalls this country is the plague, but its damages are ſoon repaired by the fruitfulneſs of the women. It produces ſo much corn, that it was formerly called the granary of Rome, as it is now of the Turkiſh empire. It likewiſe abounds in rice, barley, cotton, pulſe, linen, fowls, ſheep, horned cattle, buffaloes, camels, aſſes, horſes, and other animals; the trees are always loaded with fruit, and there are wine, ſugar, citrons, oranges, melons, nuts, coffee, flax, and acacia, the thorny tree, which produces gum-arabic, grows near Suez. The animals of Egypt are lions, tygers, leopards, panthers, elephants, rhinoceroſſes, camels, dromedaries, monkies, and oſtriches. But the moſt particular to it are theſe following; the hippopotamus, or ſea-horſe. This is an amphibous animal, which lives both in the water and on the land, and is of a monſtrous ſize: behind he is like a buffalo, and before, like a horſe, eſpecially the head. He has very ſtrong teeth, beſides tuſhes, which are very large, and much better than ivory, for they never grow yellow; they are of the ſize of a bullock's horn. He weighs fifteen or ſixteen hundred weight, is covered with a mouſe-coloured fleck hair; has large lips, but no horns, and a wide mouth; it has broad ears, great eyes, a thick neck, and weak fetlocks; the hoofs are cloven in the middle, and the tail is tapering like a hog's. The crocodile is likewiſe an amphibious animal, and lives equally in the water or on land. It grows to a prodigious length, for ſome have been ſeen thirty feet long. It is of the ſhape of a lizard, and will continue forty days without eating. The female lays eggs as large as a nine-pin bowl; when they come to thirty or forty, ſhe covers them in the ſand, and they are hatched by the heat of the ſun. In due time ſhe breaks the ſhells to let out the young ones. The crocodile has a very large mouth, and ſuch prodigious ſharp teeth, that he will divide a man in two at one bite. He has no tongue, and ſwallows his prey whole. There is a ſkin which covers his eye when he is in the water, which retires to one corner when he is out of it. Thoſe who hunt crocodiles take a dead ſheep for a bait, faſtened to a great iron hook.

The cameleon is a kind of lizard which lives upon flies, and aſſumes the colour of the place he lies in. It is a poor, lean, hideous animal to look at, but very innocent. The Egyptian rat, called the ichneumon, is ſomewhat of the ſhape of a pig, and is very eaſily tamed. The briſtles on the body ſtand up like the quills of a porcupine. He is an enemy to the other rats and mice, and eſpecially to the crocodile, for he not only devours their eggs, but kills the young ones; but what is ſaid of their going down the crocodile's throat and devouring their entrails, ſeems to be fabulous. The civet-cat is not much unlike other cats but is three times as large. He ſmells very ſtrong of perfume. The male yields the beſt civet.

The manners of the Egyptians of the preſent age are not much different from what they were formerly, for they are very fond of pleaſure, and at the ſame time great poltrons, inſomuch, that thoſe who are born in Egypt have neither virtue, valour, nor wit. They are ſeldom without feſtivals, muſic, ſinging, dancing, and illuminations, not only in the cities, but in the villages themſelves. However they are not very luxurious in their eating, for no ſort of fleſh comes amiſs, except that of hogs, which all religions here have in abomination; and they all, two months in the year, that is in April and May, live on nothing but fiſh, either freſh or ſalted, and they moſt commonly uſe rice inſtead of bread. Their drinks are coffee, ſherbet, orange flower-water, and cinnamon-water, beſides a liquor called bouza, which is as intoxicating as wine. It is made with barley-meal, ſoaked in water, and mixed with ſome heady drug.

The Egyptians in general are very neat and clean, and make great uſe of baths. Neither men nor women have any ſtockings or ſhoes, but they have a ſort of ſlippers, which they put off when they ſit down. The women's dreſs, even in the ſtreets, is ſeldom any thing but a pair of linen drawers and a ſhift; but then they are very fine, and very coſtly, and their head-dreſs is ſet off with jewels; and yet they never ſhew their faces in the ſtreets. The Turks have no regard for the women of the country, but have them brought from Georgia, Circaſſia, and Mingrelia. Many are fond of the Abyſſinians, who, though they have a very dark complexion, have very regular features.

Egypt has been under the domination of the Turks ever ſince the year 1517, at which time the ancient ſultans were dethroned. The chief governor is a Turkiſh baſha, who hath a divan, and whoſe time of ſtaying here ſhould be but for one year, yet ſometimes he continues three. This government is always obtained by the help of money, for it commonly coſts the baſha 500,000 crowns before he arrives at Cairo, and every year he ſtays it lies him in as much; he is alſo obliged to pay 600,000 crowns a-year to the grand ſignior, and as much for proviſions for the ſeraglio; beſides, he muſt be at the expence of the pavillion which is ſent by the emperor every year to Mecca, and pay many other great ſums. To make amends for this, he enjoys all the revenue of the grand ſignior in Egypt, which, if well taken care of, would amount to 1,200,000 crowns yearly; and in the time of the plague, he may poſſeſs great ſums, as heir to the perſons deceaſed in right of the emperor. The whole kingdom is divided into thirty-nine kaſhiflicks, which have each a particular governor, but their exact extent is not known. There is not above 12,000 men in garriſon at Cairo, and 3000 at Swaken, on the Red-Sea, near the frontiers of Abyſſinia; and there are no forts but at Alexandria and Roſetta.

The trade of Egypt was much more flouriſhing formerly than it is at preſent, and yet it is ſo conſiderable now, that moſt nations in Europe have a conſul at Cairo. The commodities dealt in here are corn, ſugar, coffee, ſpices, cotton, flax, fine linen, Indian ſtuffs, ſilks, carpets, ſkins, leather, rough diamonds, emeralds, pearls, coral, ſalt-petre, gum-arabic, melons, citrons, caſſia, muſk, ſenna, and ſeveral other drugs uſed in medicine, a prodigious quantity of dates, ſea-horſes teeth, oſtrich feathers, and mummies.

EICK, (Hubert Van) a famous painter, born at Maſeik, in the dioceſe of Liege, had for his diſciple his brother John Eick, more known by the name of John of Bruges, and performed ſeveral pictures for Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, who gave him public marks of his eſteem. He died in 1426. See Bruges.

EICHFELD, a diſtrict in Germany, between Heſſe, Thuringia, and the duchy of Brunſwick. It belongs to the elector of Mentz.

EICHTERNACH, a town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, ſeated on the river Stour, in the duchy of Luxemburg, and ſurrounded with mountains. It has an abbey, a pariſh-church, an hoſpital, and a nunnery. It is ſeven miles north-weſt of Treves. Long 6. 30 E. Lat. 49. 55. N.

EIFFEL, a ſmall diſtrict of Germany, between the duchy of Juliers, the electorate of Treves, the duchy of Luxemburg, and the electorate of Cologne.

EIMBECK, a town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, capital of the principality of Grubenhagen, formerly merly imperial, but now ſubject to the elector of Hanover, who receives a good revenue from the iron and ſilver mines. Its principal commodity is excellent beer. It is ſeated near the river Ilme, thirteeen miles north of Gottingen, and twenty-five ſouth-weſt of Hildeſheim. Long. 9. 54. E. Lat. 51. 46. N.

EINDHOVEN, a town of the Netherlands, in Dutch Brabrant, fifteen miles ſouth of Bois-le-duc. Long 5. 30. E. Lat. 51. 26. N.

EISENACH, a handſome town of Germany, is the capital of a ſmall territory of the ſame name, and has a celebrated college. It belongs to, and is the place of reſidence of the prince of Saxe-Eiſenach. It is ſeated on the river Neſs, twenty miles north-weſt of Smalkalde, and thirty-eight ſouth-weſt of Erford. Long. 10. 18. E. Lat. 50. 51. N.

EISLEBEN, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, in the county of Mansfeld, famous for the birth of Martin Luther. It is thirteen miles eaſt of Mansfeld, and thirteen weſt of Hall. Long. 11. 56. E. Lat. 51. 39 N.

EITDEVET, an ancient town of Afric, in the kingdom of Morocco, in the province of Hea, ſeated on the top of a high mountain, ſurrounded with craggy rocks, and two rivers. It hath a celebrated ſchool.

EKELENFORD, a town of Denmark, in the duchy of Sleſwick, with a harbour on the Baltic ſea. It is thirteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Sleſwick, thirteen north-weſt of Kiell, and thirty-five north-weſt of Lubeck. Long 10. 20. E. Lat 54. 40. N.

ELAPHEBOLIA, Ελαφηβολια, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival in honour of Diana, ſurnamed Elaphebolos, or the huntreſs, on which occaſion a cake was offered to her in the form of a deer.

The origin of this feſtival was as follows; The Phocenſians being reduced to the laſt extremity by the Theſſalians, to whom they diſdained to ſubmit, Daïphantus propoſed that a vaſt pile of combuſtible matter ſhould be erected, upon which they ſhould place their wives, children, and their whole ſubſtance, and in caſe they were defeated, ſet all on fire together, that nothing might fall into the enemies hands. The women being ſummoned to the public aſſembly, the propoſal was no ſooner made to them, than they unanimouſly conſented, applauding Daïphantus, and decreeing him a crown, as a reward for a propoſal that would ſave them all from infamy; the boys alſo are ſaid to have met, and conſented to it. Things being in this ſituation, they went to meet their enemies, whom they engaged with ſuch fury and reſolution, that thoſe by whom they had been reduced to extreme deſpair were entirely defeated. In memory of which victory, this feſtival was inſtituted, and obſerved with more ſolemnity than any other in that country. Potter's Antiq.

ELBA, an iſland of Italy, on the coaſt of Tuſcany, over againſt Piombino, ſubject to the prince of Piombino, under the protection of the king of Naples, to whom Porto-Longow therein belongs, and the grand duke of Tuſcany has Fort de Porto Ferraro. This iſland is remarkable for its mines of iron and loadſtone, and for a quarry of marble. Long. 11. 18. E. Lat. 42. 26. N.

ELBASSANO, a city of Turky, in Europe, in the province of Albania, forty-two miles ſouth-eaſt of Durazzo. Long. 21. 15. E. Lat 41. 20. N.

ELBE, a river which riſes on the confines of Sileſia, and running ſouth to Koningſgratz, in Bohemia, afterwards runs north-weſt till it receives the Muldaw, at Malnick, below Prague, and continuing its courſe north, paſſes through the duchies of Saxony, viſiting Dreſden, Meiſſon, Wittenburg, and afterward Magdeburgh; then running north-weſt through Brandenburg, receives the river Havel, after which it divides the duchy of Lunenburg from Mecklenburg, then running between the duchies of Bremen and Holſtein, viſits Hamburgh; and paſſing on ſtill north-weſt by the fortreſs of Gluckſtadt, falls into the German ocean a little below it. It is navigable for great ſhips higher than moſt rivers in Europe, for ſhips of three or four hundred tuns may go up as high as Hamburgh, which is ſeventy miles from the ſea; and by this river is imported and exported to and from Germany, an incredible quantity of merchandize of almoſt every kind.

ELBEUF, a town of France, in Normandy, with the title of a duchy. It has a celebrated manufacture in cloth, eſtabliſhed in 1667. It is ſeated on the Seine, ten miles from Rouen, five from Pont-de-Arche, twenty from Conche, and ſixty-five north-weſt from Paris. Long. 1. 20. E. Lat. 49. 20. N.

ELBING, a handſome, rich, fortified, trading town of Poland, in Royal Pruſſia, capital of the ſmall diſtrict of Hockerland, in the Palatinate of Marienburg, with a univerſity. It has been ſucceſſively in poſſeſſion of the Saxons, Poles, Swedes, Pruſſians, and Ruſſians. It is ſubject to Poland, and there is a Poliſh garriſon in the town. It is ſeated near the Baltic ſea, in a fertile ſoil, thirty miles ſouth-eaſt of Dantzick, and ninety north-by-weſt of Warſaw. Long. 19. 15. E. Lat. 54. 21. N.

ELBURG, a town of the United Provinces, in the duchy of Guelderland, on the Zuider-Zee. It is ten miles weſt of Harlem. Long. 5. 38. E. Lat. 52 28. N.

ELCATIF, or more properly KATIF, a town of Aſia, in Arabia the Happy, ſeated on the weſtern coaſt of the Perſian gulph. In the adjacent places the inhabitants fiſh for pearls. It is ſeated north-eaſt of Ahſa, at the diſtance of fifty miles. It has walls, a ditch, and four gates. At high tide the ſea riſes to the very foot of the walls. It has a channel or ſmall bay, by which the largeſt laden ſhips may come up to the town with the tide. It is one hundred and fifty miles ſouth-by eaſt of Kadema, two hundred and forty ſouth of Baſra, and three hundred and eighty weſt-by-north of Oman. Long. 53. 5. E. Lat. 20. 0. N.

ELCHE, a town of Spain, in the kingdom of Valencia. It is ſeated in a country fruitful in grapes and dates, and abounding in cattle, in the midſt of a foreſt of olive and palm-trees of a prodigious height. The town is pretty well built; but though it is ſix miles from the ſea, the water is brackiſh. The out-parts of the town are very agreeable, and there are plenty of gardens and orchards full of excellent fruit. It is ſeated on the river Segre, ten miles from Alicant, and ſeven from Orihuela. Long. 0. 10. W. Lat. 38. 10. N.

ELEANOR OF GUIENNE, queen of France, and afterwards of England, was the daughter of William X. duke of Guienne, and born about the year 1122. Nature ſeemed to have beſtowed upon her all her favours. To an elevated rank, and the richeſt dowry, ſhe had all the charms of the moſt lovely and accompliſhed perſon. Her father dying when ſhe was ſcarce 16 years of age, deſtined her to be the wife of Lewis VII. ſtyled the Younger, who ſoon after being induced by St Bernard to march to the aſſiſtance of the Chriſtians in the Holy Land, ſet out in 1147, with his wife Eleanor, and forty thouſand men.

In this fatal expedition he formed the reſolution of repudiating Eleanor, who, while they were in Aſia, gave him ſome cauſe for jealouſy, and of reſtoring to her the two fine provinces of Guienne and Aquitaine ſhe had brought him in marriage, and ſhe was accordingly divorced three months after, on the 18th of March 1152. On the 18th of May in the ſame year, ſhe married Henry duke of Normandy, who, by this marriage, obtained a great part of France, particularly Guienne, Perigord, Angoumois, Poitou, Saintonge, Auvergne, Limoſin, and pretenſions to the county of Toulouſe, which he alſo obtained. He was before in poſſeſſion of Anjou, Normandy, Touraine, and Maine. Eleanor afterwards diſtinguiſhed herſelf in England, where Henry II. was crowned in 1154, and diſtinguiſhed herſelf by her political intrigues. She long ſurvived that great prince, and died in the convent of Fontevrault, on the 31ſt of March, 1204, in the eighty-firſt year of her age. See HENRY II. king of England.

ELEANOR OF AUSTRIA, queen of France and Portugal, was the eldeſt daughter of Philip archduke of Auſtria, and was born at Louvain, on the 24th of November, 1498. In 1519 ſhe married Emanuel king of Portugal, and having continued his widow two years, was promiſed by his brother, the emperor Charles V. to Charles of Bourbon, conſtable of France, as a reward for his deſerting his prince; but after the battle of Pavia, Charles V. who of all princes paid the leaſt regard to his promiſes, gave his ſiſter to Francis I. king of France, as the pledge and ſeal of the peace between the empire and France. The marriage was celebrated at Bourdeaux, on the 4th of July, 1530, and the queen crowned at St. Denys on the 5th of March, 1531. Her natural goodneſs, and the effect expected from this alliance, rendered her extremely dear to Francis. Reading, and the exerciſes of piety were her employments, hunting and fiſhing her amuſements. After the death of that prince, with whom ſhe lived between ſixteen and ſeventeen years, ſhe retired into the Netherlands, from whence ſhe followed the emperor her brother to Spain, and died at Valladolid in March 1558.

ELEAZAR, the name of ſeveral Jews; the moſt celebrated of which are, 1. ELEAZAR the high-prieſt, the ſon of Aaron, and the father of Phineas. 2. ELEAZAR, one of David's moſt valiant captains, who made a great ſlaughter of the Philiſtines, in the 1047th year before the Chriſtian æra; 3. The high-prieſt ELEAZAR, the brother of Simon the Juſt, who ſent learned Jews to Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, to tranſlate the Old Teſtament from Hebrew into Greek, about the 277th year before the birth of Chriſt; this is now called the Septuagint; 4. The venerable ELEAZAR, who, under the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, choſe rather to loſe his life, than to eat meat forbidden by the law of Moſes; 5. ELEAZAR, the youngeſt ſon of Matathias, who, in a battle fought by his brother againſt Antiochus Eupator's army, diſtinguiſhed himſelf againſt the enemy, and ſlipping under the belly of a large elephant, killed him with his ſword, but was preſſed to death by the weight of that animal.

forbidden

ELECTORS, are the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſons of the German empire, who have the power of electing the emperor. The origin of this auguſt aſſembly is unknown, and therefore we may conclude it was perfected by little and little. However, ſome pretend this college was founded in the year 998, in the time of the emperor Otho or Otton III. when he aſſumed the imperial dignity of Germany. At the time of making the golden bull there were ſeven electors, whence they were called the Septemviri. But within about an hundred years ago, the houſes of Bavaria and Hanover have obtained that dignity, the former in 1623, and the latter in 1692, inſomuch, that the number of electors now is nine, of which three are eccleſiaſtics, and ſix ſeculars; theſe are, 1. Mentz, 2 Treves, 3. Cologne, 4. Bohemia, 5. Bavaria, 6. Saxony, 7. Brandenburg, 8. the Palatinate, and, 9. Brunſwick-Lunenburg. Whenever there is an aſſembly of the electors, that of Mentz preſides, and takes the voices.

ELECTRA, the daughter of Agamemnon, perſuaded her brother Oreſtes to revenge his father's death upon Ægyſthus his murderer.

ELENIA, Ελένια, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival inſtituted by the Laconians in honour of Helena, which was celebrated by virgins riding upon mules, or in chariots compoſed of reeds or bull-ruſhes.

ELEPHANTA, a ſmall iſland about nine miles from Bombay, ſo called from the ſtatue of an elephant cut in ſtone, of the natural magnitude. There is likewiſe a horſe carved in ſtone, which is ſo well done, that many at a diſtance have taken it for a living animal. But the moſt remarkable thing in this iſland is the famous pagod, hewn out of the rock in the midſt of an high mountain; it is one hundred and twenty feet ſquare, and about eighteen high, beſides ſeveral out-rooms which belong to it. The roof is ſupported by ſixteen pillars of ſtone, at ſixteen feet diſtance from each other, done in a curious manner, the diameters of which are three feet and a half. There are likewiſe arches made with ſurpriſing ſkill and exactneſs. Out of the ſides of the pagod are carved figures of men from twelve to fifteen feet high, to the number of forty or fifty, which are in exact proportion according to their height. Some of theſe have ſix arms, others three heads, and ſome of their fingers are as big as an ordinary man's leg. Some are adorned with crowns wrought in a moſt curious manner, while others near them hold ſceptres in their hands; above the heads of others are a multitude of little people in poſtures of devotion; ſome are leaning upon women, and others on the head of a cow; ſome are taking a moſt beautiful woman by the chin, and others cutting little children to pieces. Above the heads of all there is a diminutive ſet of people, which ſeems to be hovering in the air, and look very lively, with chearful aſpects. There is nothing extraordinary in the frontiſpiece, or at the entrance, and yet the whole pagod muſt require infinite labour and ſkill, which has cauſed the Indians themſelves to aſſert, that it is the work of the giants repreſented in it, none elſe in their opinion being able to perform ſuch a work.

ELEUSINIA, Ελευσίνια, a ſolemnity obſerved by ſome of the ſtates of Greece every fourth year, and by others, particularly the Athenians every fifth year, at Eleuſis in Attica, from whence it was tranſlated to Rome under the emperor Adrian. It was the moſt myſterious ſolemnity of any in Greece, and ſo ſuperſtitious were they of concealing its ſacred rights, that if any perſon divulged any part of them he was puniſhed with death; yet the neglect of it was looked upon as a crime of a very heinous nature. There were two ſolemnities of this name, called the Leſſer and the Greater Myſteries.

The Leſſer myſteries were performed near the river Iliſſus, and in latter times were uſed as a preparative to the Greater. They here offered ſacrifices and prayers, wearing crowns and garlands of flowers, and ſtanding upon the ſkin of a victim offered to Jupiter.

About a year after they were admitted to the Greater Myſteries, when they were initiated in the following manner: The candidates being crowned with myrtle, had admittance by night into a place called the Myſtical Temple, when having waſhed their hands in holy water, they were admoniſhed to preſent their minds pure and undefiled, after which the holy myſteries were read, and certain queſtions propoſed, as whether they were faſting, &c. This done, ſtrange and amazing objects preſented themſelves. The place they were in appeared bright and reſplendent with light, and then again covered with black darkneſs and horror, ſometimes thunder and lightning, ſometimes frightful noiſes and bellowings, ſometimes terrible apparitions aſtoniſhed the trembling ſpectators. The other ſolemnities laſted nine days, in one of which a ſolemn proceſſion was made, in which the holy baſket was carried in a conſecrated cart, crowds of people ſhouting as they went along, Hail to Ceres, after theſe followed women carrying baſkets, containing carded wool, ſalt, a ſerpent, pomgranates, cakes, poppies, &c. On the fifth night, the men and women ran about with torches in their hands, in memory of Ceres's journey in ſearch of her daughter. On the ſixth day, the ſtatue of Jacchus, who accompanied the goddeſs in her ſearch after Proſerpine, was carried to Eleuſis with a torch in its hand, accompanied by perſons with their heads crowned with myrtle, dancing and beating brazen kettles. The next day there were ſports, in which the victors were rewarded with a meaſure of barley, &c. Diodorus Siculus has obſerved, and even proved from their exact reſemblance, that theſe myſteries came from Lower Egypt, and were the ſame with thoſe of Iſis.

ELEUTHERIA, Ελευθέρια, an annive ſary ſolemnity obſerved by the Platæans, in honour of thoſe who had bravely loſt their lives in defence of the liberties of their country. On which occaſion a proceſſion was made, which began about break of day: It was led by a trumpeter ſounding a point of war, then followed certain chariots loaden with myrrh, garlands, and a black bull; after theſe came young men who were free-born, carrying libations of wine and milk, jars of oil, and precious ointments. Laſt of all came the magiſtrate, and though it was unlawful for him to wear garments of any colour but white, or to touch iron, he was then cloathed in a purple robe, and taking a water-pot of the city-chamber, proceeded with a ſword in his hand through the midſt of the city to the ſepulchres, when drawing water out of a neighbouring ſpring, he waſhed and anointed the monuments, then ſacrificing the bull upon a pile of wood, made ſupplication to infernal Jupiter and Mercury, and invited to the entertainment the ſouls of the valiant heroes who loſt their lives in defence of their country, and filling a bowl with wine, ſaid, "I "drink to thoſe who loſt their lives for the liberties of "Greece."

It was alſo the cuſtom for ſlaves to keep a holiday called by this name, when they obtained liberty.

Another feſtival called Eleutheria, was obſerved by the Samians in honour of the god of love. Potter's Antiq.

ELEUTHERUS, biſhop of Rome, ſucceeded Sotor in 177. In his time Chriſtianity greatly increaſed, eſpecially at Rome, where many of the Roman nobility, with their families, were baptized. He was biſhop upwards of fifteen years, and died on the 26th of May, 192.

ELFIELD, a town of Germany, capital of the county of Rhinegaw, in Lower Saxony, ſeated on the river Rhine, ſeven miles north-weſt of Mentz, and ſubject to the elector of Mentz. Long. 25. 11. E. Lat. 50. 6. N.

ELGIN, a town of Sotland, capital of the county of Murray, ſeated on the river Loſay, five miles ſouth of Murray-Frith, and thirty-ſeven eaſt of Inverneſs. Long. 2. 45 E. Lat. 57. 40. N.

ELHAM, or ELTHAM, a town in Kent, with a market on Mondays; the fairs are on Palm Monday, Eaſter-Monday, Whitſun-Monday, and October 10, for horſes, cattle, and pedlary-ware. It is nine miles ſouth of Canterbury, and ſixty-ſeven ſouth-weſt of London. Long. 1. 12. E. Lat. 51. 10. N.

ELHAMMA, a town of Africa, in Proper Tripoli, near a lake called the Lake of Lepers, becauſe its water is ſaid to cure the leproſy. Long. 10. 51. E. Lat. 34. 0. N.

ELIAS LEVITA, a learned rabbin of the ſixteenth century, and an able Jewiſh critic, was born in Germany. He taught Hebrew at Rome, and at Venice, and wrote, 1. A Treatiſe on the Maſſora; 2. A Dictionary of the Chaldee Language, and an Hebrew Gloſſary; 3. Several excellent Treatiſes on the Grammar of the Hebrews. Moſt of his works have been tranſlated into Latin.

ELIC, (LEWIS PHILIP) in Latin Elichius, lived in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century, and wrote a book in Latin on the Magic of the Devils, of their Power to do Evil, and of the Power of Sorcerers, and another on the Miſery of Man.

ELICHMAN, (JOHN) a native of Sileſia, lived in the year 1600, and practiſed phyſic at Leyden. He underſtood ſixteen languages, and was ſo well ſkilled in the Perſian, that in the judgment of Salmaſius, Europe has never produced any man who ever equalled him in that point, and perhaps never will. He wrote a diſſertation, De Termino Vitæ ſecundum Mentem Orientalium, and a Latin Tranſlation of the Tables of Cebes, with an Arabic Verſion.

ELIEZER, a famous rabbin, whom the Jews believed to be very ancient, and even place him as early as the time of our Saviour; but according to M. Morin, he lived in the ſeventh or eighth century. He wrote a famous book, intitled titled The Chapters, which Vorſtius has tranſlated into Latin, with notes.

ELIJAH, the Tiſhbite, a famous prophet under the reign of Ahab. He foretold that there would be no rain for three years; was miraculouſly fed by ravens; multiplied the meal and oil of the widow of Zarephath, and raiſed her ſon from the dead. He afterwards reproached Ahab for worſhipping Baal, and fire coming down from heaven in a miraculous manner to conſume the ſacrifice he offered to God, the people put four hundred and fifty of the prieſts of Baal to death, who were unable to work that miracle. Jezabel the queen reſolving to take away his life, he fled into the Deſert, where he was ſupplied with bread and water by an angel. In ſhort, he performed ſeveral other miracles, and was at length taken up into heaven in a chariot of fire, about the eight hundred and ninety-fifth year before the Chriſtian æra.

ELIPANDUS, archbiſhop of Toledo, in the eighth century, maintained with Felix d'Urgal, that Jeſus Chriſt was not the natural, but the adopted ſon of God. His opinion was condemned in ſeveral councils, and by pope Adrian in the time of Charlemagne. He died about the year 800.

ELISHA, a famous prophet, the ſon of Shaphat, quitted the plough about the nine hundred and ſeventh year before the birth of Chriſt, to follow the prophet Elijah, whom he afterwards conſtantly attended. He was preſent at that great prophet's aſcenſion into heaven, and inheriting his mantle, and a double portion of his prophetic ſpirit, paſſed through the river Jordan dry ſhod; and ſeveral young men, who are in the Scriptures called children, ridiculing his divine miſſion, were devoured by two bears; he multiplied a poor woman's oil; raiſed the Shunamite woman's ſon from the dead; multiplied the bread he diſtributed to the people; cured Naaman's leproſy; and after having performed many other miracles, died about the eight hundred and thirtieth year before the birth of Chriſt, at about an hundred years of age. Long after his death, a dead body being caſt into his tomb, was raiſed to life, on its touching his dry bones.

ELIZABETH (St.) the wife of Zacharia, and the mother of John the Baptiſt.

ELIZABETH (St.) the daughter of Andrew II. king of Hungary, was born in 1207, and in 1221 married Lewis, landgrave of Heſſe, by whom ſhe had three children. After the death of the prince her huſband, ſhe was deprived of the regency during the minority of her ſon, and was reduced to the neceſſity of begging her bread from door to door; however, ſhe was at length permitted to return to the palace, and treated according to her dignity: but preferring a ſtate of humility to the higheſt honours, ſhe employed herſelf in ſpinning, and ſerving the poor in the hoſpital of Maſpurg, which ſhe herſelf had founded. She died on the 19th of November, 1231, aged twenty-four, and was canonized by Gregory IX. four years after.

ELIZABETH OF AUSTRIA, queen of France, was the daughter of the emperor Maximillian II. and Mary of Auſtria, the daughter of the emperor Charles V. She was born in 1554, and in November, 1570, married Charles IX. king of France. She was one of the wiſeſt and moſt virtuous princeſſes France has ever had. In the midſt of a court extremely corrupt, barbarous, and filled with the moſt cruel bigotry, ſhe preſerved her virtue, ſimplicity, ſweetneſs, and charity. It is ſaid that at the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's day, not having heard a word of the dreadful ſlaughter intended, ſhe went to bed as uſual, and not awaking till the morning, was then told of that horrid affair; when ſhe ſuddenly cried out, "Alas! does the king my huſband know "it?" Yes, madam, ſaid they, it is he that has done it.—"O my God!" cried ſhe, "what counſellors are they "that gave him ſuch advice? My God, I entreat thee to "pardon him," and then calling for her prayer-book, offered up her prayers to God with her eyes filled with tears. Such, ſays a French author of the Romiſh church, were the ſentiments of a queen extremely zealous for the catholic religion, in thoſe days of horror, when the father piouſly cut the throat of his ſon; the ſon that of his father; when even the miniſters of the altar offered to the God of peace and mercy, their poniards ſtained with the blood of their brethren.

Elizabeth is not only placed in the number of the beſt queens of France; but held a diſtinguiſhed rank among the learned; as ſhe compoſed a pious work, and another on what paſſed in France in the reign of Charles IX. and her own. She died greatly regretted, and worthy to be ſo, on the 22d of January, 1592.

ELIZABETH, queen of Edward IV. king of England, was the daughter of ſir Richard Widville, by Jaqueline of Luxembourg, ducheſs of Bedford, and widow of ſir John Grey, of Groby, who was killed fighting for the houſe of Lancaſter. As her huſband's eſtate was forfeited to the crown, ſhe firſt appeared before the king as a ſuppliant, with all the attractions which beauty, heightened by diſtreſs, could give her, and ſoon found her way to his heart, and to the throne. See EDWARD IV.

ELIZABETH, the amiable queen of Henry the Seventh, was the eldeſt daughter of Edward the Fourth, and by her marriage to that prince, the two houſes of York and Lancaſter were united. She was a pattern of conjugal duty and obſequiouſneſs, but met with very cold returns from the king, whoſe malignity to the houſe of York, and jealouſy of its title to the crown, extended itſelf even to his queen. She bore him three children, prince Arthur, prince Henry, and the princeſs Margaret, and died on the 11th of February, 1503.

ELIZABETH, queen of England, and the daughter of Henry VIII. and Anna Boleyn; ſhe was born on the eighth of September, 1533, and when ſhe came to the crown, on the 17th of November, 1558, was wavering between the two religions, but at laſt, to the inexpreſſible advantage of England, choſe the reformed. She aſſiſted the diſtreſſed States of Holland, defeated the formidable armada of Spain, encouraged the navigation of England, and ſpread her fame to the moſt diſtant parts of the earth. The papiſts repreſent her as a monſter of cruelty, avarice, and laſciviouſneſs, which is not to be wondered at, conſidering the ſevere laws ſhe was obliged to put in execution againſt thoſe of that religion. Yet pope Sextus had a particular eſteem for her, ſince he placed her among the three perſons, who alone, in his opinion, deſerved to reign; the other two were himſelf and Henry IV. of France. "Your queen, ſaid he to an Engliſhman, is born for-"tunate. She governs her kingdom with great happineſs, "and wants only to be married to me, to give the world "a ſecond Alexander the Great." It is indeed difficult to excuſe her beheading Mary queen of Scots, and the ſeverity ſhe ſometimes made uſe of both againſt the papiſts and the proteſtant diſſenters. She however underſtood the art of reigning in an eminent degree, and her reign was the ſchool of able miniſters, great ſtateſmen, and diſtinguiſhed warriors. She was very learned; for ſhe underſtood the Greek, Latin, French, Spaniſh, and Dutch: had a deep and penetrating, a noble and elevated mind. Yet her glorious reign, on which Providence for a long time poured innumerable bleſſings, ended in a moſt diſmal melancholy; which, according to ſome writers, was occaſioned by the death of the earl of Eſſex, whom ſhe had cauſed to be beheaded. This queen makes a conſiderable figure among the learned ladies. Her Tranſlation of the Meditations of the Queen of Navarre was printed at London, in 1548. Her Tranſlation of Xenophon's Dialogue between Hiero and Simonides, was firſt printed in 1743, in numb. 2. of the Miſcellaneous Correſpondence; and ſeveral of her Letters are in the Sylloge Epiſtolarum. She alſo wrote a Comment on Plato, and tranſlated into Latin two of the Orations of Iſocrates, and a play of Euripides, &c. She died on the 3d of April, 1603, aged ſeventy, in the forty-fifth year of her reign.

ELIZABETH of Bohemia, princeſs Palatine, is celebrated by the learned for her genius, her philoſophical knowledge, and for being the diſciple and protectreſs of Des Cartes. She was the eldeſt daughter of Frederick V. elector Palatine of the Rhine, who was elected king of Bohemia in 1619, and of Elizabeth of Great Britain, and was born on the 26th of December, 1618. She learned foreign languages when very young, and became well ſkilled in philoſophy and the mathematics. Having ſeen Des Cartes's Philoſophical Eſſays, ſhe became ſo fond of them, that ſhe reſolved to be inſtructed by that celebrated philoſopher himſelf. Des Cartes inſtructed her in the moſt abſtract parts of geometry, and the moſt ſublime metaphyſics; in both which ſhe became ſo learned, that Des Cartes, on dedicating to her his Principles, obſerves, that ſhe was the only perſon he had yet found, who perfectly underſtood the works he had publiſhed. Uladiſlaus IV. king of Poland ſought her in marriage, after the death of Renea Cecilia of Auſtria, his firſt wife; but her love for philoſophy made her refuſe him. At length, having incurred the diſpleaſure of the electreſs palatine her mother, who ſuſpected her of having had ſome concern in the death of the ſieur d'Epinai, a French gentleman, who was aſſaſſinated at the Hague, ſhe went to live at Groſſen, then at Heidelberg, and afterwards at Caſſel. She at laſt accepted of the abbey of Hervorden, a benefice worth about twenty thouſand crowns a year. This abbey ſhe rendered a philoſophical academy, into which all perſons of wit and learning were received, without regarding either ſex or religion; and it was conſidered as one of the Carteſian ſchools. The princeſs Palatine died there in 1680. Queen Chriſtina of Sweden had conceived ſuch a jealouſy of her, that ſhe would not ſuffer any one to praiſe her in her preſence.

ELIZABETH ISLAND, is near the coaſt of New England, having cape Cod on the north, the iſland of Nantucket on the eaſt, and the iſland of Martha's Vineyard on the weſt weſt. It is ſubject to Great Britain, and the natives are employed in fiſhing. Long. 70. 30. W. Lat. 41. 0. N.

ELLENBOGEN, called Locket in the Bohemian language, a town of Bohemia, in a circle of the ſame name, which is almoſt ſurrounded by the river Egra. It is not large, but has a ſtrong caſtle. It is thirty miles north-eaſt of Egra, and ſeventy five weſt-by-north of Prague. Long. 12 40. E. Lat. 50. 20. N.

ELLERENA, a town of Spain, in Eſtramadura, with a biſhop's ſee. It is fifty miles ſouth-by-eaſt of Menda, and fifty-four north of Seville. Long. 5. 31. W. Lat. 38. 18. N.

ELLESDON, a town of Northumberland, with a market on Saturdays. The fair is on Auguſt 26, for horned cattle, ſheep, linen, and woollen cloth. It is three hundred and one miles north of London. Long. 1. 45. W. Lat. 55. 22. N.

ELLESMERE, a town in Shropſhire, with a market on Tueſdays. The fairs are the third Tueſday in April, Whit-Tueſday, Auguſt 25, and November 14, for horſes, ſheep, and horned cattle. It is eighteen miles north-by-weſt of Shrewſbury, and one hundred and ſeventy-two north weſt of London. Long. 2. 55. W. Lat 52. 53 N.

ELLOTIA, Ελλωτια, in Grecian antiquity, two feſtivals, one of which was celebrated at Crete, in honour of Europa, where Europa's bones were carried in proceſſion, with a myrtle garland no leſs than twenty cubits in circumference. The other was celebrated by the Corinthians in honour of Minerva, in which young men ran with lighted torches in their hands.

ELMACINUS (George) a famous hiſtorian, in the thirteenth century, was born in Egypt, and though he acknowledged himſelf a Chriſtian, was ſecretary to ſeveral khalifs. He wrote in Arabic an Hiſtory of the Saracens, which was tranſlated into Latin by Erpenius, and printed at Leyden in 1625, in two volumes, folio.

ELMENHORST (Geverhart) a perſon of learning, who flouriſhed in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. He was born at Hamburgh, and applying himſelf to the ſtudy of criticiſm, wrote Notes upon Minutius Felix, Arnobius, Apuleius, &c. He died in 1621.

ELNE, a town of France, in Rouſſillon, which was formerly ſurrounded with walls, but they are now in ruins. It has a large church and a convent of Capuchins. The houſes are about two hundred and eighty, and the number of ſouls eight hundred and ſeventy. It is ſeated on the river Fech, five miles from Perpignan. Long. 2. 56. E. Lat. 42. 39. N.

ELPENOR, in fabulous hiſtory, one of the companions of Ulyſſes, was changed, with thoſe who were with him, into ſwine. Circe however at length reſtored him to his priſtine form; but falling from a ladder, he broke his neck.

ELSHEIMER (Adam) a celebrated painter, was born at Frankfort, on the Mayn, in the year 1574, and was at firſt a diſciple of Philip Uffenbach, a German; but his ardent deſire of improvement carrying him to Rome, he ſoon became a moſt excellent artiſt in landſcapes, hiſtories, and night-pieces, enlightened by the moon, or by candles; and all of them with ſmall figures. His works are very few; and from the incredible pains and labour which he beſtowed upon them, valued at ſo high a rate, that they are ſeldom to be found but in the cabinets of princes. He was naturally inclined to melancholy, and through continued thought and ſtudy, this unhappy temper became ſo fixed, that neglecting his own domeſtic concerns, debts came thick upon him, and were followed by impriſonment, which ſtruck ſuch a damp upon his ſpirits, that though he was ſoon releaſed, he did not long ſurvive it, but died about the year 1610, at thirty-ſix years of age.

ELSIMBURG, a port-town of Sweden, in the province of Gothland, and territory of Schonen, ſeated on the ſide of the Sound, over againſt Elſinore. It was formerly a fortreſs belonging to the Danes, but all the fortifications were demoliſhed in 1679, and there is only one tower of a caſtle which remains undemoliſhed. It now belongs to Sweden. Long. 13. 20. E. Lat. 56. 2. N.

ELSINORE, a port town of Denmark, ſeated on the Sound, in the iſle of Zealand. The Sound is a ſtrait of the Baltic Sea, of which this is one of the quays, for here the Danes take toll of all the merchant ſhips which go to the Baltic. Sometimes two or three hundred veſſels paſs through it in a day. Long. 13. 23. E. Lat. 56. 0. N.

ELSYNGE (Henry) clerk of the houſe of commons, in the reign of king Charles I. and a perſon of diſtinguiſhed abilities, was born at Batterſey, in Surry, in the year 1598, and after ſtudying at Weſtminſter-ſchool, completed his ſtudies at Oxford. He wrote a work, intitled The ancient Method and Manner of holding Parliaments, which has had ſeveral editions, and ſome Tracts that have never been printed.

ELTZ, a town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and biſhoprick of Hildeſheim. It is ſeated on the river Leing, ſeventeen miles ſouth of Hanover, and eleven ſouth-weſt of the city of Hildeſheim. Long. 9. 40. E. Lat. 52. 18. N.

ELVAS, a town of Portugal, in the province of Alentejo. It is a large town, and one of the beſt and moſt important in Portugal, ſeated ſix miles from the frontiers of Eſtramadura, in Spain. It is built on a mountain which it entirely takes up, and is ſtrongly fortified with works of free ſtone. The ſtreets of the town are handſome, and the houſes neat; and there is a ciſtern ſo large, that it will hold water enough to ſupply the whole town ſix months. The water is conveyed to it by a magnificent aquæduct, three miles in length, ſuſtained in ſome places by four or five high arches, one upon another. On the ſide of the aquæduct is a foreſt of olive trees, two miles in length, divided into walks, with fine fountains in the middle. Near it is fort St. Lucia, which ſerves for a citadel. The adjacent country abounds with wine and oil. It was bombarded by the French and Spaniards in 1706, but without effect. It has generally a gariſon of one thouſand men. The king founded an academy here, in 1733, for young gentlemen. It is ſeated near the river Guadiana, fifty miles north-eaſt of Evora, thirteen north-weſt of Badajoz, and ninety eaſt of Liſbon. Long. 7. 28. W. Lat. 38. 39. N.

ELWANGEN, a town of Germany, in Swabia, with a chapter whoſe provoſt is a prince of the empire, and lord of the town. It has an abbey in the town, and the palace belonging to it is built on a mountain over againſt the abbey. It is ſeated on the river Jaxt, eighteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Hall, and twenty five miles ſouth-weſt of Anſpach. Long. 10. 18. E. Lat. 48. 50. N.

ELY, a city of Cambridgeſhire, ſeated in the fenny part of the county, on the river Ouſe, which renders the air unhealthy. It has a handſome cathedral, which was the work of ſeveral biſhops. The buildings are but mean, and the inhabitants not numerous. It has a market on Saturdays, and is governed by a mayor. The fairs are on Holy-Thurſday, for horſes; on the Thurſday of the week St. Luke's-day falls in, which is October 18, for horſes, cheeſe, and hops. It is with the territory about it, which includes Wiſbech, and moſt parts round it, a territory of itſelf; and has a judge who decides all cauſes, criminal and civil, within its limits, and is the ſee of a biſhop. It is ſeventeen miles north of Cambridge, and ſixty-eight north of London. It has a free-ſchool for twenty-four boys, and two charity-ſchools, the one for forty boys, and the other for twenty girls, which are maintained by ſubſcription. Long. 0. 15. E. Lat. 52. 24. N.

ELYOT (Sir Thomas) an excellent grammarian, poet, philoſopher, phyſician, coſmographer, and hiſtorian, in the ſixteenth century. He finiſhed his education in St. Mary's hall, in Oxford; and after he had ſpent ſome years in that univerſity, travelled into foreign countries. Upon his return to England he was introduced to court, where his uncommon genius and extenſive learning recommended him to the favour of Henry VIII. who conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and employed him in ſeveral negociations, particularly to Rome, in the year 1532, about the divorce of queen Catharine, and afterwards to the emperor Charles V. He was diſtinguiſhed by his candour, and by the innocence and integrity of his life, as much as by his learning. Hence he was admired and beloved by all the men of learning, who were his cotemporaries, and who celebrated him in their works. He wrote, 1. The Caſtle of Health. 2. The Governor. 3. The Banquet of Sapience. 4. De Rebus Memorabilibus Angliæ; and other pieces. He died in 1546.

ELYSIUM, or Elysian Fields, in pagan mythology, the happy abodes of the juſt and good after death, abounding with woods, fountains, and every thing ſuppoſed capable of affording delight. Of theſe beautiful plains the poets have given a variety of deſcriptions; in particular, an eternal ſpring of flowers and verdure; fountains of freſh water, thoſe of honey, and thoſe of odoriferous ointment; a ſky ever ſerene; ambroſial breezes, an univerſal harmony and uninterrupted joy, were ſuppoſed to embalm thoſe delightful regions. The origin of whatever relates to the ſtate of the virtuous and the wicked after death, was evidently derived from the ceremonies of the Egyptians on the burial of the dead. See Tartarus.

ELZIVIRS, five celebrated printers at Amſterdam and Leyden, admired for the beauty and correctneſs of their editions, viz. Lewis, Bonaventure, Abraham, Lewis, and Daniel. The laſt died at Amſterdam, in 1680.

EMANUEL (Comnenus) emperor of Conſtantinople. See Comnenus.

Emanuel, king of Portugal, and one of the greateſt princes that have reigned in Europe, ſucceeded his couſin John II. who died without iſſue, in 1495. He protected men of learning, drove the Moors out of his dominions, and took many many cities and fortreſſes in Africa. He carried on the deſigns of king John, and under his auſpices, Vaſco de Gama, Albuquerque, Alvarez Cabral, and other great ſeamen, diſcovered new countries, and ſpread the name of the Portugueſe among people who were before unknown. Such proſperity and happineſs gave to the time of his reign the name of The Golden Age of Portugal. He died at Lisbon, on the 13th of December, 1521, aged fifty-three.

EMANUEL (PHILIBERT) duke of Savoy, ſurnamed Iron Head, was the ſon of Charles III. and Beatrix of Portugal, and was born on the 8th of July, 1528. He went into Germany at twenty years of age, was made general of the Imperial army at the ſiege of Metz, and defeated the French at the battle of St. Quintin, in 1557; but a peace being concluded in 1559, he married Margaret of France, the daughter of king Francis I. By this marriage he recovered his dominions, which he enlarged by his prudence and courage. His piety, wiſdom, valour, and love of the ſciences gained him the affection of his ſubjects. He died on the 30th of Auguſt, 1580, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Charles Emanuel.

EMBDEN, a town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, and capital of a diſtrict of the ſame name. It is large, rich, and has a good harbour, and two ſtrong caſtles. This town is divided into three parts, 1. the Old Town. 2. Faldren, and 3. the two ſuburbs. The moſt remarkable things are the town-houſe, to which boats can come up along the canal called Delf, the library which is contained therein, and the cathedral church. It is called the mother of the reformed churches, becauſe the Reformation began here in 1519, and ſoon after extended itſelf throughout the Seven Provinces. The inhabitants in general are of the reformed church, but there are a great many Catholics, Mennonites, and Jews, who have the free exerciſe of their religion. Formerly the ſhips of the Brandenburghers, bound for Africa, made this town their ſtaple. Their harbour renders it a place of ſome trade. In 1744, the Dutch ſold their right to this place to the king of Pruſſia. It is ſeated on the river Ems, near the ſea, twenty-five miles north-eaſt of Groningen, and forty-five north-weſt of Oldenburg. Long. 24. 38. E. Lat. 53. 20. N.

EMBOLI, a town of Turky in Europe, in Macedonia, with a Greek archbiſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Stromona, forty miles north of Theſſalonica. Long. 7. 3. E. Lat. 41. 48. N.

EMBRUN, or AMBRUN, a town of France, in Dauphiny, with an archbiſhop's ſee. The cathedral and the archbiſhop's palace are fine ſtructures. This laſt ſtands in the higheſt part of the town, which has five gates, and as many pariſhes. It hath a Jeſuit's college, and had a citadel in the place where the convent of Capuchins is now built. It has alſo a convent of Cordeliers, and a nunnery. It was taken by the duke of Savoy in 1692. It is ſeated near the river, on a high rock, eighteen miles eaſt of Gap, fifty-five ſouth-eaſt of Grenoble, thirty-five north-eaſt of Digne, forty-five north of Senez, and three hundred and ſixty-five ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 6. 24. E. Lat. 44. 34. N.

EMLYN (THOMAS) a learned and pious divine, memorable for his ſufferings on account of his opinions, was born at Stamford, in Lincolnſhire, and received his education at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and an academy of the diſſenters, amongſt whom he began to preach in the year 1682. He ſoon after became chaplain to the counteſs of Donegal, with whom he went to Belfaſt in Ireland, where ſir William Franklin, who had a good eſtate in the weſt of England, offered him a conſiderable living, on condition of his conforming to the eſtabliſhed church; but this he declined, the terms of miniſterial conformity being ſuch that he could not conſcientiouſly comply with them, though he had not then the ſcruples about the Trinity he afterwards had. The confuſions in Ireland at the time of the Revolution induced him to return to England, and being invited by ſir Robert Rich, one of the lords of the admiralty, to his houſe near Beccles, in Suffolk, was prevailed upon by him to officiate as miniſter to a diſſenting congregation at Leoſtoff, in that county. There contracting an intimate acquaintance with Mr. William Manning, a nonconformiſt miniſter in that neighbourhood, being both of inquiſitive tempers, they jointly ſearched into the principal points of religion, and Dr. Sherlock's Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, being publiſhed about the ſame time, they turned their thoughts to that ſubject; which they examined the more cloſely, as they imagined they ſaw reaſon firſt to doubt, and afterwards to differ from, the received doctrine in that article. Mr. Manning became a Socinian, and ſtrove hard to make Mr. Emlyn one; but the latter could never be brought to doubt of the pre-exiſtence of our Saviour, or that God created the material world by him. In 1691 Mr. Emlyn received an invitation from Mr. Boyſe, a diſſenting miniſter of Dublin, to accept of the paſtoral care of his congregation jointly with himſelf, and accordingly went to Dublin, where, about ſeven years after, he had ſome thoughts of openly declaring his ſentiments on the Trinity, and quitting his congregation, as he could have no hopes of ſtaying when they were known. He only wanted a proper opportunity of doing it, and this was ſoon offered him; for Dr. Duncan Cummins, a phyſician in Dublin, having ſome ſuſpicion, put Mr. Boyſe firſt upon the enquiry, and afterwards went with him to Mr. Emlyn's houſe, where Mr. Emlyn freely owned his being convinced that "the God and father of Jeſus Chriſt is alone the ſupreme Being, and ſuperior in excellence and authority to his Son, who derives all from him." But declared that he had no deſign to cauſe ſtriſe among them, and would therefore leave the congregation peaceably, that they might chuſe another if they pleaſed in his place. Mr. Boyſe however brought the affair before the meeting of the Dublin miniſters, on which he was immediately prohibited from preaching, and a few days after obliged to withdraw himſelf into England. The pulpits inſtantly reſounded with hereſy and blaſphemy, and the loudeſt clamours were raiſed againſt him and his opinions.

On his arrival at London he publiſhed a ſhort account of his caſe, and after about ten weeks abſence returned to his family, which he had left in Dublin. When finding the prodigious odium his opinions, and conſequently himſelf, lay under, he reſolved to ſhew what evidence he had for them from the Scriptures, and wrote An humble Inquiry into the Scripture Account of Jeſus Chriſt; intending to return to England as ſoon as it was printed. Of this ſome zealous diſſenters getting notice, one of them obtained the lord chief juſtice Pine's ſpecial warrant to ſeize him and his books, and went with the keeper of Newgate to ſee it executed. The chief juſtice at firſt refuſed to take bail, but at laſt accepted of two perſons being bound in a recognizance of eight hundred pounds for his appearance. He accordingly took his trial for this book, before the court of Queen's Bench, on the 14th of June, 1703; but not being permitted to ſpeak freely, was ſoon found guilty. He was committed to the common jail till the 16th of June, and then appearing to have judgment given againſt him, the queen's council moved that he ſhould recant; which Mr. Emlyn abſolutely refuſing, he was ſentenced to pay one thouſand pounds fine to the queen, to lie in priſon till it was paid, and to find ſecurity for his good behaviour during life; and as if this was not ſufficient, was led with a paper on his breaſt round the Four Courts. He was now for above a quarter of a year a cloſe priſoner in the under-ſheriff's houſe; but upon complaint, was haſtily hurried to the common jail, where he lay among the criminals, in a cloſe room filled with ſix beds, for five or ſix weeks; and then was removed, upon his petition, by an habeas corpus, into the Marſhalſea, for his health. Thus he continued under cloſe confinement, forſaken by all his friends, except Mr. Boyſe, who made inceſſant attempts to procure his liberty. At laſt his fine was diminiſhed to ſeventy pounds, and that together with twenty pounds claimed by the primate as the queen's almoner, being paid, he was releaſed, after two years and above a month's impriſonment, upon giving ſecurity for his good behaviour during life.

He now returned to London, where a few friends aſſembled a ſmall congregation, to whom he preached every Sunday. This gave great offence to the high church clergy, and even the lower houſe of convocation, in their repreſentation to the queen in 1711, made no ſcruple falſely to aſſert, that weekly ſermons were preached in defence of the Unitarian principles. This congregation however within a few years dwindled away, by the death of the principal perſons who ſupported it; and Mr. Emlyn being left a comfortable ſubſiſtence, by a gentleman who pitied his misfortunes, retired into ſilence and obſcurity; but was honoured with the eſteem and friendſhip of many eminent and learned men, among whom was the excellent Dr. Samuel Clarke, Mr. William Whiſton, and Dr. James Foſter. He died at Iſlington, on the 30th of July, 1741, in the ſeventy eighth year of his age. Since his death his works have been collected in three volumes, octavo, and to the whole are prefixed, by his ſon Sollom Emlyn, Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Author.

EMMA, the wife of Ethelred, king of England, and the mother of Edward the Confeſſor, was the daughter of Richard II. duke of Normandy. She attended king Ethelred when he was forced to retire, with his ſons Alfred and Edward, into her father's dominions; and after Ethelred's death, married Canute, and conſented to the excluſion of her former huſband's children from the throne: yet had ſuch a ſhare in the government, during the reign of her ſon Edward the Confeſſor, that the earl of Kent, who had enjoyed great authority during ſeveral reigns, grew jealous of her, and charged her with ſeveral crimes; on which that prince ſending for all her treaſures, inſtantly reduced her to the extremeſt poverty. In this diſtreſs ſhe appealed to the biſhop of Wincheſter, to whom ſhe was related: this furniſhed her enemies with a new ſubject for calumny, and ſhe was accuſed of having a criminal converſation with him. The archbiſhop of Canterbury brought three accuſations againſt her; that ſhe had conſented to the death of her ſon Alfred, that ſhe had endeavoured to prevent Edward's obtaining the crown, and that ſhe had carried on a ſcandalous correſpondence with Alwine, biſhop of Wincheſter. The credulous king, upon this, convened a ſynod to enquire into the affair, and they ſentenced her to ſubmit to the ordeal trial by fire, and ſhe was ordered to go bare-foot over nine plough ſhares, heated red hot, before the clergy and people in the cathedral church of Wincheſter. The night before this trial ſhe ſpent in prayer at St. Swithin's tomb. The next day, when the preparatory ceremonies were concluded, ſhe walked on the plough-ſhares dreſſed like a common woman, naked to the knee, with her eyes conſtantly fixed towards heaven, and though ſhe trod upon all the hot irons, ſhe, on her walking out of the church, is ſaid to have aſked, when they deſigned to bring her to the teſt? and being told it was over, returned thanks to God for proving her innocence; on which the king falling on his knees, not only begged her pardon, but ridiculouſly ordered the biſhops to diſcipline him, on which his ſhoulders were laid bare, and he was ſcourged. Yet he ſuffered her to ſpend the laſt ten years of her life in a kind of priſon at Wincheſter, where ſhe died, in the year 1052.

biſhop

EMMERICK, a rich fortified town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, and duchy of Cleves. It carries on a good trade with the Dutch, and both proteſtants and catholics have the free exerciſe of their religion. The ſtreets are neat and regular, and the houſes tolerably built. It was taken by the French in 1672, and delivered to the elector of Brandenburg in 1673, under whoſe juriſdiction it now is. It is ſeated near the Rhine, eight miles eaſt of Cleves, and twenty ſouth-eaſt of Nimeguen. Long. 5. 29. E. Lat. 52. 5. N.

EMMIUS (Ubo) a learned profeſſor at Groningen, was born at Gretha, a village in Eaſt Frieſland, on the 5th of December, 1547. He was the ſon of Emmo Dicken, a miniſter of that village, who had been the diſciple of Luther and Melancthon, and at nine years of age was ſent to ſtudy at Embden, after which he was ſent to the univerſity of Roſtock. In 1579 he was made rector of the college of Norden, which he cauſed to flouriſh extremely; but in 1587 he was turned out of his employment, for refuſing to ſubſcribe to the confeſſion of Augſburg. The year after he was choſen rector of the college of Leer, whoſe reputation he raiſed ſo high, that it ſurpaſſed that of Norden. In 1594 he was made rector of the college of Groningen, where he continued near twenty years, and in 1614, the magiſtrates changing that college into an univerſity, made Emmius profeſſor of hiſtory, and of the Greek tongue. He was the firſt rector of that univerſity, and one of the chief ornaments of it by his lectures. What has been ſaid of the extent of his memory, and his accurate knowledge, in hiſtory, can ſcarcely be credited; for it is aſſerted, that without any preparation, he could anſwer all queſtions relating to both ancient and modern hiſtory, without the leaſt miſtake in the circumſtances of times, places, and perſons. Though he ſpent his life in a college, he was capable of even adviſing princes; hence the governor of the provinces of Frieſland and Groningen frequently conſulted him, and ſeldom failed to follow his advice. He wrote in Latin, 1. Decades of the Affairs of Frieſland. 2. Ancient Greece illuſtrated. 3. An Hiſtory of Rome. 4. An Univerſal Hiſtory: and ſeveral other works. He died on the 9th of December, 1625.

EMOUI, or Emwi, a ſea-port town of China, in the province of Fokien. It is one of the beſt harbours in the world, and is made by the iſland Emoui on one ſide, and the continent on the other, and by abundance of ſmall iſlands which are very high, and ſhelter it from the winds. It is ſo ſpacious, that it will contain ſeveral thouſand ſhips, and ſo deep, that they may come cloſe to the ſhore, and ride in ſafety. It was formerly frequented by European veſſels, but now the trade is removed to Canton. The emperor keeps a ſtrong garriſon here. Long. 140. 55. E. Lat. 24. 30 N.

EMPEDOCLES, a celebrated philoſopher and poet, was born at Agrigentum, a city in Sicily, about four hundred and forty-four years before the Chriſtian æra; followed the Pythagorean philoſophy, and admitted the metempſychoſis. He conſtantly appeared with a crown of gold on his head, to maintain by this outward pomp, the reputation he had acquired of being a very extraordinary man. Ariſtotle ſays, that he was a great lover of liberty; extremely averſe to ſtate and command, and that he even refuſed a kingdom that was offered him. His principal work was a Treatiſe in verſe on the Nature and Principles of Things. Ariſtotle, Lucretius, and all the ancients, make the moſt magnificent elogiums on his poetry and eloquence. His death is variouſly reported; but the common opinion is, that he leaped into mount Ætna, that he might leave behind him an opinion that he was a god; but Diogenes Laertius ſeems to believe, that Empedocles being extremely old, fell into the ſea and was drowned.

EMPEREUR, (Constantine l') a native of Oppyck, was a celebrated profeſſor of Hebrew at Harderwick, and afterwards at Leyden. He was well ſkilled in the eaſtern languages, which he learned under Druſius and Erpinus. He contracted an intimate friendſhip with Lewis de Dieu, Daniel Heinſius, and the two Buxtorfs; wrote ſeveral works, which are eſteemed, and died in 1648.

EMPOLI, a ſmall town of Italy, in Tuſcany, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Arno, eighteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Florence, and twenty-eight of Piſa. Long. 11. 44. E. Lat. 43. 26. N.

EMPORIUS, a learned rhetorician in the ſixth century, wrote ſeveral works which are ſtill extant, and written in an animated and nervous ſtyle.

EMS, a river of Germany, which riſes in the biſhoprick of Paderborn, near the town of the ſame name, and the ſource of the river Lippe. It traverſes the counties of Ritberg, Tekelenburg, the biſhoprick of Munſter, and a part of Eaſt-Frieſland, where it falls into Dolart-Bay, a mile and a half above Embden. The principal places it paſſes by are Ritberg, Rhedas, and Lingen.

ENCHUYSEN, a ſea-port town of North-Holland, ſeated on the Zuider Zee. Two thirds of the town are environed by the ſea, which makes it a peninſula; the harbour was formerly large and commodious, but it is now in danger of being choaked up with ſand. The ſtreets are clean, and cut through by abundance of canals: It is ſtrong by art and nature, and has plenty of good water. The houſes are neat and handſome, as alſo the public buildings, eſpecially the ſtadt-houſe, which has a very high tower, and is as handſome as any in Holland, except Amſterdam. It has two churches, one of which is remarkable for its high tower, and the other is turned into an admiralty-office. Ships are built here for the Baltick and the Eaſt Indies, and there is a great trade carried on in herrings and ſalt fiſh. It is eight miles north-eaſt of Horn, eighteen ſouth-eaſt of Staveren, and twenty-five north-eaſt of Amſterdam. Long. 5. 10. E. Lat. 52. 39. N.

ENDYMION, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Athlius, and grandſon of Jupiter, who taking him up into heaven, he had the inſolence to ſollicit Juno, for which he was caſt into a deep ſleep; when Luna concealed him in a cave of Mount Latmos, in Caria, where ſhe had fifty daughters by him, and a ſon named Ætolus, after which he was again exalted to the ſkies.

According to ſome mythologiſts, this fable had its origin from the Neomenia, or feaſt in which the Egyptians celebrated the ancient ſtate of mankind; for which purpoſe, it is ſaid, they choſe a retired grotto, wherein they placed an Iſis with her creſcent, and by her ſide an horus aſleep, to denote the repoſe and ſecurity mankind then enjoyed, which they called endymion, or the Grotto of the Repreſentation. Others affirm, that Endymion was king of Elis, but being expelled his kingdom, retired into Caria to Mount Latmos, where applying himſelf to the ſtudy of the heavenly bodies, and chiefly the moon, the poets feigned that he was beloved by Luna, who viſited him every night as he lay aſleep on the top of that hill.

ENFIELD, a town in Middleſex, with a market on Saturdays. It has two fairs held on May 25, and November 29, for horſes, cows, and cheeſe. It is eleven miles north of London, Long. 0. 20. E. Lat. 51. 40. N.

ENGELBERDA, or Engelberga, empreſs of Germany, was, according to ſome, the daughter of the duke of Spoleto, or, according to others, of Etico duke of Swabia, and was married to the emperor Lewis II. The dignity of empreſs, of which her birth could give her no proſpect, raiſed the hatred and jealouſy of many of the princes and princeſſes of Germany. The prince of Anhault, and the count of Mansfeldt, her moſt inveterate enemes, even accuſed her of being unfaithful to the emperor her huſband, and ſupported their calumnies with the moſt plauſible reaſons. The innocent princeſs could no otherwiſe juſtify herſelf than by expoſing herſelf to the terrible proof of water, which in thoſe times of ignorance ſuperſtition had introduced. She was to ſubmit to it within two days, when there arrived at Augſburg, where the court then was, a knight armed at all points, mounted on a very fine horſe, accompanied by an eſquire and a page. He advanced to the gate of the imperial palace, and poſted upon it a challenge, by which he offered to maintain, in the liſts, the innocence of the empreſs againſt her accuſers. The emperor approved of this combat: the prince of Anhalt and the count of Mansfeldt ſucceſſively appeared in the liſts, and were overthrown by the generous knight, who obliged them to acknow-knowledge, that what they had maintained were baſe calumnies. The marquis of Halberſtadt reſolved to take the part of the two lords, but as he was advancing to the combat, he fell from his horſe and was killed. The victorious knight then went to ſalute the emperor with his vizir down, and departed without making himſelf known; but the emperor cauſing him to be followed, learned that this brave knight was Bozon count of Arles, and as a teſtimony of his eſteem ſent him a crown, and gave him the title of king of Arles. Engelberge, after the emperor's death, retired into the convent of St. Julia at Breſcia, whence ſhe removed to that of St. Sextus at Placenza. She was living in the year 880.

ENGHIEN, a town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in the county of Hainault. Near this town king William III. attacked the French, commanded by marſhal Luxemburg, in 1692, but was repulſed with very great loſs. This is commonly called the battle of Steinkirk. This place is ſeated in a valley, fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Bruſſels, and is much frequented by ſtrangers, on account of the palace and park belonging to the governor of the Auſtrian Netherlands. The park is adorned with caſcades, fountains, arbours, gardens, and orange-walks, according to the modern taſte. At the end of the park there was a farm houſe, that has been turned into fine lodgings and apartments, which have been all furniſhed in a different manner. It is fifteen miles north of Mons. Long. 3. 52. E. Lat. 50. 36. N.

ENGIA, or ENGINA, a town of Turky, in Europe, ſeated on the gulph of Engia, between Achaia and the Morea, twenty-one miles ſouth of Athens, and five eaſt of Corinth. It is about thirty miles in circumference, and conſiſts of ſix hundred houſes. It is in a fruitful country, that abounds with patridges to that degree, that the people are ſummoned to deſtroy their eggs, to preſerve their corn. Long. 24. 9. E. Lat. 37. 54. N.

ENGLAND, the ſouthern and moſt fertile part of the iſland of Great Britain, derived its name from the Angles, the ancient inhabitants of a ſmall country of the ſame name, in the duchy of Sleſwic, in Denmark, who came over with the Saxons to aſſiſt the Britons. It is ſituated between two degree eaſt, and ſix degrees weſt longitude, and between forty-nine degrees fifty minutes, and fifty-five degrees forty-five minutes north latitude. It is bounded on the north by Scotland, on the ſouth by the Britiſh Channel, on the eaſt by the German Ocean, and on the weſt by St. George's channel, the Iriſh Sea, and the weſtern Ocean. Its length from Berwick upon Tweed to Chicheſter, is four hundred ſtatute or meaſured miles, and its breadth from Yarmouth in the eaſt, to St. David's in the weſt, is three hundred and fifteen meaſured miles.

It is a fine fertile country, watered by many rivers, the principal of which are, the Thames, the Severn, the Trent, the Medway, the Ouſe, the Humber, the Cam, the Tyne, the Thamar, the Tees, the Tweed, the Eden, the Avon, the Derwent, the Ribble, the Merſey, and the Dee.

The chief hills in England, excluſive of Wales, are the Mendip in Somerſetſhire, the Malvern in Worceſterſhire, the Chiltern-hills in Buckinghamſhire, the Cotſwold in Glouceſterſhire, the Peak in Derbſhire, the Wolds in Yorkſhire, the Pendle, Pennikent, and Ingleborough in Lancaſhire, and the Wrekin in Shropſhire. And here it is to be noted, that the northern parts of England are much more hilly and mountanious than the ſouthern.

The lakes in England are neither many nor very large. In Cambridgeſhire there are Ramſay-Mere and Soham-Mere; in Huntingdonſhire, Whittleſea-Mere; and in Weſtmoreland Winander-Mere; beſides ſome ſmall lakes in Lancaſhire. The hot baths are thoſe of Bath in Somerſetſhire, and Buxton Wells in Derbyſhire, beſides the hot wells near Briſtol. The mineral waters for drinking only, are Tunbridge, Scarborough, Epſom, Iſlington, Northal, Barnet, Cheltenham, Acton, Dulwich, Cobham, and Harrowgate; of which Scarborough and Tunbridge are the moſt frequented.

The unſettled weather in this iſland renders the air groſs and full of vapours, and yet it is generally heathful, unleſs in marſhy low grounds, eſpecially near the ſea, as in Kent and Eſſex. The rains are frequent, but commonly gentle, and never ſo violent as in the hot countries between the tropics. There has been now and then an earthquake, but never attended with thoſe cruel conſequences we frequently hear of in other countries. The greateſt damage is done by ſtorms of wind, but theſe ſeldom happen, and are more ſeldom general. An eaſterly wind, which blows moſt frequently in the ſpring, is unwholſome, and too often produces blights among the fruit-trees and the corn. The ſouth is moſt productive of epidemical diſtempers; and the north, though very cold in the winter, is not prejudicial to health, unleſs to ſome tender conſtitutions; but the moſt common wind is the weſt, which is of itſelf very healthful; but when it brings long ſettled rains, it muſt be prejudicial to the health of many weakly perſons on that very account. However, the air is neither ſo hot in ſummer, nor ſo cold in winter, as in other countries of the ſame latitude: not that we are entirely free from long, cold, froſty, ſevere winters, and hot, dry, parching ſummers, but then they happen but ſeldom.

Formerly this kingdom was over-run with foreſts, there having been no leſs than ſixty-nine, which took up two-thirds of the whole, of which there are but four left that are remarkable, viz. Windſor, New-Foreſt, the Foreſt of Dean, and the Foreſt of Sherwood. The principal timber in this iſland is oak, elm, aſh, and beech: but we have other trees upon many accounts as uſeful, as the walnut, poplar, maple, horn-beam, hazle, willow, ſallow, ſycamore, and arbele.

The ſoil is various, but chiefly conſiſts of clay, gravel, and ſand. The clays are fit for wheat and beans, and the other for barley and oats, and any of them will produce peas, The lighteſt ſoils will bear turneps, and after them barley, except in very dry years. Beſides, there have been great improvements made of late years, by new methods of huſbandry, and ſowing clover, cinquefoil, trefoil, lucern, and other graſs-ſeeds. In ſome parts, as Kent and Eſſex, there are large plantations of hops; and in others, conſiderable quantities of flax and hemp.

The principal fruits are apples and pears, of the juice of which are made rich, vinous liquors, called cyder and perry. We have likewiſe plenty of cherries, plums, peaches, nectarines, apricots, grapes, currants, gooſeberries, ſtrawberries, and raſpberries. In Eſſex and Cambridgeſhire there is a great quantity of the fineſt ſaffron in the world; and in Bedfordſhire and Bucks woad for dying. Our kitchen-gardens and fields produce carrots, parſneps, potatoes, cabbages, cauliflowers, kidney-beans, artichoakes, aſparagus, onions, ſpinnage, beets, lettuce, cellery, broccoli, muſhrooms, and all ſorts of ſallad-herbs.

It has been computed, that thirty-four millions of buſhels of wheat is annually produced in England, of which great quantities are often exported into other countries. The barley may be about as much, of which twenty-three millions of buſhels are converted into malt, to make ale and beer. A million more is uſed by the malt-diſtillery. The reſt is made into bread, exported abroad, or reſerved for ſeed. In ſome other parts, eſpecially the northern, there is a great deal of rye, which is mixt with wheat and made into bread. The grain for horſes are beans, oats, and vetches. However, in ſome of the northern parts, they make the oat-meal into cakes, which ſerves them entirely for bread.

The animals of this kingdom are beeves, or horned cattle, horſes, aſſes, a few mules, hogs, ſheep, goats, red and fallow deer, hares, rabbits, dogs, cats, foxes, badgers, weazels, ferrets,, pole-cats, ſquirrels, rats, mice, moles, hedgehogs, and otters. Our horned cattle are the largeſt and beſt we meet with any where; and there is a leſſer ſort brought from Wales and Scotland, whoſe fleſh is very ſweet and good. Our ſheep are very valuable both for their fleeces and fleſh. In Lincolnſhire they are prodigiouſly large; but thoſe that feed upon ſhort graſs throughout the kingdom, are ſmall, and yet are by much the fineſt eating; their fleſh is commonly called near London Downmutton. The number of ſheep muſt be ſometimes more and ſometimes leſs, but at a medium, there are twelve millions of ſheep which are ſhorn yearly, whoſe fleeces, one with another, are worth 900,000 pounds, and when manufactured, 4,500,000 pounds.

The tame fowls are cocks and hens, geeſe, ducks, turkies, peacocks, and tame pigeons. The ſwans are likewiſe pretty tame, though they are not domeſtic. The wild are buſtards, wild-geeſe, wild-ducks, teals, wigeons, plovers, pheaſants, patridges, wood-cocks, grouſes, heath-cocks, moor-hens, kites, hawks of various kinds, cuckows, ſeveral ſorts of owls, rooks, ravens, crows, jackdaws, magpies, jays, wood-peckers, wall-creepers, ox-eye-creepers, hoopkoes, king-fiſhers, water-ouzels, quails, turtle-doves, ſtock-doves, pigeons, thruſhes, blackbirds, fieldfares, ſtares, martins, ſwallows, red-ſtarts, robin-red-breaſts, larks of ſeveral ſorts, nightingales, wrens, titmice, ſparrows, bulfinches, goldfinches, linnets, yellow-hammers, water-wagtails, cranes, herons, bitterns, ſnipes, godwits, curlieus, red-ſhanks, lapwings, knots, ruffs, coots, cormorants, ſhags, choughs, and wheat-ears.

The rivers, lakes, and ponds produce ſalmon, trout, pikes, jacks, carps, tench, chars, graylings, perch, roach, dace, barbels, ſhad, mullets, bream, eels, plaice, flounders, ſmelts, gudgeons, haddocks. and cray-fiſh. In the ſea are cod-fiſh, whitings, turbets, halybuts, ſoals, herrings, pilchards, ſprats, dabs, mackrel, lumps, ſea-gudgeons, ſea-eels, ſand-eels, lobſters, crabs, prawns, ſhrimps, oyſters, and other ſhell-fiſh. The herrings and pilchards are cured in different manners, and exported into other countries.

With

With regard to metals, we have iron mines in ſeveral parts of England; lead-mines in Derbyſhire, and tin-mines in Cornwal, which produce the fineſt tin in Europe. Beſides theſe, we have copper mines, and ſilver mines, but theſe laſt will hardly pay the expence of working. We have one mineral, which ſome think to be peculiar to England, and that is black-lead, which is got out of a hill in Cumberland. Marble, free ſtone, ſalt ſprings, and pit-coal, in various parts of the kingdom. London is ſupplied from Newcaſtle and Sunderland with pit-coal, which, becauſe it is brought by the ſea, is by the inhabitants improperly called ſea-coal. Fuller's earth is not very rare or coſtly, but is of great advantage to the cloathing trade.

The diviſion of England and Wales into dioceſes.

Provinces.	Dioceſes.	Counties.	Pariſhes.	Impropr.
Canterbury.	Canterbury.	Part of Kent.	257	140
	London	Eſſex, Middleſex, Part of Hertf.	923	189
	Winchester	Southampton, Surrey, Iſle of Wight, Iſles of Guern. and Jerſey	362	131
	Chicheſter	Suſſex	250	112
	Saliſbury	Wiltſhire, Berkſhire	248	109
	Exeter	Devonſhire, Cornwall	604	239
	Bath and W.	Somerſet	388	160
	Glouceſter	Glouceſter	267	125
	Worceſter	Worceſter, Warwick part	241	79
	Hereford	Hereford, Part of Shropſh.	313	166
	Litchfield and Coventry	Stafford, Derby, Part of Shropſh. Partof Warwick	557	250
	Lincoln	Lincoln, Leiceſter, Huntingdon, Bedford, Buckingham, Hertford part	1255	575
	Ely	Cambridge, Ely Iſle	141	75
	Norwich	Norfolk, Suffolk	1121	385
	Oxford	Oxford	195	88
	Peterboroug.	Northampton, Rutland	293	91
	Briſtol	Dorſet	236	64
	Rocheſter	Part of Kent	98	36
	St. David's	Pembroke, Cardigan, Caermarthen, Brecknock, Radnor, Glamorgan part, Monmouth part, Montgomery pa. Hereford part	308	120
	Bangor	Caernarvon, Angleſey, Merioneth part, Montgomery pa. Denbigh part	107	36
	Landaff	Monmouth part, Glamorgan part	177	98
	St. Aſaph	Denbigh part, Flint part, Montgomery pa. Merioneth part, Hereford part.	121	19
York.	York	York, Nottingham	581	336
	Durham	Northumberland, Durham	135	87
	Cheſter	Cheſter, Richmond, Lancaſter, Part of Cumber.	256	101
	Carliſle	Part of Cumber. Part of Weſtmoreland.	93	18
		In all	9284	3845

The diviſion of England into counties, with their length, breadth, pariſhes, market towns, and the number of members they ſend to parliament.

Counties.	Length.	Breadth.	Pariſhes.	Mark. T.	Mem. of P.
Berkſhire	45	25	140	11	9
Bedfordſhire	24	14	116	9	4
Buckinhamgſhire	40	18	185	15	14
Cambridgeſhire	35	20	163	7	6
Cheſhire	45	25	85	12	4
Cornwall	70	40	161	27	44
Cumberland	50	38	58	14	6
Derbyſhire	30	25	106	11	4
Devonſhire	50	45	394	38	26
Dorſetſhire	45	25	248	22	20
Durham	35	30	118	9	4
Eſſex	45	36	415	27	8
Glouceſterſhire	50	26	280	27	8
Hampſhire	46	30	250	20	26
Hertfordſhire	30	27	120	18	6
Herefordſhire	35	30	176	8	8
Huntingdonſhire	22	18	79	6	4
Kent	50	47	408	31	10
Lancaſhire	45	32	61	27	14
Leiceſterſhire	30	25	192	11	4
Lincolnſhire	60	35	630	39	12
Middleſex	29	16	200	7	8
Monmouthſhire	25	20	127	7	3
Norfolk	50	35	660	33	12
Northamptonſhire	45	20	156	13	9
Northumberland	40	30	460	12	8
Nottinghamſhire	40	20	168	8	8
Oxfordſhire	40	30	280	12	9
Rutlandſhire	12	9	48	2	2
Shropſhire	34	25	170	16	12
Somerſetſhire	50	40	385	35	18
Staffordſhire	44	27	130	19	10
Suffolk	45	30	55	21	16
Surry	34	22	140	11	14
Suſſex	60	20	312	17	20
Warwickſhire	35	26	158	14	6
Weſtmoreland	32	24	26	8	4
Wiltſhire	40	30	304	21	4
Worceſterſhire	35	25	152	12	9
Yorkſhire	80	70	363	58	30

In England there are forty counties which ſend up eighty knights to parliament, and twenty-five cities which ſend fifty citizens, of which Ely ſends none, and London four. And one hundred ſixty-ſeven boroughs which ſend two burgeſſes each; beſides five boroughs which ſend only one each; viz. Abingdon, Banbury, Bewdley, Higham Ferrers, and Monmouth. The two univerſities ſend four. The Cinque Ports, Haſtings, Dover, Sandwich, Romney, Hithe, and their three dependants, Rye, Winchelſea, and Seaford, ſend two each, ſtiled barons, in all ſixteen. Wales ſends twelve knights for the twelve counties, and twelve burgeſſes for twelve boroughs, whereof Pembroke ſends two, and Merioneth none. In Scotland they ſend thirty knights for the ſhires, and fifteen burgeſſes for the boroughs; which make in all five hundred and fifty-eight members of the houſe of commons. Some reckon the four towns which give names to the biſhopricks in Wales to be cities, but they are not ſo much as incorporated, nor do they ſend any repreſentatives to parliament.

Our manufactures and trades are now upon ſuch a footing, that no other in the world can vie with us. Our woollen manufacture far exceeds thoſe of all other countries; and for ſilks we now equal France. Our dyers and printers of linen and cottons have brought their art to great perfection, both for the beauty and durableneſs of their colours. Our letter-founders now exceed the Dutch in the neatneſs of their types, and our paper-mills produce very good paper, both for writing, printing, and common uſes. In ſhort, all arts and ſciences, and all mechanical trades, are nearly in as great perfection here as in any other country.

Our foreign traffic is vaſtly great, ſome of which is carried on by companies, and the reſt by private merchants. The Hamburgh merchants were incorporated firſt, and theſe export broad-cloths, druggets, long ells, ſerges, ſeveral ſorts of ſtuffs, tobacco, ſugar, Eaſt India goods, tin and lead, which are conſumed in Lower Germany; from whence they import great quantities of linen-yarn, kid-ſkins, tin-plates, and other articles.

The Ruſſia merchants export coarſe woollen, long-ells, worſted ſtuffs, tin, lead, and tobacco; and import from Ruſſia hemp, flax, linen, linen-yarn, Ruſſia leather, iron, and pot-aſhes.

The Eaſt-land company trade to all the countries in the Baltic Sea, as Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, Livonia, vonia, Pomerania, and Mecklenburgh; but this trade is in a manner laid open. To theſe countries we carry a little cloth, and other manufactures; but for their iron, copper, timber, and naval ſtores, we chiefly pay ready money.

The Turky merchants export broad-cloths, long-ells, tin, lead, iron, ſugar, and ſome bullion; and they import great quantities of raw-ſilk, grogram, yarn, dying materials, drugs, leather, cotton, fruit, and oil.

The Eaſt-India company export ſilver, lead, cloth, and a few other Engliſh manufactures; and they import raw and wrought ſilks, callicoes, chintz, tea, china-ware, cabinets, medicinal drugs, pepper, borax, camphire, &c. But all the wrought ſilks and cottons are exported again.

Thoſe that trade to Guinea purchaſe gold-duſt, elephants teeth, malgueta, palm-oil, red wood, and negro ſlaves, partly with the manufactures of England, and partly with Eaſt India ſtuffs. It is now ſaid, ſince the Guinea trade has been laid open, that upwards of thirty thouſand ſlaves have been purchaſed in a year, and ſo they might before, for the private traders were nearly as numerous as they are now.

The merchants who trade to Italy, export broad-cloths, long-ells, baize, druggets, callimancoes, camblets and other ſtuffs, leather, tin, lead, fiſh, pepper, and Eaſt-India goods; and they import raw and wrought ſilks, wine, ſoap, olives, oil, anchovies, and dying materials. The balance has been greatly againſt us in the ſingle article of raw ſilk, but we hope it will leſſen yearly, if the breeding of ſilk-worms in the ſouthern colonies of North America is properly encouraged.

The traders to Spain export broad cloth, druggets, baize, long-ells calamancoes, and other ſtuffs, leather, tin, lead, fiſh, corn, and haberdaſhery wares; and import wine, oil, ſalt, lemons, and oranges. This is accounted a moſt beneficial trade.

We export to France tin, lead, horn-plates, corn, and great quantities of tobacco; and import from thence wine, barndy, &c.

To Flanders we ſend ſerges, flannels, ſtuffs, ſugar, tobacco, tin, and lead; and bring back from thence cambrick, lawns, lace, linen, thread, and tapes to a very great value. This is a very diſadvantageous trade.

To Holland we export broad-cloth, druggets, long-ells, ſtuffs, leather, corn, coals, India and Turky commodities, ſugars, tobacco, rice, ginger, pitch, and tar; and in return we have cambricks, hollands, lace, linen, thread, tapes, inkle, whale-bone, madder, argol, toys, clap-board, wainſcot, nutmegs, cinnamon, cloves, and mace.

To our plantations in the Weſt-Indies we ſend all manner of cloathing, as well of linen as woollen furniture for their houſes, and almoſt every commodity for the convenience of life; for which we bring back ſugar, ginger, indigo, molaſſes, pimento, coffee, and many other productions of thoſe iſlands.

To our ſettlements in North America we have been accuſtomed to export all ſorts of cloathing and furniture, and our manufactures of almoſt every kind; in lieu of which we have tobacco, indigo, ſome raw ſilk, rice, pitch, tar, and ſilver, which they gain by a trade with Spaniſh America, beſides medicinal balſams, woods, barks, and roots. There is a probability that not only raw-ſilk and indigo, but wine and oil will be wrought from Carolina.

The government of England is a limited monarchy, and the power of making new laws, and repealing old ones, is veſted in the king, lords, and commons. But the king only has the power of declaring war, and making peace, and the commons only have the privilege of raiſing money for the ſervice of the current year, with the conſent of the of the lords; for though the laſt cannot alter a money-bill, they can reject it.

The adminiſtration of juſtice is the buſineſs of the courts of Weſtminſter-hall, in which are the court of chancery, the court of king's bench, the common-pleas, and the exchequer. Beſides, all the judges, except the chancellor, go their circuits twice a-year throughout England, to try criminals, and to determine ſuch cauſes as are brought before them between man and man. In the court of chancery the witneſſes are examined by interrogatories, and their depoſitions are taken in writing, on which the chancellor founds his decrees. But in the other courts, the witneſſes are examined and croſs-examined, viva voce, and the facts are determined by a jury of twelve ſubſtantial men, which in the country muſt be freeholders; but in London and Middleſex reputable houſekeepers and tradeſmen are not only admitted to the petty jury, but the grand jury. When they have given their verdict, the judges have no power to alter or reverſe it.

The eccleſiaſtical government is in archbiſhops and biſhops, who adminiſter juſtice in their reſpective courts, in matters relating to eccleſiaſtical affairs by their chancellors and officials. The archdeacons have a court of their own.

The convocation is a national ſynod of the clergy, deſigned to conſider the ſtate of the church, and is called together by the king, who directs his writs to the archbiſhop of each province, impowering them to ſummon the the biſhops, deans, archdeacons, and proctors of the clergy, to meet at a certain time and place: but this is done by the biſhop of London, as dean-provincial, who, in conſequence of a mandate from the archbiſhop, cites all the other biſhops, deans, archdeacons, one proctor for each cathederal and collegiate church, and two proctors for the inferior body of the clergy in each dioceſe, to the place of meeting, which is uſually at St. Paul's cathedral in London, from whence they adjourn to the Chapter-houſe, or to Weſtminſter. They are regularly ſummoned at the time every new parliament meets, and after they have agreed upon, and preſented an addreſs to the king, they are uſually adjourned without entering upon buſineſs.

The upper houſe in the province of Canterbury conſiſts of twenty-two biſhops, of whom the archbiſhop is preſident. The lower houſe is made up of deans, archdeacons, and proctors, in all one hundred and ſixty-ſix. The archbiſhop of York may hold a convocation at the ſame time, the members of which are fifty in all.

The higheſt eccleſiaſtical court is that of delegates, which conſiſts of commiſſioners appointed by his majeſty under the broad-ſeal. Their buſineſs is to hear appeals from the inferior courts. The court of arches hears appeals in eccleſiaſtical cauſes in the province of Canterbury, in which the judge alone determines a cauſe without a jury. The court of audience is when the archbiſhop hears a cauſe himſelf. The prorogative court takes notice of wills, and the eſtates of thoſe who die inteſtate. The court of peculiars takes cognizance of the cauſes in pariſhes, exempt from the juriſdiction of the biſhop of the dioceſe. Every biſhop has likewiſe a court, which takes cognizance of wills, and the eſtates of thoſe that die inteſtate, wherein his chancellor is judge; under which, in large dioceſes, there are conſiſtory courts. In the archdeacon's court, cauſes of an inferior nature are determined which comes under his juriſdiction.

Every parliament is ſummoned by the king's writs, fifty days before they aſſemble; one of which is directed to every lord ſpiritual and temporal, requiring him to appear at a certain time and place, to treat and adviſe of certain weighty affairs. Other writs are ſent to the ſheriff of every county, to ſummon thoſe who have a right to vote for members of the houſe of commons, to elect two knights for each county, two citizens for each city, and one or two burgeſſes for each corporation, according to ancient cuſtom. No one ought to be a candidate for a county who is not poſſeſſed of an eſtate of ſix hundred a-year, nor for a city or corporation, without three hundred pounds per annum.

The lord chancellor, or keeper for the time being, is ſpeaker of the houſe of lords; but the commons elect their own ſpeaker, who muſt be approved of by the king. All members muſt take the oath of allegiance before they vote, and no Roman catholic can ſit in the houſe. The twelve judges, and the maſters in chancery, ſit in the houſe of peers, but have no vote. However, the judges give their opinions in point of law when it is required; and the maſters in chancery are uſually employed in meſſages to the commons, and in carrying down money-bills. The commons ſend up all their meſſages and bills by ſome of their own members. The lords have the liberty of voting by proxy, which the commons have not But the commons, as obſerved above, have the power alone of introducing money-bills, in which they will not ſuffer the lords to make any alteration, though they have the power of throwing them out.

The commons can impeach any peer of the realm, as well as inferior perſons, but they muſt be tried by the lords. Likewiſe all capital offences, ſuppoſed to have been committed by a peer, is brought before that houſe, and muſt be judged by it. Such a trial may be brought before them when the parliament is not ſitting.

Any member of the houſe of commons may move to bring in a bill, which, if allowed, muſt be prepared by him and ſome others, and then be preſented to the houſe; and after it has been read a firſt time, the ſpeaker repeats an abſtract of the bill, and puts the queſtion if it ſhall have a ſecond reading, and upon the ſecond reading, it is uſually committed to a committee, or thrown out. When the committee has gone through the bill, the chairman makes his report at the ſide of the bar, reading all the alterations made by the committee, which are either agreed to, or rejected, by the houſe, as the queſtion is put on every one of them. Then the queſtion is put whether the bill ſo amended ſhall be engroſſed, and read a third time, on ſome future day; which, if agreed to, the ſpeaker puts the queſtion on that day, if the bill ſhall paſs, which, if carried in the affirmative, the bill is carried to the houſe of lords. But if the bill be rejected, it cannot be brought in again the ſame ſeſſions. Forty members are ſufficient to conſtitute a houſe, and eight a committee, but not leſs.

The members direct their ſpeeches to the ſpeaker, and if any one anſwers any particular ſpeech, he who made it is not ſuffered to reply the ſame day, and if debates ariſe about any bill, no one is permitted to ſpeak twice the ſame day, unleſs the houſe be turned into a committee, and then every one may ſpeak as often as he pleaſes, if the chairman will allow it. The commons give their votes by Ayes and Noes, and if it be uncertain which is the greater number, the houſe divides. If the queſtion be about bringing in a bill or petition, the Ayes go out; but if it relates to a thing already admitted into the houſe, the Noes go out. If it be a committee, the Ayes take the right ſide of the chair, and the Noes the left.

When the two houſes differ about a bill, or any other matter, ſometimes a conference is demanded in the Painted Chamber, where a deputation from each houſe meet. At which time the lords ſit at a table, and the commons are ſtanding and bare. If they agree, it then lies for the royal aſſent, but the king may reject that or any other bill. A bill coming from the crown for a general pardon is read but once in either houſe; but every other bill muſt be read three times. The houſe may adjourn themſelves without cauſing any alteration in their proceedings, but when it is prorogued, all buſineſs muſt be reſumed anew, and all bills which have not received the royal aſſent are loſt.

The parliament was formerly diſſolved by the king's death, but now they continue ſitting, or aſſemble, if not ſitting, till the ſucceſſor diſſolves them, which muſt be within a certain time limited. In the houſe of peers, each lord, when he votes, declares himſelf Content or Not content, beginning with the youngeſt. The majority here, as in the houſe of commons, always carries the queſtion.

Before we conclude this article, it will be neceſſary to take notice of the particular buſineſs of each court of juſtice. The court of chancery, of which the lord chancellor or keeper is the ſole judge, is a court of equity, and is deſigned to abate the rigour of the common law in ſome particular caſes, as well as to enquire into frauds and breaches of truſt. The proceedings are by bills, anſwers, and decrees. The witneſſes are examined in private, and their evidence is taken in writing. The defendant is ſummoned to appear by a ſupœna, which if he neglects, an attachment goes out againſt him, in order to compel him. If he keeps out of the way, the attachment is attended with a proclamation, and if this is diſregarded, the court will award a proclamation of rebellion, upon which, when taken, he is ſent priſoner to the Fleet; and here their power ends, for this court cannot ſeize on the defendant's eſtate.

The lord chancellor hath twelve aſſiſtants, uſually called maſters in chancery; the principal whereof is maſter of the rolls, ſo called from his being keeper of the rolls or records of the court of chancery: in the abſence of the chancellor he hears all cauſes at the rolls, and ſometimes in the court of chancery. He hath the offices of the ſix clerks in his gift.

The office of the ſix clerks is to enroll commiſſions, pardons, patents, &c. which paſs the great ſeal, and they are attornies for the ſuitors for all cauſes depending in this court. Under theſe clerks there are ſixty more, who diſpatch all the buſineſs of that office. And there are two examiners in the court of chancery, who examine witneſſes on their oaths, and take their depoſitions in writing. The court of chancery iſſues out commiſſions for charitable uſes, inquiring into ſuch frauds and abuſes as may have been committed where eſtates or money have been given to charitable uſes, obliging the truſtees to perform their truſt, according to the intent of the donors.

The court of king's-bench takes cognizance of all criminal cauſes; viz. treaſons, felonies, and breaches of the peace, and can examine, controul, and correct the judgments and proceedings of the inferior courts, not only in pleas of the crown, but in all pleas, real, perſonal, and mixed, except thoſe of the exchequer. There are four judges in this court, namely, the lord chief juſtice, ſtyled the lord chief juſtice of England, who is created by patent, as well as the three puiſne judges, and they all hold their places for life. This court grants prohibitions to other courts, both eccleſiaſtical and civil, when they exceed the bounds of their juriſdiction. All matters of fact, relating either to civil or criminal cauſes, is determined by a jury.

The court of common pleas takes notice only of civil cauſes, and real actions are pleadable no where elſe. Neither can fines be levied, or recoveries ſuffered in any other court. The judges of this court are the lord chief juſtice of the common pleas, and three other judges. They are created by patent for life. None but ſerjeants at law can plead in this court, and the trial of all facts is by a jury.

The court of exchequer tries all cauſes relating to the public revenues, as well as thoſe of private right between party and party; and it is a court of equity as well as of law; where the ſuitors proceed by way of bill and anſwer. The principal judge in this court has the title of the lord chief baron, beſides which there are three other judges.

The counties of England are divided into ſix circuits, as before obſerved, and two judges are appointed to each circuit twice a year.

In every city, both civil and criminal cauſes are tried in the court of the mayor and aldermen, in trivial matters; but they determine no capital caſes, nor pleas of land. But all cauſes may be removed from thence to ſuperior courts. In all corporations the proceedings are the ſame. The lords of manors can hold court barons and court leets, where the tenants are obliged to attend and receive juſtice in ſome few caſes. But the buſineſs of court leets is chiefly to preſent and puniſh nuiſances; and at court barons, the conveyances and alienations of the copyhold tenants are enrolled. There are likewiſe county courts held in all parts of England, where little matters are controverted; and courts of conſcience erected, not only in London and Weſtminſter, but in ſome parts of England, for the recovery of ſmall debts.

The juſtices of the peace have great power in all things relating to the breach of the peace, and their qualifications for this office is an hundred pounds per annum. Their office is to put the ſtatute law in execution relating to the poor, the highways, vagrants, treaſons, felonies, riots, and the preſervation of the game. In capital offences they only commit and bind over the offender to take his trial at the aſſizes; but in moſt other caſes they determine matters finally at their quarter ſeſſions, eſpecially in relation to the poor.

The office of high conſtable and petty conſtable conſiſts chiefly in performing the orders of the juſtices, and ſerving their warrants; in keeping the peace, and detaining vagabonds and other offenders, till they can bring them before a juſtice of the peace.

The people of England are divided into the laity and clergy, and the firſt are ſubdivided into the nobility, gentry, and commonalty. By nobility is meant the temporal peers, who are lords of parliament, of whom there are five degrees, namely, dukes, marquiſſes, earls, viſcounts, and barons. A duke's coronet has leaves without pearls, and his eldeſt ſon is called lord marquiſs; the younger are called by their Chriſtian names, with the additions of lord, as, lord William, lord Thomas; and all his daughters have the title of ladies; but this is by the courteſy of England. All the children of a marquiſs have the title of lords and ladies on the ſame account; and the eldeſt ſon has the title of viſcount: a marquiſs's coronet has a pearl and a ſtrawberry-leaf all round, of equal height: an earl's coronet differs from it in having the pearls raiſed upon points. An earl's eldeſt ſon has the title of viſcount, and his daughters are called ladies, but the younger ſons are only eſquires. A viſcount's coronet has an unlimited circle of pearls, but a baron's has only ſix. None of the children of either of theſe have the title of lord or lady.

With regard to rank or precedency they obſerve the following order: 1. dukes; 2. marquiſſes; 3. the eldeſt ſons of dukes; 4. earls; 5 eldeſt ſons of marquiſſes; 6. younger ſons of dukes; 7. viſcounts; 8. eldeſt ſons of earls; 9. younger ſons of marquiſſes; 10. barons; 11. eldeſt ſons of viſcounts; 12. younger ſons of earls; 13. eldeſt ſons of barons. All peers of the ſame degree keep rank according to the dates of their patents. Their ladies, and the ladies of their ſons have precedency in the ſame manner as their huſbands. However, ſome of the officers of ſtate have precedency of all dukes who are not of the royal blood, as the lord chancellor, or lord keeper, the lord high treaſurer, the lord preſident of the privy-council, and the lord privy-ſeal. Others take place only of thoſe of the ſame degree, as lord chamberlain of England, lord chamberlain of the houſhold, and lord high admiral.

There are or have been nine great officers of ſtate, 1. the lord high ſteward, who is now made occaſionally for the trial of a peer, for a capital crime, during which he ſits in ſtate, with a white ſtaff in his hand. His buſineſs is to pronounce ſentence, and when that is done he breaks his ſtaff. 2. The lord high chancellor, who is looked upon as the principal perſon in the kingdom in civil affairs, as the archbiſhop of Canterbury is in eccleſiaſtical matters. He is a privy counſellor by his office, and diſpoſes of all the king's livings which are under twenty pounds a year in the king's books. 3. The lord high treaſurer, takes charge of the king's revenue, which is kept in the exchequer, but this office is now put in commiſſion. 4. The lord privy-ſeal is to affix the privy-ſeal to all charters and grants of the king, and to all pardons ſigned by his majeſty. But they muſt firſt paſs the ſignet in the ſecretary's office, which being directed to the lord privy-ſeal, is his warrant for fixing the privy-ſeal to the grant. He is a privy counſellor by his place. 5. The lord preſident of the council, propoſes matters to the privy council, and reports its tranſactions to the king when he is not there. 6. The lord chamberlain, regulates the affairs in the king's houſhold, puts on his robes of ſtate, appoints a nobleman to carry the ſword of ſtate before the king, takes care of the furniſhing Weſtminſter-hall at coronations, and provides all things in the houſe of lords in the time of parliament. 7. The lord high conſtable was a place of very great trust, but is now diſcontinued. 8. The earl marſhal, with the aſſiſtance of the kings at arms and heralds, marſhals and orders the proceſſions at coronations, is judge of coats of arms, and of pedigrees, having a court in the common hall of the college of heralds, ſo that whoever wants a coat of arms muſt apply to the earl marſhal by petition. 9. The laſt great officer is the lord high admiral, who has the care of all maritime affairs. This office is now put into commiſſion. To theſe may be added the three ſecretaries of ſtate.

There are alſo two orders of knighthood, the knights of the garter, and thoſe of the bath.

We ſhall ſay nothing of the religion, manners, and dreſſes of the Engliſh, becauſe theſe fall under every one's own obſervation.

ENGLAND (NEW). See NEW ENGLAND.

ENGLEBERT (CORNELIUS) a celebrated painter in the ſixteenth century, born at Leyden. Several good pieces of his drawing are to be ſeen at Leyden and Utrecht. He had two ſons, who exactly imitated his manner; one of whom came to England, and was employed by Henry VIII.

ENKOPING, a town of Sweden, in the province of Upland, ſeated near Meller lake. It is a ſmall open town, and lies forty miles weſt of Stockholm. Long. 16. 30. E. Lat. 59. 50. N.

ENNIUS (QUINTUS) an ancient Latin poet, born at Rudiæ, a town in Calabria, about the two hundred and thirty-ſixth year before the birth of Chriſt. He inſtructed Cato the Cenſor in the Greek language, while in Sardinia; and went with him to Rome, where he was eſteemed for the integrity of his manners, the ſprightlineſs of his wit, and the agreeableneſs of his converſation. He endeavoured to introduce the beauties of the Greek language into the Latin tongue, and was the firſt among the Romans who compoſed heroic verſes. He wrote many tragedies, and alſo the Annals of the Roman Republic. If we may believe Horace, Ennius never applied himſelf to writing till he had drank freely of wine. He died about the one hundred and ſixty-ninth year before the Chriſtian æra, and was buried in his friend Scipio's ſepulchre. We have only ſome fragments of his works, which were firſt collected by the two Stephens, and afterwards publiſhed at Naples, with a learned Commentary, by Jerom Columna, in quarto, 1590; and reprinted at Amſterdam, in 1707, in 4to, with additions by Heſſelius.

ENNODIUS (MAGNUS FOELIX) was deſcended from an illuſtrious family in Gaul, and born in Italy, about the year 473. He entered into holy orders by the conſent of his wife, who had brought him a great fortune, and who on her ſide became a nun. He pronounced a panegyric on Theodoric, undertook the defence of pope Symmachus, and in 510 was advanced to the biſhoprick of Favia; after which, he was appointed to negociate a union between the Eaſtern and Weſtern churches; for which purpoſe he took two journies into the Eaſt, but without ſucceſs. He died at Pavia, in 521, aged forty-eight. His works, which gained him great reputation, were publiſhed by Andrew Schottus, at Tournay, 1610, in octavo; and by James Sirmond, at Paris, 1611, in octavo, with notes.

ENO, or ENOS, a town of Turky in Europe, in Romania, near the gulph of the ſame name, with the ſee of a Greek archbiſhop. It is ſeated one hundred and twenty-five miles weſt of Conſtantinople. Long. 26. 15. E. Lat. 40. 46. N.

ENOCH, the ſon of Jared, and the father of Methuſalem, was born three thouſand four hundred and twelve years before our Saviour's incarnation. On account of his extraordinary piety, he was ſaid to walk with God; and had the extraordinary privilege of being taken up into heaven, without ſuffering death.

ENS, a city of Germany, in Upper Auſtria, with the title of a principality. It is ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Danube and Ens, has a good arſenal, and is defended with ſtrong fortifications. It is thirteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Lintz, and ninety weſt of Vienna. Long. 14. 22. E. Lat. 48. 25. N.

ENSISHEIM, a town of France, in Upper Alſace. It is a pretty little place, well ſeated and well built, and conſiſts of about two hundred houſes. It ſtands on the river Ill, ten miles ſouth-weſt of Briſach, forty-one ſouth-by-weſt of Straſburgh, and two hundred and forty four ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 7. 46. E. Lat. 47. 49. N.

ENT (Sir GEORGE) an eminent phyſician, born at Sandwich, in Kent, on the 6th of November, 1604, was educated at Sidney college, Cambridge, and afterwards travelling into foreign countries, received the degree of doctor of phyſic, at Padua. After his return he obtained great practice, was made preſident of the College of Phyſicians in London, and at length received the honour of knighthood from king Charles II. He was extremely intimate with Dr. Harvey, whom he learnedly defended, in a piece intitled, Apologia pro Circulatione Sanguinis contra Æmilium Parisanum. He alſo publiſhed Animadverſiones in Malachiæ Thruſtoni; and ſome Obſervations in the Philoſophical Tranſactions. Glanville, ſpeaking in his Plus Ultra of the modern improvements of anatomy, numbers Sir George Ent, Dr. Gliſſon, and Dr. Wallis, with the moſt celebrated diſcoverers in that ſcience. The two former were among the firſt members of the Royal Society. Sir George Ent died at London, on the 13th of October, 1689.

ENTRE-DUERO-E-MINHO, a province of Portugal, ſo called becauſe it is ſeated between two rivers, of which the Douro is on the ſouth, and the Minho on the north. It is alſo bounded on the weſt by the ſea, and on the eaſt by the province Tra-los Montes, from which it is ſeparated by a ridge of mountains. It is about forty-five miles in length, and thirty in breadth. The ſoil is rich and fertile, and the air pure and wholeſome, which renders the women fruitful, and the people in general long-lived. They reckon one thouſand four hundred and ſixty pariſh-churches in this province, beſides the metropolitan church at Braga, and the cathedral at Porto. There are likewiſe thirty convents and nunneries, well endowed; ſix harbours for ſhips; two hundred ſtone bridges; and above five hundred ſprings, which never grow dry. The fruitfulneſs of the land is owing to the great number of rivers, wherewith it is watered; for beſides the Douro and the Minho, there is the Lima, which riſes in Galicia, paſſes to Soias, to Ponte-de Lima, and falls into the ſea at Viana; the Tamago, which proceeds from Galicia and paſſes to Monte-Rei, enters the province of Tra-los-Montes, where it waſhes the walls of Chiaves, then advances into this province, and falls into the Douro; the Cavado paſſes by Braga and Barcelos, and falls into the ocean: the Rio d'Aves falls into the ſea at Villa-de-Conde. It is divided into four diſtricts, from the names of four of the principal towns; Oporto, Viana, Defoz-de-Lima, Ponte-de-Lima, and Guimaranes. Braga is the capital of the whole province.

ENTREVAUX, a town of France, in Provence, ſeated on the river Var. It is the place of reſidence of the biſhop of Glandeve. Long. 7. 11. E. Lat. 44. 1. N.

EOBANUS (HELIUS) a celebrated Latin poet, born in the landgravate of Heſſe, under a tree in the midſt of the fields, on the 6th of January, 1488, and became ſo famous for his poetry, that he was called, the Homer of Germany. Eobanus taught polite literature at Herford, at Nuremburg, and afterwards at Marpurg, where the landgrave of Heſſe loaded him with favours. He was as famous a drinker as he was a poet. He died at Marpurg, on the 5th of October, 1540. He tranſlated into Latin verſe Theocritus, Homer's Iliad, &c. and his elogies are particularly admired. His poetry is wrote in a natural, eaſy, clear, and chaſte ſtyle; and he was the beſt poet Germany had then ever produced. His life is written by Joachim Camerarius.

EPAMINONDAS, a celebrated Theban, the ſon of Polymnus, and one of the greateſt captains of antiquity, learned philoſophy and muſic under Lyſis, a Pythagorean philoſopher, and was from his infancy inured to all the exerciſes of body and mind. He was learned, generous, well-ſkilled in war, brave, modeſt, and prudent, and had ſuch a regard for truth, that he would not tell a falſhood, even in jeſt. He ſerved firſt under the Lacedæmonians, and ſaved the life of Pelopidas, their chief, who received in a battle ſeven or eight wounds; and contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with that general, which laſted till his death. At his perſuaſions, Pelopidas delivered the city of Thebes from the yoke of the Spartans, who had rendered themſelves maſters of Cadmea, which occaſioned a bloody war between the two nations. Epaminondas was made general of the Thebans, on which he gained the celebrated battle of Leuctra, in the three hundred and forty-firſt year before the Chriſtian æra, in which Cleombrotus, the valiant king of Sparta, was killed. He then ravaged the enemy's country, and cauſed the city of Meſſina to be rebuilt and peopled. At length, the command of the army was given to another, becauſe Epaminondas had kept his troops in the field four months longer than he had been ordered by the people; but inſtead of retiring in diſguſt, he now ſerved as a common ſoldier, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by ſo many brave actions, that the Thebans, aſhamed of having deprived him of the command, reſtored him to his poſt, in order to carry the war into Theſſaly, where his arms were always victorious. A war breaking out between the Elians and the inhabitants of Mantinea, the Thebans took the part of the former. Epaminondas then reſolved to endeavour to ſurpriſe Sparta and Mantinea; but not ſucceeding, he gave the enemy battle, in the three hundred and ſixty-third year before the Chriſtian æra, and received a mortal wound with a javelin, the bearded iron remaining in the wound. Knowing that it could not be drawn out without giving him immediate death, he would not ſuffer it to be touched, but continued to give his orders; and on his being told, that the enemy were entirely defeated, "I have lived long enough, he cried, "ſince I die without being conquered;" and at the ſame time he plucked the arrow from his wound, and expired. A moment before his death, one of his friends lamenting his leaving no poſterity, (for he was never married) "Thou "art deceived, ſaid he, I leave two daughters to ſurvive me, "the victory of Leuctra and that of Mantinea."

EPERIES, a free city of Upper Hungary, in the palatinate of Saros. It is encompaſſed with ſtrong walls, and good advanced works. It is remarkable for its fairs, its ſalt-works, and its mineral waters. There is a college in this place where Emer, count Teckel, ſtudied, who was the chief of the malcontents. He died at Nicomedia, in Aſia, in 1705. It was taken by them in 1682; but general Schultz beat them, and retook it, in 1685. They took it again in 1704; and the Imperialiſts got it again in 1707. It is ſeated on the river Tarſo, twenty miles north of Caſſovia, ninety ſouth-by-weſt of Sondormitz, and one hundred and forty-five eaſt-by-north of Preſburg. Long. 21. 1 E. Lat. 48. 50. N.

EPEUS, the brother of Peon, and king of Phocis, reigned after his father Panopeus. According to Pliny, he was the inventor of the battering-ram; and it is ſaid he built the Trojan-horſe, and founded the city of Metopontum.

EPHÆSTION, the favourite of Alexander the Great. They were equal in age; and he, being taller and handſomer, was often taken for Alexander himſelf. That prince told one who aſked his pardon for it, that he was not miſtaken; for he was another Alexander. At his death Alexander was ſo grieved, that he eat nothing for three days; he cauſed divine honours to be paid him, and beſtowed twelve thouſand talents on his funeral.

EPHAISTIA, ἡφαιστεῖα, an Athenian feſtival, in honour of Vulcan, at which races were performed with torches, in the following manner: three young men being choſen, one of them, who was appointed by lots to take his turn firſt, took a lighted torch in his hand, and began the courſe, which having ended, he gave it to the ſecond, and he, in like manner, to the third. The victory was his who carried the torch lighted to the end of the race.

EPHESUS, now called by the Turks Ajaſalouc, is an ancient and celebrated city of Turky in Aſia, and in Natolia. It ſtands in a fine plain, which extends weſtward, towards the ſea, above ſix miles, and is above three miles wide in many places. Towards the north, eaſt, and ſouth, there are high mountains and rocks, by which it is ſhut up on all ſides, except towards the ſea. It has mount Gallecius on the north, in the road to the ſea, into which the river Caiſter diſcharges itſelf. This river has a paſſage through the mountains, and leaving the city to the ſouth, makes ſeveral turnings and winding in the plains, and falls into the ſea to the weſt of the city, near a promontory. This city, ſo famous in hiſtory, and the capital of Aſia, has not now above forty or fifty Mahommedan families of Greek extraction, who live in miſerable huts, without one Chriſtian among them.

All the ground is covered with ruins, fragments of marble, pedeſtals, pillars, and broken pieces of curious architecture. The Turks have a caſtle on a little hill, which ſtretching from north to ſouth, commands the whole plain. The incloſure of this citadel, which is fortified with many towers, has nothing magnificent; but, at a little diſtance from thence, on the ſouth ſide, there are the remains of another citadel, whoſe works were covered with the fineſt marble of the ancient Epheſus. At the foot of a hill, whereon the caſtle ſtands, is the church of St. John, now converted into a moſque, and is but an ordinary ſtructure. There is an aqueduct ſtill remaining, whoſe pillars, which ſuſtain the arches, are of fine marble. It was made uſe of to ſupply the citadel and city with water. The ruins of the temple of Diana, formerly one of the wonders of the world, are ſtill viſible, among which there are only four or five broken pillars. This ſtructure was four hundred and twenty-five feet long, and two hundred and twenty feet wide; there were one hundred and twenty-ſeven pillars, each ſixty feet high, ſix and thirty of which were covered with baſſo relievos. At the foot of the mountain, near the ruins of the temple, is the Grotto of the Seven Sleepers, who took a nap which laſted two hundred years, if you will believe tradition. The caſtle, which they call the priſon of St. Paul, is a modern ordinary building. It is ſeated near a gulph, thirty-five miles ſouth of Smyrna. Long. 27. 3. E. Lat. 38. 16. N.

EPHIALTES, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Neptune, was a giant of prodigious ſtrength. He, with his brother Othus, and the reſt of the giants, reſolved to ſcale heaven, but he was killed by Jupiter; after which Jupiter caſt him into Tartarus.

EPHORI, Ἔφοροι, in Grecian antiquity, five, or, according to ſome, ſeven magiſtrates eſtabliſhed in Sparta, by Lycurgus, as a curb on the power of their kings. Their authority was exceeding great; for they ſometimes expelled, and even put the kings to death, ſuſpended or aboliſhed the power of the other magiſtrates, and called them to an account at pleaſure; they were alſo intruſted with the public treaſure; they made war and peace, and preſided in the public ſhews and feſtivals.

EPHORUS, a celebrated orator and hiſtorian, about three hundred and fifty-two years before the Chriſtian æra, was a native of Cumæ, in Æolia. He was the diſciple of Iſocrates; and by his advice he compoſed an hiſtory, the loſs of which has been regretted by the learned.

EPHRAIM, the ſecond ſon of the patriarch Joſeph, and the head of the tribe of the Jews that bears his name.

EPHREM Syrus, an ancient Chriſtian writer, in the fourth century, deacon of Edeſſa, was born at Niſibe, in Syria. He was eſteemed by St. Baſil, St. Gregory Nyſſen, and other great men. He wrote againſt the opinions of Sabellius, Arius, Apollinarius, the Manichees, &c. and acquired ſuch reputation by his virtue and his works, that he was called the Doctor and the Prophet of the Syrians. He died in 378. The beſt editions of his works are that of Oxford, in 1708, in folio, and that of Rome, from 1732 to 1736, in Syriac, Greek, and Latin, ſix volumes folio.

EPICHARMUS, a poet and Pythagorean philoſopher, was born in Sicily, or, according to others, in the iſland of Coos, and carried into Sicily when but three months old. He and Phormus are ſaid to have invented comedies at Syracuſe, where a great number of his performances were acted, which were afterwards imitated by Plautus. He alſo compoſed ſeveral philoſophical and medicinal treatiſes. Ariſtotle and Pliny attribute to him the invention of the two Greek letters, Θ and Χ. He lived about four hundred and forty years before the Chriſtian æra, and died at above ninety years of age.

EPICTETUS, a celebrated Stoic philoſopher, born at Hierapolis, in Phrygia, in the firſt century, was the ſlave of Epaphroditus, a freedman and one of Nero's guard. Domitian baniſhing all philoſophers from Rome, about the year 94, Epictetus retired to Nicopolis, in Epirus, where he died in a very advanced age, and after his death, the earthen lamp he made uſe of ſold for three thouſand drachmas. He was a man of great modeſty, which was eminent in his own practice, as well as in his recommendation to others: hence he uſed to ſay, "That there is no need of "adorning a man's houſe with rich hangings or paintings, "ſince the moſt graceful furniture is temperance and mo-"deſty, which are laſting ornaments, and will never be "the worſe for wearing." Of all the ancient philoſophers, he ſeems to have made the neareſt approaches to the Chriſtian morality, and to have had the moſt juſt ideas of God and providence. He always poſſeſſed a cool and ſerene mind, unruffled by paſſion, and was uſed to ſay, that the whole of moral philoſophy was included in theſe words, ſupport and abſtain. One day, his maſter, Epaphroditus, ſtrove, in a frolic, to wrench his leg; when Epictetus ſaid, with a ſmile, and free from any emotion, "If you go on, "you will certainly break my leg;" but redoubling his effort, and ſtriking it with all his ſtrength, he at laſt broke the bone; when all the return he made was, "Did not I "tell you, ſir, that you would break my leg." No man was more expert at reducing the rigour of the maxims of the Stoics into practice. He conformed himſelf ſtrictly, both in his diſcourſe and behaviour, to the manners of Socrates and Zeno. He waged continual war with fancy and fortune, and it is an excellence peculiar to himſelf, that he admitted all the ſeverity of the Stoics without their fourneſs, and reformed Stoiciſm as well as profeſſed it; and beſides his vindicating the immortality of the ſoul, as ſtrenuouſly as Socrates, or any Stoic of them all, he declared openly againſt ſelf-murder, the lawfulneſs of which was maintained by the reſt of the ſect. Arrian, his diſciple, wrote a large account of his life and death, which is loſt, and preſerved four books of his diſcourſes, and his Enchiridion, of which there have been ſeveral editions in Greek and Latin; and, in 1758, was publiſhed a tranſlation of them into Engliſh by the learned and ingenious Miſs Carter.

EPICURUS, one of the greateſt philoſophers of his age, was born at Gargettium, in Attica, about the three hundred and fortieth year before the Chriſtian æra. He was the ſon of Neocles and Chæreſtrata. He ſettled at Athens when he was about thirty ſix years of age, and ſet up a ſchool there in a garden he had purchaſed, where he lived with his friends in great tranquility, and educated a great number of ſcholars who lived in common with their maſter, and ſubſiſted entirely on what this garden produced. His ſchool was never divided, but his doctrine was followed, as if he were an oracle. He maintained, that motion was eternal and neceſſary; that the world was governed by chance; chance; and the Supreme Divinity was too great to concern himſelf with the affairs of men; that the gods were not to be worſhipped from the hope of reward or the fear of puniſhment, but from the pure ideas of reaſon, which require us to reſpect and honour whatever is moſt perfect, he therefore recommended veneration to the gods, ſobriety, and chaſtity; and it is certain that he lived in an exemplary manner, and conformably to the rules of philoſophical wiſdom and frugality. His works, it is ſaid, amounted to three hundred volumes, which contained nothing but what was entirely his own: theſe, however, are all loſt. His diſciples, long after his death, corrupted the purity of his principles, and inſtead of the delight ariſing from temperance and ſobriety, ran into all the exceſſes of voluptuouſneſs. He died of a ſuppreſſion of urine, in the two hundred and ſixty-firſt year before the Chriſtian æra, aged ſeventy-two.

EPIDEMIA, ἐπιδημια, in Grecian antiquity, private feſtivals, or times of rejoicing, when a friend or relation had returned from a journey.

EPIMENIDES, an ancient poet and philoſopher, born in Crete. It is ſaid, that when he was a boy, being ſent by his father into the country to fetch a ſheep, he left the road and went into a cave, where he ſlept fifty-ſeven years; but authors differ about the time: however, at laſt waking, and fancying that he had only taken a ſhort nap, he began to look about for the ſheep; but not finding it, he proceeded to his father's country eſtate, when perceiving the face of things altered, and the lands poſſeſſed by a new maſter, he ran back with amazement into the city. Here endeavouring to get into his father's houſe, his younger brother, now grown a grave old man, with much ſcruple admitted him, and informed him of all that had paſſed, and how long he had ſlept. Plutarch obſerves, that he awaked an old man; but Pliny and Laertius tell us, that he grew old in as many days as he had ſlept years. Some authors ſay he wandered all this time in order to improve himſelf in natural philoſophy. However, the report of this accident made him immediately eſteemed a peculiar favourite of the gods, upon which account the Athenians, on being afflicted with a plague, ſent for him to Athens, when performing the luſtrations of the city, the plague ceaſed. He here got acquainted with Solon, about the five hundred and ninety-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra, and inſtructed him in the proper methods for the regulation of the Athenian common-wealth. He refuſed the preſents offered him by the Athenians, and at length returned to Crete. He died in a very advanced age, after he had compoſed many works in verſe, which were much admired by the ancients. Plato calls him a divine man, and St. Paul quotes a line out of his book of Oracles and Reſponſes; viz. "The Cretans "are always liars, evil beaſts, ſlow bellies."

EPIMETHEUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Japetus, and brother to Prometheus, married Pandora, and though warned of the danger, opened the fatal box preſented her by Jupiter, by which means vice, folly, and diſeaſes, overſpread the earth. He had by Pandora a daughter, named Pyrrha, who married Deucalion; but at length Jupiter metamorphoſed him into an ape, and baniſhed him to the iſle Pithecuſæ. See PANDORA and PROMETHEUS.

EPIPHANIUS (St.) an ancient father of the church, born at Beſanducan, a village in Paleſtine, about the year 332. He founded a monaſtery near the place of his birth, and preſided over it. He was afterwards elected biſhop of Salamis, when he ſided with Paulinus againſt Meletius, and ordained in Paleſtine, Paulinian, the brother of St. Jerom, on which a conteſt aroſe between him and John, biſhop of Jeruſalem. He afterwards called a council in the iſland of Cyprus, in which he procured a prohibition of the reading of Origen's writings, and made uſe of all his endeavours to prevail on Theophilus, biſhop of Alexandria, to engage St. Chryſoſtom to declare in favour of that decree: but not meeting with ſucceſs, he went himſelf to Conſtantinople, where he would not have any converſation with St. Chryſoſtom, and formed the deſign of entering the church of the apoſtles, to publiſh his condemnation of Origen; but being informed of the danger to which he would be expoſed, he reſolved to return to Cyprus, and for a farewell to St. Chryſoſtom, he ſaid, "I hope you will not die a bi-"ſhop;" to which the latter replied, "I hope you will "not return to your own country." Both which came to paſs, for St. Chryſoſtom was depoſed from his biſhoprick, and Epiphanius died at ſea on his return, in the year 402, or 403, at about eighty years of age. The beſt edition of his works is that of father Petavius, in 1622, in Greek and Latin, with learned notes, in two volumes, folio.

EPIPHANIUS, patriarch of Conſtantinople in 520, zealouſly undertook the defence of the council of Chalcedon, and the condemnation of the Eutychians. Pope Hormiſdas gave him the power of receiving in his name all the biſhops, who were willing to unite themſelves to the Roman church, on condition of their ſubſcribing a formula he had prepared. Epiphanius died in 535.

EPIPHANIUS SCHOLASTICUS, a famous writer of the ſixth century, was the friend of Caſſiodorus, at whoſe deſire he tranſlated from the Greek into Latin the eccleſiaſtical hiſtorians, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret. From this verſion Caſſiodorus compoſed his Hiſtoria Tripartita. Epiphanius made ſeveral other tranſlations.

EPIRUS, a province of Turky in Europe, ſeated near the narroweſt part of the gulph of Venice. On the ſide of the continent it is ſurrounded by the Acroceraunian mountains, or the mountains of Chimera. In ſome maps it is called Upper Albania. The famous Scanderbeg reigned in this country, and very probably would have driven the Turks out of Europe, had he been ſupported by the Weſtern Chriſtians. The principal places are Delfino, where the baſhaw uſually reſides; Chimera, a ſmall town ſeated on a rock; Butrinto, Parga, Larta, and Preveſa, belong to the Venetians.

EPISCOPUS (SIMON) one of the moſt learned men of the ſeventeenth century, and the principal writer of the Arminian ſect, was born at Amſterdam in 1583. He was choſen in 1612 to fill the place of divinity profeſſor at Leyden, vacant by the voluntary reſignation of Gomarus. Epiſcopus publicly undertook the defence of the Arminians againſt the Gomariſts, which procured him many enemies. The ſynod of Dort would not admit him to ſit in that aſſembly as a judge, but condemned him, depoſed him from his miniſtry, and baniſhed him out of the territories of the republic. He then retired to Antwerp, where he wrote againſt the church of Rome, in defence of thoſe truths which all proteſtants in general maintain; but in 1626 returned into Holland, and was miniſter of the church of the Remonſtrants at Rotterdam, till 1634, when he was made rector of the Arminian college at Amſterdam, and enjoyed that poſt till his death, which happened on the 4th of April, 1643. He wrote in Latin, 1. An Antidote againſt the Synod of Dort. 2. Bodeker out of his Wits. 3. Obſervations upon ſome Chapters of St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Romans. 4. Theological Inſtitutions; and, 5. An Examination of Capellus's Theſes, &c. His works are printed together in two volumes, folio. Thoſe contained in the firſt volume were printed in his life-time; thoſe in the ſecond are poſthumous.

EPISTATIS, Ἐπιστάτης, in Grecian antiquity, was an officer among the Athenians, choſen out of the Prytanes, in order to have the cuſtody of the public ſeal, the keys of the exchequer and citadel, which truſt was thought ſo great, that no man was permitted to enjoy it above a ſingle day, nor to be elected into it a ſecond time. The Epiſtatis was alſo the preſident of the aſſembly, where the chief part of his office ſeems to have conſiſted in granting the people liberty to give their votes, which they were not permitted to do till he gave the ſignal.

EPPENDORF (HENRY of) a gentleman of Germany, who lived in the ſixteenth century, and raiſed a great clamour againſt Eraſmus. He wrote a work in Latin againſt Eraſmus's Admonition againſt Lying and Slandering; and alſo a work which contains an account of this controverſy.

EPPING, a town in Eſſex, with a market on Fridays. The fairs are on Whit-Tueſday and October 13, for horſes, cows, and ſheep. It is ſeventeen miles north-by-eaſt of London. Long 0. 9. E. Lat. 51. 40. N.

EPPINGEN, a town of Germany, in the palatinate of the Rhine, ſeated on the river Alſats, eighteen miles north-weſt of Philipſburg, and fifteen north-weſt of Hailbron. Long. 8. 46. E. Lat 49. 31. N.

EPSOM, a town in Surry, famous for its medicinal waters, which are of a purging quality. It is a pleaſant place, and pretty much reſorted to by the Londoners. It has a market on Fridays, and a fair on July 25, for toys. It is fifteen miles ſouth-weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 0. 18. W. Lat. 51. 25. N.

ERFORT, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, the capital of Thuringia, and ſubject to the elector of Mentz. It is defended by good ramparts, and has a caſtle on an eminence, which commands the town. Its inhabitants are almoſt all Lutherans, but its principal churches belong to the Catholics. There are ſeveral handſome ſtructures, both public and private, but the houſes in general are but indifferently built. The adjacent country abounds with corn and wine, in which they have a good trade, as well as in worſted; eſpecially at the two great fairs in Trinity week and St. Martin's day. The cathedral is a handſome Gothic building, and famous for having the largeſt bell in all Germany. On the hill called Peterſberg, there is a Benedictine convent, and a handſome church. There are ſeveral other churches and convents worth notice. It is ſeated on the river Gera, thirty miles ſouth-eaſt of Mulhauſen, twenty ſouth-weſt of Weimar, and fifty north-by-east of Coburg. Long. 11. 14. E. Lat. 50. 49. N.

EPULONES, in Roman antiquity, an order of prieſts who aſſiſted at the ſacrifices, had the management of the ſacred banquet, and gave notice when feaſts were to be held in honour of the gods. At firſt they were only three in number, but afterwards they were encreaſed to ſeven. They had their name from a cuſtom which obtained among the Romans in time of public danger, of inviting the gods to a ſumptuous feaſt in their temples, when the ſtatues were brought on rich beds, with their pillows, and placed at the moſt honourable part of the table, as the principal gueſts: theſe regalios they called Epula, the care of which belonged to the Epulones.

ERACLIA, Ηραχλεια, in Grecian antiquity, a name given to ſeveral feſtivals obſerved in honour of Hercules.

ERAIA, Ηραια, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival at Argos, in honour of Juno, who was the protectreſs of that city; and it was alſo kept by the colonies from Argos, which inhabited the iſlands of Ægina and Samos. There were two proceſſions to the goddeſs's temple without the city, one by the men in armour; another, in which the prieſteſs of Juno, who was always a matron of the firſt quality, was drawn in a chariot by white oxen. From her prieſthood the Argians counted their years, as the Athenians did by the government of the Archons. On their arrival at the temple, they offered an hecatomb of oxen. There were alſo certain games wherein the victory conſiſted in pulling down a ſhield that was ſtrongly fixed upon the theatre.

Another feſtival of this name was celebrated every fifth year in Elis, where ſixteen matrons were appointed to weave a garment for the goddeſs. There were alſo games which are ſaid to have been firſt inſtituted by Hippodamia in honour of Juno, by whoſe aſſiſtance ſhe was married to Pelops. The preſidents were ſixteen matrons, each attended by a maid. The contenders were virgins, who, being diſtinguiſhed into ſeveral claſſes, according to their ages, ran races in their order, beginning from the youngeſt. The habit of all was the ſame; their hair was diſhevelled, their right ſhoulders bare, and their coats reached no lower than their knees. Thoſe who obtained the victory were rewarded with crowns of olive, had a ſhare of the ox that was offered in ſacrifice, and were permitted to dedicate their pictures to the goddeſs.

ERASMUS (Desiderius) one of the greateſt men that ever appeared in the republic of letters, was born at Rotterdam, October 28, 1467. He loſt his father and mother at fourteen years of age, and was committed to the care of certain guardians, who would force him to be an eccleſiaſtic, which he for a long time refuſed; but was at laſt obliged to aſſume the religious habit among the canons regular in the monaſtery of Stein, near Tergou, where he for ſome time amuſed himſelf with painting. He was ordained prieſt in 1492, and afterwards went to Paris to continue his ſtudies. He alſo ſtudied civil law at Orleans; travelled into England, and was exceedingly pleaſed with the erudition and other advantages of this country. He then went into Italy, ſtayed about a year at Bologna, when he wrote to Lambert Brunnius, ſecretary to pope Julius II. to deſire a diſpenſation from his vows, which he obtained. From thence he went to Venice; afterwards to Padua, and at length to Rome, where he was well received by the pope and cardinals, particularly by cardinal de Medicis, who was afterwards Leo X. In 1509, Eraſmus made another voyage to England, at the requeſt of his friends here, who made him expect great advantages from Henry VIII. He lodged with ſir Thomas More, lord chancellor of England, when he compoſed his Praiſe of Folly in Latin. He became Margaret profeſſor of divinity at Cambridge, Greek profeſſor at Oxford and Cambridge, and miniſter of Aldington in Kent. He then went to Baſil, on which Charles of Auſtria, ſovereign of the Low Countries, who was afterwards emperor under the title of Charles V. made him his counſellor of ſtate, and aſſigned him an annual penſion of two hundred florins, which was paid him till the year 1525. King Francis I. offered him much more conſiderable advantages to draw him into France; and pope Paul III. conceived the deſign of making him a cardinal; but Eraſmus was too much a proteſtant to take any ſtep towards being raiſed to that dignity. At length he quitted Friburg, where he had lived ſeveral years, on account of his ill ſtate of health, and returning to Baſil, was made rector of the univerſity. He there reviſed his works, and died on the 12th of July, 1536, aged fifty-eight. "This great man, "who was the boaſt and glory of his country," ſays Mr. Granger, "diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a reformer of religion, "and reſtorer of learning. His religion was as remote from "the bigotry and perſecuting ſpirit of the age in which he "lived, as his learning was from the pedantry and barba-"riſm of the ſchools. He was much eſteemed by the En-"gliſh nobility, whom he celebrates as the moſt learned in "the world. He lived in the ſtricteſt intimacy with More, "Lynacre, Colet, and Tonſtall; and preferred the ſociety "of his ingenious and learned friends to that of the greateſt "princes in Europe, ſeveral of whom ſought his acquain-"tance. We find in his works, particularly his Colloquies "and Epiſtles, a more juſt and agreeable picture of his own "times, than is to be met with in any other author. His "Moriæ Encomium will ever be admired for the trueſt wit "and humour." The beſt edition of his works is that by John Le Clerc, publiſhed at Leyden, in 1703, in ten volumes, folio. But as Eraſmus did not publicly embrace the ſentiments of Luther, and yet cenſured a great many things in popery, he has been cenſured, and treated very injuriouſly both by papiſts and proteſtants.

ERASTUS (Thomas) a famous phyſician, born in 1523, in the marquiſate of Baden Dourlach. He finiſhed his ſtudies at Bologna, and taught with reputation at Heidelburg, and afterwards at Baſil, where he died, on the firſt of January, 1582. He wrote ſeveral medicinal works, the principal of which are againſt Paracelſus; and a famous book De Excommunicatione Eccleſiaſtica.

ERATO, in fabulous hiſtory, one of the Muſes. She preſided over elegiac or amorous poetry, and dancing, and is repreſented as a young maiden crowned with myrtle and roſes, with a lyre in her right hand, and a bow in her left; with a little winged Cupid placed by her, armed with his bow and arrows.

ERATOSTRATUS, an obſcure Epheſian, who, to get himſelf a name, ſet fire to the temple of Epheſus, in the three hundred and fifty-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra; on which account the Epheſians made a law that nobody ſhould preſume ſo much as to pronounce his name; but this ſingular law was rather the means of perpetuating it.

ERATOSTHENES, a learned critic and philologer, born at Cyrene, about the two hundred and ſeventy-ſixth year before the Chriſtian æra. He was the ſcholar of Ariſton and Callimachus, and became librarian of Alexandria, under Ptolemy Evergetes, king of Egypt. He died in the one hundred and ninety-fourth year before the birth of Chriſt, aged eighty-one. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of all the ſciences, and was the firſt who diſcovered the method of meaſuring the compaſs of the earth. Some of his works are ſtill extant, and were printed at Oxford in 1672, in octavo.

ERCILLA y Cuniga (Don Alonzo d') a celebrated Spaniſh poet, who lived at the end of the ſixteenth century, going into Chili, engaged and defeated the Indians called Araucana, who had revolted againſt their conquerors the Spaniards; and on this occaſion, Don Alonzo d'Ercilla compoſed an epic poem, which he intitled Araucana, from the name of thoſe people. In this poem there appear new and bold thoughts, and a great deal of fire and elevation, though but little taſte in the invention, and beſides, the rules of an epic poem are not obſerved.

ERECTHEUS, the fifth king of Athens, ſucceeded Pandion about the one thouſand three hundred and ninety-ninth year before the Chriſtian æra, reigned fifty years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Cecrops. It is ſaid that Boreas ſtole his daughter Erythia, and had two ſons by her, Zetes and Calais.

EREMITA (Daniel) a native of Antwerp, and ſecretary to the duke of Florence, about the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. He wrote a Panegyric on the duke of Florence; an Epiſtle De Helveticorum, Rhetorum, Sedonenſium ſitu Republica & Moribus; ſome Latin Poems, &c. He died at Leghorn, in 1613.

ERICK, that is Henry, the name of fourteen kings of Sweden, the moſt known of which is Erick, the eldeſt ſon of Guſtavus I. and Catharine of Saxony. He aſcended the throne in 1560, and engaged in war, but without ſucceſs. His brothers John and Charles took up arms againſt him in 1568, and were joined by the principal nobility, who beſieged him in Stockholm; took him priſoner, confined him, and at length his brother John was proclaimed king by the general conſent of the nobles, and of all the orders of the ſtate.

ERICTHONIUS, the fourth king of Athens, ſucceeded Amphictyon about the one thouſand four hundred and eighty-ninth year before the Chriſtian æra, and reigned fifty years. He inſtituted the Panathenaic games, in honour of Minerva. And it is ſaid, that having legs crooked like ſerpents, he invented chariots to conceal their deformity. He was ſucceeded by Pandion.

ERIE, a great lake in North America, which is two hundred and forty miles from eaſt to weſt, and ſixty-five from north to ſouth. The middle of it is in about forty-nine degrees of latitude. It has a communication with the lake Ontario, by the ſtrait of Niagara, where there is one of the greateſt cataracts or water-falls in the world. Long. from 80. to 87 deg. W. Lat. 41. and 42. deg. N.

ERIGENA,

ERIGENA, (John) alſo called Scotus, a perſon of diſtinguiſhed learning, was, according to ſome, an Engliſhman, born at Ergene, a town bordering on Wales; according to others, a Scotſman, and others have repreſented him as an Iriſhman; but whichever he was, he flouriſhed about the middle of the ninthe entury, and was very learned in a barbarous age. He left his native country when young, and went into France, where he was kindly received by Charles the Bald, who was ſo fond of him, on account of his extraordinary parts and learning, that he made him the conſtant companion both of his pleaſures and his buſineſs. About the year 850, when the predeſtinarian controverſy was agitated, Erigena, engaged warmly in it; and drew great ill-will upon himſelf, though the books of his antagoniſts were condemned. This was ſuppoſed to have proceeded partly from ſomething in his writings, not agreeable to the doctrines of the church, and partly from envy on account of his intimacy with the king.

After the death of Charles, in 877, he returned to England, and ſome time after was employed by Alfred to promote learning and the liberal arts at Oxford, that univerſity being then lately reſtored by Alfred, and he there taught geometry and aſtronomy; but having ſpent three years in this ſituation, he left the univerſity on account of ſome diſputes and diſturbances which aroſe there, and retired to the monaſtery of Malmſbury, where he opened a ſchool; but behaving with ſeverity to his ſcholars, they ſtabbed him with the iron bodkins they then wrote with, in ſuch a manner, that he died, according to ſome, on the fourth of November 883, or according to others, in 886. Some ſay that his ſcholars were inſtigated to this cruel act by the monks, who hated him on account of his learning and his heterodoxy. Nevertheleſs we are told, that a miracle was wrought at his funeral by the deſcent of fire from heaven, which inſtantly changed their opinion, and they not only buried him in a more honourable place than they intended, but conſidered him as a ſaint and a martyr. And ſuch he continued to be in the Church of Rome, till ſome wiſer heads of late diſcovered that he had held opinions directly contrary to the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation, and then Baronius ſtruck him out of the martyrology. He wrote, 1. De Diviſione Naturæ, ſeu de Rerum Natura; 2. A Tranſlation from the Greek into Latin of the Ambigua S. Maximi, ſeu Scholia ejus in difficiles Locos S. Georgii Nazianzeni. Theſe two works were printed at Oxford in folio, in 1681. 3. A Tranſlation into Latin of four Pieces of Dionyſius the Areopagite; 4. A Work upon the Body and Blood of Chriſt; 5. A Work on Predeſtination, &c.

ERIGONE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Icarus, was ſo grieved at the murder of her father that ſhe hanged herſelf, on which Jupiter, to reward her filial piety, took her into the heavens, and placed her in the conſtellation Virgo.

ERISICHTHON, in fabulous hiſtory, a Theſſalian lord, who having cut down a foreſt conſecrated to Ceres, was reduced by that goddeſs to ſuch extreme hunger, that he proſtituted his daughter to obtain ſubſiſtence; and at length, having lived on his own fleſh, died diſtracted.

EROPUS, king of Macedon, ſucceeded his father Philip I. when but an infant. The Illyrians taking advantage of his minority, attacked the Macedonians, and defeated them; but afterwards, the infant being carried into the field, the ſoldiers, for fear of leaving it expoſed, fought deſperately, and gained a complete victory, about the 598th year before the Chriſtian æra.

ERPENIUS, (Thomas) in Dutch Thomas of Erpe, a celebrated profeſſor of the Arabic language, was born at Gorcum in Holland, in 1584, and educated at Leyden. He applied himſelf to the oriental languages at the perſuaſion of Joſeph Scaliger, and afterwards travelled into England, France, Italy, and Germany, and every where obtained the eſteem of the learned. On his return to Holland, he was made profeſſor of Arabic in the univerſity of Leyden, and died there on the 13th of November, 1624. He publiſhed a great many excellent works, which ſpread his reputation through the whole learned world. It is ſaid that the king of Morocco admired ſo greatly the letters Erpenius wrote to him in Arabic in the name of the United Provinces, that he could not ceaſe reading them, and ſhowing them to thoſe who ſpoke that language naturally.

ERIVAN, a city of Aſia, in Perſia, capital of Perſian Armenia. It is a large dirty ill-looking place, in which are no handſome bulidings, the houſes are very mean, and raiſed with earth or mud; but it is full of gardens and vineyards. It is ſituated in a plain which is ſurrounded on all ſides with mountains. Two rivers paſs near it, the Zengui to the north-weſt, and the Queur Boulac to the ſouth-weſt. The fortreſs may paſs for a town of itſelf; it is of an oval form, and is four miles in circumference, containing about eight hundred houſes. It is inhabited by none but the native Perſians. The Armenians have ſhops in it, where they work and trade in the day-time, but at night return to their habitation in the city. The fortreſs is ſurrounded with three walls, made with bricks dried in the ſun, which have battlements, and are flanked with towers, and defended with ramparts. On the north-eaſt there is a dreadful precipice, above two hundred yards in depth, at the bottom of which the river runs. The garriſon uſually conſiſted of two thouſand; but how many there is ſince the revolution is hard to ſay. The palace of the governor of the province is within the fortreſs. The city is about a cannon's ſhot diſtant from the fortreſs, and the ſpace between is full of houſes and markets. There are ſeveral churches in the city, the two principal of which are ancient ſtructures. The modern ones are ſmall, and half buried in the earth, inſomuch that they look like catacombs. Near the biſhop's houſe is a ſmall tower, but upon what occaſion it was built is not known. On the outſide there are characters reſembling the Armenian, but the Armenians cannot read them. The inſide is quite naked. Before it there is a large market-place, and near that a brick moſque now in ruins. Three hundred paces from hence there is a large ſquare called a maydan. It is two hundred paces in diameter, and is ſurrounded with trees. It is the place for public diverſions and exerciſes. There are many baths in the city, and in the fortreſs ſeveral caravanſeras. The portico of the fineſt is eighty paces deep, and forms a handſome gallery, which is full of ſhops, where they ſell all ſorts of ſtuffs. Before it is a market-place, ſurrounded with ſhops, in which all ſorts of proviſions are ſold.

The country about Erivan is very fruitful, and produces good wine, and very cheap. The Armenians affirm that Noah planted the vine near this city, and pretend to ſhow the very ſpot. Patridges, trouts, and carp, are extremely good and cheap. The two laſt they have from the lake of Erivan, which is ſeventy miles in compaſs, and very deep. It is ſixty miles north-weſt from the town. The moſques of this place have nothing particular worth mentioning. Erivan is one hundred and five miles north-weſt of Aſtrabad, and two hundred eaſt of Erzerum. Long. 44. 50. E. Lat. 40. 20. N.

ERKELENS, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Juliers, with a caſtle. Long. 5. 49. E. 50. 27. N.

ERLANG, a town of Germany, in the circle of Franconia, and marquiſate of Cullembach, thirteen miles north-weſt of Nuremberg. Long. 11. 7. E. Lat. 49. 38. N.

ERZERUM, or Erzeron, a city of Turky, in Aſia, and capital of Armenia, or Turkomania. It is a pretty large town, five days journey from the Black Sea, and ten from the frontiers of Perſia. It ſtands in a delightful plain, at the foot of a chain of mountains, which hinder the Frat, or Euphrates, from falling into the Black Sea. The winters are exceeding ſharp here, and it is ſometimes very cold in the middle of June. They do not get in their harveſt till September. The country is quite bare of wood, inſomuch that their common fewel is cow-dung. The fruits are brought from Georgia, particularly pears, plums, cherries, and melons. A neighbouring hill ſupplies very fine ſprings, which not only water the fields, but the ſtreets of the town.

Erzerum is ſurrounded with double walls, defended by pentagonal towers, but the ditches are neither deep nor well kept up. The beglerbeg, or baſhaw of the province, lives in the ſeraglio, which is very ill built. They reckon that there are eighteen thouſand Turks at Erzerum, ſix thouſand Armenians, and ten thouſand Greeks. In the province are ſixty thouſand Armenians, and ten thouſand Greeks.

The Armenians have a biſhop, and two churches; and the Greeks have a biſhop, but the church is a miſerable place. The laſt are moſtly braziers, inhabiting the ſuburbs, who work the copper brought from the neighbouring mountains. They drive a great trade in copper utenſils and furs, particularly martins ſkins. Five or ſix days journey from the town there are oaks which produce plenty of gall-nuts, which are brought hither.

This place is the thoroughfare and reſting place of all the merchants trading to the Indies, eſpecially when the Arabs are watching for their prey round Aleppo and Bagdad. The plain of Erzerum is incloſed between two beautiful ſtreams which forms the Euphrates. Long 40. 50. E. Lat. 39 46. N.

ESAU, the ſon of Iſaac and Rebecca, was born in the 1836th year before the Chriſtian æra. He ſold his birth right to his brother Jacob for a meſs of pottage; and againſt the will of his father married amongſt the Canaanites. Jacob fradulently deprived him of his father's bleſſing, and then fled to Laban to eſcape the effects of his anger. At length, however, they were reconciled, after which Eſau retired to Seir in Idumia, where he died about the 1710th year before before the birth of Chriſt, aged an hundred and twenty-ſeven, leaving a numerous family.

ESCALIN, (ANTHONY) a celebrated captain in the ſixteenth century, born of an obſcure family at la Garde, in Dauphine. He raiſed himſelf by his wit and courage, ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral occaſions, and in 1542, was ſent ambaſſador to the Porte from the French king, Francis I. He at length became baron of la Garde, and general of the gallies, acquired great reputation both by ſea and land, and died on the 30th of May, 1578, aged eighty. Hiſtorians frequently call him captain Poulin or Polin, which was his name before his advancement.

ESCOBAR DE MENDOZA, (ANTHONY) a famous caſuiſt among the Jeſuits; wrote a Treatiſe on Moral Divinity; Commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, and other works. He died on the 4th of July, 1669, at above eighty years of age.

ESCURIAL, a palace which takes its name from a village about fifteen miles north-weſt of Madrid, the capital of Spain. It is the largeſt and moſt ſuperb ſtructure in the whole kingdom, and perhaps one of the fineſt in Europe. It was begun by Philip II. in 1557 who was twenty-two years in building it. He called it St. Laurence of the Eſcurial, becauſe he had gained a battle over the French on that ſaint's day.

It contains as many different buildings as are uſually met with in a city; for there is a royal palace, a church, a college, a library, cloiſters, ſhops for mechanics, lodgings for great numbers of people, fine walks, large alleys, a vaſt park, and gardens with water-works. It is built in a dry barren ſpot, ſurrounded with rugged mountains, inſomuch, that every thing that grows there is owing to art. This place was choſen only for the ſake of the ſtone wherewith it is built, which is got from a mountain juſt by, and is very durable.

The way from the village to the Eſcurial, is along a walk planted with four rows of elm and lime-trees, about a mile and a half in length. There is a glacis round the building, which, before the front, is ſeparated from the ſquare by walls, through which there are gates to enter the ſquare. The ſquare is paved with ſtones of different figures, diſpoſed into compartments.

The ſtructure itſelf is almoſt ſquare, and is a little longer one way than the other; all the walls are conſtructed with grey ſtone, ſo well poliſhed, that it looks like marble. This noble ſtructure has eleven thouſand windows, ſeventeen cloiſters, twenty-two courts, eight hundred columns, a prodigious number of chambers, halls, ſaloons, and cloſets.

ESDRAS, a Jewiſh prieſt, and doctor of the law, during the captivity acquired the eſteem of Artaxerxes Longimanus. That prince ſent him to Jeruſalem with rich preſents for the temple, which had been rebuilt under Zerubbabel, and gave orders to the governors of the neighbouring provinces, to furniſh whatever ſhould be neceſſary to encreaſe the ſplendor of divine worſhip. Eſdras arrived at Jeruſalem in the 467th year before the birth of Chriſt, when he dedicated the city, and read the law to the people. He is alſo generally ſuppoſed to have collected and reviſed the books which form the canon of ſcripture. He wrote the firſt of the four books which bear his name, a part of which is written in Chaldee, and a part in Hebrew; the ſecond ſeems to have been written after his death, and the two laſt are accounted apocryphal even by the Church of Rome.

ESK, a river, which is part of the boundary between England and Scotland. It runs from the north-eaſt to the ſouth-weſt, and falls into Solway Frith.

ESKIMAUX, the inhabitants of a country called Eſkimaux, or Terra Labrador, to the north of the river of St. Laurence, in North America. But this cannot properly be their country, for they are ſometimes in one place, and ſometimes in another, for in the ſummer they are ſeen in Newfoundland. Though they wander about in a vaſt country, they are very few in number, being hardly ſufficient to people two or three villages. They are ſuppoſed to be ſo called from the words Abnaqui Eſquimantſic, which ſignify eaters of raw fleſh, for they are the only ſavages of America that live upon fleſh without dreſſing it; however, they ſometimes dry it in the ſun. They are the only people in this continent that have any beards, beſides thoſe that have ſettled here, and came originally from other countries. Their beards are very thick, and reach up to the eyes, inſomuch that you cannot diſcover any feature in their faces. Their eyes are ſmall, and look very wild, their teeth are large and foul; their hair is generally black, and hangs over their foreheads in a frightfull manner.

They will eat nothing though never ſo good that the Europeans give them. They always wear cloaths winter and ſummer, and their ſkins are white, which ſhews they are of a different original from the inhabitants of the reſt of America.

Their clothes are a ſort of ſhirt, made of the guts of large fiſh, cut into fillets, and ſewed together, over which there is a ſort of waiſtcoat of bear-ſkin, or of ſome other wild beaſt. Some have them made of the ſkins of birds, with a hood like that of a capuchin, to put over their heads, of the ſame materials as the ſhirt. The ſhirt comes no lower than the waiſt, but the waiſtcoat, or rather caſſock, reaches to their thighs behind, and before terminates in a point a little lower than the girdle. But that of the women reaches to the middle of the leg, and is faſtened on with a girdle from which hang little bones. The men have breeches made of ſkins, with the hair on the inſide, which are faced with ermine, or other furs. Their ſtockings are alſo of ſkins, with the hair on the inſide, over which they have boots of the ſame, then another pair of ſtockings, and then boots again. Their arms are nothing but arrows, which are pointed at the end with the teeth of a ſea cow. Sometimes there is iron at the end, when they can get it. In the ſummer they live in the open air day and night, and in the winter lodge in caves, where they lie promiſcouſly all together.

ESLINGEN, a city of Germany, in the circle of Suabia, and duchy of Wirtemberg. It is an imperial free city, and is pretty large, with five ſuburbs. It had a univerſity, which is come to nothing ſince the year 1732, becauſe the univerſity of Tubingen, and the college of Stutgard are in the neighbourhood. The inhabitants are chiefly Proteſtants, and yet there are ſeveral convents in this city. It is ſeated on the Neckar, five miles ſouth-eaſt of Stutgard, fifteen north-eaſt of Tubingen, and forty north-weſt of Ulm. Long. 9. 18. E. Lat. 48. 46. N.

ESMOUTIER, a town of France in Limoſin, eighteen miles from Limoges. Long. 1. 47. E. Lat. 15. 42. N.

ESMENDREVILLE (JOHN DU BASE, lord of) preſident of the court of Aids at Roan, was executed with Marlorat a Proteſtant miniſter, and ſome others, as being one of thoſe who principally occaſioned the reſiſtance which that city made to the arms of the French king, in the civil wars of Charles IX. He was beheaded, and his body hanged on a gibbet, on the firſt of November, 1562.

ESPEN (ZEGER BERNARD VAN) a famous civilian and learned canoniſt, born at Louvain, on the 9th of July, 1646, where he was admitted doctor of law in 1675. He taught with reputation in the college of pope Adrian VI. but having approved as canonical the conſecration of Mr. Steenhoven, archbiſhop of Utrecht, he was obliged to retire to Maeſtricht, and from thence went to Amersfort, where he died, on the 2d of October, 1728, aged eighty-three. The moſt excellent of his works is his Jus Eccleſiaſticum univerſum, in which he diſcovers great knowledge in eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, both ancient and modern.

ESPENCE (CLAUDIUS D') a famous doctor of the Sorbonne, was born at Chalons ſur Marne, in 1511. He wrote, 1. A Commentary on St Paul's Epiſtles to Timothy and Titus. 2. A Treatiſe on Clandeſtine Marriages; and other works on Continence, the Adoration of the Euchariſt, the Maſs, &c. and died on the 5th of October, 1571, aged ſixty.

ESPERIENTE (PHILIP CALIMACO) a learned writer of the fifteenth century, was born at San Gimignano, in Florence, of the noble and illuſtrious family of Buonaccorti. He went to Rome under the pontificate of Pius II. and there, with Pomponius Lætus, formed an academy, all the members of which took Latin or Greek names. The learned perſon of whom we are now ſpeaking, changed his name of Buonaccorti to that of Calimaco; but the ſurname Eſperiente was given him on account of his great experience in public affairs. Paul II. imagining that the new academy concealed ſome pernicious myſtery, proſecuted the members with ſuch rigour, that Eſperiente fled to Poland, where king Caſimir III. entruſted him with the education of his children, and ſome time after made him his ſecretary. That prince afterwards ſent him ſucceſſively as his ambaſſador to Conſtantinople, Vienna, Venice, and Rome. At his return to Poland his houſe was ſet on fire, and his moveables, his library, and ſeveral of his writings, conſumed, which gave him great concern. He died at Cracow in 1496. He wrote, 1. Commentaria Rerum Perſicarum, folio. 2. Hiſt. de iis quæ a Venetis tentata ſunt Perſis & Tartaris contra Turcas movendis, &c. 3. Attila, which is a Hiſtory of that King of the Huns, in quarto. 4. Hiſtoria de Rege Uladiſlao, ſeu clade Varnenſi, in quarto. Paulus Jovius was of opinion, that in this hiſtory Eſperiente excells all the hiſtorians that have written ſince Tacitus.

ESPERNAY, a town of France, in Champagne. It was formerly fortified in the ancient manner, but now the fortifications are all deſtroyed. It is ſeated in an agreeable place, on the river Marne, where the country produces excellent wine. It is eighteen miles north-weſt of Chalons, lons, fifteen ſouth of Rheims, and ſeventy-five eaſt-by-north of Paris. Long. 4. 11. E. Lat. 49. 2. N.

ESPERNON, a town of France, in Beauce, ſeated on the river Gueſle, five miles from Chartres. Long. 0. 45. E. Lat. 48. 35. N.

ESPINAL, a town of Lorrain, near the mountains of Voſga, where there is a nunnery, which takes in no girls but what are of noble families. It is famous for the paper-mills which are near it. It was formerly fortified, but is now diſmantled. It is ſeated on the Moſelle, ten miles north-weſt of Remiremont, and thirty-five ſouth-eaſt of Nancy. Long. 6. 20. E. Lat. 48. 26. N.

ESPRIT (JAMES) counſellor of ſtate, and member of the French academy, was born at Beziers in 1611, and died at Paris in 1678. He publiſhed a Paraphraſe on the Pſalms, ſome Letters, and a Work entitled the Falſity of Human Virtues, which is only a Commentary on Rochefoucault.

ESSE (ANDREW DE MONTALEMBERT, lord of) a French general of great bravery, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century. He ſignalized himſelf by his courage on ſeveral occaſions, particularly in the defence of Landrecy, when beſieged by the emperor in the year 1543, where, with ruined fortifications, and a garriſon diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, he forced the emperor to retire.

ESSECK, is a town of Sclavonia, in Hungary, and the moſt remarkable place in the country, on account of a bridge built by the Turks. This bridge is built of wood, and is eight miles and five hundred and ſixty-five paces long, and ſeventeen paces broad. It is over the river Drave, at ſome diſtance from the place where it falls into the Danube. The reaſon of its being ſo long is, becauſe the fens or marſhes are overflowed It has towers built on it at the diſtance of every quarter of a mile, and has handſome rails on each ſide. That part of the bridge over the Drave was burnt down by count Serini in the Turkiſh wars, and is now ſupplied by a bridge of boats. The town is large, well fortified, and populous. The fort of Dard, which defends the town, is ſeated on the farther ſide of the Danube. Eſſeck was abandoned by the Turks in 1687, after the battle of Harſa. It is ninety miles weſt-by-north of Belgrade, one hundred and thirteen ſouth of Buda, and one hundred and ſeventy-five ſouth-by-eaſt of Vienna. Long. 20. 25. E. Lat 46. 20. N.

ESSEN, a city of Germany, which is free and imperial, and is governed by a ſenate of Proteſtant counſellors. Near the wall is a handſome nunnery of the order of St. Benedict, which depends immediately on the empire. They make a large quantity of ſword-blades and fire-arms at Eſſen. It is ten miles north-eaſt of Duiſburg, and fifteen ſouth of Dorſten. Long. 6. 39. Lat. 51. 31. N.

ESSENES, a ſect among the Jews, who were divided into two ſorts, the Practics and the Theoretics. The firſt lived in cities, the other in ſolitary places. The Eſſenes in general profeſſed a community of goods, for the moſt part ſhunned marriage, and all pleaſures whatſoever, wore white garments, forbad oaths, drank nothing but water, had their elders in ſingular reſpect, and were ſo ſtrict in the obſervation of the ſabbath, that on that day they would not remove a veſſel out of its place, nor even ſupply or eaſe nature upon it without the moſt urgent neceſſity. Philo alſo ſays, that they offered no ſacrifices to God, but thoſe of a pure and upright heart; but Joſephus obſerves, that upon certain occaſions they brought preſents to the temple.

ESSEX, is a large populous county, bounded on the eaſt by the German Sea, on the weſt by the river Stort, which divides it from Hertfordſhire, and by the river Lea, which parts it from Middleſex; on the ſouth by the river Thames, which ſeparates it from Kent, and on the ſouth-eaſt by part of Cambridgeſhire and Suffolk, from which laſt it is divided by the river Stour. It is fifty miles in length, from Harwich in the eaſt to Birchanger in the weſt, and forty-ſeven in breadth, from Tilbury Fort in the ſouth to Haveril in the north. It contains twenty hundreds, twenty-two market-towns, four hundred and fifteen pariſhes, forty-ſix parks, one foreſt, one million two hundred and forty thouſand acres of land, thirty-four thouſand eight hundred and nineteen houſes, and two hundred and thirty-eight thouſand eight hundred ſouls. It ſends eight members to parliament, that is, two knights of the ſhire, and for Colcheſter, Malden, and Harwich, two each.

The chief rivers are the Thames, the Stower, the Lea, the Stort, the Coln, the Chelmer, the Blackwater, the Crouch, and the Roding, which contain variety of fiſh. The air of this country is very healthful, except in the Hundreds, where the inhabitants are ſubject to agues of a very bad ſort. Among theſe Rochford and Dengy hundreds are the worſt; and yet in theſe places the ſoil is very rich, and anſwers the expectation of the huſbandmen, by whom they are chiefly inhabited, for the owners of the land ſeldom chooſe to live there. Some of the inland parts are more barren and healthy; but near the rivers and market-towns the ſoil conſiſts of clay and loam, which yields plentiful crops.

No county in England abounds more in proviſions of all ſorts, of which great quantities are ſent to London, both by ſea and land, particularly butter, cheeſe, and calves. Out of the ſea they have ſoals, plaice, flounders, maids, lobſters, and oyſters, of which laſt thoſe from Colcheſter are moſt famous, being ſent in barrels all over the kingdom. Another commodity, almoſt peculiar to this county, is ſaffron, which is the beſt in the world. It is cultivated chiefly about Saffron-Walden, on the edge of Cambridgeſhire. Every acre will yield eighty or one hundred pounds of wet ſaffron, which looſes its weight greatly before it is dried. The waters in the Hundreds are very indifferent, and in ſome places near the ſea brackiſh, but in other places they are very good. The chief manufacture is the woollen, which is carried on at Colcheſter, Halſtead, Braintree, and other places. The inhabitants make baize, ſays, ſerges, ſhalloons, &c. In ſome places they ſpin a great quantity of yarn, which is ſent up to Spitalfields in London. Colcheſter and Bocking baize are in great eſteem.

ESSEX (earl of). See the article DEVEREUX.

ESTAIN, a ſmall ancient town of France, in the duchy of Bar, fifteen miles north-eaſt of Verden. Long. 5. 43 E. Lat. 49. 15. N.

ESTAMPES (VALENÇAY ACHILLES D') knight of Malta, and a celebrated cardinal, was the ſon of John d' Eſtampes, lord of Valençay, and was born at Tours, on the fifth of July, 1593, and early engaged in the profeſſion of arms. He commanded at the ſiege of Rochelle in quality of vice-admiral, and after the reduction of that city, was made marſhal de camp. He at length became general of the gallies, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the taking of St. Maura, and in the Archipelago. Some time after he was invited to Rome by pope Urban VIII. to ſerve him in the affair between him and the duke of Parma; he was ſoon after made general of the army of the Holy See, under cardinal Antonio Barberini, and on the 4th of December, 1643, was created cardinal. He vigorouſly maintained the intereſt of France againſt the Spaniſh ambaſſador, and died on the 7th of July, 1646, at fifty-three years of age. He was a bold, brave, and enterprizing man, who performed the moſt difficult things with the greateſt eaſe.

ESTAMPES (ANNE DE PISSELEU, ducheſs of). See PISSELEU.

ESTAMPES, a town of France, in Beauce, ſeated on the river Juine, in the middle of meadows, ſurrounded with hills, which are planted with vines, intermixed with fruit-trees, gardens, and houſes of pleaſure. The great church, the collegiate church of Notre Dame, and that of St. Martin, are all the conſiderable buildings. There is an old caſtle, ſaid to be built by king Robert. Eſtampes is thirty miles eaſt of Chartres, thirty-five north-by-eaſt of Orleans, and thirty-three ſouth of Paris. Long. 2. 20. E. Lat. 48. 25. N.

ESTAPLES, a ſea-port town of France, in Picardy, which is gone very much to decay. It is ſeated at the mouth of the river Canche, ten miles from Boulogne, and one hundred and twenty-five north of Paris. Long. 1. 29. E. Lat. 50. 31. N.

ESTAPO, a ſtrong town of America, in New Spain, inhabited by Spaniards and Indians. It is ſeated at the mouth of the river Tlaluc. Long. 103. 55. W. Lat. 17. 50. N.

ESTAVEYER, a town of Swiſſerland, in the canton of Fribourg. It is a handſome place, on the ſide of the lake of Neufchatel. There is a very high caſtle on the ſide of the lake, as alſo a convent of Urſuline nuns. In the diſtrict of this town the banks of the lake are very high, and in many places full of craggy rocks. Not far from Eſtaveyer is the monaſtery of Chartreux monks. Long. 6. 55. E. Lat. 46. 46. N.

ESTE, a town of Italy, in the ſtate of Venice, and in the Paduan. It is fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Padua, and twenty ſouth-eaſt of Vicenza. Long. 12. 12. E. Lat. 45. 30. N.

ESTELLA, a town of Spain, in the kingdom of Navarre. It is a handſome place, ſeated on the river Egra, in a pleaſant valley. It is fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Pampeluna, and twenty-five north of Calahorra. Long. 2. 12. W. Lat. 42. 35. N.

ESTEPA, a town of Andaluſia, with an ancient caſtle, ſeated on a mountain. It is fifteen miles ſouth of Ecija, and ſeventy-three north-by-weſt of Malaga. Long. 5. 9. W. Lat. 37. 10. N.

ESTHER, the niece, or rather couſin-german of Mordecai, a Jew of the tribe of Benjamin. She lived at Suſa, married Ahaſuerus, after that prince had divorced Vaſhti, his firſt wife, and ſaved the life of Mordecai, and of the Jews, whom Hammon, the favourite of Ahaſuerus, had reſolved to deſtroy. The Jews inſtituted the feaſt of Purim as a perpetual memorial of this deliverance.

ESTIUS (William) a famous divine, born at Gorcum, in Holland, ſtudied at Utrecht, and afterwards at Louvain, where he obtained the degree of doctor, in 1580. Some time after, he taught at Douay, with great reputation, and became chancellor of the univerſity in that city. He died on the 20th of September, 1613, aged ſeventy-two. His principal works are. 1. Commentaries on St. Paul's Epiſtles; 2. A Theological work, in two volumes, folio; and, 3. Notes on the difficult Paſſages in the Holy Scriptures.

ESTIOLLE (Claudius de l') lord of Sauſſay, and one of the ancient members of the French academy, was born at Paris, and wrote ſome dramatic pieces, and ſeveral odes. He died in 1652.

ESTONIA is a province of the Ruſſian empire, and part of Livonia. It is bounded on the eaſt by the Baltic ſea, on the north by the Gulph of Finland, on the weſt by Ingria, and on the ſouth by Lettonia. It is divided into ſix diſtricts, 1. Harrien; 2. Wireland; 3. Alentakin; 4. Wich; 5. Jerven; and, 6. Odepoa. The principal towns are, Revel, Weiſenberg, Borckholm, Narva, Nyſlot, Habſal, Derpt, St. Elin, Pernau, and Roderſwick.

In former times the inhabitants of this country carried on a good trade in corn, which was dried in ſtoves: but wars have much diſpeopled the country, inſomuch that not a fourth part of it is inhabited, and a great number of gentlemen's ſeats lie in ruins.

ESTRADES (Godfrey Count d') marſhal of France, and governor of Dunkirk, ſerved in Holland under prince Maurice, and in 1621 was ſent ambaſſador-extraordinary into England. In 1662 he concluded the treaty of Breda, and was afterwards intruſted with ſeveral other important negociations. He died on the 26th of February, 1686, aged ſeventy-nine. An Extract of his Memoirs were publiſhed at the Hague in 1743, in nine volumes, duodecimo.

ESTRAMADURA, a province of Spain, has New Caſtile on the eaſt Leon on the north, Andaluſia on the ſouth, and Portugal on the weſt. It is one hundred and ſeventy-five miles in length, and one hundred in breadth; and its principal towns are, Calatrava, Menda, and Badajoz, on the river Guadiana; Alcantara, on the Tajo; and Cona and Placentia, to the north of this river. Theſe two rivers, which traverſe this province in length, render it extremely fertile. Beſides theſe, there are three ſmaller rivers, the Alegon, which paſſes by Coria, and falls into the Tajo; the Almonte, which has its riſe in the mountains of Calatrava, and falls into the ſame river; and the Zaja, which has its ſource in the mountains of Sierra Morena, and runs into the Guadiana, a little below Medellin.

Eſtramadura enjoys a very pure and healthful air, and its mountains are full of wild and tame animals; they having woods and foreſts for the one ſort, and paſtures for the other. The fields are planted with fruit-trees, which bear all kinds of delicious fruit; ſuch as, pears, apples, nuts, cheſnuts, figs, lemons, citrons, pomegranates, and oranges. The vineyards produce excellent wines of all colours, and the fields yield plenty of corn.

Estramadura, a province of Portugal near the mouth of the Tagus or Tajo, is bounded on the north by Beira, on the eaſt and ſouth by Alentejo, and on the weſt by the Atlantic Ocean. It is about eighty eight miles in length, and forty-five in breadth. The rivers beſides the Tagus are, the Zezem, which comes from the province of Beira, paſſes to Pedragan, and falls into the Tagus near Punheta; the Nabon, which runs to Tomar, and empties itſelf into the Zezera; the Rio de Soura, which proceeds from the mountain Tapiæus, or Sera de Anzaon, runs to Soura, and loſes itſelf in the Mondego; the Soro, to the ſouth of the Tagus, runs from the eaſt to the weſt, and receiving ſeveral ſmaller ſtreams, ſeparates Eſtramadura from Alentejo, and falls into the Tagus between Benevento and Salvaterra; the Zadaon, coming from Alentejo, runs from the ſouth to the north, and turning weſtward enters Eſtramadura, and keeping between theſe two provinces, falls into the ſea, near Setubal.

This province is divided into ſix comarcas, viz. Litria, Liſbon, Tomar, Santaren, and Alanquar, to the north of the Tagus; and that of Setubal, to the ſouth of this river. Theſe are likewiſe the principal towns.

Eſtramadura is equal, if not preferable, to any other province in Spain or Portugal. The diſtrict of Santaren produces ſuch plenty of corn, and feeds ſo many flocks of ſheep, that it may enter into competition with Sicily. The fruits and the wines are all excellent; and it was here that the ſweet oranges brought from China were firſt planted, and of which there are large quantities tranſported to foreign parts, with the wines and other fruits. The fields are covered with flowers almoſt all the year, from which the bees collect large quantities of fine honey. The olive-trees are numerous, from which they have excellent oil. The rivers abound with good fiſh, and the mountains have quarries of ſeveral kinds. The river Tagus was formerly noted for the gold mixed with her ſands, which is now perhaps not thought worth while to ſeek after. In ſhort, the air is ſo ſoft and mild, that there is almoſt a perpetual ſpring.

ESTREES (John d') grand maſter of the French artillery, and one of the moſt able commanders of his time, was at firſt page to queen Anne of Brittany. He performed ſignal ſervices for Francis I. and Henry II. and was preſent at the taking of Calais, in 1558. He is ſaid to be the firſt gentleman of Picardy who embraced the proteſtant religion. He died in a very advanced age, in 1567.

Etrees (Francis Hannibal d') duke, peer, and marſhal of France, was born in 1573. He at firſt embraced the ſtate of an eccleſiaſtic, and king Henry IV. nominated him to the biſhoprick of Laon; but he quitted that biſhoprick, to embrace the profeſſion of arms; when he diſtinguiſhed himſelf on ſeveral occaſions; particularly, he ſuccoured the duke of Mantua, took Treves, and was ambaſſador-extraordinary to Rome. He died at Paris, on the 5th of May, 1670, aged ninety-eight. He wrote Memoirs of the Regency of Mary de Medicis; an Account of the Siege of Mantua, in 1630; and of the Intrigues of the Conclave in which Pope Gregory XV. was elected, in 1621.

Estrees (Victor Maria duke d') born on the 30th of December, 1660, ſucceeded his father in the poſt of vice-admiral of France, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Levant. In 1691 he bombarded Barcelona and Alicant; in 1701 was made lieutenant-general of the fleet of Philip V. king of Spain, and marſhal of France in 1705. The duke d'Eſtrees commanded the fleet in 1704 under the count of Thouloufe, at the battle of Malaga, and was made a grandee of Spain, and knight of the golden fleece. He was received an honorary member of the Academy of Sciences in 1707, of the French Academy in 1715, and an honorary member of that of Inſcriptions and Belles Lettres in 1726. He died at Paris, without, iſſue, on the 28th of December, 1737, aged ſeventy-ſeven.

ESTREMOS, a town of Portugal, in the province of Alentejo, is well fortified, and populous. It ſtands upon a high mountain, and is ſurrounded by a ditch. It is divided into the upper and lower town, of which the latter is moſt regular and beſt fortified; and all its fortifications are covered with free-ſtone. The houſes are white on the outſide, and the principal are adorned with fine marble columns. This marble is obtained from a rock cloſe by the town, and has been made uſe of for ſome of the moſt ſtately ſtructures in Spain and Portugal. There is in this town a tower entirely conſtructed of this marble, by king Denys I. The ſtones are ſo well poliſhed, that when the ſun ſhines upon them, they glitter extremely. Here they make veſſels of a ſort of earth, which are highly eſteemed in many parts of Europe for their fine ſmell. Without the town is a ſpring, which ſends out its waters in ſo full a ſtream, that it is ſufficient to turn a mill immediately: however, it dries up in winter, as do moſt of the other ſprings. In 1663, the Portugueſe gained a complete victory over the Spaniards near this place. It is ſeated thirty-eight miles weſt of Badajoz, and ſeventy-five eaſt of Liſbon. Long. 8. 12. W. Lat 38. 44. N.

ESWEGEN, or Eschwegen, a town of Germany, in the territory of Heſſe-Caſſel, is next to Caſſel the principal town in the country. The ſtreets are fine and large, and it has a handſome caſtle. At ſome diſtance from this town is the mountain called Weiſener, which is ſaid to be the higheſt in Lower Heſſe. There are a great many uncommon plants growing upon it, and it contains mines of pit-coal. It is twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of the city of Caſſel. Long. 0 48. E. Lat. 51. 24. N.

ETEOCLES, the ſon of Œdipus and Jocaſta, divided the kingdom of Thebes with his brother Polynices, on condition that they ſhould reign by turns. Eteocles, being the eldeſt, reigned the firſt year; but afterwards refuſed to reſign the throne to his brother. This refuſal kindled the famous Theban war, in which the two brothers engaged, and killed each other.

ETHALIDES, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Mercury, who being allowed by his father to wiſh for whatever he deſired, except immortality, aſked to have the power of remembering all the tranſmigrations of his ſoul after death. Heraclides Ponticus, to gain credit to his doctrine of the tranſmigration, pretended that he himſelf was this Ethalides.

ETHELBALD, king of England, ſucceeded his father Ethelwolf (to whom he had been very undutiful) in 857; but Ethelbert, his brother, had a ſhare in the kingdom, Kent, Eſſex, Surry, aud Suſſex being bequeathed to him by his father. The moſt remarkable particular in Ethelbald's reign is his falling in love with his mother-in-law, his father's widow, whom he married. But dying without iſſue, after a reign of three years, the whole kingdom devolved to his brother Ethelbert.

ETHEL-

ETHELBERT, king of Kent, ſucceeded Emeric, his father, and, about the year 560, married Bertha, a Chriſtian princeſs, the daughter of Charibert, king of France. This princeſs was allowed the free exerciſe of her religion, and by her conduct greatly contributed to the converſion of the Engliſh, and particularly of Ethelbert, who became the firſt Chriſtian king of the Saxon race. In his reign pope Gregory the Great ſent ſome monks into England, under Auguſtine, their abbot, who, on their arrival, ſent word to Ethelbert, that they were come to offer him heaven, by a God unknown to the Saxons; and the queen perſuaded him to hearken to the pope's miſſionaries: upon which, he ſent for them to come before him, and gave them audience in an open field, purſuant to a ſuperſtitious notion, that if they ſhould employ ſecret inchantments to deceive him, they would be diſperſed, and loſe all their power, in the open air. After Auguſtine's ſermon, he told them, "that "though he was greatly delighted with what he heard, "yet, as thoſe things were new to him, he ſhould pro- "ceed leiſurely in his determination." He, however, gave them permiſſion to preach in his kingdom, and allowed every one who approved of their doctrine to embrace it, and at length became their convert himſelf. Ethelbert died in 616, after a reign of fifty-ſix years.

ETHELBERT, king of England, was the ſecond ſon of Ethelwolf, and ſucceeded his brother in 860, when he obtained the government of the whole kingdom. He was a brave and virtuous prince. In his reign the Danes landed in the Weſt, and having ſacked Wincheſter, burnt that city to the ground: but he beat them back to their ſhips, and forced them to leave their booty behind. Five years after they returned to Thanet, when the Kentiſh men, wearied out with their frequent alarms, agreed with them for a ſum of money; which not being paid in time, the Danes roſe in the night, and ravaged all the eaſt of Kent. Ethelbert died in 866, and was buried at Sherburn.

ETHELRED I. king of England, was the third ſon of Ethelwolf, and ſucceeded his brother Ethelbert, in the year 866. He was brave, prudent, and pious; but had no ſooner aſcended the throne, than the Danes ravaged England, plundered the city of York, and wintered in Mercia. The next year they laid waſte all the country, till they came into Weſſex, where nine battles were fought, in one of which Ethelred ſlew one of their kings, nine earls, and a great number of common ſoldiers; but about fourteen days after, Ethelred's army was routed in another battle, and himſelf ſlain: others, however, ſay, that he died of the plague, in 872, in the ſixth year of his reign. He was ſucceeded by Alfred the Great, his youngeſt brother.

ETHELRED II. king of England, was the ſecond ſon of Edgar and Elfrida, and ſucceeded Edward the Martyr, on that prince's being murdered, by order of Elfrida, while drinking on horſeback at her gate. He was covetous, indolent, and a coward. The Danes, who had ſettled in England, treating the natives on all occaſions with great inſolence, he, by a ſecret commiſſion, cauſed them all to be aſſaſſinated in one night; which induced Sweyn, king of Denmark, to invade his dominions; and, Ethelred being deſpiſed and hated by his ſubjects, the Danes eaſily prevailed, and having defeated his forces, obliged him to pay thirty thouſand pounds, raiſed on the Engliſh, by a tax called Danegelt. With this booty Sweyn ſailed to Denmark: but returning the next year, with a more powerful army, he entirely conquered the kingdom. Upon which, Ethelred eſcaped into Normandy; but on the death of Sweyn, which happened ſoon after, he returned to England, where he died, in the year 1016, after a reign of thirty ſeven years; and was ſucceeded by his ſon Edmund Ironſides.

ETHELSTAN, king of the Weſt Saxons. See ATHELSTAN.

ETHELWOLF, the ſecond king of England of the Saxon race, ſucceeded his father Egbert the Great, in the year 836. He had been biſhop of Wincheſter, and was eſteemed a pious, wiſe, and peaceable prince: on which, the Danes, thinking to take advantage of his mild and pacific diſpoſition, invaded England, and plundered London; but, in 851, he cut moſt of them to pieces: and they returning about two years after, he obtained two ſuch ſignal victories over them, that, according to ſome hiſtorians, not one of the Danes eſcaped to tell their countrymen the news. This king freed the church lands from all tribute; and afterwards going to Rome with his younger ſon Alfred, and being kindly received by pope Leo IV. he had the folly to render his kingdom tributary to the papal ſee, by obliging every family in his dominions to pay to the pope one ſhilling annually, which was called Rome's ſcot, or Peter-pence. During his abſence, he concluded a marriage between his ſon Alfred and Judith, the daughter of Charles the Bald, king of France; which raiſing a ſuſpicion that he intended to place him on the throne, Ethelbald, his eldeſt ſon, began to conſpire againſt him; therefore, on his return to England, in order to avoid a civil war he gave him the beſt part of his kingdom. He died in 857, after a reign of twenty one years, leaving four ſons, Ethelbald, Ethelbert, Ethelred, and Alfred, ſharing the kingdom between the two eldeſt, Kent, Suſſex, Surry, and Eſſex, being bequeathed to Ethelbert, his ſecond ſon.

ETHEREGE (GEORGE) a celebrated wit in the reign of king Charles and king James II. and eminent for his poetical genius, eſpecially in comedy. He was born at London, about the year 1636. He had his education, as is commonly ſuppoſed, in the univerſity of Cambridge, and ſtudied ſome time after in one of the Inns of Court. He ſeems to have been originally intended for the law; but his genius leading him ſtrongly to the ſtudy of the belles lettres, he removed to purſue that more agreeable courſe of life, and became remarkable for his ſprightly and generous temper, and his free, lively, and natural vein of writing, which acquired him the general character of Gentle George, and Eaſy Etherege. He wrote the three following comedies, Love in a Tub, She would if She could, and the Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter; and alſo ſome airy ſonnets, ſmart lampoons, and ſmooth panegyrics. His peculiar talents, which were now known and admired, introduced him to the acquaintance of all the wits of the age, particularly of the earl of Dorſet, the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Rocheſter, &c. who recommended him to the favour of his majeſty king James II. and by that prince he was ſent ambaſſador to Ratiſbon, where having treated ſome company with a liberal entertainment, and being too forward in waiting on ſome of his gueſts at their departure, it is ſaid he unhappily tumbled down the ſtairs, and broke his neck.

ETHIOPIA is a vaſt country, which lies to the ſouth of Egypt, in Africa. It was ſo called by the ancients, to whom but a ſmall part of it was known, and principally that which is called Nubia. Others have given the name of Higher Ethiopia to Abyſſinia: both which ſee in their proper places. Some by Ethiopia mean all the ſouth part of Africa.

ETIENNE, (ST.) the capital town of Upper Forez, in France. It is ſurrounded with walls, carries on a good trade, and is remarkable for its manufactures in iron and ſteel, which have brought it to a flouriſhing condition, inſomuch that it now contains eighteen thouſand ſouls. The brook Furens, on which the town ſtands, is thought to be of great uſe in tempering their works, which are knives, ſword-blades, fire-arms, and the like. It is twenty three miles ſouth-eaſt of Feurs, thirty ſouth-weſt of Lyons, and and two hundred and ſeventy-five ſouth by-weſt of Paris. Long. 4. 35. E. Lat. 45. 22 N.

ETLINGEN, a town of Germany, in Swabia, and in the margravate of Baden. It is ſeated between Pforzheim and Raſtat, ten miles from each. Long 9. 31. E. Lat. 48. 55. N.

ETNA MOUNT, now called Gibello, is a burning mountain in the iſland of Sicily, and province of Val Demona. The top of the mountain is encompaſſed with ſnow; which however does not prevent the ſmoke and flames from aſcending continually, inſomuch, that the air in the night-time ſometimes ſeems to be all on fire. It ſometimes throws out calcined ſtones, and red-hot cinders, from an aperture which is five hundred paces in breadth. The bottom is ſeventy miles in circumference, which on the eaſt and ſouth is covered with vineyards, and on the weſt and north with woods, full of wild animals. Sometimes it vomits up ſuch torrents of burning matter, that it entirely ruins the country round about it. The moſt remarkable eruptions were, in the years 1536, 1554, 1556, 1579, 1669, and 1693, which have made a good deal of noiſe in hiſtory. It was obſerved, in 1693, that this mountain ſunk lower conſiderably; but then it was attended with an earthquake, as thoſe eruptions generally are. Long. 14. 49. E. Lat. 38. 12. N.

ETTMULLER (MICHAEL) a celebrated phyſician, born at Leipſic, on the 26th of May, 1640. He travelled into moſt of the countries of Europe, after which he was made profeſſor of botany, chemiſtry, and anatomy, at Leipſic, where he died, in 1683. He wrote Medicinal Inſtitutions, and other works, the moſt complete edition of which is that of Naples, 1728, in five volumes, folio.

ETTMULLER (MICHAEL ERNEST) his ſon, was alſo an able phyſician, and died, on the 25th of September, 1732, after his having favoured the public with ſeveral diſſertations.

ETON, a town of Buckinghamſhire, oppoſite to Windſor, to which it is joined by a bridge over the Thames. It is moſt remarkable for its college, which is one of the beſt ſeminaries in England. It was founded by Henry VI. in 1441, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary. It has a provoſt, ſeven fellows, two ſchoolmaſters, two conducts, an organiſt, ſeven clerks, ſeventy king's-ſcholars, ten choriſters, a regiſter, and twelve ſervants, who have all their lodgings and neceſſary conveniencies, beſides a good maintenance in the college.

lege, which conſiſts of an apartment for the provoſt and fellows, a large hall, chapel, library, and ſchool-houſe. The ſcholars are to be inſtructed in claſſic learning, and, being made fit for the univerſity, are by election ſent to King's college, in Cambridge, where they are provided with ſcholarſhips, and fellowſhips in their turns, none but theſe being admitted fellows.

The ſchool is divided into the upper and lower, and each into three claſſes; and beſides the maſters mentioned above, there are four aſſiſtants or uſhers to each, there being ſeldom leſs than three hundred ſcholars here, beſides thoſe on the foundation who board at the maſters houſes, or elſewhere within the college bounds. It has a fair on Aſh-Wedneſday, for horſes and cattle, and is twenty-one miles from London. Long. 0. 31. W. Lat. 51. 28. N.

EU, a conſiderable town of France, in Upper Normandy. It conſiſts of three pariſhes, has a handſome ſquare, ſeveral religious houſes, and had a college of Jeſuits. In the church of theſe laſt there are ſeveral magnificent tombs. The caſtle is large, and has fine apartments. Their trade is chiefly in ſerge and lace. It is ſeated on the river Brele, in a valley, fifteen miles north-eaſt of Dieppe, thirteen ſouth-weſt of Abbeville, twenty north of Neuf-Chatel, and ninety-one north-by weſt of Paris. Long. 30. E. Lat. 50. 3. N.

EVAGORAS I. king of Cyprus, received Conon, the Athenian captain, about the four hundred and fifth year before the Chriſtian æra. He took the city of Salamis, and made war on Artaxerxes, king of Perſia; but loſing a battle at ſea, he was forced to give up the iſle of Cyprus to the Perſians, and to be contented with reigning in Salamis. He was aſſaſſinated by Thraſydeus, the eunuch; and left two ſons, Nicocles, who ſucceeded him, and Protagoras.

EVAGORAS II. the grandſon of the former, and the ſon of Nicocles, was deprived of his kingdom of Salamis by his uncle Protagoras. He had recourſe to Artaxerxes Ochus, from whom he obtained a ſovereignty in Aſia of much greater extent than that he had loſt; but at laſt, to avoid the accuſations formed againſt him, he fled into the iſle of Cyprus, where he was put to death.

EVAGRIUS, patriarch of Conſtantinople, was elected to that ſee in 370, immediately after the death of Eudoxus, an Arian biſhop. But he was driven from his ſee, and baniſhed by the emperor Valens.

EVAGRIUS, patriarch of Antioch, and the friend of St. Jerom, ſucceeded Paulinus in 389; but as Meletius had ſucceeded Flavian in 381, this double ſucceſſion continued the ſchiſm in the church of Antioch; but after Evagrius's death, his party joined with Flavian, and put an end to the ſchiſm.

EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS, a famous hiſtorian, born at Epiphania, about the year 536. He practiſed the profeſſion of an advocate, from which he was called Scholaſticus, which name was then given to the pleaders at the bar. He was alſo tribune and keeper of the prefect's diſpatches. He wrote an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which begins where Socrates and Theodoret ended theirs; and other works, for which he was rewarded by the emperors Tiberius and Mauricius. M. de Valois publiſhed at Paris a good edition of Evagrius's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, in folio; and it was republiſhed at Cambridge in 1620, in folio, by William Reading, with additional notes of various authors.

EVANDER, called the ſon of Mercury on account of his eloquence, went into Italy about ſixty years before the taking of Troy; when Faunus, who then reigned over the Aborigines, gave him a large extent of country, in which he ſettled with his friends. He is ſaid to have taught the Latins the uſe of letters, and the art of huſbandry.

EVARICK, king of the Goths in Spain, was the ſon of Theodoric I. and the brother of Theodoric II. whom he ſucceeded in 466. He ravaged Luſitania, the Upper Spain, and Navarre, took Arles and Marſeilles, laid ſiege to Clermont, and defeated the emperor Anthemius. In ſhort, he plundered Auvergne, Berry, Touraine, and Provence, and died at Arles in 485. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Alaric.

EVARISTUS, biſhop of Rome, ſucceeded St. Clement in the year 100.

EVAUX, a town of France, in the Bourbonnois, on the confines of la Marche, twenty miles from Montluzon. Long. 2. 35. E. Lat. 46. 15. N.

EUCHERIUS, biſhop of Lyons, was raiſed to that ſee in 434. He was the author of two excellent Treatiſes, the one on the Advantages of Solitude, and the other on Contempt of the World. Several other works are attributed to him. He died in 454.

EUCLID, a native of Megara, and the diſciple of Socrates, attended with ſuch pleaſure to the leſſons of that philoſopher, that during the war between the Athenians and Megarians, he diſguiſed himſelf in woman's apparel, to attend the ſchool of that great man, and thus eluded the edict which forbid the Megarians going to Athens on pain of death. After the death of Socrates, Plato, and other philoſophers went to Euclid at Megara, to ſhelter themſelves from the tyrants who governed Athens. Euclid gave himſelf up to all the ſubtilties of logic, and founded a ſect of eternal diſputers. He however admitted but one chief good, which he ſometimes called God, ſometimes Spirit, and ſometimes Providence. He was ſucceeded by Eubulides.

EUCLID, a celebrated mathematician, born at Alexandria, taught in that city about two hundred and ſeventy-ſeven years before the Chriſtian æra, under the reign of Ptolemy Lagus. He reduced all the fundamental principles of pure mathematics, which had been delivered down by Thales, Pythagoras, Eudoxus, and other mathematicians before him into regularity, and order, and added many others of his own diſcovering; on which account he is ſaid to be the firſt who reduced arithmetic and geometry into the form of a ſcience. He likewiſe applied himſelf to the ſtudy of mixed mathematics, and eſpecially to aſtronomy, in which he alſo excelled. The moſt celebrated of his works is his Elements of Geometry, of which there have been a great number of editions in all languages, and a fine edition of all his works was printed in 1703, by David Gregory, Savilian profeſſor of aſtronomy at Oxford.

EUDES, duke of Aquitain, in the eighth century. Being jealous of the power of Charles Martel, he granted ſuccours to Chilperic and Rainfroy; who were defeated by Charles Martel about the year 719; on which, Eudes making a peace with the latter, delivered up Chilperic to him. In 719 he defeated Zama, general of the Saracens, who had laid ſiege to Toulouſe; but in 730, ſeeing that the infidels grew formidable, he entered into an alliance with Munuza, their general, and gave him his daughter in marriage. Two years after, Eudes called Charles Martel to his aſſiſtance againſt Abderama, and was at a celebrated victory gained over the Saracens. In 732 a war broke out between theſe two princes, which was not ended till the death of Eudes, in 735.

EUDES, count of Paris, duke of France, and one of the moſt valiant princes of his time, was the ſon of Robert the Strong. He defended Paris in 887 againſt the Normans, whom he obliged to raiſe the ſiege. The year following he was proclaimed king of Weſt France, and a ſhort time after, he cut in pieces a Norman army, and purſued thoſe who eſcaped as far as the frontiers. He obliged king Charles the Simple to retire into Neuſtria, took Laon, and died at la Fere in Picardy, on the 3d of January, 898.

EUDOXIA, the wife of the emperor Arcadius, took the part of Theophilus of Alexandria, againſt St. John Chryſoſtom, whom ſhe baniſhed from Conſtantinople on his inveighing againſt the luxury and vanity of the ladies at court. She recalled him from this exile ſome time after; but the biſhop expreſſing his indignation in very vehement terms, againſt the games and ſhews exhibited to the people on the dedication of a ſtatue erected in honour of that princeſs, ſhe cauſed him to be baniſhed a ſecond time. She died on the 6th of October, 404.

EUDOXIA, or EUDOCIA, the daughter of Leontius, an Athenian philoſopher, was diſtinguiſhed by her beauty and many accompliſhments. She was inſtructed by her father in polite literature, philoſophy, and the mathematics; but he diſinheriting her by his will, from a belief that the riches of her mind would be a ſufficient portion, ſhe went to complain of this injuſtice to Pulcheria, the ſiſter of Theodoſius the Younger; and that princeſs, charmed with her wit, and filled with admiration at her wiſdom, adopted her for her daughter; had her baptized; changed her name of Athenais to that of Eudoxia, and at length engaged the emperor to marry her. Their union laſted a conſiderable time; but being at variance with Theodoſius and Pulcheria, on account of the emperor's jealouſy, ſhe retired into Paleſtine, and died at Jeruſalem in 460, aged ſixty-ſeven. She was the author of a Paraphraſe on the four firſt Books of the Old Teſtament, in heroic verſe, and of a great number of poems which are loſt.

EUDOXIA, the daughter of the former, and Theodoſius the Younger, and the wife of the emperor Valentinian III. who was killed by Maximus in 455. She was married in ſpite of herſelf to the laſt mentioned prince. In revenge for this act of violence ſhe called Genſeric, king of the Vandals, into Italy, who ſacked Rome, and carried this princeſs captive into Africa, with her two daughters Placidia and Eudoxia; but at length, at the requeſt of the emperors Marcian and Leo, ſhe was ſent back to Conſtantinople.

EUDOXUS, of Gnidus, the ſon of Æſchinus, flouriſhed about three hundred and ninety years before the Chriſtian æra, and was an aſtronomer, geometrician, and legiſlator. Architas inſtructed him in geometry; and Philiſton of Sicily in medicine. He travelled into Egypt to conſult the learned of that country, and at his return gave laws to his own.

own. He died about the three hundred and fiftieth year before the birth of Chriſt.

EUDOXUS, the firſt patriarch of Antioch, and afterwards of Conſtantinople. He was a great favourer of the Arians, and therefore, at his baptizing the emperor Valens, in the year 367, engaged him to defend that party. He died in 370.

EVE, the wife of Adam, and the mother of all mankind, who, being deluded by the ſerpent, occaſioned the fall, and all its dreadful conſequences. She had many children, but Cain, Abel, and Seth, are the only ones mentioned in Scripture.

EVEILLON (JAMES) an able canoniſt, and grand vicar of Angers, under Fouquet, De Reuil, and Arnaud. He compoſed an excellent Treatiſe on Excommunications, &c. in quarto, and other works which are eſteemed. He was ſo very charitable to the poor, that on their account he deprived himſelf of moſt of the accommodations of life. As he was one day cenſured for having no tapeſtry, he replied, "When I enter my houſe in winter, the walls do "not ſay that they are cold; but the poor whom I find "ſhivering at my door, tell me that they are in want of "cloathing." He died at Angers, in 1651, aged ſeventy-nine.

EVELYN (JOHN) a very ingenious, learned, and pious writer, born at Wotton, in Surry, October 31, 1620, and educated at the univerſity of Oxford. He afterwards travelled, but after his return, enjoyed ſome conſiderable poſts, and in the reign of king William was treaſurer of Greenwich hoſpital, in Kent. "His life," ſays the honourable Mr. Walpole, "was a courſe of enquiry, ſtudy, curioſity, inſtruction, and benevolence. The works of the Creator, and the mimic labours of the creature, were all objects of his purſuit. He unfolded the perfection of the one, and aſſiſted the imperfections of the other. He adored from examination; was a courtier that flattered only by informing his prince, and by pointing out what was worthy for him to countenance, and was really the neighbour of the goſpel, for there was no man that might not have been the better for him. He was one of the firſt promoters of the Royal Society, a patron of the ingenious and indigent, and peculiarly ſerviceable to the lettered world; for beſides his writings and diſcoveries, he obtained the Arundelian marbles for the univerſity of Oxford, and the Arundelian library for the Royal Society: nor is it the leaſt part of his praiſe, that he who propoſed to Mr. Boyle the erection of a philoſophic college for retired and ſpeculative perſons, had the honeſty to write in defence of active life againſt Sir George Mackenzie's Eſſay on Solitude. He knew that retirement in his own hands was induſtry and benefit to mankind, but in thoſe of others, lazineſs and inutility. There are five ſmall prints of this gentleman's journey from Rome to Naples, drawn and etched by him; and he publiſhed ſeveral works, among which are, 1. A Character of England; 2. The State of France; 3. An Eſſay on the firſt Book of Lucretius da Rerum Natura; 4. The French Gardener; 5. A Panygyric on king Charles the Second's Coronation; 6. Fumifugum, or the Inconveniences of the Air and Smoke of London diſſipated; 7. The Hiſtory and Art of Engraving in Copper; 8. A parallel between the Ancient Architecture and the Modern; 9. Sylva, or a Diſcourſe of Foreſt-Trees; and ſeveral others. He died February 27, 1705-6, aged eighty-ſix.

EVELYN, (JOHN) ſon to the former, was born at Saye's Court near Deptford, in Kent, January 14, 1654, and educated at Oxford. He was no leſs diſtinguiſhed for his political abilities than his literary accompliſhments, he was appointed one of the commiſſioners of the revenue in Ireland, and would probably have been advanced to higher employments, had he not been cut off in the flower of his age, by dying March the 24th, 1698, in the forty-fifth year of his age. He wrote the following works, 1. Of Gardens, a poem, tranſlated from the Latin of Renatus Rapinus; 2. The Life of Alexander the Great, tranſlated from the Greek of Plutarch; 3. The Hiſtory of the Grand Vizirs Mahomet, and Achmet Coprogli, and of the three laſt Grand Signiors, their Sultanas, and chief Favourites, tranſlated from the French; and ſome poems.

EVEPHENUS, a Pythagorean philoſopher, who was condemned to death by Dionyſius the Elder, for having diſſuaded the Metapontines from joining in a league with him; but was ſo far from being terrified at the ſentence, that he only deſired the tyrant to let him go home to give his ſiſter in marriage, promiſing to return in a little time, and deliver himſelf up to execution. The tyrant aſked what bail he would give. He offered his friend Eucritus, who readily undertook for his return in ſix months. This piece of confidence and friendſhip was much admired; but all the court were ſtill more ſurpriſed when Evephenus returned, and preſented himſelf to the tyrant, who being charmed with the virtue of two ſuch friends, deſired to be admitted to a third ſhare of their friendſhip.

EVERSHOT, a town of Dorſetſhire, with a [illegible] days. The river Frome riſes near it. The fair is on May 12, for bullocks and toys. It is thirty-two miles eaſt of Exeter, forty ſouth-of Briſtol, and one hundred and thirty-two weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long 2. 45. W. Lat. 50. 47. N.

EVESHAM, a borough-town of Worceſterſhire, ſeated on a gentle aſcent from the river Avon, over which there is a bridge of ſeven arches. It contains three pariſh churches, and is governed by a mayor, ſeven aldermen, twelve capital burgeſſes, a recorder, and a chamberlain, all of which are of the common-council, and twenty-two other burgeſſes, called aſſiſtants. Their juriſdiction extends to the pariſh on the other ſide of the Avon, called Bengworth. The market-day is on Monday, and the fairs on Candlemas-day, the firſt Monday after Eaſter, Whit-Monday, and September 21, all for cattle and horſes. It ſends two members to parliament. Near the bridge there was formerly a caſtle called Bengworth-caſtle. Two of the churches ſtand near the Tower, built by the abbot of Litchfield, which holds the bells for both. This town ſtands in the vale of Eveſham, famous for its fertility in producing fine wheat, and for the numerous flocks it feeds. It is fourteen miles eaſt-by-ſouth of Worceſter, ſixty north-north-weſt of Briſtol, and ninety-five weſt-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 0. W. Lat. 52. 10. N.

EUGENE, (FRANCIS) prince of Savoy, was born in 1663, and was deſcended from one of the three branches of the houſe of Savoy. His father was Eugene Maurice, earl of Soiſſons, general of the Swiſs and Griſons, and governor of Champaigne in France; and his mother was neice to cardinal Mazarine. He was early committed to the tuition of a doctor of the Sorbonne, and and was deſigned for the church. His father died before he was ten years of age, after the French king had given young Eugene the grant of an abbey, as a ſtep towards his obtaining a cardinal's hat. But this was by no means ſuitable to his genius, for he was a youth of a great ſpirit, and was ſo jealous of the honour of his family, that ſoon after the death of his father, his mother being baniſhed to the Low Countries, he proteſted againſt the injuſtice with which ſhe was treated, and vowed eternal enmity to the authors of it. He was ſtill trained up for the ſervice of the church; but at length, finding that he had no inclinations that way, he frequently beſought the king, who maintained him according to his quality, to give him ſome military employment; but this being denied him on various pretences, he apprehended that he ſhould not be promoted according to his deſerts in France, and perceiving that he was involved in the diſgrace of his mother, and that his elder brother, Thomas count de Soiſſons, was deprived of a very conſiderable penſion, under the pretence of his having married againſt the king's conſent, he reſolved to retire to Vienna, with prince Philip, another of his brothers, to whom the emperor's ambaſſador had promiſed a regiment of horſe.

His imperial majeſty gave them a kind reception, and prince Eugene ſoon became his favourite. In the meantime, he had many flattering promiſes and invitations to return to France; but his fidelity to the emperor remained unſhaken, and he reſolved to ſpend his life in the ſervice of the houſe of Auſtria. On their firſt arrival in Germany, the Turks making an irruption into the hereditary country, prince Philip received his death's wound by the fall of his horſe, after he had behaved with great bravery in a ſkirmiſh with the Turks, and left his command to his brother Francis Eugene. This prince, in the year 1683, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of Vienna, where he made a great ſlaughter of the Turks, in the preſence of John III. king of Poland, the elector of Bavaria, John George III. the elector of Saxony, Charles V. duke of Lorrain, and many other great men. The next year he again ſignalized himſelf at the ſiege of Buda, where he behaved with ſuch gallantry, that the duke of Lorrain wrote a letter in his commendation to the emperor. He was conſtantly in the trenches, and was one of the firſt that entered the town ſword in hand; and at his return to Vienna, when Newhauſel was taken, the duke preſented him to the emperor, ſaying, May it pleaſe your Majeſty, this young Savoyard will ſome time or other become the greateſt captain of the age. His imperial majeſty had the firmeſt confidence in him, and the army going into winter quarters, he inveſted him with the chief command, during the abſence of the ſupreme officers. Thus he daily roſe in the favour of the court of Vienna, and every campaign was a new ſtep to his advancement.

At the taking of Belgrade in 1688, prince Eugene, who was always among the foremoſt in every onſet, received a cut with a ſabre through his helmet; but he returned the blow, and laid the Turk who gave it dead at his feet. Lewis XIV. having now invaded the empire, prince Eugene was commanded to make a diverſion in Italy; he therefore blocked up Mantua, which had received a French garriſon. In 1692 he entered Dauphiny, when the inhabitants of Gap brought him the keys of the town, and all the neighbouring places ſubmitted to contribution; but the great deſigns he had formed there ſoon vaniſhed; for the Spaniards would ſtay no longer in the army, though prince Eugene, for whom they had an high eſteem, endeavoured to make them change their reſolution.

In 1696, after the ſeparate peace between France and Savoy, at which prince Eugene was extremely diſſatisfied, Lewis XIV. in order to draw him over to his intereſt, offered him his father's government of Champaigne, beſides the poſt of marſhal of France, and an annually penſion of two thouſand piſtoles; but nothing was capable of ſhaking his fidelity to the emperor, who afterwards gave him the command of his army in Hungary, in preference to many older generals; and in 1697, he gave the Turks the greateſt blow they had received during the whole war, at Zenta, near Peterwaradin. The Grand Seignior, who commanded his troops in perſon, had thrown a bridge over the Thieſſe, and made his forces encamp on both ſides of that river. Prince Eugene marched up to him, attacked his camp on the weſt ſide, and after a ſhort diſpute, broke in, made himſelf maſter of it, and forced all who lay on that ſide the Theiſſe over that river, whither he followed them, and gave them a total defeat. In this action the Germans had only four hundred and thirty men killed, and one thouſand five hundred and eighty-three wounded; but twenty-two thouſand Turks were ſlain in the field, among whom was the grand vizier, and the aga of the janiſaries, ten or twelve thouſand were drowned in the Thieſſe, and ſix thouſand were wounded and taken priſoners, among whom were twenty-ſeven baſhaws, and ſeveral agas. The Imperialiſts took nine thouſand loaded waggons, after three thouſand had been thrown into the river, the grand ſeignior's tent, valued at forty thouſand livres, with all the reſt belonging to the army, ſeventeen thouſand oxen, ſix thouſand camels heavy laden, ſeven thouſand horſes, one hundred heavy cannon, and ſeventy field-pieces, a ſcymitar of ineſtimable value, the grand ſeignior's great ſeal, his coach drawn by eight horſes, in which were ten of the women of his ſeraglio, all that prince's papers, and all the money that was to pay the army, the whole booty amounting to ten millions ſterling.

In 1699, the peace of Carlowitz was concluded, and an end put to the war which had laſted fifteen years. Prince Eugene had paſſed his youth in the wars of Hungary, was in almoſt all the battles, and had eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf. This fortunate general ſeemed now to have nothing to do, but to enjoy at Vienna that tranquility which is ſometimes, but not always reliſhed by men who have ſpent their lives amidſt the noiſe of war. But his repoſe was of ſhort duration. The king of Spain's death, and the dreaded union of that monarchy with France, kindled a new war, which called him into Italy to command the emperor's forces there, when the progreſs of his arms againſt marſhal Catinat, made the French king recall that general, and ſend marſhal Villeroy into Italy in his room. But Eugene ſoon let him ſee, that numbers alone, in which the French were greatly ſuperior, could not gain a victory, for he foiled him in every ſkirmiſh and engagement, and at length took him priſoner.

The queen of England now concerted meaſures with the emperor for carrying on a war with France. Her majeſty reſented the wrong done to the houſe of Auſtria, by the duke of Anjou's uſurping the crown of Spain; ſhe reſolved to preſerve the liberty and balance of Europe, to pull down the exorbitant power of France, and at the ſame time to revenge the affront offered by the French king's owning the pretended prince of Wales for king of her dominions. She therefore ſent an army under the duke of Marlborough into Flanders, where prince Eugene diſtinguiſhed himſelf under that great general. For the particulars of theſe tranſactions ſee the article CHURCHILL, (JOHN) duke of Marlborough.

In the year 1710, the enemies of prince Eugene, who had vowed his deſtruction, ſent him a letter, with a paper encloſed, which was poiſoned to ſuch a degree, that it made his highneſs, with two or three more, who did but handle it, ready to ſwoon, and inſtantly killed a dog, upon his ſwallowing it after it was greaſed. The next year the emperor Joſeph dying, prince Eugene marched into Germany to ſecure the election of that emperor's brother to the throne, and the following year came into England, to try to engage our court to continue the war; but had the mortification to find, the day before his arrival, that his good friend the duke of Marlborough was turned out of all his places. But though his negociation was unſucceſsful, he was treated with great reſpect, and the queen made him a preſent of a ſword ſet with diamonds, worth about five thouſand pounds.

In 1713, prince Eugene, though forced to act only defenſively on the Rhine againſt the French, who now threatened to over-run Europe, nevertheleſs ſignalized himſelf by his vigilance and conduct; and having the next year concluded and ſigned a peace with France, as his Imperial majeſty's plenipotentiary, he returned to Vienna, where he was received by the people with the loudeſt acclamations of joy, and with the moſt cordial affection by the emperor, who preſented him a ſword richly ſet with diamonds. Soon after a war again breaking out on the ſide of the Turks, he was ſent with the Imperial army into Hungary, where, attacking their camp, he not only obtained a complete victory, but took the important fortreſs of Temaſwaer, after the Turks had been in poſſeſſion of it one hundred and ſixty-four years, and next inveſted and took Belgrade. A peace being now concluded with the Turks, he had a long ſuſpenſion from the glories that conſtantly attended his victorious ſword. But at length we find him engaged in a new ſcene of action, in the war between the emperor, and the kings of France, Spain, and Sardinia, in which he experienced various ſucceſs. This illuſtrious hero died at Vienna on the 10th of April, 1736, in the ſeventy-third year of his age.

Prince Eugene was of the middle ſize, had a very ſerious and reſerved air; he was ſenſible of all the ſweets of friendſhip, faithful to his promiſes, had no pride, and was extremely liberal. He cheriſhed the officers and ſoldiers, rewarded their bravery, was uneaſy when they were ſick, or wounded, rejoiced at their cure, and had an affectionate concern in whatever happened to them; this procured him the love and confidence of all his troops, who conſidered him as their father and protector: his candour and love for the ſciences rendered him the delight of the ingenious and the learned. He had a taſte for the finer arts, but deſpiſed oſtentation and luxury, and was extremely plain in his dreſs. He was firſt counſellor of the Council of Conferences, preſident of the Aulic Council of war, generaliſſimo of the armies of the emperor and the empire, his imperial majeſty's vicar-general in Italy, colonel of a regiment of dragoons, and knight of the golden fleece, &c.

EUGENIUS, biſhop of Carthage, had a conference, in 484, with the Arians, by order of Hunneric, who baniſhed him the ſame year. He was, however, recalled under the reign of Gonbaud; but king Traſſamond drove him again from Carthage, and baniſhed him to Gaul, when Eugenius retired to Albi, and died at Viance in that dioceſe, on the 6th of September, 505. He wrote ſeveral works, which are ſtill extant.

EUGENIUS I. a Roman, ſucceed pope Martin I. He died in 653, and was ſucceeded by Vitalian.

EUGENIUS II. a Roman, was elected pope after the death of Paſchal I. on the 19th of May, 824. He govered the church with great mildneſs, and died on the 11th of Auguſt, 827, and was ſucceeded by Valentine.

EUGENIUS III. before called Peter Bernard, was at firſt a Ciſtercian monk, and the diſciple of St. Bernard, but was elected pope on the 27th of February, 1145, the very day on which pope Lucius II. died. A ſedition at Rome obliged Eugenius to fly to France in 1147, where he was well received by Lewis VII. and where he held ſeveral councils to promote a cruſade. He returned to Italy in 1148, rendered himſelf maſter of St. Peter's church in 1150, and died at Tivoli on the 8th of July 1153. He wrote ſeveral works, and was ſucceeded by Anaſtatius IV.

EUGENIUS IV. before called Gabriel Condolmerio, was of an obſcure family at Venice, and born in 1383. He was brought up to the church, became a Celeſtine friar, and being carried to Rome by a nephew of Gregory XII. obtained the favour of that pope, who firſt made him his treaſurer, then biſhop of Sienna, and at laſt a cardinal. Martin V. gave him the legateſhip of the Picentine, and afterwards that of Bologna. He aſſiſted at the council of Conſtance, and in 1431, was elected pope, after the death of Martin. He opened his pontificate with ſeizing the treaſures which Martin V. had amaſſed; and this ſeiſure was conducted ſo indiſcretely, that it raiſed a civil tumult, threw all things into confuſion, and laid the foundation of the wars and miſeries that attended his reign. In 1434, Philip duke of Milan being exaſperated againſt him, made an incurſion into the territories of Rome. The cavalry he ſent thither was commanded by Nicholas Fortebrachio, a brave captain, who had quitted the pope's ſervice in great diſguſt; for having demanded his pay, Eugenius ſaid, that he ought to think himſelf well paid by the ſpoils he had taken. Enraged at this anſwer, he had ſought another maſter, and being employed on this occaſion by Philip, made ſuch dreadful havock about Rome, that the whole city was in conſternation, and the pope himſelf in doubt whither to retire. The people reſorted to him in crowds, to complain of the loſſes they had ſuſtained; but Eugenius, not knowing which way to turn himſelf, himſelf, referred them to the cardinal his nephew and chamberlain. He continued thundering all the while with his bulls; but whatever effect that kind of thunder may have wrought while things have been ſtill and peaceable, it has ſeldom been attended to amidſt the claſh of arms. The cardinal who was idle and voluptuous, paid little regard to the complaints that were made; but to thoſe who complained of their loſing all their cattle, uſed to return no other anſwer but, "You value your cattle too "highly, the Venetians lead a much more agreeable life "without them." The people of Rome, enraged by this behaviour, cried out, "To arms! Liberty!" They removed all the magiſtrates appointed by Eugenius, choſe others, and ſeized the cardinal. The pope, reduced to theſe extremities, diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a monk, and going on board a veſſel, fled to Oſtia, notwithſtanding the volleys of ſtones and arrows that were diſcharged at him, and afterwards went to Florence. Rome was now free, but the Romans did not long enjoy their liberty, for the pope's authority was reſtored in that city during his abſence, by the patriarch of Alexandria, who puniſhed the mutineers with the utmoſt ſeverity.

In 1431, Eugenius confirmed the council of Baſil; but the emperor Sigiſmund dying, he declared the council diſſolved, and aſſembled another at Ferrara in 1437. The prelates, who ſtill continued to hold the council of Baſil, depoſed him two years after, and elected Amadeus VIII. duke of Savoy, in his room, who took the name of Felix V. Eugenius then transferred the council from Ferrara to Florence, where the emperor Paleologus aſſiſted, with many Greek biſhops. Eugenius at length removed the council from Florence to Rome in 1442, and undertook to recover the lands which he thought had been uſurped from the church; but he had not time to execute this deſign, for he died on the 23d of February, 1447. It is ſaid, that when he was at the point of death, he turned towards the religious who ſtood by his bed, and with a voice interrupted with ſighs, cried, "O Gabriel, how "much better would it have been for thy ſoul's health "hadſt thou never been raiſed to the purple or pontificate, "but continued a religious life in thy monaſtery!" Eugenius never drink wine, and was very frugal in himſelf, though magnificent in his palace. He was no ſcholar, yet was a patron of ſcholars. He is juſtly blamed for having made his legate perſuade the king of Hungary to violate a ſolemn treaty of peace concluded with the Turks, and to undertake againſt them a bloody war, that proved fatal to the Chriſtians. He was ſucceeded by Nicholas V.

EUGUBIO, a town of Italy, in the territories of the pope, and duchy of Urbino, with a biſhop's ſee. It is thirty-five miles ſouth of Urbino, and eighty-eight north of Rome. Long. 13. 46. E. Lat. 43. 18. N.

EVIAN, a town of Savoy, in the duchy of Chablais, ſeated on the lake of Geneva, twenty-four miles north-eaſt of Geneva, and ten miles ſouth-weſt of Lauſanne. Long. 6. 34. E. Lat. 46. 30. N.

EVILMERODAC, king of Babylon, ſucceeded his father Nebuchadnezzar about the five hundred and ſixty ſecond year before the birth of Chriſt. He releaſed Jehoiachin, king of Judea, out of priſon, and treated him with the greateſt kindneſs.

EULOGIUS, patriarch of Alexandria, in the year 581, was famous for his learning and piety: he compoſed ſeveral works againſt the Novations, Acephali, &c. and died about the year 608.

He ought not to be confounded with Eulogius of Cordova, who alſo wrote ſeveral works, and ſuffered martyrdom in 859.

EUMENES, a famous captain, born at Cardia, a town in Thracian Cherſoneſus, of an obſcure family. By his valour he acquired the eſteem of Alexander the Great, who gave him his wife Barſina's ſiſter in marriage. After the death of that conqueror, Eumenes had Capadocia and Paphlagonia to his ſhare, but Antigonus refuſing to ſettle him in them, he retired to Pardiccas, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral provinces, and commanded that prince's army againſt Craterus and Antipater. On the death of Perdiccas he made war on Antigonus and Seleucus, and loſt the battle of Orcinia. In ſhort, after various ſucceſs, he was delivered up by his own troops to Antigonus, who put him to death about the three hundred and fifteenth year before the Chriſtian æra.

EUMENES, king of Aſia and Pergamus, ſucceeded his father Attalus, about the one hundred and ninety-ſeventh year before the birth of Chriſt. He lived in ſo ſtrict an union with his brothers Attalus, Phileterus, and Atheneus, that they were propoſed as an example of fraternal amity. He made an alliance with the Romans, conquered Pruſſias, diſcovered the deſigns of Perſeus, defeated Antigonus, the ſon of Seleucus, and died about the one hundred and fifty-ninth year before the Chriſtian æra.

EUMENIDEIA, Εὐμενίδεια, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival obſerved by the Athenians once a year in honour of the Furies, with ſacrifices, in which pregnant ewes, cakes made by the moſt eminent of the young men, and a libation of honey and wine, were offered to theſe infernal goddeſſes; the worſhippers were alſo adorned with flowers. At Athens none were admitted to theſe ceremonies but free-born denizens of known virtue and integrity, for ſuch alone could be acceptable to thoſe deities, whoſe peculiar office it was to puniſh and revenge all kinds of wickedneſs.

EUMENIDES, or Furies, in Pagan mythology, the jailors and tormentors of the wicked in Tartarus. The names of theſe avengeful ſiſters, as they were alſo called, were Tiſiphone, Alecto, and Megæra, who went by the general appellation of Furiæ, on account of the diſtraction that attends a guilty conſcience. However, to each of theſe was aſſigned a diſtinct office. Tiſiphone was ſaid to puniſh the ſins ariſing from anger and hatred, Megæra thoſe occaſioned by envy, and Alecto the crimes that ſpring from ambition and luſt. Others, however, make only one Fury, called Adraſtia, the daughter of Jupiter and Neceſſity, and the avenger of all vice.

The furies are painted lean, with long flabby breaſts, their hair compoſed of ſnakes, and their hollow eyes inflamed with madneſs, carrying in one hand whips and iron chains, and in the other torches that yield a diſmal light. Their robes are black, and their feet of braſs, to ſhew that their purſuit, tho' ſlow, is ſteady and certain.

Some mythologiſts repreſent theſe imaginary beings as only a repreſentation of the inward ſtings and ſcourges of a guilty conſcience, and thus they are repreſented by the poets. However, the abbé la Pluche ſays that they were derived from the Egyptians, who uſed three figures to denote the three months of autumn, and that the very deformities aſcribed to them were ſymbols of national joy: he adds, that with that people the ſerpents were the hieroglypic of life and happineſs, and their torches public indications of a ſacrifice.

EUMENIUS, a celebrated orator in the fourth century, was of Greek extraction. He was born at Autun, and was much eſteemed by Conſtantius Chlorus, and the emperor Conſtantine. In 309 he pronounced a fine panegyric at Treves, in the preſence of that emperor, and diſcovered much zeal for the re-eſtabliſhment of public ſchools. Father de la Baume has collected all that is extant of this author's in his Panegyrici veteres.

EUNAPIUS, a famous ſophiſt, phyſician, and hiſtorian, in the fourth century, was a native of Sardis, and flouriſhed under the reigns of Valentinian, Valens, and Gratian. He wrote the lives of the philoſophers of his time, in which he ſhews himſelf a bitter enemy to the Chriſtians; and alſo a hiſtory of the Cæſars, in which he treats the Chriſtian emperors very injuriouſly.

EUNOMIUS, biſhop of Cyzicum in the fourth century, was the diſciple of Aëtius, and maintained opinions very like thoſe of Arius. He was continually baniſhed from place to place, and after having experienced a variety of ſufferings, died very old, about the year 394. The greateſt part of his works is loſt.

EVORA, or EBORA, a conſiderable town of Portugal, in the province of Alentejo, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is ſuppoſed to have been built by the Phœnicians, and it is certain that Julius Cæſar gave it the right of a Latin city, by the name of Liberalitas Julia, as appears from an ancient inſcription. Sertorius built ſtrong ſtone walls round it. It was very conderable in the time of the Goths, and had the privilege of coining money. The Moors had it in their poſſeſſion till 1166, when king Alfonſus I. took it from them. In the ſixteenth century it was advanced to the dignity of a metropolitan ſee, and in 1559 the archbiſhop founded an univerſity here.

Evora is ſeated in the heart of the province, in a vale, where the land is not very level, but it is pleaſant, and ſurrounded with mountains on all ſides. Both the lower ground and the mountains are very fertile, and are planted with high trees of various kinds, as well fruit-trees at others. It may contain about five thouſand inhabitants, capable of bearing arms. It is fortified with thirteen baſtions, and defended by a good citadel. It is ſixty miles eaſt-by-ſouth of Liſbon, and one hundred and thirty weſt of Seville. Long. 8. 26. W. Lat. 38. 40. N.

EUPHEMIA, (St.) a virgin and martyr of Chalcedon, in the fourth century, ſuffered death under the perſecution of Diocleſian, about the year 307.

EUPHEMIA, a port town of Naples, in the province of Calabria Ulterior, ſeated in a bay, to which it gives its name. It is fifty miles north-eaſt of Reggio. Long. 16. 28. E. Lat. 39. 16. N.

EUPHEMIUS, patriarch of Conſtantinople in the year 489, took out of the Dyptics the name of Peter Mongus; but not being willing to do the ſame with reſpect to Acacius, the popes Felix and Gelaſius refuſed to admit him to their communion.

munion. He was baniſhed in the year 495 by the emperor Anaſtatius, who had obliged him to make a public profeſſion of his faith, and died at Ancyra, in the year 515.

EUPHORBUS, a famous Trojan, killed by Menelaus at the war of Troy. Pythagoras affirmed that his ſoul was the ſame as that of Pythagoras, and that it paſſed into his body by tranſmigration.

EUPHORION, of Cha'cis in Eubea, a celebrated poet and hiſtorian, born about the two hundred and ſeventy-fourth year before the Chriſtian æra, was librarian to Antiochus the Great. Suetonius ſays that the emperor Tiberius compoſed Greek poems in imitation of Euphorion, and that he placed the writings and picture of that philoſopher in the public libraries.

EUPHRANOR, an admired painter and ſculptor of antiquity, lived about three hundred and ſixty-two years before the Chriſtian æra, and compoſed ſeveral volumes of ſymetry and the art of colouring. His conceptions were elevated and noble, his ſtyle bold and maſculine, and he was the firſt who ſignalized himſelf by repreſenting the majeſty of heroes, yet is ſaid to have fallen into the ſame error with Zeuxis, of making his heads too big in proportion to the other parts.

EUPHRASIA (St) an illuſtrious, ſolitary, and religious of the Thebaid in Upper Egypt, was the daughter of Antigonus, governor of Lyſia. She was born in the year 380, and died at thirty years of age, in a monaſtery of the Thebaid, where ſhe had been diſtinguiſhed by her piety and virtue.

EUPHRATES, or the FRAT, is the moſt celebrated river of Aſia, has two ſources to the northward of the city of Erzerum, in Turcomania, in about forty degrees of latitude. Theſe ſtreams unite three days journey below the city, where the river is navigable for ſmall veſſels, but the rocky channel renders the paſſage dangerous. It runs at firſt from eaſt to weſt, thro' Turkomania, where meeting with Mount Taurus, it turns to the ſouthward, dividing Turcomania from Natolia, and continuing its courſe ſouth-eaſt, divides Syria from Diarbeck or Aſſyria. It afterwards paſſes through the province of Irack Arabi, or Chaldea, and having united its waters with the Tigris, runs on ſouth-eaſt to the city of Baſra, and falls into the gulph of Perſia.

EUPHRATES, a diſciple of Plato, was in ſuch prodigious favour with Perdiccas, king of Macedon, that he was as much monarch as he. He excluded from Perdiccas's table all perſons who were not ſkilled in geometry or philoſophy. Parmenio put him to death in the reign of Philip, ſucceſſor to Perdiccas.

EUPHROSYNE, in the Pagan mythology, one of the three Graces.

EUPOLIS, a famous comic poet of Athens, flouriſhed about four hundred and forty years before the Chriſtian æra. 'Tis ſaid that Alcibiades cauſed him to be put to death for writing ſome verſes againſt him.

EURE, a river of France, which riſes in Le Perche, in the foreſt of Logny, between Nully and Lande, and falls into the Seine, a little above Pont de l'Arche. It is navigable for boats.

EVREMOND (CHARLES DE ST. DENNIS) a celebrated writer, born at St. Dennis le Guaſt, in Lower Normandy, April 1, 1613. As ſoon as he had gone through a courſe of philoſophy, he applied himſelf to the law, but ſoon quitting that ſtudy, entered into the army, ſerved in ſeveral campaigns, and roſe from the rank of enſign to the poſt of marſhal de camp. A military life did not hinder him from cultivating polite literature, and he ſignalized himſelf by his politeneſs and wit as much as by his bravery; but was obliged to leave France for writing a letter to the marquiſs de Crequi, afterwards marſhal of France, in which he rallied cardinal Mazarine in a very ſatirical manner. He ſpent the latter part of his life in England, where king Charles II. ſettled a penſion of 300l. a year upon him. He wrote many pieces, which are collected together under the general title of St. Evremond's works. They have had ſeveral editions, but the beſt is that of Amſterdam, 1726, in five volumes, duodecimo, together with two volumes more of the ſame ſize, intitled, A curious Collection of the beſt Pieces attributed to St. Evremond, and of ſeveral Pieces by other Hands: to all which is prefixed his Life, by M. Des Maizeau. Several of his pieces had been tranſlated into Engliſh, though incorrectly; and we have an accurate tranſlation of the whole by Des Maizeau, in three volumes, octavo. St. Evremond died in September, 1703, in the ninety-firſt year of his age, and was interred in Weſtminſter abbey, where a monument is erected to his memory.

EVREUX, an ancient town of France, in Normandy with a biſhop's ſee. It has nine pariſhes, and ſeveral religious houſes. The cathedral church, and the magnificent caſtle of Navarre, are ſtructures worth a traveller's obſervation. It is ſeated on the river Iton, fifty-five miles north-weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 14. E. Lat. 49 21. N.

EURIPIDES, a celebrated Greek poet, and one of thoſe who moſt excelled in tragedy, was born about the four hundred and eightieth year before the Chriſtian æra, in the iſle of Salamis, whither his father and mother had retired a little before Xerxes entered Attica. He learnt rhetoric under Prodicus, morality under Socrates, and natural philoſophy under Anaxagoras; but at eighteen years of age abandoned philoſophy, in order to apply himſelf to dramatic poetry. It ought not, however, to be imagined that he afterwards neglected the ſtudy of morality and natural philoſophy, for his works prove the contrary. He ſhut himſelf up in a cave to compoſe his tragedies, which were extremely applauded by the Greeks. The Athenian army, commanded by Nicias, being defeated in Sicily, the ſoldiers purchaſed their lives and liberties by reciting the verſes of Euripides, ſuch eſteem and veneration had the Sicilians for the pieces wrote by this excellent poet. Socrates, the wiſeſt of the philoſophers, ſet ſuch a value upon them, that they were the only tragedies he went to ſee acted, and yet his performances ſeldom gained the prize. Euripides frequently interſperſes through them moral ſentences, and ſevere reflections on the fair ſex, whence he was called the Woman Hater. He was, nevertheleſs, married, but the ſcandalous lives of his two wives drew upon him the raillery of Ariſtophanes, and other comic poets, which occaſioned his retiring to the court of Archelaus, king of Macedon, where he was well received. That prince was fond of learned men, and drew them to him by his liberality. If we may believe Solinus, he made Euripides his miniſter of ſtate, and gave him other extraordinary proofs of his eſteem. He however died in a very miſerable manner: he was walking in a wood, according to his cuſtom, in deep meditation, when the intenſeneſs of his thoughts, perhaps, carrying him too far, he was met by the hounds of Archelaus, who was then hunting, and was torn to pieces in the four hundred and fifth year before the Chriſtian æra, when ſeventy-five years of age. Archelaus buried him with great magnificence, and the Athenians were ſo much afflicted at his death, that the whole city went into mourning.

Of ninety-two tragedies which he compoſed, nineteen are only remaining, the moſt valuable editions of which are thoſe of Aldus in 1703, octavo; of Plantin, in 1570, ſexeſimo; of Commelin, in 1597, octavo; of Paul Stevens, in 1604, quarto; and of Joſhua Barnes, in 1694, folio.

EUROPA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, and the ſiſter of Cadmus, who being beloved by Jupiter, that god transformed himſelf into a white bull, and appeared in the meadows where ſhe was walking with her attendants. Pleaſed with the beauty and gentleneſs of the horned animal, ſhe ventured on his back, when the god immediately plunged into the ſea, and carried her off in triumph to the iſle of Crete, where, laying aſide his diſguiſe, he made the bull a conſtellation in the zodiac, and, in honour of his miſtreſs, gave her name to the fourth part of the world.

Some mythologiſts explain this fable by obſerving that Taurus, king of Crete, or general of the forces of that monarch, waged war with Agenor, diſpoſſeſſed him of the city of Tyre, and of Europa his daughter, whom he carried with him to Crete. Others ſay, that Aſterius, or Minos, brought her away, when he waged war with the Phœnicians; and that putting her into a ſhip called Taurus, or the Bull, ſailed with her to Crete, where ſhe married Aſterius, who, for his virtue and juſtice, was called Jupiter.

EUROPE is one of the four parts of the world, and is a large peninſula, being bounded on the north by the Frozen Ocean, on the weſt by the Weſtern Ocean, on the ſouth by the Mediterranean, which ſeparates it from Africa, and by the Archipelago, which divides it in part from Aſia, as alſo by the Black Sea, and then by the river Don, till it comes near the river Volga or Wolga, and then it is parted from Aſia by this laſt, and afterwards by the river Oby. Europe is ſituated between Long 9. 35. W. and 72. 25. E. and latitude 35. and 72. N. It is about three thouſand three hundred miles in length, from Cape St. Vincent, in Portugal, to the river Oby, in Ruſſia; and two thouſand two hundred miles in breadth, from Cape Matapan, in the Morea, to the North Cape of Norway. We may judge by this, that it is much leſs than Aſia and Africa; but it is in many things more conſiderable than both.

Europe, excepting a ſmall part of Lapland and Muſcovy, is ſituated in the temperate zone; inſomuch, that we neither feel the extremities of heat nor cold. We cannot boaſt of rich mines of gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones, nor does it produce ſugar or ſpices, nor yet elephants, camels, lions, tygers, panthers, and crocodiles, things that we can do without; but produces abundance of corn, pulſe, fruits, animals, and even ſimples, the moſt neceſſary for the uſe of mankind. In general, it is better peopled and better cultivated than the other parts; it is more full of cities, towns, and villages, great and ſmall, and its buildings are more ſolid, and more commodious, in general, than thoſe of Africa and Aſia. The inhabitants are all white, and incomparably more handſome than the Africans, and even than moſt of the the Aſiatics. The Europeans ſurpaſs both in arts and ſciences, eſpecially in thoſe called the liberal, in trade, navigation, and in military and civil affairs; being, at the ſame time, more prudent, more valiant, more generous, more polite, and more ſociable than they: and though we are divided into various ſects, yet, as Chriſtians, we have infinitely the advantage over the reſt of mankind. There are but few places in Europe where they ſell each other for ſlaves; and none where robbery is a profeſſion, as it is in Aſia and Africa.

There are ſeveral ſorts of governments in Europe, as the two empires of Germany and Ruſſia, the kingdoms of England, France, Spain, Portugal, Denmark, Sweden, Poland, Pruſſia, Sardinia, and the Two Sicilies. The commonwealths are Holland, Swiſſerland, Venice, Genoa, Raguſa, Lucca, and Geneva. The dukedoms, Tuſcany, Savoy, Modena, Mantua, Parma, and Courland, &c.

There are five ſorts of religions in Europe, viz. The Mahommedan, which is profeſſed in Turky in Europe; the Greek, of which there are many in the ſame parts, in all Muſcovy, and in ſeveral parts of Poliſh Ruſſia; the Roman catholic in Spain, Portugal, France, and Italy; the proteſtant, though with a conſiderable difference, in Great Britain, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. There is a mixture of in both the laſt, Ireland, Swiſſerland, Germany, Poland, Hungary, and the Low Countries: beſides many Jews, and ſome idolaters, in Lapland, and the northern parts of Muſcovy.

There are three general languages in Europe; the Latin, of which the Italian, the French, and the Spaniſh, are dialects; the Teutonic, which is ſpoken, though differently, in Germany, Hungary, Denmark, Sweden, and Great Britain; the Sclavonic, which is ſpoken, though greatly diſguiſed, in Mucovy, Poland, Bohemia, and Turky in Europe. There are ſome of leſs extent, as the Greek, the Proper Hungarian, the Baſque, the Britiſh, which is ſpoken in Wales and Bretagne, in France, the Iriſh, and the Laponic.

The moſt conſiderable mountains are, the Sierra Morena, in Spain: the Pyrennees, between France and Spain; the mountains of Auvergne and of the Cevennes, in France; the Alps, between Germany and Italy; the mountains of Bohemia and Germany; the Appenines, in Italy; the Dofrine, mountains, between Norway, Sweden, and Lapland, the mountains of Stolp and Oby, in Muſcovy; the Carpatian mountains, between Poland, Germany, Hungary, Tranſylvania, and Moravia; Mount Argentara, which ſeparates Servia and Moldavia from Macedonia, Romania, and Albania; Monte Gibello, in Sicilly; the Wreking, in Shropſhire; and ſome high mountains in Wales and Scotland.

Europe is as well watered with rivers as any part of Aſia or Africa; for in Spain there is the Ebro, the Guadalquivir, the Guadiana, the Tajo, and the Douro; in France, the Garonne, the Rhone, the Loire, and the Seine; in Italy, the Po, and the Tiber, or Tivere; in Germany, the Rhine, the Weſer, the Elbe, the Oder, and the Danube; in England, the Thames; in Scotland, the Tay; in Ireland, the Shannon, in Poland, the Viſtula and the Nieper; and in Muſcovy, the Don, the Dwina, the Wolga, and part of the Oby.

Europe may be divided into eleven great parts, including their dependencies; 1. Sweden; 2. Denmark and Norway; 3. Ruſſia; 4. Poland; 5. Germany; 6. France; 7. Spain; 8. Italy; 9. Turky in Europe; 10. Little Tartary; and, 11. The European iſlands, of which the chief are Great Britain and Ireland. The greateſt cities in Europe are, London, Paris, Amſterdam, Conſtantinople, Moſcow, and Rome.

EURYDICE, in fabulous hiſtory, the wife of Orpheus, was bit by a ſerpent, and died on the very day of their marriage. Orpheus went to Tartarus, or hell, to ſeek for her; where, by the charms of his lyre and the ſweetneſs of his voice, he obtained Pluto's permiſſion to bring her back to the earth, on condition, that he did not look at her till they came to the light of the world: but his impatient fondneſs rendering him unable to avoid turning his head, to ſee if ſhe was ſafe, ſhe was ſnatched from him for ever.

EURYDICE, the wife of Amyntas, king of Macedon, lived about three hundred and ſixty years before the Chriſtian æra. She brought Amyntas four children, three ſons, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, the father of Alexander the Great; and a daughter, named Euryone. Eurydice fell ſo diſtractedly in love with her ſon-in-law, that to engage him to marry her, ſhe promiſed to murder her huſband, and raiſe him to the throne: but Euryone informed the king of her wicked deſigns. However, the king, though convinced of his wife's guilt, pardoned her, for the ſake of her children. After his death, he was ſucceeded by his ſon Alexander; but Eurydice, fired with luſt and ambition, got him murdered, as alſo Perdiccas, her ſecond ſon, who ſucceeded his brother Alexander.

EURYDICE, daughter to Amintas, the ſon of Perdiccas, king of Macedon, and the brother of Philip, Alexander the Great's father, married her uncle Aridæus, who was declared king of Macedon after Alexander's death. She oppoſed Olympias, Alexander's mother, on every occaſion; but having the ill fortune to be deſerted by her ſoldiers, on her endeavouring to hinder Olympias from returning into Macedon, both Aridæus and ſhe fell into Olympias's hands, and were impriſoned in a dungeon. The Athenians murmuring at her cruelty, Olympias cauſed ſome Thracians to murder Aridæus, and this rigour not bridling Eurydice's tongue, ſhe ſent her a ſword, a girdle, and a cup of hemlock-juice, and recommended her to die by which of them ſhe pleaſed; when Eurydice, without ſhedding a tear, or ſhewing the leaſt diſturbance, took the girdle, and ſtrangled herſelf.

EURYDICE, an Illyrian lady, whom Plutarch propoſes as a pattern to her ſex, becauſe though ſhe was of a barbarous country, and advanced in years, ſhe applied herſelf to ſtudy, that ſhe might be qualified to educate her children. The time in which ſhe lived is uncertain.

EURYSTHÆUS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Mycenæ, ſucceeded his father Sthenelus, and, to pleaſe Juno, made Hercules undertake the labours ſo celebrated by the poets, from the hopes that he would periſh in ſome of them. He is ſaid to have been killed by Hyllus, one of the ſons of Hercules, about the one thouſand two hundred and thirtieth year before the Chriſtian æra.

EURYTUS, in fabulous hiſtory, a king of Oechalia, who promiſed to give his daughter in marriage to any one who could ſhoot nearer a mark than he. Hercules agreed to the propoſal; but though he won, he was refuſed the prize: on which he ſlew Eurytus, and carried away his daughter.

EUSDEN (LAWRENCE) an Engliſh divine and poet-laureat, was born in Ireland, educated at Trinity college, Cambridge and entered into holy orders. On his tranſlating the lord Halifax's Battle of the Boyne into Latin, and dedicating it to that ingenious nobleman, his lordſhip became his patron. He was alſo eſteemed and encouraged by the duke of Newcaſtle, on whoſe marriage with the lady Henrietta Godolphin, he wrote an epithalamium; for which, upon Mr. Rowe's death, his grace procured him the poſt of poet-laureat. He was the author of many poetical pieces; but was placed by Mr. Pope in his Dunciad. He died at his rectory at Coneſby, in Lincolnſhire, on the 27th of September, 1730.

EUSEBIUS, ſurnamed Pamphilus, a celebrated biſhop of Cæſarea, in Paleſtine, and one of the moſt judicious and learned men of his time, was born in Paleſtine, about the latter end of the reign of Galienus. He was the intimate friend of Pamphilus the Martyr, and after his death took his name, in honour to his memory. He was ordained biſhop of Cæſaria in 313. He had a conſiderable ſhare in the conteſt relating to Arius, whoſe cauſe he, as well as ſeveral other biſhops of Paleſtine, defended, being perſuaded that Arius had been unjuſtly perſecuted by Alexander, biſhop of Alexandria. He aſſiſted at the council of Nice in 325, when he made a ſpeech to the emperor Conſtantine, on his coming to the council, and was placed next him on his right hand. He was preſent at the council of Antioch, in which Euſtathius, biſhop of that city, was depoſed; but though he was choſen by the biſhop and people of Antioch to ſucceed him, he abſolutely refuſed it. In 335 he aſſiſted at the council of Tyre, held againſt Athanaſius; and at the aſſembly of biſhops at Jeruſalem, at the time of the dedication of the church there; and was ſent by theſe biſhops to the emperor Conſtantine, to defend what they had done againſt Athanaſius; when he pronounced the panegyric made on that emperor, during the public rejoicings in the beginning of the thirtieth year of his reign, which was the laſt of his life. Euſebius ſurvived the emperor but a ſhort time, for he died about the year 338. He wrote, 1. An Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, of which Valetius has given a good edition in Greek and Latin. 2. The Life of Conſtantine. 3. A Treatiſe againſt Hierocles. 4. Chronicon. 5. Preparationis Evangelicæ. 6. De Demonſtratione Evangelica, of which there are but ten books extant out of twenty; and ſeveral other works, ſome of which are loſt.

EUSEBIUS, biſhop of Nicomedia, and afterwards of Conſtantinople, flouriſhed in the fourth century, and rendered himſelf famous by his adhering to the opinions of Arius, and his oppoſition to Athanaſius.

EUSEBIUS, biſhop of Verceil, in the fourth century, warmly defended Athanaſius, on which account he was baniſhed by the emperor Conſtantius. At his return he oppoſed an Arian biſhop of Milan, and died on the firſt of Auguſt, 373. A Latin verſion of the four Goſpels is attributed to him, which John Andrew Irici cauſed to be printed at Milan, in 1748, quarto; but he was evidently not the author of it.

EUSEBIUS, a native of Greece, ſucceeded pope Marcellus, on the 5th of February, 310, and died the following year. He was ſucceeded by Miltiades.

EUSTACHIA (ST.) one of the ſmalleſt of the Caribbee iſlands, in America, has a ſtrong fort, and belongs to the Dutch. It is little more than a mountain, which riſes in the form of a ſugar-loaf, which is hollow at the top. Long. 62. 56. W. Lat. 17. 29. N.

EUSTATHIUS, biſhop of Beræa, was born in Pamphilia, and in 323 was raiſed to the ſee of Antioch. In 325 he aſſiſted at the council of Nice, where he oppoſed the Arians with great zeal; but being charged with Sabellianiſm and immorality, he was baniſhed, by the emperor Conſtantine, to Trajanopolis, in Thrace, where he died, about the year 337. He wrote ſeveral treatiſes; all of which are loſt, except a treatiſe on the Pythoneſs, or Woman with a Familiar Spirit, which he wrote againſt Origen.

EUSTATHIUS, biſhop of Theſſalonica, in the twelfth century, under the reigns of the emperors Emanuel, Alexander, and Andronicus Comnenus. He was a very eminent grammarian, and wrote Commentaries upon Homer and Dionyſius, the geographer. The beſt edition of his Commentaries on Homer is that of Rome, printed in Greek, in 1542, four volumes, folio. His Commentaries on the Periegeſis of Dionyſius were printed by Mr. Hudſon, at Oxford, in 1697, octavo. Euſtathius appears to have been alive in the year 1194.

EUSTOCHIA, a Roman lady, illuſtrious by her birth, her virtues, and her merit, was one of the diſciples of St. Jerom. Under that excellent maſter, ſhe became a perfect miſtreſs of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; and applied her knowledge in theſe languages to the ſtudy of the Holy Scriptures. She attended that holy doctor in his travels into Syria, Paleſtine, and Egypt, to viſit the convents and holy places; and ſhut herſelf up in the convent of Bethlehem, which ſhe governed, after the death of Paula. She died in the year 419.

EUTHYCRATES, a celebrated ſtatuary, born at Sycione, was the ſon and ſcholar of Lyſippus. He applied himſelf principally to obſerve the proportions of bodies. The ſtatues of Hercules and Alexander procured him great reputation, as did that of Medea, drawn by four horſes.

EUTICHIUS, a famous patriarch of Alexandria, from the year 933 to 940. He compoſed, in Arabic, his Annals, which were printed by Dr. Pococke, at Oxford, in 1658, with a Latin verſion.

EUTROPIUS, (FLAVIUS) a Latin author, in the fourth century, was ſecretary to Conſtantine the Great, and afterwards bore arms under the emperor Julian, and followed that prince in his expedition againſt the Perſians. He wrote an Abridgment of the Roman Hiſtory, from the Foundation of Rome to the Reign of Valens, to whom he dedicated his works, the beſt edition of which is that of Miſs Le Fevre, afterwards Madam Dacier, publiſhed at Paris for the uſe of the Dauphin, in quarto, in the year 1683.

EUTROPIUS, a famous eunuch, who, in the reign of Arcadius, was raiſed to the moſt diſtinguiſhed poſts, and even to the conſulſhip, but rendered himſelf odious by his crimes and debaucheries, and had even the inſolence to threaten the empreſs Eudoxia, with cauſing her to be divorced; but Gainas having demanded his head, he took ſanctuary in a church, which he had deprived of its immunities, when St. Chryſoſtom ſaved him from the fury of the populace, and pronounced, on that occaſion, a ſermon, which is juſtly eſteemed a maſter-piece of eloquence. Eutropius was afterwards baniſhed to the iſland of Cyprus, and was beheaded at Chalcedon, in 399.

EUTYCHES, a famous abbot of a monaſtery at Conſtantinople, in the fifth century, who zealouſly attacking the opinions of Neſtorius, fell himſelf into error. He maintained that Jeſus Chriſt had a celeſtial body, which had paſſed through the body of the Virgin as through a canal, and that after the hypoſtatic union there was but one nature in Jeſus Chriſt, the human nature being abſorbed by the divine. This opinion was however condemned by the ſynod of Conſtantinople in 448, but it was approved in one held at Epheſus, and afterwards condemned in the general council of Chalcedon in 451.

EUTYCHIANUS, biſhop of Rome, ſucceeded Felix on the 4th of June, 275. He ſuffered martyrdom on the 8th of December, 283, and was ſucceeded by Caius.

EUTYCHIUS, a famous patriarch of Conſtantinople, ſucceeded Mennas in 552, and called the fifth Oecumenical council, in which he preſided. But at length oppoſing the opinions of Juſtinian, that prince cauſed him to be depoſed in a ſynod, and afterwards baniſhed him. However he was reſtored in 577, and compoſed a Treatiſe on the Reſurrection, in which he maintained that the bodies raiſed will be ſo ſubtil, as not to be tangible. He died in 582, aged ſeventy.

EUTYCHIUS, patriarch of Alexandria, was born at Cairo in Egypt, in the year 876. He became ſo well ſkilled in phyſic, that he was reckoned one of the beſt phyſicians of his time. Towards the latter part of his life he applied to the ſtudy of divinity, and in 933 was choſen patriarch of Alexandria, when he took the name of Eutychius, he being before called Said Ebn Batrik. He wrote Annals from the beginning of the world to the year 900, which were publiſhed by the learned Dr. Pococke, in Arabic and Latin, at Oxford, in 1659, quarto, with a preface and notes by Mr. Selden. There are ſome other of his works in manuſcript, in the public library at Cambridge.

EUZOIUS, deacon of Alexandria, in the fourth century, was depoſed together with Arius; but upon his offering Conſtantine a confeſſion of his faith, was again received into the church. He was ſoon after preferred to the ſee of Antioch; and in the year 360 baptized the emperor Conſtantine.

EXETER, the capital city of Devonſhire, was the Iſca Dannoniorum, in the Itinerary of Antoninus. It is a mile and a half in circumference, and has large ſuburbs without the walls. It has ſix gates, ſeveral turrets, and four principal ſtreets, which all meet in the middle of the city, out of which run ſeveral leſſer ſtreets and lanes. There were ſeveral conduits, to which leaden pipes conveyed water for the uſe of the city. The principal was in the cathedral church-yard, which is now converted into a pump. There are ſixteen churches in the city and ſuburbs, beſides the cathedral, which is dedicated to St. Peter. This ſtands in the eaſt quarter of the city, and is a magnificent ſtructure. It has two towers, in one of which was St. Peter's bell, which weighed thirty thouſand pounds, which is now taken down. The other tower contains a ring of ten bells, the largeſt in England. It is vaulted throughout, both in the body and the iſles, and is three hundred and ſeventy-two feet in length, and ſeventy two in breadth. In the choir the epiſcopal ſeat is high, and of curious workmanſhip; and in other parts of the church there are handſome tombs and monuments. The organ is ſuppoſed to be the largeſt in England, the great pipe being fifteen inches in diameter. The biſhop's palace is near the cathedral, and has a way out of it into that church. The dean and chapter's houſes are near the church-yard, in a place called the Cloſe.

The cathedral is ſurrounded with pleaſant walks and good houſes, and is ſeparated from the reſt of the town by its gates. In the north part is the caſtle, called Rugemont. The Saxon kings had anciently their palace here, and ſince the Conqueſt it was the reſidence of the earls of Cornwal. At preſent it is famous only for being the ſhire hall of Devon, and the place where the aſſizes are kept, as well as the quarter-ſeſſions.

The High-ſtreet for ſpaciouſneſs and good buildings is ſcarcely to be equalled in any city but London, beſides which the city halls are worthy notice. It is a county of itſelf, and is governed by a mayor, twenty-four aldermen, a recorder, chamberlain, and other ſubordinate officers. It ſends two members to parliament, who are choſen by the magiſtrates and freemen, being in number about one thouſand two hundred. It was anciently noted for the coinage of money, and being a ſtaple town. It continued coining ſo late as the reign of king William III. as appears from the letter E on his ſhillings and other pieces. It has long had a printing-houſe, where ſeveral books of value have been printed.

The incorporated body of this city is divided into ſeveral companies, and every company is governed by ſuch officers among them as are yearly choſen, by which means the order of the city is greatly promoted. Civil cauſes are directed to the mayor, or his officers, who have cognizance of all pleas, and hear cauſes between party and party, and determine them with the advice of the recorder, aldermen, and common council of the city. But criminal cauſes belonging to the king, and breaches of the peace, are determined by eight aldermen, who are juſtices of the peace. The manufactures are ſerges, pluſhes, and of late tapeſtry. It has two markets, on Wedneſdays and Fridays, and four fairs, on Aſh-Wedneſday, Whit-Monday, Auguſt 1, and December 6, for horned cattle, horſes, and almoſt every commodity. It is ſeventy-nine miles ſouth-weſt of Briſtol, twenty-eight ſouth-ſouth-eaſt of Barnſtaple, eighty-eight weſt-by-ſouth of Saliſbury, and one hundred and ſeventy-two weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 3. 40. W. Lat. 50. 44. N.

EXETER (FRANCES BRIDGES, counteſs of) a lady diſtinguiſhed by a moſt cruel and unjuſt proſecution carried on againſt her. She was daughter to the lord Chandos, and was firſt married to ſir Thomas Smith, of Abingdon, maſter of the requeſts, and Latin ſecretary to James I. After his deceaſe ſhe became the ſecond wife of Thomas Cecil, the firſt earl of Exeter of that name, who died on the 7th of February, 1622. After the earl's death ſhe was maliciouſly accuſed of inceſt with her ſon-in-law, the lord Roſs, who married a daughter of ſir Thomas Lake, whom he ſlighted. This ſcandalous accuſation was accompanied with that of witchcraft, the great crime of that age, and alſo with that of an intention to poiſon her accuſers: theſe were the ladies Lake and Roſs. Sir Thomas Lake, who ſaid, "he could not not refuſe to be a father and a huſband," was artfully perſuaded to join with them, in a proſecution againſt the innocent counteſs. King James took great pains to enquire into the truth of this affair, and diſcovered ſuch a complication of forgery, ſubornation, and perjury, as is ſcarce to be paralleled in hiſtory. The king ſat in judgment upon them himſelf, and compared their crimes to the firſt plot of the firſt ſin in Paradiſe; the lady Lake to the ſerpent, her daughter to Eve, and ſir Thomas to Adam. Lady Roſs, who confeſſed her guilt in open court, was pardoned. Sir Thomas and his lady were fined ten thouſand pounds to the king, and five hundred pounds to the injured counteſs. The laſt mentioned lady had only one daughter, who died in her infancy.

EXILLES, a town in Piedmont, in the Brianzoneſe, defended by four baſtions, and a caſtle ſtanding upon a hill. It was taken by the duke of Savoy in 1708, and afterwards confirmed to him by the treaty of Utrecht. It is ſeated on the river Doire, eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Suza, and twenty-five miles ſouth-weſt of Pignerol. Long. 7. 10. E. Lat. 45. 12 N.

EXPERIENS (PHILIP CALLIMACHUS). See ESPERIENTE.

EXUPERIUS, biſhop of Thouloufe, in the fifth century, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by acts of the moſt extraordinary beneficence. There being a great famine, he ſold all his goods, and even the conſecrated gold and ſilver plate in the church, to relieve the poor. He died about the year 417.

EYE, a town in Suffolk, with a market on Saturdays. It is but a mean dirty place, and has only one fair, which is on Whit-Monday, for cattle and toys. It ſends two members to parliament, and is twenty-five miles eaſt-north-eaſt of Bury, twenty three north of Ipſwich, and ninety-one north-north-eaſt of London. Long. 1. 3 E. Lat. 52. 27. N.

EYNDHOVEN, a town in Dutch Brabant, with a ſtrong caſtle. The inhabitants make a great deal of butter in the neighbourhood, and have mines of pit-coal. It now belongs to the prince of Naſſau Orange. Long 5. 26. E. Lat. 51. 40. N.

EYRAC, or IRAC ARABI, a province of Turky, in Aſia, three hundred and forty-five miles in length, and one hundred and ninety in breadth, of which Bagdad is the capital. The other towns are Hella, on the river Euphrates, near the place where Babylon ſtood. Kufa, on the lake Rahema, once a large city, now in a mean condition; and Baſrah, a large town, and of great trade.

EYRAC AGEMI, or IRAC AGEMI, the principal province of Perſia. It was formerly called Parthia. It is five hundred and forty miles in length, and three hundred and ſixty in breadth. The capital city is Iſpahan. It is bounded on the north by Gilan and Adirbeitzun, on the eaſt by the province of Chorafan; by Chuſiſtan and Forſiſtan, or Pars, on the ſouth; and by Curdiſtan the ancient Aſſyria on the weſt.

EYSENACH, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, and territory of Thuringia, ſeated on the river Neſs. A ſeminary was founded here in 1704, for ſix ſtudents in theology; and in 1707 an illuſtrious ſchool. It is the capital of the country, and belongs to the branch of Sax-Eyſenach. It is thirty-five miles eaſt of Erfurt. Long. 10. 18. E. Lat. 50. 59. N.

EYSENGREYN (MARTIN) in Latin, Eiſengrenius, doctor of divinity, and vice-chancellor of the univerſity of Ingolſtadt, in the ſixteenth century. He wrote, 1. An Account of the memorable Things which happened in the Church. 2. A Chronicle of Spire; and many other works. He died in the year 1578.

EZEKIEL, the third of the greater prophets, was carried away captive when young with the reſt of the Jews to Babylon, in the reign of Jeconiah, and began to prophecy about the four hundred and eighty-fifth year before the Chriſtian æra. He predicted the captivity and ruin of Jeruſalem, the misfortunes that would happen to the neighbouring nations, the re-eſtabliſhment of the Jews, the rebuilding of the temple, the reign of the Meſſiah, and the call of the Gentiles. His prophecies are filled with viſions, ſentences, and compariſons, ſome of which are ſo difficult to be underſtood, that the Jews forbid the reading of them before thirty years of age. Ezekiel reproaches that people for their idolatry, expatiates on their crimes, and uſes every argument to turn them from the worſhip of falſe gods, threatening them with captivity and the greateſt misfortunes, if they continued in them, and gave credit to the promiſes of falſe prophets. This, it is ſaid, ſo exaſperated that people, that they put him to a cruel death. The book of Ezekiel contains twenty-two viſions, placed according to the order of time in which they appeared to him.

EZIJA, or ECYA, a town of Spain, in Andaluſia, ſeated on the banks of the river Xenil, over which there is a long handſome ſtone bridge. It was formerly more conſiderable than it is now, having been a biſhop's ſee, which it loſt by the invaſion of the Moors. The land about it is fruitful, and produces all the neceſſaries of life, eſpecially it affords paſture for numerous flocks of ſheep. The riches of the inhabitant ariſe from hemp, cotton, and wool, which are exported by means of the river which falls into the Guadalquivir, fifteen miles below the town. It is thirty miles ſouth-weſt of Cordova, and forty one eaſt of Seville. Long. 5 4 W. Lat. 37. 22. N.

EZZELINO, a famous tyrant, born in the village of Onera, in the province of Trevigiano, was of German extraction, and lived in the thirteenth century. He fought at firſt at the head of the Gibelins, and gained ſeveral great victories. At length he became dreaded on account of his cruelty and oppreſſion; for having taken Verona, Padua, and ſome other cities in Italy, he there rendered himſelf odious by the moſt ſhocking tyranny. Being one day informed that the inhabitants of Padua had revolted, he put to death twelve thouſand of them whom he had in his army. But at laſt the princes of Lombardy entered into a league againſt him, took him as he was marching to attack Milan, and carried him to Soncino, where he died mad, on the 12th of October, 1259, after he had exerciſed his tyranny above forty years.

F.

FABER (JOHN) a learned divine, of the order of St. Dominic, was born at Hailbron, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſixteenth century by his ſermons, and various works, the principal of which are, a Latin Treatiſe on the Manner of knowing Heretics, and another to prove that there may be faith without charity.

FABER (JOHN) a learned Dominican monk, who was official and grand vicar of Conſtance, in 1519, and alſo confeſſor to the emperor Ferdinand. He was a friend to Eraſmus, and had a celebrated conference with the Proteſtants in 1526. He died June 12, 1541. His principal works have been collected together, and printed in three volumes, folio. This monk is frequently called The Hammer of the Heretics, from one of his books intitled Malleus Hæreticorum.

FABER (JOHN) an excellent ſcraper in mezzotinto, was born in Holland, and brought to England at three years of age; he received his firſt inſtructions from his father, who drew the portraits of the founders of colleges at Oxford and Cambridge, and whom he at length far ſurpaſſed. He afterwards ſtudied in Vanderbank's academy. He executed a prodigious number of portraits, ſome of which are bold, free, and beautiful. To him we owe the kit-kat-club, and the beauties at Hampton-Court. "He died of the gout, ſays Mr. Walpole, a few years ago, at his houſe in Bloomſbury."

FABER. See FEVRE.

FABERT (ABRAHAM) marſhal of France, and governor of Sedan, was born at Metz, and ſignalized himſelf by his courage in ſeveral battles and ſieges. He ſaved the king's army at the famous retreat at Mentz, which ſome have compared to that of Xenophon. Being wounded in the thigh at the ſiege of Turin by a muſket-ball, M. de Turenne, with the cardinal de la Valette, to whom he was aid-de-camp, conjuring him to follow the advice of all the ſurgeons, and ſuffer his leg to be cut off, he ſaid that death ſhould either have him entire or not at all, and he was happily cured. He had afterwards the government of Sedan, which he fortified with ſuch ſolidity and œconomy, that the French king never had better fortifications, nor any performed at ſo little expence. He took Stenay in 1654, and in 1658 was made marſhal of France. His merit, his probity, and his modeſty, acquired him the eſteem of Lewis XIV. and the nobility. He refuſed the collar of the king's orders, alledging that it ought never to be borne by any but the ancient nobility; on which Lewis XIV. anſwered his letter with his own hand, and obſerved that thoſe to whom he was going to diſtribute it could never receive more honour from it than he had done, by refuſing it from ſo generous a principle. He died at Sedan on the 17th of May, 1662, at ſixty-three years of age. Father Barre publiſhed his Life in 1752, in two volumes, duodecimo.

FABIAN (ROBERT) an Engliſh hiſtorian, born at London, in the fifteenth century, was brought up to trade, and became ſo conſiderable a merchant, that he was choſen one of the aldermen of that city, and, in 1493, ſerved the office of ſheriff. He was a man of learning, and had ſome ſkill in poetry, both in Engliſh, Latin, and French, but chiefly applied himſelf to the ſtudy of hiſtory, and compiled a Chronicle of England and France, or, as he calls it, The Concordance of Stories, in two volumes, folio. He died in London, in the beginning of the year 1512.

FABIANUS, biſhop of Rome, was born in that city, and ſucceeded Anterus in that ſee, in the year 236. He ſuffered martyrdom on the 13th of January, 250, during the perſecution of Decius. It is ſaid that a dove ſettled on his head during the ceremony of his election.

FABIUS (MAXIMUS RULLIANUS) a celebrated Roman conſul, was general of the cavalry, in the three hundred and twenty-fourth year before the Chriſtian æra, and obtained the command of the army during the abſence of Papirius the dictator, with expreſs orders not to attack the enemy; but ſo fine an opportunity of defeating them offered, that he rather choſe to expoſe his head, than to neglect doing an important ſervice to his country. He therefore forced the camp of the Samnites, and gained a complete victory; yet in ſpite of this glorious ſucceſs, Papirius reſolved that he ſhould ſuffer death for his diſobedience, but the army and the Roman people obtained his pardon. Fabius was five times conſul, once cenſor and dictator; he triumphed over the Apulians, Lucerians, Samnites, Gauls, Umbrians, Marſi, and Tuſcans, and inſtituted the annual proceſſion of the Roman knights, mounted on white horſes, from the Temple of Honour to the Capitol.

FABIUS MAXIMUS, (QUINTUS) one of the greateſt generals of his time, was ſurnamed Cunctator, i. e. Temporiſer, becauſe being created dictator, after the battle of Traſimenes, in the 217th year before the Chriſtian æra, he found means to weary out Hannibal without fighting, by encamping in the moſt advantageous manner, and inceſſantly harraſſing him. Hannibal rallied his backwardneſs, and made uſe of every ſtratagem to force him to come to an engagement; but ſeeing that all was to no purpoſe, he ſent him word, that, "If he was as great a captain as he "would be thought, he ought to come into the plain and "give him battle." But Fabius coldly replied, "That if "Hannibal himſelf was as great a captain as he would be "thought, he would do well to force him to fight." Fabius was five times conſul, the firſt in the 233d year before Chriſt, after he had defeated the Ligurians. He performed ſuch great ſervices for his country, that he was called, The Buckler of the Republic. He was alſo called Verrucoſus, from a wart on his lips, and Oricula, from his ſingular mildneſs. Quintus Fabius Maximus, his ſon, was alſo conſul; during his conſulſhip, ſeeing his father come to him on horſeback, he ordered him to diſmount, when that great man embracing him, ſaid, "I was willing to ſee whether thou knoweſt what it is to be a conſul."

FABIUS PICTOR, the firſt of the Romans who wrote hiſtory in proſe, lived about two hundred and ſixteen years before the Chriſtian æra. The work we have under his name is a ſuppoſititious piece, and one of thoſe publiſhed by Annius Viterbo. This family took the name of Pictor, from the firſt of it who painted the temple of Health at Rome.

FABIUS DOSSENUS, or DORSENUS, compoſed farces, called by the Romans Atellanes, from the city of Atella, where he wrote them. This poet is mentioned by Horace, Seneca, and Pliny.

FABIUS MARCELLINUS, an hiſtorian of the third century, lived after Alexander Severus, and before Diocleſian. He is cited by Lampridius as the author of the Life of Alexander Mammeus. It is this Marcellinus, who with Marius Maximus, and Suetonius Vopiſcus, propoſed to imitate, in writing, the Life of Probus.

FABIUS RUSTICUS, an hiſtorian in the time of Claudius and Nero, was the friend of Seneca. Tacitus, in his Annals and Life of Agricola, praiſes his ſtyle.

FABRE, (JOHN CLAUDE) prieſt of the Oratory, and one of the moſt laborious French writers in the eighteenth century, was the ſon of an able ſurgeon, and born at Paris on the 25th of April, 1668. He was ſucceſſively profeſſor of philoſophy at Rumilly in Savoy, at Toulon, Rionen, Mans, and at Nantes, and taught theology three years at the ſeminary of the congregation at Lyons, where he cauſed to be printed his ſmall Latin and French Dictionary in 8vo, drawn from the beſt claſſic authors, which has had many editions. It was at Lyons alſo that he printed, in 1709, a new edition of Richelet's Dictionary, corrected and augmented, in 2 vols. folio, though in the title it was ſaid to be printed at Amſterdam, on account of ſeveral veral paſſages, which it was ſuppoſed would give offence, and it was accordingly ſuppreſſed, when being obliged to leave the congregation of the oratory, and to retire to Clermont, in Auvergne, and having no means of ſubſiſtence, he applied himſelf, to the education of ſome children. He was reſtored to his place in the congregation of the Oratory at the end of the year 1715, and was ſent to Douai, and afterwards lived at Montmorency. He died at Paris on the 22d of October, 1753, at eighty-five years of age, much regretted, on account of his modeſty, candour, ſweetneſs of temper, and his virtues. The moſt conſiderable of his works, is the Continuation of the Abbé Fleury's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which contains much erudition, but has many faults. He alſo wrote, beſides the works we have mentioned, 1. A Tranſlation of Virgil, in 4 vols. 12mo, with Notes and Diſſertations; 2. A Tranſlation of the Fables of Phædrus, with Notes, 12mo; 3. An Edition of Ovid's Metamorphoſes, with Notes, 12mo. &c.

FABRE (CLAUDE). See VAUGELAS.

FABRETTI (RAPHAEL) a very learned antiquary, born at Urbino in 1619. He was of a noble family, had a lively genius, an excellent memory, and a ſtrong inclination to learning. He obtained the eſteem of the moſt celebrated antiquaries in Europe, as cardinal Carpegna, cardinal Charles Barberini, and pope Alexander VII. who made him his ſecretary. After the death of that pope, Fabretti applied himſelf entirely to his ſtudies, the fruits of which are ſeveral excellent works, on the Aqueducts of ancient Rome, Trajan's Column, Ancient Inſcriptions, &c. He died January 7, 1700, aged eighty.

FABRI (HONORIUS) a laborious Jeſuit, born in the dioceſe of Bellay, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſkill in philoſophy and the mathematics, and by writing a great number of books, the moſt curious of which treat of Optics, the Loadſtone, the Motion of the Earth, the Ebbing and Flowing of the Sea, and of Geometry. He died at Rome, March 9, 1688.

FABRI, or FABRICIUS (GEORGE) a celebrated writer, born at Chemnitz, in 1516, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his piety and his works in proſe and verſe, which are, the Art of Poetry, in ſeven Books, and a great number of Latin poems, wrote in a pure, elegant, and eaſy ſtyle. He died on the 5th of July, 1571, aged fifty-ſix.

FABRIANO, a town of Italy, in the State of the Church, and in the March of Ancona. It is famous for making the beſt paper in all Italy. It is thirteen miles weſt of St. Severino. Long. 13. 3. Lat. 45. 18. N.

FABRICIUS, LUSCINUS (CAIUS) a Roman general, as much diſtinguiſhed by his honeſty and frugality, as by his courage, he was conſul, for the firſt time, in the year of Rome 471, about the 280th year before the Chriſtian æra, and conquered the Samnites, the Brutii, and the Lucanians. He raiſed the ſiege of Thurium, and obtained ſuch immenſe booty, that after he had given the ſoldiers a large ſhare of it, and had returned to the citizens of Rome all they had contributed to the expence of the war, there were ſtill four hundred talents left, which were carried into the exchequer on the day of his triumph, he being the only perſon who kept none of thoſe rich ſpoils for himſelf. Having been ſent on an embaſſy to Pyrrhus, he refuſed the preſents offered him by that prince, and being once honoured with a ſeat at his table, the diſcourſe turned upon the Epicureans, who, it was ſaid, placed their higheſt happineſs in a voluptuous life, and did not believe that the gods minded the government of the world, on which Fabricius cried, "Heaven grant that Pyrrhus and the Samnites may take great delight in this philoſophy, as long as they wage war againſt us." During his ſecond conſulſhip he generouſly informed Pyrrhus, that his phyſician had offered to poiſon him, provided he could obtain a reward. Fabricius died ſo poor, that the ſenate married his daughters at the public expence.

FABRICIUS (VEIENTO) a Roman author in the reign of Nero, A. D. 49. wrote defamatory libels againſt the ſenators and pontiffs, and was driven out of Italy for his crimes. Tacitus remarks, that this Fabricius, while he was prætor, faſtened maſtiffs inſtead of horſes to the chariots in the Cercenſian games. His works were burnt by Nero's order.

FABRICIUS (JEROME) a celebrated phyſician in the latter-end of the ſixteenth century, more known by the name of Aquapendente, the place of his birth; was the diſciple and ſucceſſor of Fallopius. He chiefly applied himſelf to ſurgery and anatomy, which he profeſſed at Padua for forty years with extraordinary reputation. The republic of Venice gave him a penſion of a thouſand golden crowns, and honoured him with a gold chain, and a ſtatue. He died in 1603. We have ſeveral of his works which are much eſteemed.

FABRICIUS (JOHN ALBERT) one of the moſt laborious and learned men of the laſt century, was born at Leipſic on the 11th of November, 1668. Having loſt his father and mother at ten or eleven years of age, his tutor ſent him to ſtudy at Quedlinburg, where reading by chance the Adverſaria of Barthius, it inſpired him with an incredible thirſt for ſtudy, and he applied himſelf to the reading of ancient authors both ſacred and profane. In 1693 he went to Hamburgh, and was, ſome years after, elected profeſſor of eloquence in that city. In 1719, the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel offered him the chair of the firſt profeſſor of divinity at Gieſſen, and the place of ſuperintendant of the churches of the confeſſion of Augſburg: when the magiſtrates of Hamburgh, in order to retain him, added an hundred crowns a year to his ſalary, and he was ſo ſenſible of this proof of their regard for him, that he reſolved to end his days in that city, and ſteadily refuſed all the places that were offered him elſewhere. He died April 3, 1736, aged ſixty-eight. He wrote a great number of works, but the principal and moſt eſteemed are, 1. Memoirs of Hamburgh, in 7 vols 8vo. to which Mr. Evers added an eighth; 2. Bibliotheca Græca, 14 vols 4to. 3 Bibliotheca Latina; 4. Codex Apocryphus Novi Teſtamentini, 3 vols 8vo. 5. Codex pſeudepigraphus Veteris Teſtamenti, 2 vols. 8vo. 6. Salutaris Lux Evangelii, toti Orbi per Divinam Gratiam exoriens, &c.

FABRICIUS (VINCENT) a native of Hamburgh, eminent for being a good poet, an able phyſician, a learned civilian, and a great orator, was counſellor to the biſhop of Lubec, and afterwards ſyndic of the city of Dantzick. His Latin poems and orations have been much admired; the moſt complete edition of them is that of Leipſic, in 1685. He died at Warſaw April 11, 1667, aged fifty-four.

FABROT (CHARLES HANNIBAL) one of the moſt celebrated civilians of his time, was born at Aix in 1681, and obtained an extraordinary ſkill in the civil and canon law, and in the belles lettres. He publiſhed the Baſilicæ, or Conſtitutions of the Emperors of the Eaſt, in Greek and Latin, with learned notes, in 7 vols. folio; and editions of Cedrenus, Nicetas, Anaſtaſius bibliothecarius, Conſtantine Manaſſes, and Cujas, with learned and curious Notes.

FABULINUS, in pagan worſhip, a certain deity to which the Romans offered ſacrifices, when their children began to ſpeak.

FACUNDUS, biſhop of Hermiana in Africa, aſſiſted at the famous conference held by pope Vigilius at Conſtantinople in 547, and wrote a Defence of the Three Chapters; that is, of the Orthodoxy of Theodorus of Mopſueſta, the Writings of Theodoret, and the Letter of Ibas; and compoſed on this occaſion twelve books, publiſhed by father Sirmond in 1629. This work is wrote with great art, ſpirit, and eloquence, but his fiery zeal ſometimes carries him too far.

FACIO (BARTHOLEMEW) a learned Italian of the fifteenth century, born at Spetia in the ſtate of Genoa. He was ſecretary to Alphonſo of Arragon, king of Naples, and ambaſſador from the Genoeſe to that prince. He acquired the friendſhip of the moſt illuſtrious perſons of his time, particularly that of the celebrated Æneas Sylvius, afterwards pope, under the name of Pius II. Facio tranſlated from Greek into Latin Arrian's Hiſtory of Alexander the Great, and compoſed in Latin the Hiſtory of Alphonſo V. king of Arragon and Naples. He alſo wrote, 1. A Treatiſe in Latin on the illuſtrious men of his time, of which a new edition was publiſhed at Florence, in 1745, quarto. 2 De Bello Veneto Cladiano ſeu inter Venetos, & Genuenſes ob Inſula Tenedos Poſſeſſionem geſto, circiter Anno 1391. 3. De Vitæ Felicitate, ſeu ſummi boni Fruitione Liber; and ſome other works. He died in 1457.

FAENZA, a city of Italy, in the State of the Church, and in Romania, with a biſhop's ſee. It is an ancient place, and has undergone various revolutions before it fell into the hands of the pope. The river Amona waſhes its walls, and paſſes between the city and the ſuburbs, which are joined by a ſtone bridge, defended by two good towers. The moſt remarkable things in the town are a marble fountain, adorned with ſeveral ſtatues, and the ſquare, which is ſurrounded with piazzas, which ſerve to walk under during the heat of the day, and when it rains. The church in the ſquare is better built than any of the reſt. This city is moſt remarkable for its earthern ware, which is the beſt in all Italy. There is a great deal of flax in the fields round about it. It is fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Ravenna, ten north-weſt of Forli, and ten ſouth-eaſt of Immola. Long. 12. 40. E. Lat. 44 34. N.

FAERNO (GABRIEL) in Latin Faernus, an excellent Latin poet and critic, was born at Cremona, in Italy, and flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century. His ſkill in polite literature rendered cardinal de Medicis, afterwards pope Pius IV. particularly fond of him. He was the author of ſome Latin Elegies, a hundred Latin Fables, ſelected from the ancients, and written in Iambic verſe, and of ſeveral criticiſms, as Cenſura Emendationem Livianarum, De Metris Comicis, &c.

He was extremely well ſkilled in decyphering manuſcripts, and reſtoring ancient authors to their purity; in particular, he took ſuch pains with Terence, that the celebrated Dr. Bentley thought his notes upon that author ſo important, that he has given them entire in his edition of him. He died at Rome, on the 17th of November, 1561.

FAGE (RAIMOND DE LA) an excellent deſigner and engraver, was born at Toulouſe, or, according to others, at Liſle, in the year 1648. He applied himſelf to deſigning through inclination, in ſpite of his parents, and had no maſter, nor any aſſiſtance, but his ſuperior talents ſupplied the want of them, and he became one of the beſt deſigners in Europe; but thoſe he performed on licentious ſubjects are the moſt eſteemed. He died in 1690.

FAGIUS (BUCHELIN) an eminent proteſtant miniſter, born at Rheinzabern, in 1504, where he laid the foundation of his learning, and afterwards ſtudied at Heidelberg and Straſburg. He at length ſtudied at Iſna, where the plague beginning to ſpread in 1541, he openly rebuked the wealthieſt of the inhabitants who were about to leave the place, exhorting them either to continue there, or liberally to beſtow their alms before they went, for the relief of thoſe they left behind, adding, that during the viſitation, he would viſit thoſe that were ſick, adminiſter ſpiritual comfort to them, pray for them, and be preſent with them day and night, all which he did, and yet eſcaped the diſtemper. The plague at the ſame time raging at Straſburg, and among many others, taking off Wolfangus Capito, Fagius was invited by the ſenate to ſucceed him, and he continued preaching there till the beginning of the German wars, when the elector Palatine made him public profeſſor at Heidelberg, and there he publiſhed many books for the promotion of Hebrew learning. In 1548, the perſecution in Germany induced him and Bucer to come to England at the invitation of archbiſhop Cranmer. They arrived here in 1549, were entertained ſome days at Lambeth palace, and appointed to reſide at Cambridge, where they were to perfect a new tranſlation and illuſtration of the Scriptures, Fagius taking the Old Teſtament, and Bucer the New, for their ſeveral parts; but an end was put to this by their ſudden illneſs and death; Fagius was ſeized with a fever at London, but would be removed to Cambridge, in hopes of receiving benefit from the change of air, but died there on the 13th of November, 1550, and Bucer did not ſurvive him above a year. Both their bodies were dug up and burnt in the reign of queen Mary. Fagius wrote a great number of books.

FAGNANI (PROSPER) a celebrated profeſſor of the canon law, and one of the moſt learned civilians in the ſeventeenth century, was conſidered at Rome as an oracle, and became ſecretary of the ſacred congregation. He loſt his ſight at forty-four years of age, and compoſed, by order of pope Alexander VII. an excellent Commentary on the Decretals, in three volumes folio, printed at Rome, in 1661. The index to that work is a maſter-piece in its kind, and it is almoſt impoſſible to conceive that it could be compoſed by a blind man. He died in 1678, at above eighty years of age.

FAGUNDEZ (STEPHEN) a famous Jeſuit caſuiſt, born at Viana, in Portugal, and the author of a Treatiſe on Contracts, and other moral works. He died January 13, 1645, aged ſixty-eight.

FAHLUN, or COPPERBERG, a town of Weſterdal, in Dalecarlia, in Sweden. It is a large open town, and every ſtreet is built in a ſtrait line. There are two ſquares, one of which is large, handſome, and regular, to the north of which is a ſtone building, which contains the court of juſtice, a granary, and a public diſpenſary of medicines. To the eaſt is a large church with a high ſteeple, which contains a fine ring of bells. The church is covered with copper, and the gates are of braſs, but it has no ornaments within. In the church-yards there are ſeveral tombs of caſt metal. Without the town, to the eaſt, is another church built with ſtone as the former, and covered with copper. The ſpire likewiſe on the top of the ſteeple is covered with the ſame metal, and is very beautiful. Beſides theſe, among the buildings about the mines, there is a chapel for the officers and workmen belonging to them.

At ſome diſtance from the town, to the ſouth-weſt, there is a handſome houſe, which belongs to the king of Sweden, where the governor reſides, and where the king ſometimes comes; and round it are ſeveral country houſes belonging to the burghers. Theſe have all a ſhare in the mines; for without this they can have no right to this privilege. They are called berſemans, or men of the company; and thoſe that work themſelves are called brukande-berſemens. Inſtead of a cane, they generally carry little axes in their hands, wear their hats like quakers, have black coats without pockets, with black ſtockings and gloves. The country on the weſt ſide of the town, for half a mile together, is quite barren and full of rocks. Among theſe are the copper mines. Several canals are cut through them, which carry water to the machines, and ſet them at work. On the eaſt ſide, on the river, there are ſome good meadows, and beyond them you ſee nothing but woods and mountains. Thoſe that viſit the mines are accommodated with habits proper for the purpoſe, and have a man to guide them. At firſt they go down into a great quarry two hundred yards broad, and three hundred deep, by means of ſtairs or ſteps cut in the rock, and where thoſe are wanting, by wooden ladders. The conductors carry with them ſeveral bundles of long deal ſplinters, and at the bottom of the quarry they begin to light them; then the viſiters begin to enter a narrow cavern one after another, with his guide before him, in which there is a deſcent by a winding ſtair-caſe, which leads to a ſquare perpendicular hole, about three or four feet wide, and thirty deep, with ladders againſt two of the ſides, made up of ſeveral faſtened together to reach to the bottom. When they are got down, they enter a narrow paſſage, which leads to the workmen, who are quite naked, except a pair of breeches. Here the heat begins to be intolerable and ſuffocating. Paſſing by theſe, they deſcend to cavities forty feet wide, ſome of which are terminated by deep pits. There are narrow paſſages by which theſe cavities communicate with each other. Theſe paſſages have wood at the bottom to guide the wheels of the tumbrils, in which the horſes draw the ore from the mines, to the places where there are perpendicular holes from the top, through which it is drawn up in buckets, in the ſame manner as our coal-pits. Through theſe the horſes are let down and drawn up with cords and broad girths. The tumbrils are made like wheel barrows, with one wheel only. In the cavities there are ſtables for the horſes, and blackſmith's ſhops, and ſeveral workmen, ſome with clothes, and ſome without. They are furniſhed with crows of different ſhapes, and other inſtruments, to raiſe the ore and fill the tumbrils. They have likewiſe to empty the cavities when too much water comes in; and there are ſtreams which run along and loſe themſelves in the clefts of the rock. The roofs of the cavities are ſometimes ſupported with walls, props of wood, and pieces of iron; notwithſtanding which, they ſometimes fall down ſuddenly, and bury the workmen in the ruins. They muſt neither whiſtle nor ſing in the mines, nor will they let any women go down. The depth of ſome of the pits is ſix hundred and forty feet. The viſiters are generally drawn up in buckets, in the ſame manner as the ore. They draw the water out of the mines with engines, in the ſame manner as out of the coal-pits. Their engines or machines are of different kinds.

The mines are to the ſouth-weſt of the town, about three hundred yards from the houſes. Between the mines and the town, and in the town itſelf, there are a great number of forges along the ſide of the river, with bellows that are put in motion by means of the water. Near the forges are a great number of furnaces, where the ore is laid on wood, which they ſet on fire, and let it burn ſeveral days. This is the firſt furnace for the preparation of the ore. They burn the ore again in a ſecond furnace like the former; and then they melt it in a fierce fire, which is kept up by a great pair of bellows, which are kept going by a ſtream of water. Thoſe that paſs through the ſmoke of the furnaces are not able to breathe, and when it blows into the town, it greatly incommodes the inhabitants; however it kills all the gnats, with which the neighbouring towns are ſometimes incommoded.

FAILLE (GERMAIN DE LA) an able annaliſt of Toulouſe, was born at Caſtelnaudari, on the 30th of October, 1616, and was the king's advocate in the preſidial of that city. He wrote the Annals of Toulouſe, in two volumes; and a Treatiſe on the Nobility of the Capitouls, or Chief Magiſtrates of that City; and died at Toulouſe, on the 12th of November, 1711, aged ninety-ſix.

FAIRFAX (EDWARD) an Engliſh poet, was the natural ſon of ſir Thomas Fairfax, and flouriſhed in the reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James I. to the former of whom he dedicated a Tranſlation of Taſſo, which has gone through ſeveral editions. He was alſo the author of Twelve Eclogues; of the Hiſtory of Edward the Black Prince, and of a book intitled Dæmonologia, which laſt is ſtill in manuſcript. He was living in the year 1631.

FAIRFAX (FERDINAND, lord) general of the parliament forces in the North, in the great rebellion. He and his ſon gained a complete victory over colonel Bellaſyſe, governor of York, at Selby, in that county, on the 11th of April, 1644, for which the parliament ordered a general thankſgiving; but he was totally routed by the earl of Newcaſtle, at Adderton Moor, in June, 1643. After ſir Thomas Glemham had ſurrendered York, and the above earl had retired beyond the ſeas, he ſucceeded to the government of that city, and of the northern counties. He died at York, on the 13th of March, 1647-8.

FAIRFAX (THOMAS, lord) commander in chief of the parliament's forces in the civil wars, in the laſt century, was the ſon of the above Ferdinand, lord Fairfax, and was born at Denton, in the pariſh of Otley, in Yorkſhire, in January 1611. He ſtudied in St. John's college, Cambridge, and after-afterwards, being of a martial diſpoſition, went into Holland, and ſerved as a volunteer under the command of Horatio, lord Vere. Having thus acquired ſome knowledge in the art of war, he returned to England, and retiring to his father's houſe, married Anne, the fourth daughter of the lord Vere. Upon the breaking out of the civil wars in 1642, his father was made general of the parliament's forces in the North, and he obtained a commiſſion to be general of the horſe under him, when he ſoon ſignalized himſelf by his intrepidity on ſeveral occaſions, particularly in taking ſome important towns and garriſons in Yorkſhire and Cheſhire. He commanded the right wing of horſe at the famous battle of Marſton Moor, in which the Royaliſts were defeated, and the king's affairs entirely ruined in the North. On the parliament's new modeling the army, they unanimouſly voted ſir Thomas Fairfax general in the room of the earl of Eſſex, and to him Oliver Cromwell was joined with the title of lieutenant-general, who was afterwards the ſpring of all his ſucceeding motions. In February 1644-5, he received his commiſſion; after which, he, on the 14th of June, obtained a complete victory at the deciſive battle of Naſeby. On the 18th he took Leiceſter: on the 10th of July he defeated the lord Goring; on the 22d took Bridgewater by ſtorm; on the 30th of the ſame month became maſter of Bath; on the 15th of Auguſt took Sherborne-caſtle by ſtorm; and having beſieged Briſtol from the 22d of Auguſt to the 10th of September, it was ſurrendered to him by prince Rupert. After this he became maſter of Tiverton; took Dartmouth by ſtorm; beſieged and took the city of Exeter, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral forts and garriſons; defeated the lord Hopton, and following him into Cornwall, entirely diſperſed the king's army in the Weſt. He then obliged the king to retire in diſguiſe from Oxford. His majeſty departed from thence on the 27th of April, 1646, and put himſelf into the hands of the Scots; when ſir Thomas having taken that city, and ſeveral other places, the unhappy king Charles I. had before Michaelmas neither an army nor fortreſs left in England. He then took a journey to London, where he arrived on the 12th of November, being met ſome miles off by great crowds of people, and the city militia; and two days after he received the thanks and congratulations of both houſes of parliament. On the 18th of December he ſet out to convoy the two hundred thouſand pounds that had been granted to the Scottiſh army, as the price of their delivering up their ſovereign. The parliament now attempting to diſband the army, he, in the beginning of June, 1647, advanced towards London, and in Auguſt entered the city, with the ſixty members who had fled to the army, and reſtored them in a kind of triumph; for which he received the thanks of both houſes, and was appointed conſtable of the Tower. His father dying on the 13th of March, 1647-8, he became poſſeſſed of his title and eſtate, and was appointed keeper of Pontefract-caſtle, cuſtos rotulorum of Yorkſhire, &c. in his room: after which he quelled an inſurrection of the London apprentices; and another in Kent, headed by George Goring, earl of Norwich, and ſir William Waller, and a party of the latter, obtaining reinforcements in Eſſex, and ſhutting themſelves up in Colcheſter, he obliged that town to ſurrender upon very ſevere conditions, laying a fine of twelve thouſand pounds upon the inhabitants to excuſe them from being plundered. He returned to London to awe that city and the parliament; and to forward the proceedings againſt the king, quartered himſelf at Whitehall. He was foremoſt in the liſt of the king's judges, but refuſed to act as he afterwards did to ſubſcribe the teſt appointed by parliament for approving all that was done in relation to the king. In ſhort, being unwilling to march againſt the Scots, who had declared for king Charles II. he reſigned his commiſſion, on which the parliament ſettled an annual revenue of five thouſand pounds a year upon him; after which he lived privately, till he was invited by general Monk to aſſiſt him againſt Lambert's army, when he chearfully embraced the occaſion, and on the 3d of December, 1659, appeared at the head of a body of gentlemen of Yorkſhire, when, upon the reputation of his name, a body of one thouſand two hundred horſe, forſook Lambert and joined him. He was at the head of the committee appointed by the houſe of commons on the 3d of May, 1660, to attend king Charles II. at the Hague, to deſire him ſpeedily to return to England, and having readily aſſiſted in his reſtoration, retired again to his ſeat in the country, where he lived in a private manner till his death, which happened on the 12th of November, 1671, in the ſixtieth year of his age.

His lordſhip wrote, ſays Mr. Walpole, Memorials of Thomas lord Fairfax, printed in 1699, and was not only an hiſtorian, but a poet. In Mr. Thoreſby's muſeum were preſerved in manuſcript the following pieces: The Pſalms of David; the Song of Solomon; the Canticles, and Songs of Moſes, Exod. xv. Deut. xxxii. and other parts of Scripture, verſified. A Poem on Solitude. Notes of Sermons by his lordſhip, by his lady, daughter of Horace lord Vere, and by their daughter Mary, the wife of George, ſecond duke of Buckingham; and a Treatiſe on the Shortneſs of Life. But of all lord Fairfax's works, ſays our lively author, the moſt remarkable were the Verſes he wrote on the horſe on which Charles II. rode to his coronation, and which had been bred and preſented to the king by his lordſhip. How muſt that merry monarch, unapt to keep his countenance on more ſerious occaſions, have ſmiled at this aukward homage from the old victorious hero of republicaniſm and the covenant. He gave a collection of manuſcripts to the Bodleian library. Mr. Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors.

FAIRFORD, a town in Glouceſterſhire, with a market on Thurſdays. It is remarkable for the church which has painted glaſs windows, that are exceeding well done. They are ſaid to be taken in a ſhip by John Tame, eſquire, towards the end of the fifteenth century, who built the church for their ſake. They are preſerved intire, and the figures are extremely well drawn and coloured. They repreſent the moſt remarkable hiſtories in the Old and New Teſtament. They are frequently viſited by travellers, and many go on purpoſe to view them, as one of the greateſt curioſities in England. The painter's name was Albert Durer, a German. Fairford has two fairs, on May 14, and November 12, for ſheep and cattle. It is twenty-four miles eaſt-by-ſouth from Glocester, fifty one north-eaſt from Briſtol, and eighty weſt-by-north from London. Long. 1. 46. W. Lat. 51. 42. N.

FAISANS, a little iſland formed by the river Badaſſao, which parts France from Spain, and is three miles from Fontarabia. This iſland is very ſmall, and belongs neither to France nor Spain, for which reaſon, in 1659, they built a houſe of wood, in which the embaſſadors of France and Spain concluded the peace of the Pyrenees, and there the kings of both countries had an interview. Long. 1. 30. W. Lat. 43. 25. N.

FAITHORN (WILLIAM) an ingenious Engliſh painter, flouriſhed in the ſeventeenth century. He ſtudied ſeveral years under the famous painter Champagne, and arrived to very great perfection in correctneſs of drawing, and was alſo a great proficient in engraving, eſpecially in miniature. He wrote a book upon drawing, graving, and etching, and died in Black-fryars, in the year 1691. There is a ſoftneſs and delicacy, as well as a ſtrength and beauty, in the beſt works of Faithorn, which are not to be found in thoſe of any Engliſh engravers in the laſt century.

FAKENHAM, a town in the county of Norfolk, with a market on Thurſdays. It is ſeated upon a hill, and is twenty miles eaſt-by-north of King's Lynn, twenty-eight north-weſt of Norwich, and one hundred and eleven north-north-eaſt from London. Long. 1. 0. E. Lat 52. 50. N.

FALAISE, a town of Normandy, in France, ſeated on a rock near the river Ante. It contains two pariſhes, two convents of monks, and two hoſpitals. The caſtle ſtands on a craggy rock, and was formerly a place of great importance; at preſent it hath one of the fineſt towers in France. It is remarkable for its manufactures in ſerges, linen cloth, and lace, and for the fair of Guibrai, one of its ſuburbs. It is twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Caen, thirty north-weſt of Seez, twenty-eight ſouth-weſt of Liſieux, and one hundred and ſixteen weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 18. W. Lat. 48. 58. N.

FALCANDUS (HUGO) treaſurer of St. Peter's at Palermo, in the twelfth century, was the author of the Hiſtory of Sicily under the Reign of William the Bad, and William the Good; this hiſtory is eſteemed very exact and faithful.

FALCIDIUS, a Roman tribune, rendered himſelf famous by inſtituting the Falcidian Law, by which any one might diſpoſe of his ſubſtance to whom he pleaſed, provided he reſerved a fourth part to his lawful heirs.

FALCONBERG (lady MARY) the third daughter of Oliver Cromwell, a lady of great beauty, but of greater ſpirit, was the ſecond wife of Thomas, lord viſcount Falconberg. biſhop Burnet, who calls her a wiſe and worthy woman, ſays ſhe was more likely to have maintained the poſt of protector than either of her brothers, according to a ſaying that went of her, "That thoſe who wore breeches deſerved "petticoats better; but if thoſe in petticoats had been in "breeches, they would have held faſter." After Richard was depoſed, who, ſhe well knew, was never formed for royal power, ſhe exerted herſelf in behalf of Charles II and is ſaid to have had a great and ſucceſsful hand in his reſtoration. She died on the 14th of March, 1712.

FALCZIN, a town of Turky, in Wallachia, ſeated on the river Pruth, where a battle was fought, and a peace made between the Turks and the Ruſſians in 1711. Long. 26. 49. E. Lat. 45. 15. N.

FALDA (JOHN BAPTIST) an able Italian engraver, whoſe impreſſions are eſteemed, and his books of palaces, vignets, and and of the fountains of Rome and its neighbourhood, are alſo ſought after.

FALETTI (JEROME) count of Triagnano, and an Italian poet of the ſixteenth century, was born at Savona, and was employed in ſeveral important affairs by the duke of Ferrara. He wrote, 1. An Italian Poem, in four books, on the Wars of Flanders. 2. Twelve Books of Poems. 3. The Cauſes of the War in Germany, under Charles V. &c.

FALIERI (ORDELAPHO) a famous doge of Venice, elected in 1102, went to the aſſiſtance of Baldwin, king of Jeruſalem, with a powerful fleet, and enabled him to recover a part of Syria. He afterwards reduced and brought under the dominion of the Venetians, all Dalmatia, Croatia, and ſeveral other provinces diſtant from the ſea. Some time after the city of Zara revolting, he ſailed thither, and beſieged it with his fleet, but was killed in making an aſſault.

FALIERI (MARINUS) a famous doge of Venice, elected in 1354, who having governed that republic for nine months, formed the deſign of rendering himſelf an abſolute prince, by aſſaſſinating the ſenators. But one of the conſpirators being filled with horror at the idea of committing ſuch a dreadful crime, diſcovered the conſpiracy to the ſenators, who managed the affair with ſuch dexterity, that ſixteen of the principal conſpirators were taken the night before it was to have been perpetrated, with Falieri, who was beheaded, and the reſt hanged. They afterwards put to death four hundred of his accomplices, and gave a penſion of one thouſand crowns, with the title of a noble Venetian to him who diſcovered the conſpiracy; but not being ſatisfied with this reward, he charged the ſenators with ingratitude, on which they baniſhed him to the iſland of Auguſta; and he afterwards periſhed in endeavouring to eſcape from thence, in his paſſage to Dalmatia.

FALKENBURG, a town of Germany, in the Marche of Brandenburg, forty-five miles north-eaſt of Stetin, and ſubject to Pruſſia. Long. 16. 12. E. Lat 53. 39. N.

FALKENBURG, a town of Sweden, in the diſtrict of Halland and province of Gothland, on the Baltick Sea. It is ſixty miles ſouth of Gottenburg, and fifteen north-weſt of Helmſtat. Long. 13. 12. E. Lat. 57. 10. N.

FALKIRK, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Stirling, eight miles ſouth of Sterling town. Long. 3. 48. W. Lat. 56. 0. N. It is remarkable for a battle fought between the king's forces and the rebels, Jan. 17, 1746.

FALKLAND, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Fife, in which is a palace which formerly belonged to the kings of Scotland. It is twenty miles north of Edinburgh. Long. 3. 0. W. Lat. 56. 20. N.

FALKLAND (CARY, lord viſcount). See CARY.

FALLOPIUS (GABRIEL) a very celebrated phyſician, anatomiſt, botaniſt, aſtronomer, and phyſician, famous for his diſcovery of the tubes by which the ova deſcend from the ovarium, and which from him are called the Fallopian Tubes, was deſcended from a noble family, and born at Modena in 1523. He travelled through the greateſt part of Europe, and by his induſtry penetrated into the abſtruſe myſteries of nature. He was eſteemed one of the ableſt phyſicians of his age, and was profeſſor of anatomy firſt at Piſa, and afterwards at Padua, where he died, on the 9th of October, 1562, aged thirty-nine. His works have been printed together in four volumes, folio.

FALMOUTH, a ſea-port town in Cornwall, ſeated on a fine bay, in the Engliſh channel. The harbour is very commodious, and large enough for a hundred ſail to ride ſafely in, quite defended from all ſtorms. There is a high rock at the entrance, and on the ſide two caſtles, St. Maw's and Pendennis, which is one of the largeſt in England. Falmouth is well built, and is become a good trading town, though it ſends no members to parliament. It is governed by a mayor and aldermen, and the packet-boats for Spain, Portugal, and the Weſt Indies, are ſtationed here. It has a market on Thurſdays, and the fairs are on July 27, and October 10, for horſes, oxen, ſheep, cloth, and a few hops. It is twenty-four miles eaſt of Penzance, and two hundred and ſixty-four weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 5. 12. W. Lat. 50. 12. N.

FALSTER, an iſland of Denmark, in the Baltick Sea, twenty miles in length, and ten in breadth. Nicoping is the capital, beſides which are Stubcoping, and two or three villages. Long. from 11. 15. to 11. 51. Lat. 55. 50.

FAMAGUSTA, a city of the iſle of Cyprus, and the ſee of a biſhop of the Greek church. It is ſeated at the eaſt end of the iſland, and was formerly a ſea-port town of great trade, but the harbour is now choaked up, and will not admit ſhips of burthen. It was taken by the Turks from the Venetians in 1571, after ten months ſiege, and the loſs of eighty thouſand men before the place. It is defended with fortifications, but they are conſtructed after the old manner, and are two miles in compaſs. The harbour is defended by two caſtles, which are over-againſt each other. The churches are turned into moſques, and though the Greeks are permitted to keep ſhops in the town in the day-time, they are obliged to lie in the neighbouring villages in the night. It is ſixty three miles north-eaſt of Nicoſia. Long. 36. 12. E. Lat. 34. 49. N.

FAME, one of the imaginary Pagan deities, was repreſented in a flying attitude, with expanded wings, ſounding a trumpet; and to denote the ſurprize, attention, and diſcourſe ſhe occaſions, her flowing robe was wrought all over with eyes, ears, and tongues. She had ſeveral temples erected to her, where thoſe who aſpired after glory went to offer their petitions.

FANNIA, an illuſtrious Roman lady, the daughter of Petus Thraſea, and the grand-daughter of Arria, was ſo eminently virtuous, that ſhe ought not only to be an example to other women, but a pattern of courage and conſtancy to men. She twice attended her huſband Helvetius into baniſhment, and, under the reign of Domitian, was baniſhed herſelf for deſiring Senecio to write Helvetius's life, and for furniſhing him with materials for that purpoſe.

FANNIUS (STRABO CAIUS) was conſul of Rome with Valerius Meſſala in the one hundred and ſixty-firſt year before the Chriſtian æra. Under his conſulſhip was made the law which, from Fannius's name, was called Lex Fannia, for regulating the expence of entertainments, and giving the prætors power to drive the rhetoricians and philoſophers from Rome.

FANNIUS (CAIUS) the ſon of the preceding, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence, and was conſul in the one hundred and twentieth year before the Chriſtian æra. He oppoſed the enterprizes of Caius Gracchus, and made againſt him an oration which is commended by Cicero.

FANNIUS (CAIUS) firſt couſin to the former, was quæſtor in the one hundred and thirty-ninth year before the Chriſtian æra, and afterwards prætor. He bore arms in Africa under Scipio Africanus the Younger, and compoſed Annals, which were eſteemed.

FANNIUS (QUADRATUS) a Latin poet, whoſe poems, tho' they were ridiculous, were placed with his picture in the public library, built by Auguſtus in the Temple of Apollo. Horace, who was his cotemporary, rallies him on his ſatires, and gives him the name of Paraſite.

FANNIUS (CAIUS) a Latin author, who lived in the time of Trajan, and had a ſhare in the eſteem and friendſhip of Pliny the Younger. He wrote an Account of the laſt Moments of thoſe whom Nero had put to death or baniſhed; but death prevented him from completing his work.

FANO, an ancient town of Italy, in the State of the Church, and duchy of Urbino, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the ſhore of the Adriatic Sea, or gulph of Venice, bewteen Peſaro and Senigaglia. This town was a Roman colony, called by Tacitus Fanum Fortunæ, becauſe there was formerly a ſuperb temple conſecrated to Fortune. Near this place Aſdrubal, the brother of Hannibal, was killed with fifty thouſand of his countrymen. The Roman generals were the conſuls Livius, Salinator, and Claudius Nero. There is a marble triumphal arch ſtill remaining, which is thirty cubits high, and twenty broad, and is yet more entire and magnificent than any in all Italy. In St. Michael's chapel, which is near it, there is a ſtone, on which the form of this arch is engraved.

The walls of Fano are very ſtrong, eſpecially on the ſide of the ſea, and the baſtions are caſed with bricks. They are always furniſhed with proper artillery to keep off the corſairs, which otherwiſe might be troubleſome. There is a ſtone pier, ſufficient for the ſhelter of ſmall ſhips. It is eight miles ſouth-weſt of Peſaro, and twenty miles eaſt of Urbino. Long. 14. 22. E. Lat. 44. 10. N.

FANSHAW (Sir RICHARD) famous for his embaſſies and writings, was the youngeſt ſon of ſir Henry Fanſhaw, of Wareham Park, in Hertfordſhire, and was born about the year 1608. He completed his ſtudies at Cambridge, and having made the tour of Europe, he was, in 1635, appointed reſident at the court of Spain, and returning thence in 1641, he adhered ſteadily to the royal cauſe, and ſuffered ſeverely for his loyalty during the troubles that enſued. In 1651 he was taken priſoner at the battle of Worceſter, and committed to cloſe cuſtody in the city of London; but having obtained permiſſion, on account of the bad ſtate of his health, to go to any part of the kingdom, he retired to Tankerley-Caſtle, in Yorkſhire, where he compoſed ſeveral poems, and made a good number of tranſlations. Upon the reſtoration of king Charles the Second, he was appointed maſter of requeſts, and ſecretary for the Latin tongue; and in 1662 was ſent ambaſſador to the court of Portugal, where he negociated the marriage of his maſter with the Infanta Donna Catharina, daughter of king John the Fourth. About two years after he went in the ſame quality to the court of Spain; and upon his arrival at Cadiz, was received with ſuch marks of honour and diſtinction as had never been paid to any former ambaſſador. Having fully executed his commiſſion at Madrid, Madrid, he was preparing to ſet out on his return to England, when being ſeized with a violent fever, he died on the 16th of June, 1666, the very day on which he propoſed to begin his journey. His body was brought over to England, and interred in the pariſh church of Ware, among thoſe of his anceſtors. He wrote, 1. Several Poems. 2. A Tranſlation of Il Paſtor Fido, from the Italian. 3. A Tranſlation of the Luſiad of Camoens, from the Portugueze; and ſeveral other works.

FANTIN, is a ſmall kingdom or diſtrict on the coaſt of Guinea, eaſtward of the Gold Coaſt. It is bounded on the weſt by Saboe, between which and Fantin there is an hill called the Iron Hill, with a delightful walk on the top. On the north it has Atti, Agua, and Tonqua, or rather a country unknown; and on the eaſt it is bounded by Acra. The principal villages on the ſhore are Anichan, Anamaboe, Aga, Cormentin, where the Engliſh have a fort, Amerſa, Aqua, Laguyo, and Mountfort. In all which there are upwards of four thouſand fiſhermen. The inhabitants go naked, all but a cloth before, and take as many wives as they pleaſe.

The capital town is Fantin, from which the country has its name, and is fifteen miles within land, and there are many villages ſcattered about it. This country is under the command of a braſſo, which is as much as to ſay a leader; but he is kept in awe by old men, ſomewhat in the nature a parliament, if we may compare ſmall things with great, inſomuch that the braſſo has but little power. The inland people cultivate the land, and ſupply the markets with fruit, corn, and palm wines, which laſt is ſtronger than ordinary, and very intoxicating. In general this country is rich in gold, ſlaves, and all ſorts of proviſions.

FARDELLA (MICHAEL ANGELO) a celebrated philoſopher and mathematician, was born at Trapani, in Sicily, in 1650, and at fifteen years of age, having finiſhed his courſe of philoſophy, entered the order of St. Francis. He at length improved greatly under the learned Borelli at Meſſina, and taught mathematics there. In 1676 he went to Rome, where he taught geometry, and at length went to Paris, where he ſtayed three years, during which he contracted a friendſhip with Arnauld, Regis, Father Mallebranche, and Father Lami. At his return to Rome he was created doctor in the college of Sapienza, and taught divinity in his convent, where he alſo formed an academy of experimental philoſophy. Some time after Francis II. duke of Modena invited him to his capital, and gave him the profeſſorſhip of philoſophy and geometry, which he afterwards reſigned to go to Venice, where, by permiſſion of the pope, he quitted the habit of the Franciſcans, and took that of a ſecular prieſt. He at length became profeſſor of aſtronomy and natural philoſophy at Padua, and died at Naples of an apoplexy, on the 2d of January, 1718, at ſixty-eight years of age. He wrote a great number of literary, philoſophical, and mathematical works, ſome in Latin, and ſome in Italian. The principal are, 1. Univerſæ Philoſophiæ ſyſtema. 2. Univerſæ uſualis Mathematicæ Theoria. 3. Animæ humanæ Natura ab Auguſtino detecta. 4. Several pieces in favour of Deſcartes's philoſophy, &c.

FARE (the marquis DE LA) celebrated for his memoirs and poetical pieces. He died in 1713.

FARE, or FARO OF MESSINA, is a ſtreight between Sicily and Naples, about five miles in breadth. Meſſina, in Sicily, lies on one ſide of it, and Rhegio, in Naples, on the other. It is famous for Scylla and Charybdis, ſo often mentioned by the poets. The former is now called Capo Sciglio, and is a rock on the ſide of Calabria, in Naples, which advances like a peninſula, towards Cape Faro, in Sicily, and is very dangerous, becauſe veſſels may be either thrown upon it by the violence of the current, or that of the wind, and then they periſh without reſource. Charybdis is near Cape Faro, in Sicily, and is a whirlpool, about thirty paces in diameter. The ſailors were formerly afraid it would ſwallow up their ſhips if they came near it, but experience has ſhewn that their fear had no foundation, for the inhabitants of Meſſina often go upon it in flat-bottom boats for pleaſure, where, after they have been whirled about in it for ſome time, they can go off when they pleaſe by the help of their oars. It is remarkable the current in this ſtreight runs contrary ways every ſix hours, with an extraordinary rapidity.

FAREHAM, a ſmall town in Hampſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays, and a fair on June 29, for toys. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth-ſouth-eaſt of Wincheſter, and ſeventy-three ſouth-weſt of London. Long. 1. 15. W. Lat. 50. 53. N.

FAREL (WILLIAM) a Proteſtant miniſter and learned reformer, was born at Gap, in 1489, and ſtudied at Paris, where he applied himſelf to the Greek and Hebrew languages, and to philoſophy. Briconnet, biſhop of Meaux, being inclined to the reformed religion, in 1521 invited him to preach in his dioceſe, but the perſecution raiſed againſt the reformed induced him to retire to Stratburg. He was adviſed to undertake the reformation at Montbeliard, in which he was ſupported by the duke of Wittemberg, who was lord of that place, and happily ſucceeded. His zeal was ſo exceſſive, that once on a proceſſion day he ſnatched out of the prieſt's hand the image of St. Anthony, and threw it from a bridge into the river. In 1528 he had great ſucceſs in promoting the reformation in the city of Aigle, and ſoon after in the bailiwick of Morat. In 1529 he went to Neufchatel, and diſputed againſt thoſe of the church of Rome with ſuch ſtrength, that the city embraced the reformed religion, and eſtabliſhed it entirely, on the 4th of November, 1530. He was afterwards ſent as a deputy to the ſynod of the Waldenſes, held in the valley of Angrogne. Thence he went to Geneva, when he laboured againſt popery; but the grand vicar, and the other clergy, oppoſed him with ſuch fury, that he was obliged to retire; yet, in 1534, he was called back by the inhabitants, who had renounced the popiſh religion; and the next year he was the chief perſon that procured the perfect abolition of popery. In 1538 he was baniſhed from Geneva with Calvin, and retired to Baſil, and afterwards to Neufchatel. From thence he went to Metz, but had there a thouſand difficulties to ſtruggle with, and was obliged to retire into the abbey of Gorze, where he and the new converts were protected by the count of Furſtemberg; but they could not continue there long, for they were beſieged in the abbey, and at laſt obliged to ſurrender: yet this reformer had the happineſs to eſcape in a cart among the ſick and infirm, though ſtrict ſearch was made after him. He now ſettled again at Neufchatel, where he died, on the 13th of September, 1565. The difficulties this miniſter underwent in promoting the reformation, and the courage he ſhewed in ſurmounting them all, are almoſt incredible. He was often ſurrounded with drawn ſwords, and bells were rung to prevent his being heard; but they could neither terrify nor interrupt the preacher.

FARGEAU (ST.) an ancient town of France, in Auxerre, with a good caſtle. It is ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Briare, and twenty five ſouth weſt of Auxerre. Long. 3. 10. E. Lat. 50. 53. N.

FARIA DE SOUZA (EMANUEL) a learned Portugueſe knight, born at Caravella, on the 18th of March, 1590. He went to Rome in 1631, where he acquired the eſteem of the learned at the court of Urban VIII. He publiſhed ſeveral works, and died at Madrid on the third of June, 1649, aged fifty-nine. After his death was publiſhed his Europe, Aſia, and Portugueſe Africa, in 7 vols. folio.

FARINACCIO (PROSPER) a famous civilian, born at Rome on the 30th of October, 1554. He ſtudied at Padua, and obtained great ſkill in the civil and canon law. At his return to Rome, he appeared at the bar, when he made it his buſineſs to defend thoſe cauſes that were leaſt defenſible; and being made the pope's attorney, behaved in that poſt with extreme rigour and ſeverity. This conduct involved him in very great difficulties, under which he would have ſunk, if ſome cardinals, charmed with his wit, had not interceded for him with pope Clement VIII. Farianaccio died at Rome on the 30th of October, 1618, aged ſixty-four. His works are printed in 13 vols. and are much valued by civilians.

FARINATO (PAUL) an eminent Italian painter, is ſaid to have been cut out of the belly of his mother, who had juſt died in labour, at Verona, in the year 1522. He was a diſciple of Nicolo Golfino, and an admirable deſigner, but not quite ſo happy in his colouring; though there is a piece of his painting in St. George's church at Verona, that ſeems not inferior in both reſpects to one of Paul Veroneſe's hand, which is placed next to it. He was alſo well ſkilled in ſculpture and architecture, eſpecially that part of it which relates to fortification; and was likewiſe famous for being an excellent orator, and a good ſwordſman. His laſt moments are ſaid to have been as remarkable as his firſt; for as he lay upon his death-bed in the year 1606, his wife, who was ſick in the ſame room, hearing him cry out, "I am going," told him, "She "would bear him company," and was as good as her word; for they both expired in the ſame minute, at which time he was no leſs than eighty-four years of age.

FARNHAM, a town in Surry, with a large market on Thurſdays. It is governed by twelve maſters, out of which two bailiffs are annually choſen. It is noted for a large quantity of hops, which grow about the town. The fairs are on Holy Thurſday, and June 24th, for horſes, cattle, ſheep, and hogs; and on November 2, for horſes and cattle. It is ſeated on the north-weſt ſide of the river Wey, thirty-eight miles eaſt-north-eaſt of Southampton, and thirty-nine miles weſt-ſouth-weſt of London. Long. 0. 50. W. Lat. 51. 16. N.

FARNABIE, or FARNABY, (THOMAS) a learned grammarian and ſchoolmaſter, born at London in 1575. He ſtudied ſome time at Oxford, but being perſuaded to abandon the proteſtant religion, went to Spain, and ſtudied in a college belonging to the Jeſuits. At length, being weary of their ſevere diſcipline, he found a way to leave them, and went with Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins, in their laſt voyage in 1595; after which he ſerved as a ſoldier in the Low Countries; but being reduced to great poverty, returned to England, where he taught ſchool in ſeveral parts of the country with great ſucceſs, and reputation. He was attached to the royal family during the civil wars in England, and being ſollicited, at the breaking out of the commotions in 1641, to declare in favour of the republican party, replied, that "It was better to have "one king than five hundred." Two years after, being ſuſpected of favouring a riſing near Tunbridge, he was impriſoned in Newgate, and thence carried on ſhip-board, when it was debated in the houſe of commons, whether he ſhould be ſent to America; but this motion being rejected, he was removed to Ely-houſe in Holborn, where he died on the 12th of June, 1647, aged ſeventy-two. He wrote, 1. Latin Notes on Juvenal, Perſius, Seneca, Martial, Lucan, Virgil, Terence, and Ovid; 2. Index Rhetoricus; and other works.

FARNESE. See ALEXANDER FARNESE.

FARO, a town of Portugal in the kingdom of Algarve, with a harbour on the coaſt of the gulph of Cadiz, and a biſhop's ſee. Here is a very good fiſhery, particularly for thunnies and ſardines. It was taken from the Moors by king Alphonſo in 1249. It is twenty miles ſouth-weſt of Tavira, thirty-five eaſt of Lagos, and ninety ſouth-weſt of Evora. Long. 9. 12. W. Lat. 36. 48. N.

FARO, a cape of the valley of Demona, in Sicily. It lies to the north of Meſſina, at the entrance of the ſtreight of that name, over-againſt Cape Sciglio, in Calabria. There is a light-houſe built upon it for the beneſit of the ſailors in the night-time.

FARS, or FARSISTAN, a province of Perſia, bounded on the eaſt by Segeſtan and Kereſtan, on the weſt by Chuſeſtan, on the north by Irak Agemi, and on the ſouth by the Perſian Gulph. It was the ancient Perſia, of which Perſepolis was the capital. It is now in ruins, and called Kilmanar. The palace, ſuppoſed to be that of Darius, ſtands at the foot of an high mountain, which overlooks a plan thirty miles in length, and thirty in breadth. The front is on the weſt-ſide, and is five hundred paces in length, four hundred on the north-ſide, and two hundred and fifty on the ſouth. The mountain on the eaſt ſide ſerves inſtead of a wall. Thus the ſhape is irregular, and may be compared to a fortreſs. The ſtones are of a prodigious magnitude, and ſeem to be got out of the neighbouring mountain. The walls of the firſt floor is ſtill ſtanding, and are twenty or thirty feet high in different places, cruſted over with black marble. On the outward part of the ſouth-ſide is an inſcription, in a large ſquare, very plain and legible, but the characters differ from thoſe all of the known languages.

The great ſtair-caſe of the palace is on the weſt-ſide, inclining towards the north: It is divided into two parts, each having a marble wall on one ſide, and a balluſtrade on the other. As they riſe higher, they turn different ways, but winding round, they meet at the top. They are thirty feet wide, and the ſteps are of a very eaſy aſcent, for ninety-five make but twenty-two feet in a perpendicular height, and ſix or ſeven ſteps are cut out of one ſtone, or block of marble. The landing-place leads into a portico of white marble, twenty feet wide. The architrave is fallen, but the remains of the pillars ſhow a maſter-piece of art. There are ſtill to be ſeen two animals as large as elephants, in baſſo relievo. They have bodies like horſes, feet and tails of oxen, which turn up like thoſe of lions, with faces of the laſt animals, and wings like griffins; but if Herbert's draught be true, one of them has the head of an elephant, and the other of a rhinoceros. Five yards from thence, there are two fluted columns, which are ſeventy feet high, beſides their capitals and baſes, and ſo thick, that three men can ſcarce fathom them. At the ſame diſtance, ſtrait forward are two more, which, on the ſide towards the mountain, have animals carved thereon with wings and mens heads.

Beyond this portico or hall, as ſome call it, is another ſtair-caſe leading to the upper rooms, which is but twenty five feet wide, and not ſo high. But on the walls there are carved groups of people, carrying banners and other things in their hands: Behind theſe is a chariot drawn by horſes, with a little altar, from which flames ſeem to ariſe. On the other ſide, there are wild beaſts which ſeem to be fighting, and among them a lion and a bull, done to the utmoſt perfection. At the top of this ſtair-caſe is a ſquare room, encompaſſed with columns, ſeventeen of which are yet ſtanding, only ſome have no capitals. They are fluted, and are of one entire piece of red and white marble, ſome of which are ſixty, others ſeventy feet high, and part of them as thick as the former. Next to the columns is a place fifty feet ſquare, incloſed with walls ſix or ſeven feet thick. The marble of theſe is more beautiful than the former, and they are adorned with variety of figures. There are four doors ornamented with the moſt curious and beautiful foliage; and in ſome places there are inſcriptions in the ſame characters as the former. It would be endleſs to deſcribe the variety of figures to be ſeen on the walls, pillars, and among the ruins, which ſtill are diſtinct and plain, in ſpite of the devouring teeth of time. The human figures are in different habits, ſome having long beards down to their waiſts, with ſhort hair on one ſide. Others have a flat round cap on their heads, and the garments down to their heels, wide and full of plaits. The ſleeves are wide, and hang down to the knees. Others have ſhorter hair, and beards, and higher caps. Near the ruins, and at different places, there are other remains of ancient buildings.

With regard to the province in general, and the parts about Shiras, now the capital, it is the moſt remarkable in all Perſia for wine and women, and yields large quantities of corn, oranges, lemons, pomegranates, almonds, dates, piſtachio nuts, and cypreſs trees, which afford an agreeable ſhade againſt the exceſſive heats. The ſheep are of an aſh-grey colour, with curled wool, and large tails; and the woods yield plenty of maſtich. The principal towns are Shiras, Karzerom, Bander-Longo, and Lar.

FARQUHAR, (GEORGE) an excellent comic poet in the the latter-end of king William's reign, and part of queen Anne's, was born at Londonderry in Ireland, in 1678, and very early diſcovered a genius for poetry. He ſtudied in Trinity college, Dublin, but his mind being attracted by the polite entertainments of the town, and Mr. Robert Wilkes being at that time at Dublin, prevailed upon Mr. Farquhar to appear upon the ſtage, on which he met with ſome ſucceſs, but playing the part of Guyomar, in Dryden's Indian Emperor, who kills Vaſquez, one of the Spaniſh generals, and forgetting to exchange his ſword for a file, dangerouſly wounded his brother tragedian; and though it proved not mortal, it give ſuch a ſhock to Mr. Farquhar, that it put a period to his acting forever. Soon after this Mr. Farquhar accompanied Mr. Wilkes to London, and perſuaded him, that his genius was fitter for furniſhing compoſitions for the ſtage, than for echoing thoſe of others. To this he was alſo about the ſame time invited, by his obtaining a genteel ſubſiſtence, which allowed him an opportunity of exerting his abilities at his leiſure; for the earl of Orrery gave him a lieutenant's commiſſion in his own regiment in Ireland, which he held ſeveral years, and behaved well as an officer, he giving ſeveral proofs of his courage and conduct. In 1698, his firſt comedy, called Love and a Bottle, was acted at the theatre-royal in Drury-Lane, and was well received. The year after, the celebrated Mr. Oldfield, who was then but ſixteen years of age, was, partly by his judgment and recommendation, admitted on the ſtage. In the year 1700, the very year the jubilee was celebrated at Rome, was brought on the ſtage his Trip to the Jubilee, which was received with ſuch applauſe, that the next year, appeared a ſequel to it, under the title of Sir Harry Wildair. This was followed by the Inconſtant, Twin Rivals, Recruiting Officer, and the Beaux Stratagem; but while this laſt play was acting at Drury-Lane with the greateſt applauſe imaginable, Mr. Farquhar died in April, 1707, before he was thirty years of age. Beſides the above performances, he wrote part of a farce, called the Stage-Coach, and Miſcellanies, which conſiſt of a Collection of Poems, Letters, and Eſſays.

FARRINGDON, a town of Berkſhire, with a market on Tueſdays, and three fairs, on February 2, for horſes and fat cattle, on Whit-Tueſday, for the ſame, and on October 18, for horſes, fat cattle, and abundance of hogs. It is ſeated on an eminence not far from the Thames, and the market is extremely well ſupplied with all ſorts of proviſions. It is eighteen miles weſt-by-ſouth of Oxford, fifty-one on the ſame point from Briſtol, thirty-four eaſt of Glouceſter, and ſeventy weſt-by-north of London. Long. 1. 35. W. Lat. 51. 38. N.

FASCES, in Roman antiquity, axes bound to ſtaves, which were a mark of ſovereign authority, introduced by the elder Tarquin; but in after times twelve of theſe were carried by ſo many lictors before the conſuls, who enjoyed this honour by turns. After the conſuls, the prætors aſſumed the faſces; but Cenſorius obſerves, that they had only two, though Plutarch and Polybius ſay they had ſix. In the government of the decemviri, at firſt only two of them had the faſces; but afterwards each of them had twelve, in the ſame manner as the kings.

FAS-

FASSO, a river in Georgia, which riſing in the mountains, croſſes the kingdom of Immaretta, where it waſhes Cotatis, and then enters Guriel, diſcharging itſelf into the Black Sea, near the ruins of Faſſo, which was formerly a large town.

FASTOLF (John) knight, baron of Cilliguillim, a brave commander and governor in France, and an eminent miniſter of ſtate under three kings of England, was deſcended of an ancient and honourable family in Norfolk, ſeated at Caſtre in Fleg, near Great Yarmouth, where it is ſuppoſed he was born, in or near the year 1380. In the firſt year of Henry V. Faſtolf had a grant of the caſtle and dominion of Veires in Gaſcony In 1415, when Harfleur was taken, he was appointed lieutenant of that city, received the honour of knighthood, and the next year had the manor and demeſnes of Fritenſe, near Harfleur, granted him during life, for his good ſervices. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the glorious battle of Agincourt by taking the duke of Alençon priſoner, and gave diſtinguiſhed proofs of his bravery on ſeveral other occaſions. In 1422, he was advanced to be lieutenant for the king, regent in Normandy, governor of the counties of Anjou and Maine, and created a knight banneret, and on his taking ſeveral towns from the French, was raiſed to the dignity of a baron, and created a knight of the garter. He was afterwards employed in ſeveral negociations, and ſpent his old age in acts of generoſity and hoſpitality. He was a benefactor to both the univerſities, bequeathing a conſiderable legacy to Cambridge, for building the ſchools of philoſophy and civil law; at Oxford, he was ſo bountiful to Magdalen college, from his affection for his friend William Wainfleet, the founder, that his name is there commemorated in an anniverſary ſpeech. He died on the 5th of November, 1460.

Shakeſpeare has been highly cenſured by ſome writers for perverting, with unaccountable licence, the character of this great and good man, under that of ſir John Falſtaff; while others, perhaps with better reaſon, will not allow that he drew his Falſtaff from any part of ſir John Faſtolf's character. It was originally written under the name of ſir John Oldcaſtle; exceptions were taken againſt his uſing the name of a perſon of ſo venerable a character, on which he changed it for a name that was entirely fictitious.

FATIMA, the daughter of Mahomet, and the wife of Ali, is held in great veneration by the Mahometans, who, tho' they allow her to be the mother of ſeveral children, reverence her as a virgin.

FATTORE (Il) a celebrated painter. See Penni.

FAVAGNANA, an iſland in the Sardinian Sea, about fifteen miles in circumſtance. It lies on the weſtern coaſt of Sicily, over-againſt Cape Coco. It has nothing conſiderable, except a fort. Long. 12 55. E. Lat. 38. 0. N.

FAUCHET (Claudius) a native of Paris, and one of the firſt preſidents of the mint in that city. He wrote the Antiquities of the Gauls and French, a Tranſlation of Tacitus, and other works. He died at Paris, in 1601, aged 72.

FAUCHEUR (Michael le) a celebrated miniſter of France, of the reformed religion, and one of the greateſt preachers of the ſeventeenth century, was at firſt paſtor of a congregation at Montpellier, where he acquired ſuch reputation, that he was invited to Paris, and choſen miniſter at Charenton. He one day preached againſt duelling with ſuch vehemence, and in ſo perſuaſive a manner, that the marſhal de la Force, who heard him, ſaid to ſome officers who were with him, that if they now ſent him a challenge, he could not accept of it. Le Faucheur was no leſs remarkable for his probity than for his extraordinary abilities in the pulpit, and died, at a very advanced age, at Paris, in 1667. He wrote, 1. Several volumes of Sermons. 2. An excellent Treatiſe on the Action of an orator. 3. A Collection of Prayers and Chriſtian Meditations. 4. A Treatiſe on the Euchariſt in folio, againſt cardinal du Perron, which was ſo highly approved by the reformed churches, that it was printed at their expence, by order of a national ſynod.

FAUNALIA, in Roman antiquity, three annual feſtivals in honour of Faunus. The principal ſacrifices on this occaſion were lambs and kids.

FAUNUS, in fabulous hiſtory, was king of the Aborigines, or country of the Latins, and, it is ſaid, ſucceeded his father Picus, about the one thouſand two hundred and twentieth year before the Chriſtian æra. He is ſaid to have inſtituted a great number of religious ceremonies, and to have kept himſelf almoſt always concealed, on which account he was confounded with the god Pan. His children, called Fauni or Fauns, were viſionary beings, much like the Satyrs, and were uſually crowned with pine, but both Faunus and they were only worſhipped in Italy, and were wholly unknown to the Greeks.

FAVORINUS, an ancient philoſopher and orator, at the beginning of the ſecond century, was born at Arles in Gaul, and taught both at Athens and Rome with great reputation. The emperor Adrian one day reproved him for uſing a word which though Favourinus knew to be a good one, and frequently uſed by the beſt authors, he made no reply. For this he was blamed by his friends, on which he anſwered, "Shall I not eaſily allow him to be the moſt learned of all "men, who has thirty legions at his command?" Many works have been attributed to him, and, among the reſt, a Miſcellaneous Hiſtory, in Greek, frequently quoted by Diogenes Laertius.

FAVOUR, in pagan worſhip, a fabulous deity, which ſome will have the daughter of Fortune, others of Beauty, and a third, the daughter of Wit. Apelles painted her with wings, walking with Flattery before her, Pride, Honour, and Pleaſure around her, and Envy at her heels.

FAUQUEMONT, a town of the Dutch Netherlands, in the duchy of Limburg, taken by the French, in 1672, who who demoliſhed the caſtle. It is ſeated on the river Guelt, five miles eaſt of Maeſtricht, and twenty-eight weſt of Juliers. Long. 6. 3. E. Lat 50. 52. N.

FAUR de St. Jorri (Peter du) firſt preſident in the parliament of Toulouſe, and one of the moſt learned men of his time, compoſed ſeveral works, and died on the 15th May, 1600.

FAUNE (Claudius) lord of Vaugelas, and baron of Peroges, one of the moſt illuſtrious members of the French academy, was born at Bourg en Breſſe, in the ſixteenth century, and came very young to the French court. He was gentleman in ordinary, and afterwards chamberlain to Gaſton, duke of Orleans, whom he followed in his retreat out of the kingdom. Vaugelas had much wit, mildneſs, complaiſance, and gaiety of temper, which procured him the eſteem of the court. Lewis XIII. had granted him a penſion of two thouſand livres; but it being ſtopped, cardinal Richelieu reſtored it to him again, in order to engage him to labour at the Dictionary of the academy. When Vaugelas going to thank his eminence. "Well, ſaid "the cardinal, you, without doubt, will not forget the "word Penſion in the Dictionary." "No, my lord, ſaid "Vaugelas, and much leſs ſhall I forget that of Gratitude." Vaugelas, towards the end of his days, was preceptor to prince Thomas, the ſon of Charles, duke of Savoy, and died poor, in 1649, aged ſixty-five. The moſt conſiderable and moſt eſteemed of his works are, Remarks on the French Language, and an excellent Tranſlation of Quintus Curtius.

FAUSTA, the daughter of the emperor Maximianus Valereus, ſurnamed Herculeus, and the wife of Conſtantine the Great, accuſed Criſpus, a prince of great merit, (the ſon of Conſtantine by his firſt wife) of attempting her honour; on which the emperor, his father, cauſed him to be put to death without the leaſt form of trial; but afterwards diſcovering the innocence of his ſon, he cauſed Fauſta to be ſuffocated in a hot bath.

FAUSTINA, the wife of the emperor Antoninus, famous in hiſtory for her laſciviouſneſs. Julius Capitolinus relates, that having conceived a violent paſſion for a gladiator, ſhe confeſſed it to her huſband, when that prince, by the advice of the Chaldæans, put the gladiator to death, and ordered her to waſh herſelf in his blood. Fauſtina was by this remedy cured of her paſſion, but the ſame night conceived Commodus, who had the diſpoſitions of a gladiator.

FAUSTUS (John) or rather Fust, a citizen of Mentz, entered into partnerſhip, about the year 1440, with John Guttemberg, who was endeavouring to diſcover the art of printing. After ſeveral attempts, which were confined to cutting the letters on blocks of wood, Peter Schœffer, Fauſtus's clerk, invented moveable letters and ink fit for printing. Fauſtus was ſo charmed at this diſcovery, in which the art of printing principally conſiſts, that he gave him his daughter in marriage. They printed ſeveral works, particularly Bibles, in a character like that of the manuſcripts, and carrying a great number of theſe copies to Paris, ſold them for manuſcripts. However, thoſe who purchaſed them, ſeeing ſuch an exact conformity between all the Bibles which they compared together, imagined that this could not happen without the uſe of magic, and beginning a proſecution againſt Fauſtus, he fled to Mentz; but ſome time after the parliament diſcharged him from all the demands of thoſe who had bought Bibles of him. He died about the year 1466.

FAYAL, one of the iſlands called the Azores or Weſtern Iſlands, belonging to Portugal. It has but one town, which is near the harbour, and has nothing very remarkable. Long. 31. 12. W. Lat. 38. 20. N.

FAYDIT (Peter) a prieſt of Rome, well known for the ſingularity of his opinions. He entered the congregation of the Oratory in 1662, but was obliged to leave it in 1673. He then declaimed, in the pulpit, againſt the conduct of pope Innocent XI. towards the French; and in 1690, publiſhed a Treatiſe on the Trinity, for which he was confined in St. Lazarus, at Paris. At length he received an order

order from the king to retire to the place of his birth, where he died in 1709. He wrote, 1. Remarks on Virgil, Homer, and the poetic Style of the Holy Scriptures. 2. Memoirs againſt Tillemont's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the two firſt Centuries. 3. The Telemacomante, a criticiſm on M. de Fenelon's Telemachus; and other works

FAYE (John Francis Leriget de la) a French poet, who publiſhed many ſmall pieces of poetry that are very agreeable and ſprightly. He was received into the French academy in 1730, and died in 1731, at fifty-ſeven years of age.

Faye (John Elias Leriget de la) brother of the former, was born at Vienne, in Dauphiny. He became captain of the guards, and was preſent at the battle of Ramilies, that of Oudenarde, and in ſeveral other military actions, in which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery. His ſkill in the mathematics occaſioned his being choſen into the academy of ſciences, in 1716. He wrote ſeveral Memoirs, which were printed with thoſe of the academy, and died in 1728, at forty-ſeven years of age.

FAYETTE (Mary Magdalen Pioche de la Vergne, counteſs of) a lady illuſtrious by her birth, her wit, and her works, was the daughter of Aymar de la Vergne, governor of Havre de Grace, and marſhal de camp. She married, in 1655, Francis, count of Fayette, obtained the eſteem of meſſieurs Huet, Segrais, Menage, Fontaine, and other learned men. She wrote Memoirs of the Court of France for the Years 1688 and 1689, which are curious and well wrote, and died in 1693.

FE, Fo, or Fohe, the name of the principal god of the Chineſe. They adore him as the Lord of Heaven, and repreſent him as all reſplendent with light, with his hands concealed under his robes, to ſhew that he does every thing in an inviſible manner; on his right hand is placed the famous Confucius, and on his left, Lanza, or Lanca, the chief of the ſecond ſect of the Chineſe religion. Several learned men have imagined that the ark reſted in China, where they place mount Ararat, and that Fe, or Fohê, is the ſame with Noah.

FEAR, one of the Paſſions, to which the Greeks and Romans erected temples, where they offered up their ſupplications, to be preſerved from this paſſion in the day of battle, &c.

FEATLY (Daniel) an eminent Engliſh divine, was born at Charlton upon Otmore, in Oxfordſhire, in March, 1582, and completed his ſtudies at Corpus Chriſti college, Oxford. His admirable way of preaching, his ſkill in diſputation, and his other extraordinary accompliſhments, induced ſir Thomas Edmunds, who was diſpatched by king James as lieger-ambaſſador to France, to chuſe him for his chaplain. He lived there three years, and did great honour to the Engliſh nation and the proteſtant religion, by his diſputing with the moſt learned papiſts. On his return to England, he was ſucceſſively promoted to ſeveral livings, and had at length the rectory of Allhallows, Bread-ſtreet, in London, which he ſoon after changed for the rectory of Acton, in Middleſex, and at length became the third and laſt provoſt of Chelſea college. In 1642, after the king had encountered the parliament army, ſome of the ſoldiers taking up their quarters at Brentford, made ſtrict ſearch for our author, whom they took to be a papiſt, and not finding him, did him great damage in deſtroying his houſe, ſtables, granaries, barns, &c. They afterwards ſought him at Lambeth, but having timely notice, he happily eſcaped. In 1643, he was appointed a member of the aſſembly of divines, and was afterwards a witneſs againſt archbiſhop Laud; yet he warmly oppoſed the covenant, and wrote a letter to archbiſhop Uſher, then at Oxford, containing his reaſons, which being intercepted, and carried firſt to the cloſe committee, and then to the houſe of commons, he was judged to be a ſpy, and being ſeized, was ſtripped of his livings, and committed priſoner to lord Petre's houſe, in Alderſgate-ſtreet, where he continued about ſix months, when being dropſical, and reduced to a low ſtate, he was removed to Chelſea-college, where he died on the 17th of April, 1645. He was the author of near forty different works, one of which, intitled Ancilla Pietatis, or the Hand-maid to private Devotion, has had many editions.

FECIALES, in Roman antiquity, a college of prieſts inſtituted at Rome by Numa, conſiſting of twenty perſons choſen out of the beſt families. They were arbitrators in all affairs relating to peace and war, and the guardians of the public faith. If the republic had received any injury from a foreign ſtate, theſe officers, who were properly heralds, were diſpatched to demand ſatisfaction, when, if they could not procure it, they called the gods to witneſs againſt that people and country, and immediately declared war; otherwiſe they confirmed the alliance or contracted a new one, which they ratified by ſacrificing a hog; but theſe important affairs were not, however, managed without the conſent of the ſenate and people.

FECKENHAM (John de) the laſt abbot of Weſtminſter, was ſo called from Feckenham Foreſt in Worceſterſhire, the place of his birth, and where his parents, who were poor cottagers, reſided, his original name being Howman. He ſtudied at Oxford, afterwards became chaplain to Bonner, and, on that prelate's being deprived of his biſhoprick, was committed to the Tower. He was engaged in ſeveral public and private diſputes with the Proteſtants, by order of queen Mary; but notwithſtanding his zeal for popery, employed himſelf in doing good offices for the afflicted proteſtants, from the higheſt to the loweſt. In 1556, he was made abbot of Canterbury, and on the acceſſion of queen Elizabeth, was, it is ſaid, offered the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, provided he would conform to the laws, which he refuſed, and oppoſing every thing tending to the reformation, he was, in 1560, committed to the Tower, from which he was afterwards releaſed, and brought to acknowledge the queen's ſupremacy, but was afterwards impriſoned in Wiſbich caſtle, in the Iſle of Ely, where he died in 1585. He publiſhed two homilies and a few tracts.

FEDELE (Cassandra) a learned Venetian lady, born in the year 1465, was the daughter of Angelo Fedele and Barbara Leonia. This lady became ſo famous for her ſkill in the Latin and Greek tongues, and her knowledge of hiſtory, philoſophy, and the arts, that ſhe was the wonder of the age in which ſhe lived. She wrote a volume of Latin poems, on various ſubjects.

FEITHIUS (Everard) born at Elbourg, in Gelderland, in the 16th century, obtained great ſkill in the Greek and Hebrew languages. The troubles in the Netherlands obliged him to retire into France, where he acquired the eſteem of Cauſabon, the preſident de Thou, and other learned men. He there for ſome time taught the Greek tongue; but one day walking with his ſervant to Rochelle, he was deſired to enter the houſe of a citizen, and from that time, notwithſtanding all the enquiries of the magiſtrates, could never be heard of. He wrote a book in Latin, on the Antiquities of Homer.

FELDKIRK, a town of Germany, in the Tirol, capital of a diſtrict of the ſame name. It is a trading place, and has conſiderable privileges. It was formerly an imperial city, and is ſeated on the river Ill, near the Rhine, fifteen miles eaſt of Apenzel, thirty north-eaſt of Coire, and forty ſouth-eaſt of Conſtance. Long. 9. 36. E. Lat. 47. 20. N.

FELIBIEN (Andrew) a celebrated French writer, born at Chartres, in 1619, of one of the beſt families in that city. He ſtudied at Paris, and was employed by Mr. Fouquet, and afterwards by M. Colbert, who, in 1666, made him hiſtoriographer of the king's buildings, and, in 1673, keeper of the antiquities. He was one of the eight firſt members of the Academy of Inſcriptions and Medals, eſtabliſhed by M. Colbert, in 1663, and wrote many works in French, the principal of which are, 1. A Converſation on the Lives and Works of the Painters. 2. The Principles of Architecture, Painting, and Sculpture. 3. A Treatiſe on the Origin of Painting; and, 4. Conferences in the Academy of Painting. He died at Paris, on the 11th of June, 1695.

Felibien (John Francis) hiſtoriographer of the French king's buildings, keeper of the antiquities, and member of the Academy of Inſcriptions, was the ſon of the former. He wrote, 1. An hiſtorical Collection of the Lives and Works of the moſt celebrated Architects. 2. A Deſcription of Verſailles. 3. A Deſcription of the Church of Invalids, &c. and died in 1733.

FELICIANI (Porphyry) ſecretary to pope Paul V. and afterwards biſhop of Foligno, left ſeveral collections of letters and Italian poems, which are greatly eſteemed. He died on the 2d of October, 1632, aged ſeventy.

FELICITAS, in the Roman worſhip, a goddeſs, or rather bleſſing, to which Lucullus built a temple. She is repreſented in painting by the figure of a woman, cloathed in a purple veſtment trimmed with ſilver, ſitting on an imperial throne, with a cornucopia in one hand, and a caduceus or Mercury's wand in the other.

FELIN, a town of Livonia, in Eſtonia, in the kingdom of Sweden. It is ſeated on the river Felin, ſixty-three miles ſouth-eaſt of Revel, and forty-five eaſt of Pernau. Long. 25. 58. E. Lat. 58. 50. N.

FELIX, proconſul and governor of Judea, in the firſt century, was brother to Pallas, the freedman of the emperor Claudius. He arrived in Judea about the year 53, when he conceived a violent paſſion for Druſylla, the daughter of Agrippa, and the wife of Azizes, and married her. For this reaſon St. Paul, on his ſpeaking before him, diſcourſed of chaſtity and the judgment to come with ſuch energy, that Felix trembled. Some time after Nero recalled him, on account of his ill conduct, and ſent Portius Feſtus in his room.

Felix (Minutius). See Minutius Felix.

FELIX (St.) prieſt of Nola, who, being perſecuted for the faith, and thrown into priſon, during the perſecution of Deceus or Valerian, it is ſaid an angel delivered him, that he might go to the aſſiſtance of Maximus his biſhop, who was fallen ſick in the mountains. Peace being reſtored to the church, Felix returned, and continued to diſcharge his miniſterial office. After the death of Maximus they reſolved to chuſe him biſhop, but he oppoſed it. He died about the year 256.

FELIX I. biſhop of Rome, ſucceeded St. Dennis in 270, and died on the 30th of December, 274, or 275. We find in the council of Calcedon a fragment of a letter written by Felix to Maximus, biſhop of Alexandria, againſt Sabellius and Paulus Samoſatenus.

FELIX II. antipope and archdeacon of the Roman church, was intruded upon that ſee by the emperor Conſtantius, during the baniſhment of Liberius, in 355. Three years after, Liberius returning to Rome, Felix was driven from thence, and died on the 22d of November, 375.

FELIX III. a Roman, and great-grandfather to Gregory the Great, ſucceeded pope Simplicius on the 8th of March, 483. He rejected the edict of Union publiſhed by the emperor Zeno, and pronounced an anathema againſt thoſe who received it. He died on the 25th of February, 492, and was ſucceeded by Gelaſius.

FELIX IV. a native of Benevento, ſucceeded pope John I. on the 24th of July, 526: died on the 12th of October, 529, and was ſucceeded by Boniface II.

FELIX V. See AMADEUS VIII.

FELL (JOHN) D. D. a learned Engliſh divine and biſhop, was born at Longworth, in Berkſhire, on the 23d of June, 1625, and was educated at Oxford. He took up arms for king Charles I. within the garriſon of Oxford, and was afterwards an enſign. In 1648 he was turned out of his ſtudent's place by the parliament viſitors, being then in holy orders; but at the Reſtoration was made prebendary of Chicheſter, and dean of Chriſt-church, when he built the north ſide of the great quadrangle, begun at Oxford, by cardinal Wolſey, and ſeveral other public edifices. He was afterwards vice-chancellor of that univerſity, and in February 1675-6, was conſecrated biſhop of Oxford, when he generouſly expended his ſubſtance in works of piety and charity. He publiſhed, 1. The Intereſt of England ſtated. 2. St. Clement's two Epiſtles to the Corinthians, in Greek and Latin, with notes. 3. A beautiful edition of St. Cyprian. 4. Several Sermons; and other works. This worthy prelate died on the 10th of July, 1686, and was interred in the Divinity-chapel adjoining to the choir of Chriſt-church cathedral, where a plain decent marble tomb, with an elegant Latin inſcription, is placed over him.

FELTRI, an ancient town of Italy, in the territory of Venice, capital of a diſtrict of the ſame name, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated at the foot of the Alps, on the little river Auſona, forty miles north of Padua, eighteen weſt of Belluno, and forty north-weſt of Venice. Long. 12. 26. E. Lat. 46. 12. N.

FEMEREN, a ſmall iſland of Denmark, in the Baltic Sea, ſeparated from the duchy of Holſtein by a ſtreight two miles broad, and is ten miles in length, and five in breadth. It is fertile in corn, and is ſubject to the duke of Holſtein. Long. 11. 12. E. Lat. 54. 56. N.

FENELON (FRANCIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTTE) a celebrated archbiſhop of Cambray, and one of the greateſt men the church of France has produced, was born of an ancient and noble family, at the caſtle of Fenelon, in the province of Perigord, on the 6th of Auguſt, 1651. He was educated at his father's houſe till he was twelve years of age, when he was ſent to the univerſity of Cahors, and afterwards finiſhed his ſtudies at Paris, under the care of his uncle Anthony, marquiſs of Fenelon, lieutenant-general of the king's armies, who was as much diſtinguiſhed by his genius and exemplary piety, as by his courage. This nobleman treated him as his ſon. He began to preach with applauſe at nineteen years of age, but at the marquiſs's perſuaſions deſiſted. He received holy orders at the age of twenty-four, and preached in the pariſh of St. Sulpitius. In 1689 he was made preceptor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, for whom he compoſed his Telemachus, in which he has exhauſted all the riches of the French language. In 1693 he was made a member of the French academy, and in 1695 was made archbiſhop of Cambray, which he accepted only on condition of his reſiding nine months in his dioceſe, and ſpending three at court with the princes. He reſigned at the ſame time his abbey of St. Valery, and a ſmall priory, believing that he could not in conſcience poſſeſs any benefice with his archbiſhoprick. His merit, the favour he enjoyed at court, and his great reputation, ſeemed to promiſe him ſtill more conſiderable preferments, but a ſtorm was raiſed againſt him, which obliged him to leave the court for ever. Mr. M. Boſſuet accuſing him of quietiſm, and writing againſt his book of Maxims of the Saints, cauſed him to be condemned by ſeveral biſhops. Fenelon publiſhed a great number of works in his own defence, but theſe did not calm the ſtorm. He was baniſhed to his dioceſe in 1697, and pope Innocent XII. condemned twenty-three propoſitions in that work. Monſ. de Fenelon immediately ſubmitted to this cenſure, and declared his ſubmiſſion under his hand. Thus ended this famous diſpute between two of the greateſt biſhops that have hitherto appeared in France. He now led an exemplary life at Cambray, acquitting himſelf very punctually of all the duties of his ſtation, and by his benevolence to thoſe who differed from him, was ſo beloved and reſpected, that the proteſtant army, on entering the Cambreſis, ſpared his lands. Beſides the works already mentioned, he wrote, 1. A Demonſtration of the Being of God, the beſt edition of which is that of Paris, 1726. 2. A Treatiſe on the Education of Maidens. 3. Dialogues on Eloquence. 4. The Directory of Princes. 5. An Abridgment of the Lives of the ancient Philoſophers; and other works. He died at Cambray, on the 7th of January, 1715, aged ſixty-four.

FENESTRANGE, a town of Lorrain, capital of a diſtrict of the ſame name, ſeated on the river Sarre, eighteen miles from Marſal, and eighteen ſouth of Deux Ponts. Long. 7. 11 E Lat. 48. 52. N.

FENESTRELLES, a town in the valley of the Vaudois, on the river Cluſon. It was taken from the French by the duke of Savoy, in 1708, and was confirmed to him by the treaty of Utrecht. It is fifteen miles weſt of Turin. Long. 7. 26. E. Lat. 45. 10. N.

FENTON (EDWARD) an experienced ſeaman and gallant officer, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was deſcended from an ancient family in Nottinghamſhire. He ſerved for ſome time with great reputation in Ireland; and afterwards accompanied ſir Martin Frobiſher in two voyages, for the diſcovery of the North-weſt paſſage in 1577 and 1578, in the laſt of which he commanded the Judith, and had the title of rear-admiral. In 1582 he ſailed with three ſtout ſhips and a bark, to diſcover that paſſage by the way of the South Seas, but hearing that the king of Spain had intelligence of his project, and had ſent a ſtrong fleet into the ſtreights of Magellan to intercept him, he put into a Portugueſe ſettlement to careen, where he met with three of the Spaniſh ſquadron, one of which was the vice-admiral, which he ſunk, after a very briſk engagement, and then returned home. He died in 1603, and was buried at Deptford, where a monument was erected to his memory.

FENTON (Sir GEOFFREY) an eminent writer and ſtateſman, during the reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James I. was deſcended from an ancient family in Nottinghamſhire, and born about the middle of the ſixteenth century. He gave early proofs of his acquaintance with ancient and modern learning, and his being well verſed in the French, Spaniſh, and Italian languages. He is well known for his tranſlation from the Italian of Guiccardini's Hiſtory of the Wars of Italy. He alſo wrote, among others, a work intitled Golden Epiſtles, containing variety of diſcourſes, both moral, philoſophical, and divine, gathered as well out of Guevara's works, as others, in Latin, French, and Italian. He ſpent great part of his life in Ireland, where he was a member of the privy-council, and in 1603, married his daughter to Mr. Boyle, afterwards the great earl of Corke. He died in Dublin, on the 19th of October, 1608, leaving behind him the character of a polite writer, an accompliſhed courtier, an able ſtateſman, and a true friend to the Engliſh nation, and the proteſtant intereſt in Ireland.

FENTON (ELIJAH) an Engliſh poet, was born about the latter end of the reign of king Charles II. at Shelton, near Newcaſtle under Line, in Staffordſhire, and being deſigned for the church, was ſent to the univerſity of Cambridge, where, embracing principles very oppoſite to the government, he became diſqualified for entering into holy orders. On his quitting that ſeminary of learning, he ſerved the earl of Orrery as his ſecretary to Flanders, and on his leaving his lordſhip's ſervice, became maſter of the free-ſchool of Sevenoak, in Kent. This laborious employment he however ſoon quitted, at the requeſt of lord Bolingbroke, who promiſed to provide for him; but before his lordſhip was able to perform his promiſe, he was himſelf obliged to abandon his country. In this extremity, Mr. Fenton had recourſe to his literary abilities; and collecting his poems, by the advice of his friends, he publiſhed a volume of them in 1717. About the ſame time he was taken into the family of Mr. ſecretary Craggs, in order to read the claſſics to him; and that amiable ſtateſman would certainly have made his fortune, had he not been cut off by the ſmall-pox, in the prime of his age. He was poſſeſſed of great tenderneſs and humanity, and preſerved the faireſt reputation. In 1723 he brought upon the ſtage his tragedy of Mariamne, and with the profits of this play he diſcharged all his debts, which amounted to little leſs than one thouſand pounds; and being invited by lady Trumball, relict of ſir William Trumball, to undertake the education of her ſon, he accepted the offer; and ſettling in that family, continued to reſide there during the remaining part of his life. He alſo publiſhed a fine edition of the Works of Mr. Edmund Waller, with notes of his own; and, after a life of eaſe and tranquillity, died at Eaſt-Hampſtead-Park, near Oakingham, on the 13th of July, 1730, much regretted by all men of taſte, particularly by Mr. Pope, who honoured him with the following epitaph.

This modeſt ſtone, what few vain marbles can,
May truly ſay, Here lies an honeſt man:
A poet, bleſs'd beyond a poet's fate,
Whom heaven kept ſacred from the proud and great;
Foe to loud praiſe, and friend to learned eaſe,
Content with ſcience in the vale of peace.
Calmly he look'd on either life, and here
Saw nothing to regret, or there to fear:
From nature's temperate feaſt roſe ſatisfy'd,
Thank'd heaven that he had liv'd, and that he dy'd.

FERABATH, a town of Perſia, in the province of Gilan, near the Caſpian Sea. Shah Abbas often uſed to paſs the winter there. Long. 52. 27. E. Lat. 36. 54. N.

FERALIA, in Roman antiquity, a feſtival obſerved by the Romans, in honour of the manes of their deceaſed friends. During the ceremony, which conſiſted in making offerings at their graves, marriages were forbidden, and the temples of the gods ſhut up.

FERDINAND I. emperor of Germany, the brother of Charles V. and the ſon of Philip I. archduke of Auſtria, was born at Medina, in 1503. He married Anne, the daughter of Ladiſlaus, king of Hungary and Bohemia, and the ſiſter of Lewis the Younger, who was killed at the battle of Mohats, in 1526. After the death of this laſt prince, he was, in 1527, crowned king of Hungary and Bohemia, and Charles V. abdicating the empire in 1558, Ferdinand, who was then fifty-five years of age, ſucceeded him. He made a truce of eight years with the Turks; reconciled ſeveral princes; terminated the diſputes between the kings of Sweden and Denmark, and died at Vienna, in Auſtria, on the 25th of July, 1564, aged ſixty-one.

Ferdinand was a learned prince, and a friend to men of learning; he was mild, affable, temperate, and a lover of peace, and never appeared ſevere, except in his treatment of the Bohemians, on their entering into a league with Frederick duke of Saxony, againſt Charles V.

FERDINAND II. emperor of Germany, was the ſon of Charles, archduke of Gratz, the grandſon of the emperor Ferdinand I. and was born on the 9th of July, 1578. He was elected king of Bohemia in 1617, king of Hungary in 1618, and emperor in 1619, after the death of the emperor Matthias, his couſin. Ferdinand ſent the count de Buquoi againſt Frederick V. the elector Palatine, whom the revolted Bohemians had choſen king, and that elector was defeated at the famous battle of Prague, on the 8th of November, 1620, and his electorate given to Maximilian, duke of Bavaria. In 1625, Ferdinand defeated Chriſtiern IV. king of Denmark, but the proteſtant princes entering into a league againſt him, and being aſſiſted by Lewis XIII. king of France, and Guſtavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, the laſt mentioned prince gained a famous victory at Leipſick, over Tilly, the emperor's general, ſubdued two thirds of Germany, and loſt his life at the battle of Lutzen, though he was conqueror. His generals continued their conqueſts, the courſe of which was ſtopt by the victory of Nortlingen, obtained in 1634, by the emperor's ſon Ferdinand, king of Hungary. The following year a peace was concluded at Prague, and the emperor Ferdinand, in 1636, cauſed his ſon to be declared king of the Romans: in ſhort, after having ſecured the grandeur of his family, he died at Vienna, on the 8th of February, 1637, aged ſixty-one.

FERDINAND III. ſurnamed Erneſt, the ſon of the former, was born in 1608. He ſucceeded the emperor Ferdinand in 1637, and at firſt gained ſome advantages over the Swedes, under the conduct of Gales, one of his generals; but his army was afterwards defeated by Bernard of Saxony, duke of Weimar, aſſiſted by the French, in 1638, and by John Banier, the Swediſh general, in 1639, who even laid ſiege to Ratiſbon, where the emperor held the diet. The French alſo gained ſeveral advantages under the conduct of the marſhal de Guebriant, the duke d'Enguien, prince of Condé, and the viſcount de Turenne. Ferdinand nevertheleſs gained the battle of Tuttingen, in Swabia, and that of Mariendal, in Franconia. A peace was concluded at Munſter, in 1648, after which Ferdinand enjoyed a peaceful reign, till the year 1657, when he died at Vienna, aged forty-nine.

FERDINAND, the name of five kings of Caſtile and Leon: the firſt ſurnamed the Great, conquered the king of Leon; gained great advantages over the Moors; defeated his brother Garcias IV. king of Navarre, and died in 1065, after a reign of forty years. The ſecond was the youngeſt ſon of Alphonſo VIII. he gained ſeveral victories over the Portugueſe; made their king priſoner, and died about the year 1191. The third, St. Ferdinand, ſon of Alphonſo IX. took Cordoua, Murcia, and Seville, from the Moors, and raiſed troops for the conqueſt of the kingdom of Morocco, but he had not time to execute this great project, for he died at Seville, on the thirtieth of May, 1252, aged thirty-five, and was canonized on account of his piety. The fourth repreſſed a rebellion of his ſubjects; defeated the neighbouring princes; conquered the king of Granada, and was found dead in his bed, on the 7th of September, 1312, aged twenty-four. In ſhort, the moſt famous of all theſe princes was Ferdinand V. ſurnamed the Catholic, who was the ſon of John II. king of Arragon; he married Iſabella of Caſtile, in 1469, and in virtue of this marriage, united, in 1479, the kingdoms of Caſtile and Arragon. In 1476 he gained a celebrated victory over Alphonſo V. king of Portugal; conquered the kingdom of Granada, and in 1492 drove the Moors out of Spain. He rendered himſelf maſter of Pignon de Velez and Oran, in Africa; ſeized the kingdom of Naples, and in 1512 uſurped that of Navarre. He died in 1516, at the village of Madrigalet, of a potion which his ſecond wife gave him, to render him capable of procreation. This prince had great qualities, but he ſacrificed every thing to his ambition and political views. Under his reign Chriſtopher Columbus diſcovered the New World, and brought many of its iſlands into ſubjection to the kingdom of Caſtile.

FERDINAND OF CORDOUA, a Spaniard in the fifteenth century, was conſidered as a prodigy of learning, he was alſo a valiant ſoldier, played on ſeveral inſtruments, danced to admiration, and painted as well as the beſt artiſts in Paris. There are attributed to him a Commentary on the Almagiſt of Ptolomy, and on the Apocalypſe, and a treatiſe, De Artificio omnis Scibilis. He died at Paris in 1445.

FERDINAND LOPEZ DE CASTANEDA, a Portugueſe, accompanied his father to the Indies about the year 1540; and at his return publiſhed a Hiſtory of what he had ſeen.

FERDINAND, (CHARLES,) an able writer, born at Bruges, taught humanity with reputation at Paris, though he was born blind. He afterwards became a Benedictine monk. He wrote two books on the Tranquility of the Soul, and other works, and died in 1494.

FERE, a town of France, in Picardy, remarkable for its powder-mill, and ſchool for gunnery. The fortifications have been demoliſhed. It is ſeated on the river Serve, twenty miles north of Soiſſons, and ſeventy-five north-by-eaſt of Paris. Long 3. 26 E. Lat. 49. 45. N.

FEREDETHUS, a king of the Picts, cotemporary with Alpinus, the ſixty-eight king of Scotland, againſt whom he made war. The armies meeting at Reſtenot, a village of Angus Feredethus perceiving his men fly, with a ſelect band of the nobles, broke through the main body of the Scots, but was ſurrounded and ſlain, with the flower of his noblity. This happened in the ninth century.

FERENTINO, a territory of Italy, in the Campania of Rome, and territory of the pope, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a hill, eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Anagni, and thirty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Rome. Long. 14. 15. E. Lat. 41. 48. N.

FERRETTE, a town of Germany, in the province of Alſace. It was formerly the capital of a large county. It is ſubject to France, and is fifty-five miles ſouth of Straſburg. Long. 7. 36. E. Lat. 47. 27. N.

FERGUS, the firſt king of Scotland, was eſteemed the moſt eminent man of his time for wiſdom and bravery. The Scots living at that time in tribes and clans without any ſovereign, and engaging in a war with the Picts, with whom they had intermarried, had recourſe to this prince, who was then king or chief of the Iriſh Scots, in order to ſtrengthen themſelves by his alliance. When Fergus arriving with forces from Ireland, was unanimouſly choſen king by the public conſent of the people, and prepared for battle; but while things were in this ſituation, the Scots and Picts received advice, that the Britons waited for an opportunity to deſtroy them both, by falling upon that party that ſhould gain the victory, upon which they inſtantly concluded a treaty, and all the three armies were diſbanded. The Britons, it is ſaid, being thus diſappointed in their deſign, attempted to ſet them at variance, by privately driving away the cattle belonging to the Picts, and when ambaſſadors came to demand reſtitution, told them, they ought to ſeek for them amongſt the Scots, who were uſed to ſuch depredations, which ſo affronted the two nations, that they invaded the Britons, and obtained much plunder. In return, the Britons made head againſt the confederates, but were routed. Fergus afterwards went into Ireland to quell a ſedition, but in his return was drowned near Carrickfergus. He is ſaid to have lived about the year 330.

FERGUS II. king of Scotland, ſucceeded Eugenius, and in 404, marched into Britain, to ſhake off the Roman yoke, but was repulſed with great ſlaughter, and afterwards intirely defeated at the river Carron, near Severus's wall. The Romans however going back into Gaul, the Scots and Picts demoliſhed that wall under the conduct of Graham, father-in-law to Fergus; but the Romans returning ſoon after, under the command of Maximianus, made a great ſlaughter; but afterwards the Scots and Picts put the Romans to flight; however, the Romans detaching ſome veteran troops, fell upon the Scots, who being ſurrounded, drew themſelves up into a circle, where they bravely defended themſelves till every man was ſlain. In this battle, which was fought in 420, Fergus loſt his life, after a reign of ſixteen years.

FERGUS III. king of Scotland, ſucceeded Eugenius VIII. He at firſt appeared extremely virtuous, but afterwards addicted himſelf to vice. His wife frequently upbraided him with his lewdneſs, but finding her admonitions to be in vain, ſtrangled him while aſleep, in the third year of his reign. Several people were put to the torture in order to diſcover this murder, when at length, the queen being moved with the ſufferings of ſo many innocent perſons, acknowledged her guilt, and, to prevent her being brought to public puniſhment, ſtabbed herſelf, about the year 767.

FERIÆ, in Roman antiquity, holidays, in which they abſtained from labour. Theſe were either public, and common to all people in general; or private, and confined only to particular perſons or families. The public feriæ were of four kinds, 1. The Stativæ Feriæ, which were marked in the calendar, and always fell upon the ſame day of the month as the Lupercalia, &c. The Conceptivæ Feriæ, appointed every year by the magiſtrates, or the pontiff, upon what days they pleaſed; 3. Imperativæ Feriæ, holidays appointed by the authority of the conſuls or prætors upon ſolemn occaſions, as the gaining of a victory; and 4 The Nundinæ, or fairs. The private feriæ were on birth-days, &c.

According to Macrobius, the feriæ were polluted if the rex ſacrorum, or flamines, ſaw any work done on them, and therefore they ordered proclamation to be made, that every one muſt abſtain from labour, and whoever tranſgreſſed was fined. And the ſame author obſerves, that Mutius Scævola, the pontiff, was of opinion, that breaking the feriæ was an unpardonable crime, unleſs it was done inadvertently, and in this caſe an expiation was to be made by ſacrificing an hog.

FERMANAGH, a county of Ireland, in the province of Ulſter, bounded on the ſouth-eaſt by Leitrim, on the north-weſt by Donnegal, on the eaſt by Monaghan, and by Cavan. It is thirty-eight miles long, and twenty-four broad, and returns four members to parliament. It is full of woods and bogs, and a third part of it is taken up with Lough Erne, which runs into Donnegal Bay, near Ballyſhannon, it being forty miles in length, and ten broad. It contains great quantities of fiſh, particularly pikes, ſalmons, and trouts. The middle of it is not much broader than a river which ſeems to divide it into two parts. It continues thus about ſix miles, and has a ſtrong fort, erected thereon, being a paſs of great importance. This, and the town, is called Inniſkilling, and is famous for two obſtinate defences of it; one by the rebels againſt queen Elizabeth, and the other by the proteſtants againſt king James II. This is the only place of note in the county.

FERMAT, (PETER) counſellor of the Parliament of Thouloufe, was a famous mathematician, and one of the greateſt geniuſes, and moſt learned civilians of his time. He wrote ſeveral works, and died in 1665.

FERMO, or FIRMO, a ſtrong town of Italy in the territory of the pope, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is ſeated near the gulph of Venice, eighteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Macerata, thirty-three ſouth-eaſt of Ancona, and one hundred north-eaſt of Rome. Long. 15. 10. E. Lat. 43. 10. N.

FERNANDES (JUAN) an iſland in the South-Sea, three hundred and thirty miles from the coaſt of Chili. It is of an irregular figure, its greateſt extent being twelve or fifteen miles, and its greateſt breadth near ſix. The ſafeſt anchoring is on the north-ſide, where there are three bays; but the middlemoſt, known by the name of Cumberland-Bay, is the wideſt and deepeſt, and in all reſpects much the beſt. The northern part of this iſland is compoſed of high craggy hills, many of them inacceſſable, though generally covered with trees. The ſoil of this part is looſe and ſhallow, ſo that very large trees on the hills ſoon periſh for want of root, and are then eaſily overturned. In ſome places there are red hills of a peculiar ſort of earth, exceeding vermillion in colour, which perhaps on examination might be uſeful for various purpoſes. The ſouthern, or rather the ſouth-weſt part of the iſland, is widely different from the reſt, being dry, ſtoney, deſtitute of trees, very flat and low compared with the hills on the northern part. Beſides, it is ſurrounded with a ſteep ſhore, and has a little or no freſh water.

The trees of which the woods on the northern ſide of the iſland are compoſed, are chiefly aromaticks, and of many different ſorts. None of them are of a ſize to yield any conſiderable timber, except the myrtles, which are the largeſt, and yet theſe will not work to a greater length than forty feet. The top of the myrtle-tree is regular and uniformly circular, as if it had been clipped by art. On its bark is an excreſcence like moſs, which in taſte and ſmell reſembles garlick, and is uſed by ſailors inſtead of it. The pimento and the cabbage-tree likewiſe grow here, though in no great plenty. There are likewiſe plants of various kinds, which want a good botaniſt to deſcribe them, and ſome well known that are of great uſe in curing the ſcurvy, ſuch as water-creſſes, purſlain, wild ſorrel, turneps, and Sicilian radiſhes.

The excellence of the climate, and the looſeneſs of the ſoil, render this place extremely proper for all kinds of vegetation, for which reaſon commodore Anſon when he was here, ſowed lettuces, carrots, and other garden plants, and ſet plum, apricot, and peach-ſtones in the woods, which laſt have ſince thriven in a very remarkable degree. The woods, which cover moſt of the ſteepeſt hills, are free from all buſhes and under-wood, and afford an eaſy paſſage through every part of them; and the irregularities of the hills and precipices in the northern part of the iſland, trace out, by their various combinations, a great number of romantic vallies, moſt of which have a ſtream of the cleareſt water running through them, which falls in caſcades from rock to rock, as the bottom of the valley happens to be broken into a ſudden ſharp deſcent Some particular ſpots in the vallies, where the ſhade and fragrance of the contiguous woods, the loftineſs of the overhanging rocks, and the tranſparency and frequent falls of the neighbouring ſtreams, preſent ſuch ſcenes of elegance and dignity, as are hard to be matched in any part of the globe. It is in this perhaps that the ſingle productions of unaſſiſted nature may be ſaid to excel all the fictitious deſcriptions of the moſt animated imagination.

This iſland formerly abounded in goats, but their number is now much diminiſhed. It has alſo dogs, cats, rats, ſea lions, and ſeals.

The birds are chiefly hawks, blackbirds, owls, and humming birds. There is plenty and great variety of fiſh, particularly the codare, of a prodigious ſize, and extremely numerous; beſides which, there are cavallies, gropers, large breams, maids, ſilver-fiſh, congers of a peculiar kind, and above all, a black fiſh, in high eſteem, in ſhape reſembling a carp, and is called by ſome a chimney-ſweeper. They may be eaſily caught with hooks and lines. The ſea cray-fiſh weigh eight or nine pounds, and for flavour, ſize, delicacy, and quantity, are not to be equalled in the world. They have an excellent taſte, and lie in great abundance near the edge of the water. Lat. 33. 40. S.

FERNEL, (JOHN FRANCIS) in Latin Fernelius, phyſician to king Henry II. of France, and queen Catharine de Medicis, acquired great reputation, and wrote ſeveral works, which are much eſteemed by the French. He died at Paris on the 26th of April, 1558, aged fifty-two.

FERONIA, in the pagan worſhip, the goddeſs of woods and orchards. She received her name from Feronia, a town ſituated at the foot of Mount Soracte, where ſhe had a temple, and not far from it, a wood conſecrated to her. Strabo tells us, that her prieſts and votaries were able to walk unhurt on burning coals. Slaves received the cap of liberty in her temple, on which account they regarded her as their patroneſs.

FERRAND (JAMES) doctor of phyſic at the beginning of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Agen, and wrote a Treatiſe on the Diſeaſe of Love, printed at Paris in 1622.

FERRAND (LEWIS) advocate in the parliament of Paris, and an able divine, was born at Toulon, on the 3d of October, 1645. He was ſkilled in the antient languages, and in ſacred and profane antiquity, and died on the 11th of March, 1699, aged fifty-four. His principal works are, 1. Reflections on the Chriſtian Religion. 2. A Latin Commentary on the Pſalms. 3. A Treatiſe on the Knowledge of God, &c.

FERRANDUS (FULGENTIUS) a learned deacon of the church of Carthage, in the ſixth century. He wrote a Collection of Canons, and other works.

FERRARA, a city of Italy, in the territory of the pope, capital of a duchy of the ſame name. It is ſeated in an agreeable and fertile plain, watered by the river Po, which is a defence on one ſide, and on the other is encompaſſed by a ſtrong wall, and deep broad ditches full of water, as well as by a good citadel, finiſhed by pope Paul. In the middle of the city is a magnificent caſtle, which was formerly the palace palace of the dukes, and is not now the leaſt ornament of Ferrara. It is quite ſurrounded with water, and the arſenal, which is near it, deſerves the obſervation of travellers. Over-againſt the palace is the duke's garden, with a park, called Belvidere, on account of its beauty. Behind the garden there is a palace, built with white marble, called the Palace of Diamonds, becauſe all the ſtones are cut diamond faſhion

The caſtle or palace has a ſtrong tower at each corner, and all round there is a gallery furniſhed with little pillars of white marble, which have a fine effect. In the middle of the palace is a ſquare court, adorned all round with the portraits of the houſe of Eſte, painted in freſco. At ſome diſtance from this court, there is the palace of the nobles, before which there is a ſquare, in which is the equeſtrian ſtatue of Hercules the Second. On the other ſide of the ſquare is the ſtatue of Borſus I. duke of Eſte. He is in a ſitting poſture, and is the ſame who built the ſuperb monaſtery of the Chartreux, where his ſtatue is alſo placed. The ſtreets are beautiful, being long, broad, and regular.

The cathedral church is remarkable for its antiquity, for the quantity of fine marble wherewith the walls are caſed, and for the fine columns which adorn the front. The tower is fine and magnificent. We ſhall not take notice of every church in particular, but only the moſt remarkable. The church of the Dominicans is famous for its great number of reliques; that of the Benedictines for the tomb of Arioſto, is the fineſt; that of Notre Dame for its enigmatical epitaph; that of Notre Dame des Anges for ſeveral ancient monuments, particularly that of Nicholas d'Eſte, duke of Ferrara, who built the walls on the ſide of the Po, inlarged the ſtreets, and paved them with bricks; in ſhort, that of the Chartreux, which ſtands at one end of the city upon a hill.

Ferrara had formerly a conſiderable trade, but it is now almoſt deſerted, being very poor, inſomuch that there is hardly a perſon to be ſeen in the ſtreets. This is owing to the exactions of the popes. The fortifications are now neglected, and the ancient univerſity is dwindled into a wretched college of the Jeſuits. However, in 1735, it was advanced to an archbiſhoprick by pope Clement XII. The country about it is ſo marſhy, that a ſhower or two of rain renders the roads almoſt impaſſable. It is twenty-four miles north-eaſt of Bologna, thirty-eight north-weſt of Ravenna, ſeventy north-by-weſt of Florence, and one hundred and ninety north of Rome. Long. 12. 14. E. Lat. 44. 36. N.

FERRARA, the duchy of a province in the pope's territory, bounded on the north by the State of Venice; on the weſt by the duchies of Mantua and Mirandola; on the ſouth by the Boulogneſe, and by Romania, of which it was formerly a part; and on the eaſt by the Gulph of Venice. It is fifty miles in length, and forty-three in breadth along the coaſt. But grows narrower and narrower towards the Mantuan. This country is almoſt ſurrounded by the branches of the Po, which often overflow the country, and form the great moraſs of Comachio, which has a bad effect on the air. It is thin of people, and indifferently cultivated, though fit for corn, pulſe, and hemp. The Po and the lake of Comachio yield a large quantity of fiſh. Ferrara is the capital town, beſides which, there are Arano, Comachio, Magnavacca, Belriguardo, Cento, Buendeno, and Ficherola. This duchy was formerly poſſeſſed by the houſe of Eſte. But the pope took poſſeſſion of it in 1598, after the death of Alphonſo II. duke of Ferrara, it being a fief of the church.

FERRARA, (RENETTA, ducheſs of) a princeſs famous for her virtue and attachment to Calviniſm, was the daughter of Lewis XII. king of France, and Anne of Brittany. She was born at Blois on the 25th of October, 1510, and was married to Hercules d'Eſte II. duke of Ferrara and Modena. She left Italy on account of her religion, and returned to France immediately after the death of her huſband, where ſhe publicly profeſſed Calviniſm, and died at Montargis on the 12th of June, 1575.

FERRARI (OCTAVIAN) a polite and learned writer, born of a noble family at Milan, on the 23d of September, 1510. He taught philoſophy at Padua, and afterwards at Milan, where he died in 1586. He wrote a Treatiſe on the Origin of the Romans, and other works, which are eſteemed.

FERRARI (FRANCISCO BERNARDINO) was born at Milan in 1577. He applied himſelf with great ſucceſs to philoſophy and divinity, as well as to the Latin, Greek, Spaniſh, and French languages. His vaſt knowledge of books, induced Frederic Borromeo, archbiſhop of Milan, to ſend him into different parts of Europe to collect printed books and manuſcripts, in order to form a library at Milan, on which Ferrari travelled through a great part of Italy and Spain, and collected a vaſt number of books, which laid the foundation of the famous Ambroſian library. Ferrari was the author of ſeveral curious works, the principal of which are, 1. De Ritu Sacrarum Eccleſiæ Catholicæ Concionum; 2. A Treatiſe of the Acclamations and Applauſes of the Ancients; 3. Of the Funerals of the Ancients, &c. all in Latin, and died on the 30th of January, 1669, aged ninety-ſix.

FERRARI (OCTAVIO) a polite and learned writer, born at Milan in 1607. He acquired ſuch reputation by his eloquence and his works, that the city of Milan, queen Chriſtina of Sweden, and Lewis XIV. beſtowed preſents and penſions upon him. He wrote a great number of books, which are much eſteemed, on the Habits of the Ancients, Sepulchral Lamps, the Origin of the Italian Language, &c. He died on the 7th of March, 1682, aged ſeventy-five.

FERRARS (GEORGE) a learned lawyer, hiſtorian, poet, and accompliſhed courtier, in the reign of Henry VIII. Edward VI. queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth, was born in a village near St. Alban's, about the year 1510. He was educated at the univerſity of Oxford, from whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn, and ſoon made a conſiderable figure in Weſtminſter-hall. His firſt riſe in his profeſſion and at court, was owing to Cromwell, earl of Eſſex, who countenanced men of capacity as long as he continued in favour. He attended the king in war as well as in peace, and ſerved him both with his pen and ſword; and that monarch, to ſhew his affection for him, made him a conſiderable grant in his own native country; yet within ſeven years after, his affairs were in a very diſagreeable ſituation, which was, perhaps, one reaſon why he procured himſelf to be choſen member for the borough of Plymouth, in Devonſhire, in the parliament ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter on the 22d of January, in the thirty-third of that king's reign; where, during the ſeſſions, he had the misfortune to be taken in execution, by an officer belonging to the ſheriffs of London, and carried to the compter, then in Bread-ſtreet, the news of which being carried to the houſe of commons, occaſioned ſuch a diſturbance there, as not only produced his diſcharge, but a ſettled rule with reſpect to privilege. He continued in high favour with king Henry all his reign, and in the beginning of that Edward VI. attended Somerſet, the lord protector, in quality of one of the commiſſioners of the army, in his expedition into Scotland. Four years after, when the unfortunate duke of Somerſet lay under ſentence of death, at which the people murmured, and the king himſelf ſhewed great uneaſineſs; thoſe about his majeſty, in order to entertain and divert him, proclaimed Mr. Ferrars lord of miſrule, that is, a kind of prince of ſports and paſtimes, which office he diſcharged in Chriſtmas holidays, for twelve days together, at Greenwich, with great magnificence and addreſs. In this character, attended by the politeſt part of the court, he made an excurſion to London, where he was very honourably received by officers created for that purpoſe, was ſplendidly entertained by the lord-mayor; and when he took his leave, had a preſent made him in token of reſpect. This gentleman was beloved, admired, and careſſed during his whole life, by all who knew him, and more eſpecially reſpected by the learned, who conſulted him upon their labours as a candid critic, and generous friend. He wrote, 1. The Fall of Robert Treſſilian, lord chief-juſtice of England; 2. The Story of dame Eleanor Cobham; 3. The Story of Humphry Plantagenet, duke of Glouceſter; 4. The Tragedies of King Richard II. and of Edmund duke of Somerſet, and other works. He died in the year 1579.

FERREIRI (ANTHONY) a famous Portugueſe ſurgeon, born at Liſbon, publiſhed, in 1670, a Courſe of Surgery, which is much eſteemed. He died in 1677.

FERRET (ÆMILIUS) in Latin Ferrettus, one of the moſt learned civilians in the ſixteenth century, was born at Caſtillo Franco, in Tuſcany, on the 14th of November, 1489. He was ſecretary to pope Leo X. and afterwards went to France, and taught the lord Valence with ſuch reputation, that Francis I. made him counſellor in the parliament of Paris; and ſent him as his envoy to the Venetians and the Florentines. He wrote ſeveral books, and died at Avignon on the 15th of July, 1552.

FERRI (PAUL) in Latin Ferrius, one of the moſt learned proteſtant divines in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Metz, on the 24th of February, 1591. He acquired great reputation by his writings and his ſermons, and died on the 27th of December, 1669.

FERRI (CIRO) an excellent painter, was born at Rome, in the year 1634. He was a faithful imitator of Peter Cortona, under whom he had been bred, and came ſo near him in his invention and manner of painting, that his cielings, in particular, are often miſtaken for his. Prince Borgheſe and pope Alexander VII. had a great eſteem for him, and he was no leſs in favour with the three popes his ſucceſſors.

ſors. The great duke ſent for him to Florence, and aſſigned him a large penſion to finiſh the works begun by Cortona, and they are ſo well executed, that the whole ſeems to be done by the ſame hand. He was alſo a great architect, and ſeveral palaces, and grand altars, at Rome, are raiſed from his deſigns. In ſhort, the pope employed him in making cartoons for the Vatican, and no man has worked in more different kinds. The cupola of St Agnes, in the palace of Navona, was his laſt work; and the vexation he felt at ſeeing the paintings of Bacici, which were directly under it, the force of whoſe colouring made his appear too weak, is ſaid to have been the cauſe of his death, which happened in 1689, when he was forty-five years of age.

FERRIER (Arnold du) one of the moſt learned civilians of his time, was born at Thouloufe, where he taught the law, and was counſellor in parliament. He was afterwards ſent ambaſſador from France, to the council of Trent, where, in 1562, he pronounced ſo bold a ſpeech, that he raiſed the reſentment of the prelates, when, to put a ſtop to their complaints, he was ſent ambaſſador to Venice, where he aſſiſted father Paul in collecting materials for his hiſtory of the council of Trent. Ferrier, at his return to France, retired to the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. when he made a public profeſſion of the proteſtant religion, and that prince gave him the poſt of keeper of the ſeals. He wrote ſeveral works, and died, in 1585, aged ſeventy-nine.

Ferrier (Jeremy) was a miniſter and profeſſor of divinity at Niſmes, in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. In the year 1602, he maintained in a public diſputation, that pope Clement VIII. was the antichriſt, yet he afterwards embraced the popiſh religion. He did not however openly make this change till a popular tumult aroſe againſt him, in which his houſe was plundered, and himſelf ſo near being murdered, that, in order to eſcape, he was obliged to lie three days concealed in a tomb. After this, the French king employed him in ſeveral important affairs, and at length honoured him with the title of ſtate and privy counſellor. He was the reputed author of a famous political work, intitled Catholique d'Etat. He died on the 26th of September, 1626.

Ferrier (Claudius de) a learned civilian and doctor of laws in the univerſity of Paris, was born in that city, in 1639. He wrote a great number of works, among which are, 1. Commentaries on the Cuſtoms of Paris. 2. A Treatiſe on Fiefs. 3. Several books of civil law, &c. He died at Rheims, on the 11th of May, 1715, aged ſeventy-ſeven.

FERRO, an iſland in the Atlantic Ocean, the moſt weſtern and ſouthern of the Canaries. It is remarkable for nothing but for being the place where ſome geographers place the firſt meridian, particularly thoſe of France; but in this work we have placed ours at London. It belongs to the Spaniards. Long. 17. 26. W. Lat. 27. 48. N.

FERROL, a ſea-port town of Spain, in the province of Gallicia ſeated on a bay of the Atlantic Ocean. It has a good harbour, and, is frequented by the Spaniſh fleet in war time. It is twenty miles north-eaſt of the Groyne, and fifty north of Compoſtella. Long. 8. 46. W. Lat. 43. 26. N.

Ferte Alais, a town of France, in the Gatinois, eight miles north-eaſt of Eſtampes, and twenty-five ſouth of Paris. Long 2. 27. E. Lat. 48. 30. N.

Ferte Aucourt, a town of France, in Brie Champinois, ſeated on the river Marne, between Chateaux Thierri and Meaux. Long 3. 3. E. Lat. 48. 56. N.

Ferte Bernard, a town of France, in the Maine, ſeated on the river Huiſne, fifteen miles from Mans. Long. 0. 39. E. Lat. 48. 10. N.

Ferte Milon, a town in the Iſle of France, with an ancient caſtle. It is thirty-eight miles north-eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 7. E. Lat. 49. 10. N.

Ferte sur Aube, a town of France, in Champagne, ten miles from Bar ſur Aube. Long. 4. 48. E. Lat 48. 10. N.

FERUS (John) ſuperior of the grey friars at Mentz, and one of the moſt celebrated preachers of the ſeventeenth century. He wrote ſeveral commentaries on the Bible and other works, and by the candour and freedom of his ſentiments obtained the eſteem of the proteſtants. He died on the 5th of September, 1558.

FESCAM, a conſiderable town of France, in Normandy, in the territory of Caux, with a celebrated rich abbey of Benedictines. It carries on a conſiderable trade, and is twenty miles from Havre de Grace, fifteen north-eaſt of Montevilier, thirty ſouth-weſt of Dieppe, and one hundred and thirteen north-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 26. E. Lat. 49. 41. N.

FESTUS (Pompeius) a celebrated grammarian, who lived under the emperors Auguſtus and Tiberius, abridged Verrius Flaccus De Verborum Significatione. The beſt edition of this Abridgment is that publiſhed by Mr. Dacier, in quarto, for the uſe of the dauphin.

Festus (Portius) proconſul and governor of Judea after Felix, about the year 61. He ſent for St. Paul, when he was in Cæſarea, in order to have him tried at his tribunal; but St. Paul appealing to Cæſar, Feſtus ſent him to Rome.

FETIPOUR, a town of Aſia, in Hither India, and in the province of Agra, in the dominions of the mogul, twenty-five miles north-weſt of the city of Agra. Long. 78. 46. E. Lat. 27. 12. N.

FETTI (Domenico) a celebrated painter, born at Rome, in 1589, was educated under Lodovico Civoli, but ſoon quitting his ſchool, he went to Mantua, where the paintings of Julio Romano afforded him the means of becoming a great painter; for from them he took his colouring and the boldneſs of his characters; but he wanted the nice correctneſs of that maſter. Fetti painted with great force, but ſometimes too darkly, was very delicate in his thoughts, had a a grandeur of expreſſion, and a mellowneſs of pencil, that pleaſed the connoiſſeurs. His pictures are ſcarce, and much ſought after. Going to Venice, he abandoned himſelf to diſorderly courſes, which breaking his conſtitution put an end to his life in the thirty-fifth year of his age. The duke of Mantua was ſo concerned at his death, that he ſent for his father and ſiſter, whom he provided for, ever after. The ſiſter, who painted well, became a nun, and exerciſed her talent in the convent, which ſhe decorated with ſeveral of her works. Other religious houſes in Mantua were likewiſe adorned with her paintings.

FEVARDENTIUS (Francis) a learned Franciſcan friar and fiery zealot, was born at Conſtance, in Lower Normandy, in 1541, and might have inherited a large eſtate, had he not choſen to wear a monk's habit rather than a ſword. He was one of the moſt bitter perſecutors the French proteſtants ever had, and one of the moſt ſeditious preachers among thoſe who raiſed the diſturbances againſt Henry III and Henry IV. of France, nor did he ſpare even the chiefs of the leaguers, when he thought them guilty of any thing that might prejudice the cauſe of the rebels. He wrote Commentaries on ſome books of Scripture, and tranſlated ſome works of the fathers into French. He publiſhed the five books of Irenæus, reviſed and corrected from an ancient manuſcript, of which the ſecond edition, printed at Cologne, in 1596, and again in 1630, and at Paris, in 1639, are better than the firſt, becauſe they contain the Greek paſſages of Irenæus which were in Epiphanius, and other ancient writers. He alſo publiſhed ſome books of controverſy, which many of the catholics themſelves own to have been written with too much heat. He died at Paris, on the firſt of January, 1610.

FEUDAL System, in hiſtory. In order to give a clear idea of this part of the hiſtory of Europe, we ſhall make uſe of the obſervations of the ingenious and accurate Dr. Robertſon. "When nations, ſays he, ſubject to deſpotic government make conqueſts, theſe ſerve only to extend the dominion and the power of their maſter; but armies compoſed of freemen conquer for themſelves, not for their leaders. The people who overturned the Roman empire, and ſettled in its various provinces, were of the latter claſs. They followed the chieftains, who led them forth in queſt of new ſettlements, not by conſtraint, but from choice, not as ſoldiers whom he could order to march, but as volunteers who offered to accompany him. They conſidered their conqueſts as a common property, in which all had a title to a ſhare, as all had contributed to acquire them. In what manner they divided among them the lands which they ſeized cannot now be determined with any certainty, for there is no nation in Europe, whoſe records reach back to this remote period. This new diviſion of property, however, together with the maxims and manners to which it gave riſe, gradually introduced a ſpecies of government now diſtinguiſhed by the name of the Feudal Syſtem; and tho' the barbarous nations which framed it ſettled in their new territories at different times, came from different countries, ſpoke various languages, and were under the command of ſeparate leaders, the feudal policy and laws were eſtabliſhed with little variation in every kingdom of Europe.

As the conquerors of Europe had their acquiſitions to maintain, not only againſt ſuch of the ancient inhabitants as they had ſpared, but againſt the more formidable inroads of new invaders, ſelf-defence ſeems to have been the ſole object of their firſt inſtitution and policy; and they ſaw the neceſſity of relinquiſhing ſome of their private rights, in order to attain public ſafety. Every freeman, upon receiving a portion of the lands which were divided, bound himſelf to appear in arms againſt the enemies of the community This military ſervice was the condition upon which he received and held his lands; and, as they were exempted from every other burden, that tenure was deemed both eaſy and honourable. The king, or general, who led them to conqueſt, continuing ſtill to be the head of the colony, had of courſe the largeſt portion allotted to him. Having thus acquired the means of rewarding paſt ſervices, as well as of gaining new adherents, he parcelled out his lands with this view, binding thoſe on whom they were beſtowed to follow his ſtandard with a number of men, in proportion to the extent of the territory which they received, and to bear arms in his defence. His chief officers imitated the example of the ſovereign, and in diſtributing portions of their lands among their dependants, annexed the ſame condition to the grant. Thus a feudal kingdom reſembled a military eſtabliſhment rather than a civil inſtitution. The victorious army, cantoned out in the country which it had ſeized, continued ranged under its proper officers, and ſubordinate to military command. Every proprietor of land, girt with a ſword, was ready to march at the ſummons of his ſuperior, and to take the field againſt the common enemy.

But though the feudal policy appears to be ſo admirably calculated for defence againſt the aſſaults of any foreign power, its proviſions for the interior order and tranquility of ſociety were extremely defective. The monarchical and ariſtocratical parts of the conſtitution having no intermediate power to balance them, were perpetually at variance. The powerful vaſſals of the crown ſoon extorted a confirmation for life of theſe grants of lands, which being at firſt purely gratuitous, had been beſtowed only during pleaſure. Not ſatisfied with this, they prevailed to have them converted into hereditary poſſeſſions. They even appropriated to themſelves titles of honour, and offices of power and truſt. Thoſe perſonal marks of diſtinction which the public admiration beſtows on illuſtrious merit, or which the public confidence confers on extraordinary abilities, were annexed to certain families, and tranſmitted, like fiefs, from father to ſon, by hereditary right. The crown vaſſals having thus ſecured the poſſeſſion of their lands and dignities, the nature of the feudal inſtitution led them to new and ſtill more dangerous encroachments on the prerogatives of the ſovereign. They obtained the power of ſupreme juriſdiction, both civil and criminal, within their own territories; the right of coining money; together with the privilege of carrying on war againſt their private enemies, in their own name, and by their own authority. The ideas of political ſubjection were now almoſt entirely loſt; and the nobles who had acquired ſuch enormous power ſcorned to conſider themſelves as ſubjects. They aſpired openly at being independent; the bonds which connected the principal members of the conſtitution with the crown were diſſolved; kingdoms conſiderable in extent were broken into as many ſeparate principalities, as they contained powerful barons; and every country in Europe was filled with caſtles and places of ſtrength, erected for the ſecurity of the inhabitants, not againſt foreign force, but againſt internal hoſtilities. An univerſal anarchy, deſtructive in a great meaſure of all the advantages which men expect to derive from ſociety, prevailed, and the people, the moſt numerous, as well as the moſt uſeful part of the community, were either reduced to a ſtate of actual ſervitude, or treated with the ſame inſolence and rigour as if they had been degraded into that wretched condition. Nor was ſuch oppreſſion the portion of thoſe alone who dwelt in the country, and were employed in cultivating the eſtate of their lord; the cities and villages held of ſome great man, on whom they depended for protection, and were no leſs ſubject to his arbitrary juriſdiction. The inhabitants were deprived of the natural and moſt unalienable rights of humanity. They could not diſpoſe of the effects which their own induſtry had acquired, either by will or by any deed executed during their life. They had no right to appoint guardians for their children during their minority. They were not permitted to marry without purchaſing the conſent of the lord on whom they depended. If once they had commenced a law-ſuit, they durſt not terminate it by an accommodation, becauſe that would have deprived the lord, in whoſe court they pleaded, of the perquiſites due to him on paſſing ſentence. Services of various kinds, no leſs diſgraceful than oppreſſive, were exacted from them without mercy or moderation. The ſpirit of induſtry was, in ſome cities, choaked by abſurd regulations, and in others, by unreaſonable exactions. The king, without authority to enact or to execute ſalutary laws, could neither protect the innocent, nor puniſh the guilty. The nobles, ſuperior to all reſtraint, harraſſed each other with perpetual wars, oppreſſed their fellow-ſubjects, and humbled or inſulted their ſovereign. All the external operations of the various ſtates of Europe, during this period, were therefore extremely feeble.

To theſe pernicious effects of the feudal anarchy may be added its fatal influence on the character and improvement of the human mind. In leſs than a century after the barbarous nations ſettled in their new conqueſts, almoſt all the effects of the knowledge and civility which the Romans had ſpread through Europe diſappeared; not only the arts of elegance which miniſtered to luxury, and are ſupported by it, but many of the uſeful arts, without which life can ſcarce be conſidered as comfortable, were neglected or loſt. Literature, ſcience, taſte, were words ſcarce in uſe during the ages we are contemplating. Perſons of the higheſt rank, and in the moſt eminent ſtations, could not read or write; many of the clergy did not underſtand the Breviary, which they were obliged daily to recite; and ſome of them could ſcarce read it.

Such was the ſtate of Europe, with reſpect to the adminiſtration of government, from the ſeventh to the cloſe of the eleventh century, and from that æra we may trace the return of government and manners. From the expeditions of the cruſaders, extravagant as they were, followed the moſt beneficial conſequences. Many of the nobles who aſſumed the croſs, being unable to bear the expences of appearing at the head of their vaſſals, ſold part of their poſſeſſions far below their value. Several great barons who periſhed in the holy war leaving no heirs, their fiefs reverted to their reſpective ſovereigns, by which means the regal authority was increaſed; the abſence of many potent vaſſals accuſtomed to controul and give law to the ſovereigns, affpded them an opportunity of extending their prerogative; and all private quarrels being ſuſpended or extinguiſhed by religious zeal, a more general and ſteady adminiſtration of juſtice began to be introduced. The commercial effects of the cruſades were no leſs conſiderable. The ſufferings of the firſt cruſaders, in marching through Germany and Hungary to Conſtantinople were ſo great, that it deterred others from taking the ſame route; ſo that, rather than encounter ſo many dangers, they choſe to go by ſea. Venice, Genoa, and Piſa furniſhed the veſſels in which they embarked, and obtained immenſe ſums for freight; the cruſaders alſo contracted with them for military ſtores and proviſions; their fleets kept on the coaſt as the army advanced by land, and ſupplying them with whatever was wanting, engroſſed all the profits of that lucrative branch of commerce; and afterwards, when Conſtantinople was taken, many valuable branches of the trade of that city were transferred to Venice, Genoa, or Piſa.

No ſooner did the cities of Italy begin to conceive an idea of the advantages that may be derived from commerce, than they became impatient to ſhake off the yoke of their inſolent lords, and to eſtabliſh among themſelves ſuch a free and equal government as would render property ſecure and induſtry flouriſhing. The rights which many cities acquired by bold or fortunate uſurpations, others purchaſed from the emperors, who deemed themſelves gainers when they received large ſums for immunities which they were no longer able to with hold; and ſome cities obtained them gratuitouſly from the generoſity of the princes on whom they depended. In ſhort, the great increaſe of wealth which the cruſades brought into Italy, occaſioned, a new kind of fermentation and activity in the minds of the people, and excited ſuch a paſſion for liberty and independence, that before the concluſion of the laſt cruſade, all the conſiderable cities in that country had either purchaſed, or had extorted large immunities from the emperors.

This innovation was not long known in Italy, before it made its way to France. Lewis the Groſs, or the Fat, in order to create a power that might counter-balance theſe potent vaſſals who controuled or gave law to the crown, firſt adopted the plan of conferring new privileges on the towns ſituated within his own domain; he enfranchiſed the inhabitants, aboliſhed all marks of ſervitude, and formed them into bodies politic, to be governed by a council and magiſtrates of their own nomination, who had the right of adminiſtering juſtice within their own precincts, of levying taxes, of embodying and training to arms the militia of the town, which took the field, when required by the ſovereign, under the command of officers appointed by the community. The great barons imitated the example of their monarch, and granted like immunities to the towns within their territories; for they had waſted ſuch great ſums in their expeditions to the Holy Land, that they were eager to lay hold on this new expedient for raiſing money by the ſale of theſe charters of liberty. Thus, in leſs than two centuries, ſervitude was aboliſhed in moſt of the towns in France. Much about the ſame period, the great cities in Germany began to acquire like immunities, and laid the foundation of their preſent liberty and independence. This practice ſpread quickly over Europe, and was adopted in Germany, Spain, England, Scotland, and all the other feudal kingdoms.

The acquiſition of liberty made ſuch a happy change in the condition of all the members of the community, as rouſed them from the ſtupidity and inaction into which they had been ſunk. The ſpirit of induſtry revived; commerce became an object of attention, and began to flouriſh; population increaſed; independence was eſtabliſhed, and wealth flowed into cities, which had long been the ſeat of poverty and oppreſſion; wealth was accompanied by its uſual attendants, oſtentation and luxury; and though the former was inelegant and cumberſome, and the latter indelicate, they led gradually to greater refinement in manners, and in the habits of life, and a more regular ſpecies of government vernment and police was introduced. The great council of each nation, whether diſtinguiſhed by the name of a parliament, a diet, the cortes, or the ſtates-general, had been for many ages compoſed entirely of ſuch barons and dignified eccleſiaſtics as held immediately of the crown: but now towns, by being formed into bodies corporate, became intitled to the rights eſſential to freemen, among the moſt conſiderable of which was the privilege of having a voice in enacting laws and in granting ſubſidies.

In ſhort, the inhabitants of towns having obtained freedom, that part of the people which was employed in agriculture began to recover liberty by enfranchiſement. During the rigour of feudal government, they were ſlaves fixed to the ſoil which they cultivated, and together with it were transferred from one proprietor to another, by ſale, or by conveyance. The monarchs of France endeavoured to render their enfranchiſements general. Louis XI. and his brother Philip iſſued ordinances, declaring, That as all men were by nature free born, and as their kingdom was called the kingdom of Franks, they determined that it ſhould be ſo in reality as well as in name; therefore appointed that enfranchiſements ſhould be granted upon juſt and equitable conditions. The example of their ſovereigns, together with the expectation of the conſiderable ſums which they might raiſe by this expedient, led many of the nobles to ſet their dependents at liberty. In England, as the ſpirit of liberty gained ground, the very idea of perſonal ſervitude, without any formal interpoſition of the legiſlature to prohibit it, was totally baniſhed, and the huſbandman, maſter of his own induſtry, and ſecure of reaping for himſelf the fruits of his labours, became the farmer of thoſe fields which he had formerly been compelled to till for the benefit of another." Robertſon's Hiſt. of Charles V. vol. I.

FEVERET (Charles) a famous civilian, born at Semur, in France, on the 16th of December, 1583. He compoſed, at the deſire of Lewis II. prince of Conde, an excellent Treatiſe of Abuſes; the beſt edition of which is that of Lyons, in 1736, in two volumes, folio. He alſo wrote ſome other works, and died at Dijon, on the 12th of Auguſt, 1661, aged ſeventy-ſeven.

FEVERSHAM, a town in the county of Kent, with two markets, on Wedneſdays and Saturdays. It ſtands on a creek of the river Thames, which is navigable for boys. It is governed by a mayor, jurats, and commonalty, and is a member of the cinque-port of Dover. It conſiſts of one long ſtreet, and has a market-houſe and a charity-ſchool. Oyſters and many other things are ſent from hence to the London markets. The fairs are February 25, and Auguſt 12, for linen, woollen-drapery goods, and toys. It is eight miles weſt-by-north of Canterbury, and forty-eight eaſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 0. 38. E. Lat. 51. 20. N.

FEUQUIERS (Marquis of). See Pas.

FEVRE d'Etaples (James le) in Latin, Faber Stapulenſis, was one of thoſe who began to expel the barbariſm which reigned in the univerſity of Paris. He was born at Etaples, in the dioceſe of Amiens, about the year 1455, and obtained great ſkill in polite literature, and the ſciences. He was ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm, which obliged him to retire to Meaux, from thence to Blois, and from thence to Guienne. He at length obtained the protection of Margaret, queen of Navarre, and enjoyed full liberty at Nerac till his death, which happened in 1537. His principal works are, 1. Commentaries on the Pſalms, on the Evangeliſts, and on the Epiſtles. 2. A French Verſion of the four Goſpels, and other works.

Fevre (James le) a famous doctor of the Sorbonne, archdeacon of Liſieur, and grand vicar of Bourges. He wrote ſeveral works, and died at Paris, on the firſt of July, 1716.

Fevre, ſieur de la Boderie (Gui le) in Latin, Guido Fabritius Boderianus, one of the moſt learned Frenchmen in the ſixteenth century, was born at Boderie, in Lower Normandy, in 1541. He acquired great ſkill in the Eaſtern languages, and with his brother Nicholas had a great ſhare in the Polyglot edition of the Bible, printed at Anvers, though that learned work is commonly attributed to Arias Montanus. He alſo compoſed ſeveral works in verſe and proſe, and died in 1598.

Fevre de la Boderie (Anthony) brother to the former, diſtinguiſhed himſelf under the reigns of Henry IV. and Lewis XIII. by his capacity for negociations, and his embaſſies to Rome, the Netherlands, and to England. He tranſlated from the Italian a Treatiſe on Nobility, and died in 1615, aged ſixty.

Fevre (Nicholas le) an able critic, and one of the moſt learned men of his time, was born at Paris, on the ſecond of June, 1544, and his father dying in his infancy, he was liberally educated by his mother. During the courſe of his ſtudies, he had a terrible accident: as he was cutting a pen, a bit of the quill flew into his eye, and gave him exceſſive pain, when haſtily lifting up his hand to it, he ſtruck it out with his knife. Having finiſhed his ſtudy of the languages, he went to ſtudy the civil law at Toulouſe, Padua, and Bologna, and did not come back till he had travelled through Italy, and reſided eighteen months in Rome, where he contracted a friendſhip with Muret, Sigonius, and other learned men. At his return to France he applied himſelf wholly to ſtudy, and carried on a correſpondence by letter with cardinal Baronius, and other great men. He was at length made preceptor to the prince of Conde, and afterwards to Lewis XIII. and died on the third of November, 1612, aged ſixty-nine. He wrote ſeveral ſmall pieces, which are printed together in quarto.

Fevre (Tanegui le) in Latin, Faber, a celebrated profeſſor of polite literature at Saumur, was born at Caen, in Normandy, in 1615. He acquired great ſkill in the Greek and Latin languages, on which account cardinal de Richlieu gave him a penſion of two thouſand livres, for inſpecting the works printed at the Louvre, and would have made him principal of a college he intended to found, under the name of Richelieu; but the death of that miniſter cut off all his hopes, and his penſion was but ill paid. Some time after, the marquiſs de Franciere, governor of Langres, took him along with him to his government, and there he embraced the proteſtant religion, after which he was invited to Saumur, where he was choſen Greek profeſſor. He there taught with extraordinary reputation. Young men were ſent to him from all the provinces in the kingdom, and even from foreign countries, while divines and profeſſors themſelves gloried in attending his lectures. He was preparing to go to Heidelburg, whither he was invited by the prince Palatine, when he died, on the 12th of September, 1672, aged fifty-ſeven. He wrote, 1. Notes on Anacreon, Lucretius, Longinus, Phædrus, Juſtin, Terence, Virgil, Horace, &c. 2. A ſhort Account of the Lives of the Greek Poets. 3. Two volumes of Letters; and many other works. He wrote well in Latin, and diſcovered in all his works great ſkill in criticiſm and in profane antiquity.

Fevre (Anne le). See Dacier.

Fevre (Claude le) an eminent French painter, was born at Fontainbleau, in 1633, and ſtudied in the palace there, and then at Paris under le Sueur and le Brun, the latter of whom adviſed him to adhere to portraits, for which he had a particular talent, and in his ſtyle equalled the beſt maſters of that country. He died in England, 1675, at the age of forty-two.

Feurs, a town of France, in Lyonnois. It is now but a very ſmall place to what it was formerly. It is ſeated on the river Loire, twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Rouane, twenty-five ſouth-weſt of Lyons, and two hundred and thirty-eight ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 28. E. Lat. 45. 52. N.

FEYDEAU (Matthew) doctor of the Sorbonne, was born at Paris, in 1616. He wrote, 1. Meditations on the principal Obligations of Chriſtianity. 2. The Catechiſm of Grace. 3. Meditations on Hiſtory. 4. The Agreement of the Evangeliſts; and other works. He died on the 24th of July, 1694, aged ſeventy-eight.

FEZ, the kingdom of, in Africa, on the coaſt of Barbary. It is a part of the ancient Mauritania Tingitana, and is bounded on the ſouth by the kingdom of Morocco and Segelineſſa, on the eaſt by the kingdom of Algiers, on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, and on the weſt by the Atlantic ocean. It is in the form of an imperfect ſquare, each ſide of which is about two hundred and forty miles. The air is temperate and wholeſome, and the country mountainous, eſpecially towards the weſt and ſouth, where is part of mount Atlas. Yet for all this, it is the moſt populous and fertile country in Barbary. It abounds with citrons, oranges, lemons, dates, almonds, figs, grapes, ſugar, flax, honey, cotton, pitch, and corn. There are likewiſe camels, beeves, ſheep, and the fineſt horſes in all Barbary. Not to mention lions and other wild beaſts. The moſt conſiderable rivers are the Mulvia, Nocor, Suba, Buragrag, and Ommirabi. It is divided into ſeven provinces, which are Temeſna, Fez, Azgar, Ethabet, Errif, Garet, and Chauz. The principal towns are Fez the capital, Mequinez, Theza, Mamorra, Arzilla, Larracha, Sallee, Tangier, Ceuta, Alcazar, and Tetuan.

The houſes in this country are generally pretty good, but there are no windows to be ſeen, but little holes to look out at, the light coming in at the inſide of the houſes, where there is a ſquare court-yard open at the top, with pillars ſupporting the galleries, and painted wooden baluſtrades round the inſide, almoſt like our great inns. The rooms are built long and narrow, and generally four on a floor, anſwering to the galleries, from whence there is a large folding door which opens into each room, by which all the light that they have is let in. The houſes are but two ſtories high, and flat at the top, inſomuch, that in ſome towns they can walk a great way upon them; but thoſe belonging to Chriſtian merchants have battlements, to keep them within the bounds of their own houſes; for the Mooriſh women live live in the upper apartments, and often visit one another from the tops of the houses. They are white-washed without and within, which casts a reflection that is hurtful to the eyes in the day-time. They make their walls by putting the mortar and other stuff in wooden cases, and take them away when they are dry.

The people are poor, and next a-kin to slaves, no man possessing any thing but at the pleasure of the basha, who, in his province, has power over the lives and fortunes of the inhabitants, and take the houses, land, and horses, just as he pleases. For which reason a wealthy man always endeavours to seem poor.

The inhabitants in general are of a swarthy complexion, though some are fairer than the rest. They are strong-limbed, and rather larger than the Europeans; good horsemen, hardy, active, laborious, and needy; insomuch, that a messenger will go one hundred and fifty miles for a Barbary ducat. They are patient in labour, enduring the heat in summer and the cold rains of winter to admiration. They are generally thin and spare, eating but little; and when they go a journey of seven or eight days, they take nothing with them but a little meal and a few raisins or figs, in a little goat-skin. They carry their light goods upon horses, but when they have great quantities of tallow, corn, wax, hides, &c. they use camels.

With regard to dress, the men wear short shirts, with very broad sleeves, which sometimes hang down, but are frequently tucked up to their shoulders to keep them cool. Their linen drawers reach down to their knees. They wear neither stockings nor shoes, but slippers, of red or yellow leather, made light, and without heels. Over the shirt they wear a cloth vest or waistcoat, which sits close to their bodies, and is fastened with small buttons and loops, very close together, which are often wrought with gold or silver thread. Round the waist they wear a scarf of silk or stuff, in which they stick large knives, with costly handles, either of metal or ivory inlaid, and their sheaths are tipt with silver. Their outward garment is either an alhague, or an albornooce. The alhague is a piece of very fine white woollen stuff, five or six yards long, and about one and a half broad. This they wrap round them above and below their arms. The albornooce is a thick cloth or stuff, made like a short cloak, but joined a little way before from the neck downward, having two or three rows of short stripes worked in the stuff, and fringed at the ends for ornament, and the bottom and sides are edged with a deep fringe. Behind at the neck there hangs a peaked cowl, with a tassel at the end, to put over their heads in wet weather. On their heads, which are always shaved, they wear a little red cap, and roll muslin round it to make a turban. In the country they wear a cane hat, to keep off the sun. The difference of the habit of rich and poor consists in the value; only the poorest of all wear a gelebia, which is a thick coarse woollen stuff, without sleeves, but with holes to put their arms through, which reaches to their knees, and hangs loose about them like a sack. The alcaides have a broad leathern belt, which they wear over their shoulders to hang their scymeter in. It is embroidered with gold.

The women are dressed like the men, their outward garment being an alhague, which they throw over their heads, and bring over their foreheads close to their eyes, and underneath they tie a piece of white cloth to hide the lower part of their face. Their legs are generally naked, only the drawers of the better sort reach down to their feet. Their slippers are the same as the mens, and within doors they appear in their hair bound only with a fillet. Their hair is plaited hanging down behind. Their vest is open from the bosom to the waist, to show their embroidered shifts. They tack large pieces of muslin to the sleeves of their vests, which hang down like ruffles. Over their drawers they have a short petticoat, and they wear bracelets on their arms and legs, and large ear-rings in their ears.

They are very careful to conceal themselves when the Moors are in sight, but when there are none but Europeans, when they are in the fields, or on the house-tops, they will unveil, laugh, and give themselves wanton airs, till one of their own country appears in sight. In general, they have fine eyes and good skins. A man never sees his intended wife before marriage: but when a match is concluded, after various preliminary ceremonies, the bride is put into a cage, covered with fine white linen, and carried home on mens shoulders, her relations and friends going before with musicians. Then the women go into one apartment, and the men into another till night, when the bride is left alone to receive the bridegroom's visit, where she sits richly adorned with her own attire, or what rich things she has borrowed, such as jewels and ornaments of gold and silver. Some pretend to give an account of the furniture of the room, and the ceremonies that pass between the new married couple; but these being always private, we may readily perceive it must be all invention. It is only certain, that the Mosaic signs of virginity, if they appear, are shewn to all the company. After this, neither father nor brother can see the wife unless the husband be present. If a Christian or a Jew has to do with a Moorish woman, and it be known, he must either turn Mahometan, or die.

At their meals they use neither tables nor chairs, but sit cross-legged on the ground, setting their dishes on a large piece of greasy leather; these are either of pewter or earthen ware, like a high crowned hat, turned bottom upwards. They pull their victuals to pieces with their hands.

The shops in the town are generally small, and have no doors, therefore the master, after opening the shutters, jumps in through the windows, and sits cross-legged on a place raised above the counter. The goods are disposed in drawers round him, within his reach, and the customers stand in the street to be served. They use little exercise, for they are always sitting or lying in their houses. When they go far, they always ride, we mean such as can afford it. The priests have the same habits as the laity, and are only known by their beards, which are dyed red, and the top of their slippers is cut in the shape of a fleur-de-lis.

Upon the death of any person of note, they hire women mourners, who beat their heads and faces, and make doleful moan. If it be a man, all his wives get into the middle of the house, put ashes on their heads, jump about and scream, at the same time scratching their cheeks with their nails. When the wife dies, the husband receives the visits of condolence at the door. They wash the corpse, put it into a shrowd, and carry it on a bier, being followed by a great number of people. They always bury their dead out of town, and never put two in a grave. Those that can afford it, build cupolas over the grave, with a wide entrance; but these are of different forms; the common graves are three feet deep, into which they put the body, wrapt in a shrowd, and cover it with flat stones, with a triangular stone at the head and feet. They have ideots in high esteem, and reverence them as saints, for the people kiss their garments as they pass along.

The Jews are treated in the most contemptible manner imaginable; for as it is death for them to curse, or lift up their hand against the meanest Moor, the boys will kick them about at their pleasure against which there is no remedy but to run away. They are obliged to pull off their shoes whenever they pass by any mosque, and to wear black cloaths and caps. They are none of them permitted to ride on a horse, but some of them take the liberty to mount on mules.

A late emperor, besides his four wives, had several thousand concubines, by whom he had seven hundred sons, and a great number of daughters, but how many, is unknown, because they are never to be seen in public. He never makes use of one women above once, unless by very great chance.

The chief commodities exported from Fez, are tin, copper, wax, hides, wool, cordovans, honey, dates, raisins, olives, and almonds. They have also indigo, gum-arabic, gum-sanderach, elephant's teeth, ostrich feathers, and fine mats. Exportation of corn is against the law.

The city of Fez is the centre of trade in this empire, and it is from thence the caravans go to Mecca and Medina. These carry woollen manufactures, such as alhagues, and other garments, cordovans, indigo, cochineal, and ostrich feathers, for which they bring in return silks, muslins, and drugs. This trade is carried on under pretence of a pilgrimage. They also send caravans to the country of the negroes on this side Guinea, principally to Tombatton or Tombuto, and the river Niger. It is said that twenty thousand camels at a time are employed in one caravan or cafila, and that they pass through burning deserts twenty days, where there is not one drop of water, which obliges them to load every other camel with that necessary liquor. They trade with cowreys, wrought silks, English cloth, and the woollen manufactures of Barbary. Cowreys are little shells, brought from the East Indies, which are used for money: in lieu of these they bring home gold-dust, ostrich feathers, elephant's teeth, and slaves. This journey is performed in six or seven months.

The emperor assumes the titles of king of Fez, Morocco, Tafilet, and Sus; lord of Gogoa, Dara, and Guinea, and sheriff of Mahomet.

FEZ, the capital of a kingdom of the same name in Barbary, in Africa. It is a very large place surrounded with high walls, within which there are hills and valleys, only the middle is level and flat. The river, which runs through the city, is divided into two streams, from which canals are cut into every part of the town, insomuch, that the mosques, colleges, palaces, and the houses of great men, are are ſupplied with water. They have generally ſquare marble baſons in the middle of the court of their houſes, which are ſupplied with water by marble pipes, which paſs through the walls: they conſtantly run over, and the ſtream returns back into the ſtreet, and ſo into the river. The houſes are built with brick or ſtone, and are adorned on the outſide with fine Moſaic work, or tiles like thoſe of Holland. The wood-work and cielings are carved, painted, and gilt. The roofs are flat, for they ſleep on the tops of the houſes in the ſummer. Moſt of the houſes are two ſtories high, and ſome three. There are piazzas and galleries run all round the court on the inſide, ſo that you may go under cover from one apartment to another. The pillars are of brick, covered with glazed tiles, or of marble, with arches between. The timber-work is carved and painted with gay colours, and moſt of the rooms have marble ciſterns of water. Some of the great men build towers over their houſes ſeveral ſtories high, and ſpare no expence to render them beautiful; from hence they have a fine proſpect all over the city.

There are in this city ſeven hundred moſques, great and little, fifty of which are magnificent, and ſupported with marble pillars, and other ornaments. The floors are covered with mats, as well as the walls to the height of a man. Every moſque has a tower or minaret, like thoſe in Turky, with a gallery on the top, from whence they call the people to prayers. The principal moſque is near a mile and a half in circumference. The middle building is one hundred and fifty yards in length, and eighty in breadth, with a tower proportionably high. Round this to the eaſt, weſt, and north, there are great colonades thirty or forty yards long. There are nine hundred lamps lighted every night, and in the middle of the moſque are large branches, which are capable of holding five hundred lamps each. Along the walls are ſeven pulpits, from which the doctors of the law teach the people. The buſineſs of the prieſt is only to read prayers, and diſtribute alms to the people, to ſupport which there are large revenues.

Beſides the moſques, there are too colleges built in the Mooriſh manner, and adorned with marble and paintings. In one of them there are an hundred rooms, beſides a magnificent hall: In this there is a great marble vaſe full of water, adorned with marble pillars of various colours, and finely poliſhed. The capitals are gilt, and the roof ſhines with gold, azure, and purple. The walls are adorned with Arabic verſes in gold characters. The other colleges are not near ſo beautiful, or rather are all gone to ruin ſince the neglect of learning.

There are hoſpitals in the city, where formerly all ſtrangers were maintained three days gratis. But the eſtates belonging to them are confiſcated for the king's uſe. There are above an hundred public baths, many of which are ſtately buildings. Beſides, in this city there are two hundred inns, and four hundred corn-mills. People of the ſame trade or buſineſs live in ſtreets by themſelves.

In this country there are moving towns of the Arabs, who ſeem to live very miſerably, their houſes being very indifferent, for they are made with ſticks, with a ruſh or cloth-covering, in imitation of a tent. Theſe they move about for the convenience of water and paſture. The houſes and tents are generally placed in form of a ring, vacant in the middle, except a houſe which ſtands by itſelf belonging to the ſhiek. Theſe Arabs are of a tawney complexion, and live very naſtily with their cattle and poultry. The children run about quite naked. When they remove, they put pack-ſaddles on their camels, bulls, and cows, on which they lay their houſes and goods. Their wives and children are put in wicker baſkets, which hang on both ſides of the beaſt.

Though the country is pleaſant and fertile, and in many places abounding with corn and cattle, yet a great part of it lies waſte and uncultivated, not ſo much for want of inhabitants, as from the oppreſſion of the governors, which makes them chooſe to live at ſome diſtance from the high roads, where they cultivate juſt ſo much land as is neceſſary for their own ſubſiſtence.

Round the city there are fine marble tombs, monuments, and gardens, full of all manner of fruit-trees.

Fez is ſeated on the river Cebu, two hundred and fifty miles north-eaſt of Morocco, one hundred eaſt-by-north of Sallee, and two hundred ſouth of Gibraltar. Long. 4. 25. W. Lat. 33. 58. N.

FIASCONE, a town of Italy, in the territory of the pope, remarkable for its good wine, but nothing elſe, for it is a ſmall place, and thin of people. It is ſeated on a mountain near the lake Balſena, thirteen miles north-eaſt of Viterbo, and twelve of Orvietto. Long. 13. 12. E. Lat. 42. 20. N.

FICINUS (Marsilius) a celebrated canon of Florence, was born in that city on the 19th of October, 1433. He particularly ſtudied the Greek and Latin languages, and tranſlated the works of Plato, Plotinus, Jamblicus, Proclus, and other Platonic philoſophers. It is ſaid, that having tranſlated Plato, he communicated his work to Marcus Muſurus his friend, who was a very good judge. Sometime after, going to ſee his friend, in order know his thoughts of it, he took an inkhorn full of ink, and, inſtead of anſwering him, poured it over the firſt page of the tranſlation, by which Ficinus underſtood that it was good for nothing; he therefore began it again, and publiſhed the book we have at preſent. He died in 1496, aged ſixty-ſix.

FIDA, a kingdom or territory on the Slave-coaſt of Guinea, in Africa, otherwiſe called Whidaw, and by the French Judah. See the article Whidah.

FIDDES (Richard) D. D. a learned divine, born at Hunmanby near Scarborough, in Yorkſhire, in 1671, and educated at Oxford. He was preſented to the living of Halſham, in Yorkſhire, where he was ſo admired for the ſweetneſs of his voice, and the graceſulneſs of his delivery, that the people for ſeveral miles round flocked to his ſermons; but ſuddenly looſing, in a great meaſure, his ſpeech, he came to London in 1712, and by the favour of dean Swift, was introduced to the Earl of Oxford, who made him one of his chaplains, and the queen ſoon after appointed him chaplain to the garriſon at Hull; but looſing his patrons upon the change of the miniſtry, he loſt his chaplainſhip, and being obliged to apply himſelf to writing, compoſed, 1. A Body of Divinity; 2. The Life of Cardinal Wolſey; 3. A Treatiſe of Morality, &c. He died in 1725, aged fifty-four.

FIDERI, emperor of Japan, ſucceeded his father Taicko in 1598, but was dethroned, and burnt in his palace by Ongoſchio, his tutor and father-in-law.

FIDES, or Faith, one of the virtues deified by the pagans. She had a temple near the Capitol, founded by Numa Pompilius, but no animals were offered, or blood ſpilt in her ſacrifices. During the performance of her rites, her prieſts appeared in white veſtments, with their heads and hands covered with linen, to ſhew that fidelity ought to be ſecret.

FIDIUS, in pagan worſhip, a god who preſided over alliances and promiſes. This deity, which the Romans borrowed from the Sabines, was alſo called Sanctus, Semon, and Semi-pater.

FIELD (Richard) D. D. an eminent divine of the church of England, was born at Hempſtead in Hertfordſhire, and educated in the univerſity of Oxford. He was firſt choſen reader of Lincoln's Inn chapel, London, and at length became dean of Glouceſter. He was eſteemed a principal maintainer of the proteſtant religion, an excellent preacher, a profound ſchoolman, a very extraordinary diſputant, and extremely well ſkilled in the controverſies between the proteſtants and papiſts. King James I. to whom he was chaplain, on hearing him preach the firſt time, ſaid, "This "is a Field for God to dwell in;" and Mr. Fuller citing ſomething from his works, ſtyles him, "That learned di- "vine, whoſe memory ſmelleth like a Field which the "Lord hath bleſſed." He wrote a work intitled, Five Books of the Church, and died on the 21ſt of November, 1616.

FIELDING (Henry) an admirable comic genius, and witty writer, was born at Sharpham Park, near Glaſtonbury in Somerſetſhire, on the 22d of April, 1707. His father, Edmund Fielding, ſerved under the duke of Marlborough, and arrived to the rank of lieutenant-general, and his mother was the daughter of judge Gold. Our author received the firſt rudiments of his education at home, under the care of the reverend Mr. Oliver, of whom he has given a very humourous and ſtriking portrait in Joſeph Andrews, under the name of parſon Trulliber; and from his care he was removed to Eton ſchool, where he became acquainted with lord Lyttelton, Mr. Fox, Mr. Pitt, Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, &c. and having attained a conſiderable knowledge in the Greek and Latin claſſics, he was ſent to the univerſity of Leyden, where he ſtudied the civil law for about two years, and then his remittances failing, he returned to London, when, though under age, he found himſelf his own maſter. From this ſource flowed all the inconveniences that attended him through the remainder of his life. The vivacity of his humour, and his high reliſh of ſocial enjoyment brought him into requeſt with the men of taſte and literature, and with the voluptuous of all ranks, and this introduced an extravagance which his finances could not ſupport. His father indeed allowed him two hundred a-year; but as he had married again ſoon after the death of our author's mother, and had a large increaſing family, it was but ill paid. But in whatever difficulties Mr. Henry Fielding might be involved, his imagination was fond of ſeizing every gay proſpect, and in his worſt adverſities filled him with ſanguine hopes of a better fortune. To obtain this he flattered himſelf with finding reſoures in his wit and invention, and accordingly, in the year 1727, when about twenty years of age, commenced a writer for the ſtage, and before he was quite thirty, he had produced about eighteen theatrical performances, including plays and farces. Among theſe, the comedy of the Miſer, which he has moſtly taken from Moliere, has maintained its ground upon the ſtage ever ſince its firſt performance, and has the merit of a fine copy from a great painter. But his bold political ſtrokes in ſome of his theatrical pieces, particularly in his Hiſtorical Regiſter, were the principal inſtruments that occaſioned the law for ſubjecting all new pieces to the inſpection and licence of the lord chamberlain. Almoſt all his farces were very ſucceſsful, and many of them are ſtill acted every winter with approbation. They were generally the production of two or three mornings; when he had contracted to bring on a play or a farce, he would go home late from a tavern, and the next morning deliver a ſcene to the players, written on the paper that had incloſed the tobacco, in which he much delighted, and which he chewed immoderately.

Mr. Fielding had not been long a writer for the ſtage when he married Miſs Craddock, a beauty from Saliſbury; and his mother dying about that time, a ſmall eſtate at Stower, in Dorſetſhire devolved to him. Thither he retired with his wife, of whom he was extremely fond, with the reſolution to bid adieu to all the follies and intemperance of a town-life. But unhappily a kind of family pride gained an aſcendant over him, and he immediately began to vie in ſplendor with the neighbouring 'ſquires. With an eſtate that did not much exceed two hundred a-year, and his wife's fortune, which was not more than fifteen hundred pounds, he encumbered himſelf with a large retinue of ſervants, all dreſſed in yellow liveries; and their maſter's honour not permitting them to deſcend ſo low as to be careful of their apparel, in two or three months they were unfit to be ſeen; the ſquire's dignity then requiring that they ſhould be new equipped, and his chief pleaſure conſiſting in ſociety and convivial mirth, hoſpitality threw open his doors, and in leſs than three years, his entertainments, hounds, horſes, and ſervants devoured a little patrimony, which, if managed with œconomy, might have bleſt him with a ſtate of independence during the reſt of his life.

Mr. Fielding, ſenſible of the diſagreeable ſituation to which he was now reduced, immediately reſolved to exert himſelf in order to recover the decent competence he had loſt; and being then about thirty years of age, took chambers in the Temple, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the law with the moſt intenſe application. After the cuſtomary time of probation, he was called to the bar, and as long as his health permitted, attended with aſſiduity both in term-time, and on the weſtern circuit; but the gout ſoon rendering it impoſſible for him to be as conſtant at the bar as his profeſſion required, he could only follow the law in his intervals from pain, yet he ſtill purſued his reſearches with an eagerneſs peculiar to himſelf: amidſt the exigencies of diſtreſs, with a wife and family, whom he tenderly loved, looking up to him for ſubſiſtence, with a body tormented with the acuteſt pains, and a mind diſtracted with a thouſand cares, he was obliged, for an immediate ſupply, to produce almoſt extempore, a play, a farce, a pamphlet, or a new's paper; a great number of political tracts came from his pen, and the Champion owed its chief ſupport to his abilities.

At length his genius broke forth with an effulgence ſuperior to all the rays of light it had before emitted, in his Joſeph Andrews. In this entertaining work, he took his character of parſon Adams from the reverend Mr. Young, one of his moſt learned and eſteemed friends. Mr. Young was remarkable for his acquaintance with the Greek authors, and had as paſſionate a veneration for Æſchylus as parſon Adams, the overflowings of his benevolence were as ſtrong, and his fits of reverie and abſence of mind occurred too upon the moſt intereſting occaſions.

Soon after, his Wedding Day was exhibited on the ſtage with indifferent ſucceſs. His ill ſtate of health, and his neceſſities, now made him grow cool to the ſtudy of the law; beſides, to complete his diſtreſs, his wife, whom he tenderly loved, languiſhed, and daily wore away before his eyes, and at length her death brought on ſuch a vehemence of grief, that his friends were apprehenſive of his loſing his reaſon. The firſt emotions of his ſorrow being at length abated, he ſucceſſively engaged in two periodical papers, the True Patriot, and the Jacobite Journal. He had now attained the age of forty-three, when the repeated attacks of the gout rendered him incapable of purſuing the buſineſs of a barriſter any longer; but he had the happineſs to obtain the office of an acting magiſtrate in the commiſſion of the peace for Middleſex, with a yearly penſion out of the public ſervice-money. After this he publiſhed his admired piece, called Tom Jones, which was followed in about four years by his Amelia, in which there are evident marks of his genius beginning to decline. He next wrote a periodical paper, intitled, The Covent-Garden Journal, publiſhed every Tueſday and Saturday, but his want of health obliged him to drop it: at length, by the advice of his phyſicians, he ſet out for Liſbon, and having written an account of his voyage thither, died in that city in the year 1754, and the forty-eighth of his age.

Sarah Fielding, our author's third ſiſter, is well known to the literary world, by her writing the Life of David Simple, and ſeveral other ingenious performances.

FIENUS (Thomas) an ingenious and learned phyſician, born at Antwerp, in 1566. He went into Italy, to ſtudy phyſic under Mercurialis and Aldrovandus, and, on his return, diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much in the univerſity of Louvain, that he was there choſen profeſſor of phyſic, and was afterwards made phyſician to the duke of Bavaria. He wrote ſeveral works; among which were, De Viribus Imaginationis, and De Formatione Fœtus; and died at Louvain, in March, 1631, aged ſixty-four.

FIERENZUOLO, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Parma, ſeated ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Placentia. Long. 10. 46. E. Lat. 44. 56. N.

FIESCHI (John Lewis de) count of Lavigna, of an illuſtrious Genoeſe family, rendered himſelf famous by his ambition and misfortunes. This young lord being jealous of the glory and authority of Andrew Doria, formed a conſpiracy to render himſelf maſter of Genoa. On the firſt of January, 1547, his party having ſeized the arſenal, where the galleys lay, he ran to ſee the ſlaves ſet at liberty; but fell into the ſea, and was drowned. His palace was razed, and his family baniſhed from Genoa, till the fifth generation. See Doria.

FIESALI, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Tuſcany, with a biſhop's ſee, but greatly decayed. It is ſeated five miles north-eaſt of Florence. Long. 12. 20. E. Lat. 43. 43. N.

FIFE, a county of Scotland, bounded on the north by the friths of Tay and Strathern, on the eaſt by the German Ocean, on the ſouth by the Frith of Forth, and on the weſt by the ſhires of Mentieth and Stirling. The weſt ſide is moſt mountainous, and the eaſt moſt flat and level. It affords paſture for cattle and ſheep, and ſome parts are very proper for corn, particularly the Ochil mountains have fruitful vallies between them. The mineral waters are the ſpaws at Kinghorn and Balgrigic, and the rivers Leven and Eden abound with ſalmon. It is beſt inhabited near the ſea-coaſt, for the ſake of fiſhing, though the reſt of this country is well peopled, and has ſeveral noblemen's ſeats. The towns are, Cowper, Dumferlin, Falkland, Innerkethyn, Balmerinoch, Aberdour, Bruntiſland, Kinghorn, Kirkaldy, Pitnaween, Anſtruther Weſter, Crail, and St. Andrew's.

FIGEAC, a town of France, in Quercy, with an abbey of Benedictines. It was walled, and had a caſtle; but they are quite demoliſhed. It is ſeated on the river Salle, twenty-three miles north-eaſt of Cahors, forty-eight north of Albi, and two hundred and ſeventy ſouth of Paris. Long. 1. 42. E. Lat. 44. 49. N.

FIGUERES, a town of Spain, in the province of Catalonia. It is now but the ſhadow of what it was formerly. It is ten miles weſt of Roſes. Long. 2. 51. E. Lat. 42. 20. N.

FILESAC (John) doctor of the Sorbonne, was born at Paris, and taught humanity, and afterwards philoſophy, and in 1586 was rector of the univerſity. He wrote ſeveral works, and died on the 27th of May, 1638.

FILICAIA, (Vincenzo da) a celebrated Italian poet, deſcended from a noble family, was born at Florence, on the 30th of December, 1642. He ſtudied, during five years, philoſophy, civil law, and divinity, at Piſa, where he was made doctor of law, and at length returned to Florence, where he ſpent ſeveral years, in which he had no other employment than that of poetry and polite literature, till the duke of Tuſcany made him his ſecretary. He was a member of the academy della Cruſca, and of that of the Arcadi, and died on the 27th of September, 1707, aged ſixty-five. His poems are much eſteemed for their delicacy and the nobleneſs of the ſentiments. Scipio da Filicaia, his ſon, had them all printed together, under the title of Poeſie Toſcano di Vincenzo da Filicaia, in 1707, quarto.

FILLASSIER (Marin) a virtuous prieſt, born at Paris, after having preached there with ſucceſs, was curate of Campagni, and afterwards chaplain to the ladies of Miramion; but becoming extremely infirm, he ſpent the three laſt years of his life in continual pain, when, to edify himſelf, and alſo a lady of rank, who was afflicted with a long and painful diſeaſe, he compoſed a work, called, Chriſtian Sentiments proper for ſick and infirm Perſons, a work which is almoſt entirely compoſed of Scripture expreſſions, and thoſe of the fathers. The beſt edition is that publiſhed ſoon after the author's death, which happened at Paris, on the the 13th of July, 1733, when he was fifty-ſix years of age.

FINAL, a town of Italy, capital of the marquiſate of Final, ſeated on the weſtern coaſt of Genoa. It is divided into two parts; one of which, called the city, is ſurrounded with walls, and defended by a good caſtle, ſeated on a mountain, the avenues of which are guarded by two forts; the other part is called Marine de Final, and is ſeated on the ſhore, and defended by two forts. The emperor Charles VI. ſold it to the Genoeſe, in 1713. It is thirty miles ſouth-eaſt of Coni, thirty-three ſouth-weſt of Genoa, and fifty-five ſouth-by-eaſt of Turin. Long. 9. 12. E. Lat. 44. 30. N.

FINCH (JOHN) lord Finch of Fordwich, and lord keeper in the reign of king Charles I. ſucceeded Thomas lord Coventry in that office on the 23d of January, 1639-40, but his character was juſt the reverſe of that of his predeceſſor. He is ſaid to have been one of thoſe men, who, with ſome parts, and more vanity, fancy themſelves qualified for the higheſt offices, without the due methods of ſtudy and preparation. He wreſted the laws to anſwer the purpoſes of a deſpotic court, and was ever an advocate for ſhip-money, or any other illegal impoſts. Soon after the meeting of the long parliament, the apprehenſion of being brought to ſevere juſtice, hurried him into a foreign country, and he died in exile.

FINCH (HENEAGE) earl of Nottingham, was the ſon of Sir Heneage Finch, knight, recorder of London, and was born in 1621, educated in Weſtminſter-ſchool, and became a gentleman-commoner of Chriſt-church college in Oxford, whence he at length removed to the Inner Temple, and was ſucceſſively barriſter, bencher, treaſurer, reader, &c. At the Reſtoration, Charles II. made him his ſollicitor-general, and advanced him to the dignity of a baronet, and in 1661, he was choſen member of parliament for the univerſity of Oxford. On the impeachment of the great lord Clarendon in 1667, he ſhewed himſelf very active and forward againſt the noble earl, and frequently ſpoke in thoſe debates, which at laſt ended in the baniſhment of that unfortunate nobleman. In 1670, the king appointed him his attorney-general; and about three years after, upon the removal of the earl of Shafteſbury from being lord chancellor, he was made lord keeper, and ſoon after baron of Daventry. Upon his ſurrendering the great ſeal to his majeſty in 1675, he immediately received it back again, with the title of lord high chancellor of England: at the trial of William, lord viſcount Stafford, for being concerned in the popiſh plot, he performed the office of lord high-ſteward; and as a reward for his many faithful ſervices, he was, in 1681, created earl of Nottingham. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his wiſdom and his eloquence, and died in the year 1682, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age. Under his name are publiſhed, 1. Several of his Speeches to both Houſes of Parliament; 2. Anſwers, by his Majeſty's Command, upon ſeveral Addreſſes preſented to his Majeſty at Hampton-Court; and, 3. Arguments, upon which he made the Decree in the Cauſe between Charles Howard, Eſq. Plaintiff, and Henry duke of Norfolk, Henry lord Moubray, his ſon, Henry marquis of Dorcheſter, and Richard Marriott, Eſq. defendants.

FINCH (DANIEL) earl of Nottingham, was the ſon of the former, and was born about the year 1647. He was educated in Chriſt-church college, Oxford, and ſerved in ſeveral parliaments in the reign of king Charles II. for the city of Litchfield, and the borough of Newton, in Hampſhire. In 1679, he was conſtituted firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, and ſworn of the privy council; and in the latter-end of the next year, ſpoke with great vigour in the houſe of commons againſt the bill for the excluſion of the duke of York. Upon his father's deceaſe, he ſucceeded him in his titles and eſtates; and in the reign of king James II. was one of the chief ſpeakers among the temporal lords againſt abrogating the teſt act. On king William and queen Mary's being advanced to the throne, he was offered the poſt of lord high-chancellor of England, which he excuſed himſelf from accepting, on which he was appointed one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate. In 1690, he attended his majeſty to the congreſs at the Hague, at which James II. took ſuch umbrage, that in his declation upon his intended deſcent in 1692, his lordſhip was excepted out of his general pardon. In March 1693-4, he reſigned his poſt of principal ſecretary of ſtate; and the following year, a public teſtimony was given to the integrity of his conduct; for upon an examination in parliament into the bribery and corruption of ſome of their own members, in order to obtain a new charter for the Eaſt India company, it appeared, that his lordſhip had abſolutely refuſed to take five thouſand guineas for his intereſt in promoting that charter, and five thouſand more on the paſſing of the act for that purpoſe. Upon the acceſſion of queen Anne, he was again appointed one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate; but reſigned that poſt in 1704, and accepted no other during that reign, though, upon the change of the miniſtry in 1710, he received very large offers to engage him in the meaſures of the court; and his refuſal ſo exaſperated the oppoſite party, that he was attacked with great virulence in ſeveral libels both in verſe and proſe. On the death of queen Anne, he was one of the lord juſtices for the adminiſtration of affairs, till the arrival of king George I. and on September 24, 1714, was declared lord-preſident of the council; but ſoon after retired from all public buſineſs to a ſtudious courſe of life; and in his retirement, wrote an anſwer to Mr. Whiſton's Letter to him, on the Subject of the Trinity, for which he received the thanks of the univerſity of Oxford, in convocation aſſembled. He alſo wrote a Letter to Dr. Waterland, printed at the end of Dr Newton's Treatiſe on Pluralities. His lordſhip died on the 21ſt of January, 1729-30.

FINCH (HENEAGE) earl of Winchelſea, was firſt couſin of the chancellor Nottingham, and made a figure at the ſame period. He was intimate with general Monk, and was concerned in the Reſtoration; ſoon after which he was ſent ambaſſador to the ſultan, Mahomet IV. On his return from Conſtantinople, he viſited Sicily, and was a witneſs of a terrible convulſion of mount Ætna, an account of which he ſent to the king, and it was ſoon after publiſhed by authority in a very thin quarto. Monk had given the earl the government of Dover-caſtle, which was continued to him; and when king James was ſtopped at Feverſham, he ſent for the earl of Winchelſea, who prevailed on the king to return to London. The earl afterwards voted for giving the crown to king William, by whom he was continued lord-lieutenant of Kent. He died ſoon after, in 1689. Mr. Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors.

FINE (ORONTIUS) in Latin Finæus, a famous mathematician, was born at Briançon in Dauphiné, in the year 1494. He was profeſſor of mathematics at the Royal College of Paris, and had an admirable genius for mechanics, for he invented a curious clock, and ſome machines which acquired him great reputation. He wrote ſeveral works on geometry, optics, geography, and other mathematical treatiſes, in which he diſcovers a ridiculous credulity with reſpect to judicial Aſtrology. He died very poor, on the 6th of October, 1555, aged ſixty-one.

FINISTERRE, the moſt weſtern point, not only of Gallicia, in Spain, but alſo of the continent of Europe. The ancients, who knew of no land beyond this, gave it this name, which ſignifies the Extremity of the Earth, or the End of the World. On this cape there is a town of the ſame name. Long. 9. 20. W. Lat. 43. 15. N.

FINLAND (the duchy of) is bounded on the weſt by the gulph of Bothnia, on the eaſt by Muſcovy, on the ſouth by the gulph of Finland and Ingria, and on the north by Bothnia and Lapland. It is about two hundred miles in length, and almoſt as much in breadth. It contains many lakes, in which are ſeveral iſlands, which are generally rocks or inacceſſible mountains. The inhabitants are ſmall of ſtature, capable of enduring hardſhips, and good ſoldiers. The Ruſſians have for ſome time rendered themſelves maſters of a good part of this province; the reſt belongs to Sweden. It is divided into ſeven provinces; 1. Finland; 2. Cajana; 3. Thavaſthia; 4. Nyeland; 5. Savolaxia; 6. Carelia; and, 7. Kexholmia.

Finland Proper is an agreeable country, and lies over-againſt the city of Stockholm, near the place where the gulphs of Bothnia and Finland meet. It is divided into South and North Finland. It is diverſified with mountains, foreſts, lakes, meadows, and pleaſant fields. The inhabitants ſalt the fiſh they do not conſume themſelves, and ſend it into foreign countries.

FIONDA, an ancient epiſcopal city in Natolia, ſeated on the gulph of Satalia. It is twenty five miles ſouth weſt of Satalia. Long. 30. 57. E. Lat. 36. 45. N.

FIORENZO, a town in the iſland of Corſica, in the north part, near the gulph of the ſame name, with a good harbour. Long. 9. 30. E. Lat. 42. 35. N.

FIORENZUOLA, a town of Italy, in Lombardy, and the duchy of Parma, ſeated in an agreeable plain, twenty miles north-eaſt of Parma. Long. 9. 50. E. Lat. 44. 56. N.

FIRMICUS MATERNUS (JULIUS) a famous writer, who compoſed in Latin, about the year 345, an excellent book on the errors of the profane religions, which is printed with the notes of John Wouver. There are alſo attributed to him eight books of aſtronomy, printed by Alders Manutius, in 1501; but this laſt work appears to have been written by another Julius Firmicus, who lived at the ſame time.

FIRMILIAN, biſhop of Cæſarea, in Cappadocia, in the the third century, was the friend of Origin, and took the part of St. Cyprian againſt Stephen, biſhop of Rome, maintaining taining that thoſe ought to be rebaptiſed who had been baptiſed by heretics. He died at Tarſus, as he was going to the ſecond council of Antioch, held in the year 269.

FIRMIN (Thomas) memorable for his diffuſive benevolence and extenſive charities, was born at Ipſwich, in June, 1632. His parents, who were diſſenters, inculcated into him the opinions of Calvin. They put him apprentice in London, and his maſter being a hearer of Mr. John Goodwin, young Firmin alſo attended his ſermons, and ſoon embraced the opinions of Arminius. He was a free enquirer into religious ſubjects, and this diſpoſition at length led him to eſpouſe opinions very different from thoſe that are eſteemed orthodox.

He began trade with only one hundred pounds; but he afterwards married a citizen's daughter, who had five hundred pounds to her portion, and died after having brought him two children. He then ſettled in Lombard-ſtreet, and grew ſo famous for his benevolence and public ſpiritedneſs, that he was taken notice of by all perſons of note, and eſpecially by the clergy, among whom he became intimate with Dr. Whitchcot, Dr. Wilkins, Dr. Tillotſon, &c. and was afterwards ſo publicly known as to fall under the cognizance of majeſty itſelf, for queen Mary hearing of his uſefulneſs in all public deſigns, eſpecially thoſe of charity, and that he diſbelieved the divinity of our Saviour, deſired Dr. Tillotſon, then archbiſhop of Canterbury to ſet him right, who anſwered, that he had often endeavoured it; but that Mr. Firmin had now ſo long imbibed the Socinian doctrine, as not to be capable of renouncing it. However, his grace publiſhing his ſermons on thoſe ſubjects, ſent Mr. Firmin one of the firſt copies from the preſs, when not being convinced, he cauſed a reſpectful anſwer to be drawn up, and publiſhed with this title, Conſiderations on the Explications and Defences of the Doctrine of the Trinity; notwithſtanding which the good archbiſhop ſtill retained his uſual regard for him.

Though Mr. Firmin, in 1664, married a ſecond wife who brought him ſeveral children, he ſtill exerted his benevolence. The plague in 1665, and the fire in 1666, furniſhed him with a variety of objects, and yet his biographer ſuppoſes, that, in the year 1676, he was worth nine thouſand pounds, though he had diſpoſed of incredible ſums in charity. This year he erected his warehouſe in Little Britain, for the employment of the poor in the linen manufacture; which, Dr. Tillotſon ſays, in his funeral ſermon on Mr. Gouge, "Mr. Firmin managed with ſuch "vigour and ſucceſs, that many hundreds of poor children, "and others who before lived idle, unprofitable both to "themſelves and the public, now maintain themſelves, "and are alſo of ſome advantage to the community. By "the aſſiſtance and charity of many excellent and well diſpoſed perſons, his grace adds, Mr. Firmin is enabled to "bear the unavoidable loſs and charge of ſo vaſt an undertaking; and by his own forward inclination to charity, "and unwearied diligence and activity, is fitted to ſuſtain "and go through the incredible pains of it."

The French proteſtants who came over in 1680 and 1681, furniſhed new work for Mr. Firmin's zeal and charity, and for them, he, in the year 1682, ſet up a linen manufacture at Ipſwich. During the laſt twenty years of his life, he was one of the governors of Chriſt's hoſpital, in London, to which he procured many conſiderable donations. The great number of Iriſh nobility, clergy, gentry, and others, who fled into England from the perſecution and proſcription of James II. cauſed briefs and other means to be ſet on foot for their relief, in all which Mr. Firmin was ſo active, that he received a letter of thanks for his kindneſs and diligence, ſigned by the archbiſhop of Tuam and ſeven biſhops. This truly great man, great by the exerciſe of the moſt amiable virtues, died on the 20th of December, 1697, in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age, and was buried, according to his deſire, in the cloiſters of Chriſt-church hoſpital.

FIRMIUS (Marcus) a rich and powerful citizen of Seleucia, attached himſelf to Zenobia's party, and took the title of emperor, but was defeated by Aurelian, and, in 273, put to a cruel death.

FISHER (John) biſhop of Rocheſter, and a martyr to popery, was born at Beverley, in Yorkſhire, in 1459, and educated at Cambridge. In 1501, he was choſen chancellor of that univerſity, and again enjoyed that poſt in 1504. In 1502, he was appointed the lady Margaret's firſt divinity profeſſor in Cambridge; and two years after, was promoted to the biſhoprick of Rocheſter, which he would never exchange for a better, though he was offered both Lincoln and Ely, for he called his church his ſpouſe, and was uſed to ſay, he would not change his little old wife for a wealthier. He was a man of the higheſt integrity, and was diſtinguiſhed by his deep learning, a remarkable ſweetneſs of temper, and greatneſs of ſoul. He had conſiderable credit with Henry VIII. but refuſing to acknowledge his ſupremacy, and concealing the treaſonable ſpeeches Elizabeth Barton, the famous nun of Kent, he was deprived of his biſhoprick, thrown into a loathſome priſon, and ſtripped of his very clothes. When he was reduced to the loweſt degree of wretchedneſs, the pope created him a cardinal. This worthy divine, who was reſpectable for his unaffected piety and learning, had been the patron of learned men, and was remarkable for learning the Greek language of Eraſmus when he was an old man. He was beheaded on the 22d of June, 1535, when almoſt ſeventy-ſeven years of age. He wrote ſeveral Treatiſes againſt Luther, and other works, which were printed at Wurtzburgh, in 1597, in one volume folio.

FISKARD, a town of Pembrokeſhire, in South Wales, ſo called by the Engliſh from the taking of fiſh, for in Welſh the name is Abergwyn. It is governed by a mayor and bailiffs, and is ſeated on a ſteep cliff by the ſea-ſhore, having a commodious harbour for ſhips. There are ſometimes great numbers of herrings taken here. It is ſixteen miles north-eaſt-by-eaſt of St. David's, ſeven ſouth-weſt-by-weſt of Newport, and two hundred and forty-four weſt-north-weſt of London. Long. 5. 0. W. Lat. 52. 7. N.

FISMES, a town of France, in Champagne, remarkable for the councils which have been there held. It is fifteen miles from Rheims, and ſixty-ſix north-eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 45. E. Lat. 49. 20. N.

FISTELLA, a town of Africa, in the kingdom of Morocco, and province of Tedela, with a ſtrong caſtle and a good tower. It is one hundred and ſeventy-three miles north-eaſt of Morocco, and one hundred and thirty-five ſouth of Fez. Long. 4. 55. W. Lat. 32. 0. N.

FITZHERBERT (ſir Anthony) a learned lawyer, and one of the judges of the common pleas, in the reign of king Henry VIII. was the younger ſon of Ralph Fitzherbert, of Norbury, in the county of Derby, eſq. was educated at Oxford, after which he removed to the inns of court. In 1517, he was appointed one of his majeſty's ſerjeants at law; and two years after publiſhed his grand Abridgment, and ſeveral other learned pieces. He was made one of the juſtices of the court of common pleas, in 1523; and died no the 27th of May, 1538.

Fitzherbert (Thomas) a learned defender of the popiſh cauſe, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was the grandſon of the former, and was born in Staffordſhire, and ſtudied at Oxford; but being educated in the Romiſh religion, the college grew uneaſy to him, and he retired to his patrimony, where, refuſing to go to his pariſh church, he was impriſoned, about the year 1572; but being ſoon after ſet at liberty, he wrote ſeveral reaſons for the catholics not going to proteſtant churches; for which, being like to ſuffer, he lived concealed, and in 1582 went a voluntary exile into France, where he continued a zealous ſollicitor in the cauſe of Mary queen of Scots, with the king of France and duke of Guiſe, though in vain. After the death of that unhappy princeſs, and the loſs of his wife, he repaired to Madrid, and continued there till about the year 1589, and then went to Milan, and from thence to Rome, where, it is ſaid, he fell into great neceſſity, though he had left behind him a competent fortune in England. He ſpent a great part of his time in compoſing books. He afterwards entered into the ſociety of the Jeſuits, received prieſts orders, and removed into Flanders, to preſide over the miſſion there. At length he was choſen rector of the Roman college at Rome, which office he exerciſed with unblemiſhed credit for twenty-two years, and died there on the 27th of Auguſt, 1640, in the eighty-eighth year of his age. He wrote, 1. A Defence of the Catholic Cauſe. 2. A Treatiſe concerning Polity and Religion, quarto. 3. An ſit Utilitas in Scellere, vel de Infelicitate Principis Machiavellani. 4. Supplement to the Diſcuſſion of Dr. Barlow's Anſwer to the Judgment of a Catholic Engliſhman, quarto; and ſeveral other works.

FITZJAMES (James) duke of Berwick, peer and marſhal of France, one of the greateſt generals of his time, was the natural ſon of James II. king of England, and Arabella Churchill, ſiſter to the duke of Marlborough. He was born in 1671, and in his youth gave proofs of his valour and military abilities. He went over into France with the king his father, in 1689, and afterwards commanded in Ireland, and had a horſe killed under him at the battle of the Boyne, in 1690. After his return to France, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſieges of Mons, Charleroi, and Aeth, and at the battle of Steinkirk and Neuerwinde, where he was taken priſoner, and immediately exchanged for the duke of Ormond. He ſerved in Flanders as lieutenant-general, during the campaigns of 1701, 1702, and 1703, and the French king having given him letters of naturalization in December, 1703, gave him the command of the forces which he ſent to the Catholic king, who made him a grandee of Spain. He reduced many cities, and when he was recalled was made governor of Languedoc, and ſent againſt the Cevenneſe. In 1706 he was ſent again into Spain, where he took the city of Carthagena, and gained on the 25th of April, 1707, the famous battle of Almanza. He took Barcelona celona on the 12th of September, 1714, and was killed by a cannon-ball at the ſiege of Philipſburgh, on the 12th of June, 1734.

FITZWILLIAM (WILLIAM) earl of Southampton, and an eminent ſea commander in the ſixteenth century, was the ſecond ſon of ſir Thomas Fitzwilliam of Aldwarke, in the county of York, knight. In 1510 he was made one of the eſquires of the body to king Henry VIII. and in 1513 was one of the chief commanders in the fleet ſent out againſt France, when he was wounded by an arrow in attempting to deſtroy the French fleet at Breſt. Soon after he attended king Henry at the ſiege of Tournay, and on account of his bravery received the honour of knighthood. In 1520 he was vice-admiral of England, and employed in guarding the Channel, and in January 1521-2 put to ſea, with a ſtrong fleet of twenty-eight ſail, and ſoon after aſſiſted in the taking of Morlaix, in Brittany, and in the burning of ſeveral villages, with the town of Marguiſon, which was newly built and fortified. In 1523 he was made admiral, and diſpatched with a ſtrong fleet, in order to intercept John duke of Albany, regent of Scotland, whom the king of France was preparing to ſend into that kingdom, in order to invade England; but miſſing of him, he landed at Treport, in Normandy, and burnt the ſuburbs of that town, with ſeveral ſhips in the harbour, though there were but ſeven hundred Engliſh oppoſed by ſix thouſand French. He was afterwards employed in ſeveral negociations; was conſtituted knight of the garter, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter; he was at length made admiral of England, Wales, Ireland, Normandy, Gaſcony, and Acquitaine; he was in 1527 created earl of Southampton, and in 1539 was made lord privy-ſeal. He died in 1542. It is recorded of this great perſonage, that while he was admiral, there was not a ſerviceable man under him whoſe name he did not know, not a week paſſed but he paid his ſhips, and not a prize taken but his ſeamen ſhared in it as well as himſelf.

FIUM, a territory of Egypt, in Africa, on the weſt ſide of the Nile, which begins at Laon, a ſmall town on the canal of Joſeph. The ſands and deſerts of Lybia bound it on the weſt, and it is one of the moſt plentiful and populous countries in all Egypt. It contains near three hundred and ſixty large villages, and produces flax, ſeveral ſorts of fruit, and plenty of grapes. It is the grand canal of the Nile, which they call the river of Joſeph, which communicates fertility to theſe parts, and falls at length into the lake Mœris, near the city of Fium. They have fig trees in large quantities, and the ſoil is ſo good, that trees grow up in a ſhort time. It would produce good wine if the natives were permitted to cultivate the vine. A few days journey from Fium, in the deſert, there is a ſpot full of a great number of palm-trees, which bear the beſt dates in all Egypt. The Arabs, who look after them, are very careful to water them from the wells they dig in the deſert, and they are well paid for ther trouble by the plenty of dates, which enables them to pay their tribute to the baſha.

FIUM, the capital of a province of the ſame name, in Egypt. It is large and populous, and is ſuppoſed to be built out of the ruins of the ancient Arſinoe. Though the greateſt part of the houſes are ſmall, being but one ſtory high, and built of bricks dried in the ſun; yet they are generally pretty commodious. But thoſe where the officers and Turks of condition live are handſome enough. There are a great number of Chriſtian copts among the inhabitants, who have a biſhop of their own. But they have no church, and therefore are obliged to attend on divine worſhip in a village called Deſia, which is near the city. There are a great many ſigns of antiquity in this place, ſuch as capitals, cornices, columns of granite half broken, and of ſeveral other ſorts of marble; inſomuch, that there are few houſes where there is not ſome remarkable piece of antiquity.

The principal trade of Fium conſiſts in coarſe linen cloth, canvas, ſtriped linens, leather, mats which are the beſt in Egypt, not to mention grapes, figs, and other fruits, which they ſend to Cairo. The land about this city is the moſt fruitful and beſt cultivated of any in this country. In the gardens are pears, oranges, citrons, peaches, plums, and apricots. It is ſeventy miles ſouth-weſt of Cairo. Long. 31. 29. E. Lat. 29. 0. N.

FLACCUS (CAIUS VALERIUS) an ancient Latin poet, ſuppoſed to have been born at Setia, now Sezzo, a town of Campania, and flouriſhed in the reign of the emperor Veſpaſian, to whom he dedicated his poem of the Argonautic Expedition, of which he lived to compoſe no more than ſeven books, and a part of the eighth; he dying at about thirty years of age: however, John Baptiſta Pius, an Italian poet, completed the eighth book of the Argonautics, and added two more from the fourth of Apollonius, which were firſt printed at the end of Flaccus, in Aldus's edition of 1523, and have been ſubjoined to all, or at leaſt moſt of the latter editions. The beſt is that cum Notis integris variorum & Petri Burmanni, printed at Leyden, in 1724, quarto.

FLACCUS ILLYRICUS. See ILLYRICUS.

FLAMBOROUGH HEAD, a cape or promontory of Yorkſhire, ſeated on the German ocean, five miles eaſt of Burlington. Long. 11. 0. E. Lat. 54. 15. N.

FLAMINES, in Roman antiquity, were perſons originally appointed by Numa Pompilius to diſcharge thoſe religious offices, which he imagined properly belonged to the kings. At firſt there were but three of theſe; the Flamen Dialis, Martialis, and Quirinalis. The Flamen Dialis was ſacred to Jupiter, and was a perſon of high authority in the commonwealth; but was obliged to obſerve ſome ſuperſtitious reſtraints; though honoured with ſeveral eminent privileges above other officers; even his wife had the name of Flaminica, and was intruſted with ſome ceremonies peculiar to her place. The other two, who had leſs, though very great authority, were ordained to inſpect the rites of Mars and Romulus. All three were choſen out of the nobility, and their election confirmed by the high prieſt.

Theſe were afterwards increaſed to fifteen, when three of them were choſen from among the ſenators, and called Flamines Majores; and the other twelve choſen from the Plebeians, and ſtyled Flamines Minores.

FLAMINIO, or FLAMINIUS (MARC ANTHONY) was born at Imola, in Italy, and was the ſon of John Antonio Flaminio, a learned writer, who died at Bologna in 1536. He attached himſelf to Alexander Farneſe, who loaded him with favours, and nominated him ſecretary to the council of Trent; but Flaminio refuſed that commiſſion, on account of his ill ſtate of health. He paraphraſed thirty of the Pſalms in Latin verſe, and alſo wrote Notes on the Pſalms; and ſome letters and poems which are eſteemed. He died at Rome, on the 21ſt of March, 1550, aged fifty-ſeven.

FLAMINIUS (CAIUS) conſul of Rome, was killed at the battle of Thraſimena, with a great number of the ſenators, by the troops of Hannibal, in the two hundred and ſeventeenth year before the Chriſtian æra.

FLAMINIUS (TITUS QUINTUS) on account of his merit obtained the conſulſhip before the thirtieth year of his age, in the one hundred and ninety-eighth year before the Chriſtian æra, and was general of the Roman troops againſt Philip, king of Macedon. He conquered that prince, reſcued Greece out of his hands, and cauſed to be publiſhed by the public crier, at the Nemæan games, that the Grecians were reſtored to the enjoyment of their liberties. This news was received with tranſports of joy, and the higheſt honours were paid to their generous deliverer. Flaminius was afterwards ſent ambaſſador to Pruſias, king of Bithynia, with whom Hannibal, who was worn out with years, had found protection. Flaminius could not bear that the brave Carthaginian ſhould be ſuffered to live; and though the king uſed many entreaties, he would take no denial; on which Hannibal put an end to his life, to prevent his falling into his hands. This cruel ſtep is the moſt exceptionable paſſage in the life of this great Roman.

FLAMSTEED (JOHN) one of the moſt eminent aſtronomers that this or any other country has produced, was born at Denby, in Derbyſhire, on the 19th of Auguſt, 1646. He was educated at the free-ſchool at Derby, and at fourteen years of age was taken from thence when at the head of that ſchool, on account of a ſevere fit of ſickneſs, and within a month or two afterwards, had John de Sacroboſco's book De Sphæra put into his hands, which occaſioned his ſtudying aſtronomy, in which he found great pleaſure, and having obtained Mr. Street's Caroline Tables, he attempted to calculate the place of the planets by them. Having by theſe tables calculated an eclipſe of the ſun, which was to happen on the 22d of June, 1666, he imparted it to a relation of his, who ſhewed it to Mr. Emanuel Halton, of Wingfield-manor, who coming ſoon after to ſee him, and finding him unacquainted with the aſtronomical performances of others, ſent him Riccioli's Almageſt, and Kepler's Rudolphine Tables, with ſome other mathematical books, and being a good algebraiſt, endeavoured to draw him into the ſtudy of algebra, by propoſing little problems to him. He now proſecuted his ſtudy in aſtronomy with great vigour, and in 1669 calculated ſome remarkable eclipſes of the fixed ſtars by the moon, which would happen in 1670, calculated them from the Caroline tables, and directed them to the lord viſcount Brouncker, preſident of the Royal Society; and this piece being read before that ſociety, procured him letters of thanks from Mr. Oldenburgh, their ſecretary, and Mr. John Collins. He now began to have accounts ſent him of all the mathematical books publiſhed either at home or abroad, and at length his father taking notice of his correſpondence with ſeveral ingenious gentlemen whom he had never ſeen, adviſed him to take a journey to London, that he might become perſonally acquainted with them. He gladly embraced this offer, and viſited Mr. Oldenburgh and Mr. Collins, who introduced him to Mr. Jonas Moor, who preſented him Mr. Townley's micrometer; and at Cambridge he viſited Dr. Iſaac Barrow, Mr. Iſaac Newton, and

Dr. Wroe, and entered himſelf a ſtudent of Jeſus college. On the 4th of March, 1674-5, he was made the king's aſtronomer, at the recommendation of Sir Jonas Moore, with a ſalary of one hundred pounds per annum, and having for ſome time before reſolved to take orders, he was ordained the Eaſter following, at Ely-houſe, by biſhop Gunning. On the 10th of Auguſt, 1675, the foundation of the Royal Obſervatory at Greenwich was laid, and during the building of it, Mr. Flamſteed lodged at Greenwich, and his quadrant and teleſcopes being kept in the queen's-houſe there, he obſerved with them the appulſes of the moon and planets to the fixed ſtars. In 1681 his Doctrine of the Sphere was publiſhed, in a poſthumous work of Sir Jonas Moore's, intitled A new Syſtem of the Mathematics; and about the year 1684 he was preſented to the living of Burſtow, near Blechingly, in Surry, which he enjoyed till his death, which happened on the 31ſt of December, 1719. His Hiſtoria Cœleſtis Britannica was publiſhed at London, in three volumes, folio. Dr. John Keil tells us that Mr. Flamſteed, with indefatigable pains, for more than forty years, watched the motions of the ſtars, and has given us innumerable obſervations on the ſun, moon, and planets, which he made with very large inſtruments, exactly divided by moſt exquiſite art, and fitted with teleſcopical ſights, whence we are to rely more on the obſervations he has made, than on thoſe that went before him, who made their obſervations with the naked eye, without the aſſiſtance of teleſcopes. He alſo compoſed the Britiſh Catalogue of the fixed Stars, containing about three thouſand ſtars, which is twice the number that are in Hevelius's Catalogue, to each of which he has annexed its longitude, latitude, right aſcenſion, and diſtance from the pole, together with the variation of right aſcenſion and declination, while the longitude increaſes a degree.

FLANDERS, a province of the Low Countries, being the largeſt county or earldom in Europe; it being an hundred miles in length from eaſt to weſt, and ſeventy-five in breadth from north to ſouth. It is watered by two rivers, the Scheld and the Lys, or Leye, which not only render the country fruitful, but ſerve for the more ready tranſportation of merchandize. When we conſider the number of cities in this county, it is eaſy to judge that the ancient earls of Flanders muſt needs be very opulent. They reckon thirty walled cities, a great number of towns which have the privilege of cities, forty-eight abbeys, one thouſand one hundred and fifty-four villages, five viſcounties, and three ſmall principalities. All theſe towns and villages are ſo near each other, that when the Spaniards firſt entered this country, it ſeemed to them to be but one city, compoſed of a great number of ſtreets.

Flanders has been variouſly divided formerly, but it is now diſtinguiſhed by Dutch Flanders, Auſtrian Flanders, and French Flanders. French Flanders is bounded by Artois, and traverſed by the river Lys. It begins near this river, and extends towards the ſouth as far as the frontiers of Hainault. The principal places are Liſle, Doway, and Dunkirk. The principal places in Auſtrian Flanders lie partly on the river Lys, and partly near the North Sea: theſe are Ghent, Bruges, Oſtend, Nieuport, Dixmuyden, Ypres, Courtray, Menin, Tournay, Oudenarde, and Dendermonde. Dutch Flanders forms a long diſtrict to the weſt of the river Scheld, between Bruges and Antwerp. The Dutch conquered this country before the treaty of Weſtphalia, and have preſerved it hitherto as a bulwark or barrier to their republic. The principal places are Sluys, Sas van Ghent, Hulſt, and ſeveral ſmall fortified places and ſtrong forts.

Flanders is quite a flat level country, having no hill or riſing ground in it, except in French Flanders, and is watered with innumerable canals and rivulets. The air is groſs, on account of its vicinity to the ſea, and its numerous ſtanding waters. The north wind is very frequent, the winters are long, and the ſummers rainy, and ſometimes extremely hot, but then the heats do not laſt long. This country produces all things neceſſary for life in great abundance, as wheat, rye, barley, oats, Turky corn, hay, clover, flax, and all ſorts of pulſe. There are no vines, for which reaſon their common drink is ale or beer.

In thoſe places where they have no wood, they burn turf, which they find four or five feet under ground, and is a ſort of rotten wood, two feet in thickneſs. Sometimes they meet with large trees, which renders it probable that this country was formerly a foreſt, which the ſea has overflowed and covered with mud. But it is hard to conceive how trees could grow in ſuch low ground, ſo ſubject to be overflowed with ſalt water, and conſequently fit for nothing but to produce ruſhes.

This country is very fit for the feeding of cattle, for which reaſon they bring hither thoſe that are lean from the neighbouring provinces, and here they become fat in a ſhort time. The cows give a prodigious quantity of milk, and in ſome places the ſheep have lambs three times in a year. The horſes are large, with big heads, and are not very proper for ſome ſorts of buſineſs. There is no ſtone quarries, nor ſlate, in all the country, for which reaſon the ancient houſes were built of wood; this rendered the towns very liable to fires, which obliged the government to forbid the continuance of that practice in the towns, and to order that they ſhould henceforward be conſtructed with ſtone and bricks.

The Flemiſh are almoſt all of a large ſize, and of a heavy diſpoſition. However, they are very laborious and diligent in cultivating the ground, in their manufactures, and trade. They are great lovers of liberty, and are prevailed upon more eaſily by fair means than by force. They are ſoon angry, and as ſoon pleaſed; and comfort themſelves under all misfortunes with this conſideration, that it might have been worſe. They do not want ſenſe, but their imagination is not quick and lively. They are very fond of tipling, and tranſact buſineſs over a glaſs. But they are apt to fight with knives when they are in liquor. Their religion is the Roman Catholic, to which they are greatly bigotted. They have courage, but yet are not fond of war. The women are fair and handſome, but their beauty ſoon fades. The women manage all the houſhold affairs, and enjoy diverſions equally with the men; for theſe are not addicted to jealouſy.

FLATMAN (Thomas) an Engliſh poet, was born in London, about the year 1633. He completed his ſtudies at New college, Oxford, whence he removed to the Inner Temple, London, where he became a barriſter at law; but neglecting that profeſſion, and having a turn for the fine arts, he gave a looſe to his inclinations, and became conſiderable both as a poet and a painter in miniature. One of his poems was wrote on the death of the earl of Offory, and being read by the duke of Ormond, that nobleman's father, his grace was ſo pleaſed with it, that he ſent Mr. Flatman a mourning ring, in which was a diamond worth one hundred pounds. The third edition of his Poems and Songs was publiſhed by himſelf in 1682, with additions and amendments. He afterwards publiſhed two Pindaric Odes, one on the death of prince Rupert, the other on the death of king Charles II. He alſo wrote in proſe, Don Juan Lamberto, or a comical Hiſtory of the late Times, and died at his houſe in Fleet ſtreet, on the 8th of November, 1688.

FLAVEL (John) an eminent nonconformiſt miniſter, was educated at Univerſity college, in Oxford, and became miniſter of Deptford, and afterwards of Dartmouth, in Devonſhire, where he reſided the greateſt part of his life, and was admired for his preaching. Though he was generally reſpected at Dartmouth, yet, in 1685, ſeveral of the aldermen of that town, attended by the rabble, carried about a ridiculous effigy of him, to which were affixed the Bill of Excluſion and the Covenant. Upon this occaſion, he thought it prudent to withdraw from the town, not knowing what treatment he might meet with from a riotous mob, headed by magiſtrates who were themſelves among the loweſt of mankind. Part of his Diary, printed with his Remains, muſt give the reader a high idea of his piety. He died on the 26th of June, 1691, aged ſixty-one; and after his death, his works, which conſiſted of many pieces of practical divinity, were printed in two volumes folio. Among theſe, the moſt famous are his Navigation ſpiritualized, or a new Compaſs for Seamen, conſiſting of thirty-two points of pleaſant obſervations and ſerious reflections, of which there have been ſeveral editions in octavo, and his Huſbandry ſpiritualized, &c. with occaſional meditations, upon beaſts, birds, trees, flowers, rivers, and ſeveral other objects, of which there have been alſo many editions in octavo.

FLAVIAN (St.) patriarch of Antioch, and one of the moſt famous biſhops of the fourth century, was raiſed to the ſee of Antioch in the life of Paulinus, and his election introduced a ſchiſm in that church, in 381. He pacified the emperor Theodoſius, who was exaſperated againſt the inhabitants of Antioch for throwing down and treating with indignity the ſtatue of the empreſs Placilla. The oration he pronounced on this occaſion, in the preſence of Theodoſius, is a maſterpiece of eloquence. Flavian died in 404.

FLAVIAN, patriarch of Conſtantinople, ſucceeded Proclus, in 447. In his time, Eutyches began to ſpread his opinions, which Flavian cauſed to be condemned in a council held at Conſtantinople; but he himſelf was condemned and depoſed, in 449, in a ſynod held at Epheſus by Dioſcorus of Alexandria. Flavian died three days after of the blows he received in that ſynod.

FLAVIGNI (Valerian de) a learned doctor of divinity, of the houſe and ſociety of the Sorbonne, was made canon of Rheims, and, in 1631, Hebrew profeſſor at the Royal College. He laboured at the Polyglot Bible of Monſ. Le Jay, wrote againſt Abraham Echellenſis, and ſome other works, and died in the Sorbonne, on the 29th of April, 1674.

FLAVIGNY, a town of France, in Burgundy, with a famous abbey of Benedictine monks. It was formerly very large; but in the civil wars a great part of it was demoliſhed to render the fortifications more regular. It is now about eight hundred paces long, and fifty broad, and two thouſand three hundred in circumference, and has only three churches. It is ſeated on a mountain, thirteen miles eaſt of Semur, thirty north-weſt of Dijon, and one hundred and twenty eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 37. E. Lat. 47. 31. N.

FLAVITAS, FRAVITAS, or FLAVIENI, a prieſt in the fifth century. It is ſaid, that after the death of Achatius, patriarch of Conſtantinople, which happened in 489, the emperor Zeno, cauſing a piece of blank paper to be concealed under the altar, prayed that the Lord would cauſe an angel to write upon it the name of him whom he deſigned for the patriarchate, when Flavitas corrupting the eunuch who had the cuſtody of the church, wrote his name on the paper, and by this means obtained the ſee of Conſtantinople. The cheat was afterwards diſcovered, but his death, which happened almoſt at the ſame time, prevented his being puniſhed.

FLECHE, a town of France, in the extremity of Anjou, towards le Maine, remarkable for its jeſuits college. It is ſeated on the river Loire, twenty five miles north-eaſt of Angers, twenty-five ſouth-eaſt of Mans, and one hundred and forty-two ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 4. E. Lat. 47. 34. N.

FLECHIER (ESPRIT) biſhop of Niſmes, and the moſt famous preacher of his time for panegyrics and funeral orations, was born at Pernes, in Avignon, on the 1ſt of June, 1632. He publiſhed, beſides his Panegyrics and Funeral Orations, 1. An Hiſtory of the Emperor Theodoſius, that of Cardinal Ximenes, and that of Cardinal Commendon. This laſt is a tranſlation from the Latin of Antonio Maria Gratiani. 2. Several Sermons. 3. Miſcellaneous Works. 4. Letters, &c. He died on the 16th of February, 1710, aged ſeventy-eight.

FLECKNOE (RICHARD) an Engliſh poet and dramatic writer in the reign of Charles II. but moſt remarkable for his being laſhed by Mr. Dryden, in his ſatire named Mac Flecknoe. He is ſaid to have been originally a Jeſuit, and by that means to have had connections with many perſons of high diſtinction, who were of the Romiſh perſuaſion, in London. However, when the Revolution was completed, Mr. Dryden having ſome time before turned papiſt, became diſqualified for holding his poſt of poet laureat, it was therefore taken from him and conferred on Flecknoe; and this, together with Mr. Dryden's having before an averſion to him, induced him to write the above ſatire. Flecknoe wrote four plays, but could never get more than one of them acted, and that was damned the firſt night. This was called Love's Dominion, but he afterwards altered the title to Love's Kingdom. He alſo wrote the following dramatic pieces; Damoiſelles a-la-mode; Ermina, or the Chaſte Lady; and the Marriage of Oceanus and Britannia. His other works are the Diarium, or Journal, in burleſque verſe, and a number of epigrams and enigmas.

FLEETWOOD (WILLIAM) an eminent lawyer and recorder of the city of London, in the reign of queen of Elizabeth, was educated at Oxford, and afterwards ſtudied in the Middle Temple, London. In 1569, he became recorder of London; in 1580, was made ſerjeant at law, and, in 1592, one of the queen's ſerjeants. He made a great figure in his profeſſion, being equally celebrated for his eloquence as an advocate, and for his judgment as a lawyer. He wrote, 1. Annalium tam Regum Edwardi V. Richardi III. & Henrici VII. quam Henrici VIII. 2. A Table of the Reports of Edmund Plowden. 3. The Office of a Juſtice of Peace. He died about the year 1593.

FLEETWOOD (WILLIAM) a very learned Engliſh divine and biſhop of Ely, was born in the Tower of London, on New-year's day, 1656, and educated at Eton ſchool, from whence he removed to King's college, Cambridge; about the time of the Revolution he entered into holy orders, and was ſoon made chaplain to king William and queen Mary, and was afterwards made fellow of Eton college, rector of St. Auſtin's, London, and lecturer of St. Dunſtan's, Fleet-ſtreet. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf during king William's reign, by his Inſcriptionum antiquarum Syllogæ, by ſeveral ſermons preached on public occaſions, and by his Eſſay upon Miracles. Juſt before that prince's death, he was nominated to a canonry of Windſor; was nominated by queen Anne to the biſhoprick of St. Aſaph, not only without his requeſt, but even without his knowledge. Being a friend to the miniſtry in the beginning of queen Anne's reign, he diſapproved of the meaſures purſued by their ſucceſſors; and theſe ſentiments he expreſſed ſo openly, in a preface prefixed to ſome ſermons which he publiſhed, that an order was iſſued by the houſe of commons for burning that preface by the hands of the hangman. This ſtigma, however, far from diminiſhing, ſerved rather to encreaſe his fame, and he continued accordingly to be the favourite of the public; ſo that at the acceſſion of the Hanover family to the throne, in 1714, he was tranſlated to the biſhoprick of Ely. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his candour, his unblemiſhed life, his obliging and eaſy deportment, his uncommon abilities, and his love of liberty. Beſides the works already mentioned, he publiſhed, 1. The reaſonable Communicant. 2. Sixteen practical Diſcourſes upon the relative Duties. 3. Chronicon precioſum. 4. The Judgment of the Church of England in the Caſe of Lay Baptiſm and of Diſſenter's Baptiſm; and other works. He died on the 4th of Auguſt, 1723, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age, and was interred in the cathedral church of Ely, where a monument was erected to his memory

FLEMMING, or FLEMMYNGE, (RICHARD) biſhop of Lincoln, in the 15th century, and founder of Lincoln college, Oxford, was born at Croſton, in the county of York, and was educated in the univerſity of Oxford. In 1406, he was preſented to a prebend in the cathedral of York, and ſoon after taking his maſter of arts degree, he warmly eſpouſed Wickliffe's opinions, and by his arguments convinced great numbers of the firſt quality, who loudly complained againſt the corruptions of the church of Rome; but being either awed or bribed into ſilence, he at length became as violent an oppoſer of Wickliffe's doctrines; ſo that the college he afterwards founded at Oxford, in 1427, was intended as a ſeminary for writers and diſputers againſt that learned man's opinions. He was promoted to the biſhoprick of Lincoln by king Henry V. and, in 1424, was ſent to the council of Conſtance or Siena, and at his return, he cauſed Wickliffe's bones to be taken up and burnt. He was afterwards tranſlated by the pope's abſolute authority, to the archbiſhoprick of York; but king Henry V. who by his late conqueſt of France, was grown ſo powerful as to have no cauſe to dread the pope's indignation, oppoſed his tranſlation, as did alſo the dean and chapter of that church, ſo that he was forced to return to Lincoln. He died at his palace at Sleford, on the 25th of January, 1430-31, and was buried in Lincoln cathedral under a raiſed tomb, with a long rhyming epitaph.

FLENSBURG, a port-town of Sleſwick, ſubject to Denmark, ſeated on a gulph of the ſame name with a good citadel. It is fifteen miles ſouth of Apenrade, and fifteen north weſt of Sleſwick. Long. 9. 45. E. Lat. 55. 20. N.

FLETCHER (RICHARD) biſhop of London, was born in Kent, and educated at Cambridge. After ſeveral preferments in the church, he was, in 1580, promoted to the biſhoprick of Briſtol. In January, 1592-3, he was tranſlated to the ſee of Worceſter; and, in 1594, was made biſhop of London. Queen Elizabeth was ſo extremely offended at his marrying a very handſome woman when he was very old, that ſhe ſuſpended him from the exerciſe of his epiſcopal functions, and it was ſome months before he was reſtored. He died ſuddenly at his houſe in London, on the 15th of June, 1596.

FLETCHER (GYLES) LL. D. brother to the former, received his education at Eton ſchool, and afterwards was elected a ſcholar of King's college, Cambridge, where he took the degrees in arts, and alſo that of doctor of laws. He was employed by queen Elizabeth as her commiſſioner into Scotland, Germany, and the Low Countries, and, in 1558, was ſent ambaſſador to Muſcovy, to re-eſtabliſh the decayed trade of the Ruſſia Company; and upon his return from thence he was appointed ſecretary to the city of London, and one of the maſters in chancery. From the obſervations he made during his embaſſy, he drew up a curious account of the Ruſſian commonwealth, and alſo publiſhed An Account of the Learned in Britain, who have founded colleges at Cambridge. He died in February, 1610.

FLETCHER (JOHN) an excellent dramatic poet, was the ſon of Dr. Richard Fletcher, biſhop of London. He was born in Northamptonſhire, in 1576, and was educated at Cambridge. He wrote plays jointly with Mr. Beaumont, but what ſhare each bore in forming the plots, writing the ſcenes, &c. is not known. We are told, he aſſiſted Ben Jonſon in writing a comedy called the Widow. After Beaumont's death, he conſulted Mr. James Shirley in the plot of ſeveral of his plays, but which theſe were, it is extremely difficult, if not impoſſible to determine. His Faithful Shepherdeſs, which, it is certain, he wrote without the aſſiſtance of his colleague, is greatly commended by the poets, though its reception on the ſtage fell greatly ſhort of its merit. Fuller tells us, that Mr. Fletcher meeting once at a tavern, to contrive a rude draught of a tragedy, undertook to kill the king, when his words being overheard, he was ſeized and charged with high treaſon; but the miſtake being ſoon diſcovered, it occaſioned a great deal of mirth. He died of the plague, at London, in 1625, aged aged forty-nine, and was interred at St. Mary Overy's, in Southwark. See BEAUMONT.

FLEURI (CLAUDE) a famous hiſtorian, and one of the moſt judicious critics of his time, was born at Paris, on the 6th of December, 1640. He diſcovered in his youth a great inclination for polite literature, and civil law. After frequenting the bar for nine years, he embraced the ſtate of an eccleſiaſtic; in 1672, he was preceptor to the princes of Conti, and, in 1680, to the prince de Vermandois. Four years after, the king gave him the abbey of Loc-Dieu, and in 1689, made him ſub-preceptor to the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry. He was received into the French Academy, in 1696, had the priory of Argenteuil, in 1706, and, in 1716, was choſen confeſſor to Lewis XV. His principal works are, 1. An eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, in twenty volumes, the laſt of which ends with the year 1414. 2. The Manners of the Iſraelites and Chriſtians. 3. Inſtitutions of eccleſiaſtical Law. 4. An hiſtorical Catechiſm. 5. On the Choice and Method of Study. 6. The Duties of Maſters and Servants, &c. Thoſe works are well wrote in French. He died on the 14th of July, 1723, aged eighty-two.

FLEURI (ANDREW HERCULES DE) biſhop of Frejus, preceptor to Lewis XV. cardinal, miniſter of ſtate, one of the forty of the French Academy, and an honorary member of the Academy of Sciences, and of that of Inſcriptions, was born at Lodeve, on the 22d of June, 1653. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf during his miniſtry by his probity, his zeal for the happineſs of his country, and his pacific diſpoſition, and died at Iſly near Paris, on the 29th of January, 1743, at near ninety years of age.

FLEURS, a village of the Low Countries, in Namur, remarkable for a battle fought there between the French and Dutch, in 1690, when the former gained the victory. It is fifteen miles eaſt of Namur. Long. 4. 26. E. Lat. 50. 41. N.

FLINT, the capital town of the county of Flint, in North Wales, with a market on Saturdays. It has four fairs for cattle, on February 14, June 24, Auguſt 10, and November 30. It is commodiouſly ſeated on the river Dee, and is but ſmall, though the county town. It ſends one burgeſs to parliament, and was chiefly remarkable for its caſtle now in ruins. It is ten miles north-weſt of Cheſter, fourteen eaſt-by-ſouth of St. Aſaph, and one hundred and ninety-five north-weſt of London. Long. 3. 12. W. Lat. 53. 20. N.

FLINTSHIRE, a county of Wales, bounded on the eaſt by Cheſhire, on the ſouth-eaſt by Shropſhire, on the ſouth and weſt by Denbighſhire, and on the north by the Iriſh Sea, and the mouth of the river Dee. It is the leaſt county in Wales; for though it is twenty-five miles in length, it is but ten in breadth where broadeſt. However, there is a ſmall part detached from it which lies between Cheſhire and Shropſhire, which is ten miles over, ſo that if it be added to the reſt, it is thirty-five miles in length. It contains five hundreds, twenty-eight pariſhes, one city, one borough, three market-towns, four caſtles, two parks, about eight thouſand houſe, and thirty-two thouſand inhabitants. The air is healthful, but cold, though it is not ſo mountainous as ſome other parts of Wales. The valleys are numerous and fruitful in corn and paſture land, feeding a great number of cattle, for which they have plenty of butter and cheeſe. They have not much wood for fuel, but that is ſupplied by pit-coal. The rivers are the Wheeler, the Sevion, and the Alen. This county ſends two members to parliament, and one for the town of Flint. The chief places are St. Aſaph, Flint, Holywell, and Caerwis.

FLIX, a town and caſtle of Catalonia, in Spain, which was well fortified, but the fortifications have been demoliſhed. It is ſeated within an elbow of the Ebro, and is ſurrounded on three ſides by that river. It is twenty-five miles north of Tortoſa, and twenty ſouth-eaſt of Lerida. Long. 0. 15. E. Lat. 41. 21. N.

FLORA, the goddeſs of flowers, was, according to the poets, the wife of Zephyrus, and was firſt honoured amongſt the Sabines; but if we believe Lanctantius, ſhe was a lady of pleaſure, who, having gained large ſums of money by proſtituting herſelf, made the Roman people her heir, on condition that certain games, called Floralia, might be annually celebrated on her birth-day. Her image in the temple of Caſtor and Pollux was dreſt in a cloſe habit, and ſhe held in her hands the flowers of peas and beans; but the modern poets and painters have been more laviſh in ſetting off her charms, conſidering that no parts of nature offered ſuch innocent and exquiſite entertainment to the ſight and ſmell, as the beautiful variety which adorns, and the odour which embalms the floral creation.

FLORALIA, in Roman antiquity, a feſtival in honour of Flora, obſerved on the 29th of April, or the 5th of the calends of May, at which time games were celebrated in the Campus Martius, which were proclaimed by ſound of trumpet. Theſe games were performed in a very ſcandalous manner, and with the greateſt debauchery and diſſoluteneſs. No women appeared at them but the moſt immodeſt part of the ſex, ſo that when Cato, during his cenſorſhip, came to behold them, they through ſhame ſuſpended the ceremonies till he thought fit to withdraw; ſuch an influence had the virtue of one man over a corrupt and diſſolute multitude.

FLORE (FRANCIS) an excellent painter, born at Anvers, in the ſixteenth century, acquired ſuch reputation that he was called the Raphael of Flanders. He died in 1570, aged fifty.

FLORIANUS (MARCUS ANNIUS) brother on the mother's ſide to the emperor Tacitus, was declared emperor in 276, but Probus, his competitor, cauſed his veins to be opened, and he died three months after he took the title of emperor.

FLORENCE, a city of Italy, and capital of Tuſcany, where the dukes formerly reſided. It is ſeated on the river Arno, as in the middle of an amphitheatre, being ſurrounded on all ſides but one with hills, which riſe inſenſibly and at laſt unite with the high mountains called the Appenines, and towards Piſa there is a vaſt plain forty miles in length. This vaſt baſon is ſo full of villages and pleaſure-houſes, that they ſeem to be a continuation of the ſuburbs of this city. One may venture to affirm, that this rich and delightful valley is more full of inhabitants than any other place in the world.

The river Arno divides the city into two parts, which communicate with each other by bridges, two of which, namely, the new and old, perfectly anſwer to the grandeur and magnificence of the city. The circumference of this city about the walls is near ſix Engliſh ſtatute miles, and contains nine thouſand houſes, in which are ſeventy thouſand ſouls. There are twenty-two hoſpitals, eighty-nine convents, one hundred and fifty-two churches, eighteen halls for merchants, ſeventy-two courts of juſtice, ſix obeliſks, two pyramids, four bridges, ſeven fountains, ſeventeen ſquares, and one hundred and ſixty public ſtatues. A great part of the houſes are built uniformly of ſtone, and many of them are uncommonly large and beautiful. Some pretend, that the palaces of Florence are the beſt built of any in Italy.

The grand dukes formerly reſided at Il Palazzo Vecchio, which faces a grand market called Piazzo del Gran Duca. The object which firſt ſtrikes the eye in this palace is a tower projecting out of the building, which in one part is broader than at the baſis, but ſoon returns to its proper ſymmetry. The top of it is ſupported by four pillars. At the entrance of this palace, is a marble ſtatue of Hercules killing Cacus, oppoſite to which is David triumphing over Goliah, by Michael Angelo. There are alſo two of the ancient Dii Termini. In the middle of the court is a porphyry fountain, with a boy graſping a fiſh in bronze, and another ſtatue of Hercules killing Cacus. There is a hall in the palace one hundred and ſeventy-two feet in length, and ſeventy-four in breadth, but it is dark, the windows being ſmall. On the cieling and walls are the moſt remarkable atchievements of the republic of Florence painted in freſco; beſides which there are ſeveral marble ſtatues of perſons of the houſe of Medicis, as alſo an admirable ſtatue of Victory and the labours of Hercules in ſix ſeveral groupes.

In the wardrobe there are the famous Florentine Pandects, the Goſpel of St. John in manuſcript, twelve large cloſets full of plate, part of which is finely chaſed and ſet with jewels, and four ſilver bed-poſts. Here are alſo abundance of Turkiſh arms and bridles, beſet with jewels, and the crown of gold of Coſmo the firſt duke. But the moſt valuable thing is the altar-cloth, covered with pearls, rubies, and other precious ſtones. In the middle is Coſmo II. in embоſſed work of gems and enamel. His robe is richly ſet with diamonds, and his crown is entirely covered with them. Between the Palazo Vecchio, under the Loggia, are ſeveral other curious ſtatues; among which, the group repreſenting a young Roman carrying off a Sabine virgin, cannot be ſufficiently admired. In the ſquare is a grand fountain, adorned with ſhells, cornucopias, and ſea-gods of braſs, bigger than life, in the center of which is Neptune, ten ells high, and drawn in a large ſhell, repreſenting a triumphal car. Near this is an equeſtrian ſtatue of braſs of Coſmo I.

In this ſquare is the Fabrica degli Ufficii, where the principal magiſtrates live together on the ground floor, for the more ſpeedy diſpatch of buſineſs. The ſecond ſtory was, in the time of the late duke, filled with artificers, employed in the wardrobe and gallery. The uppermoſt ſtory contains apartments or cabinets of curioſities, particularly the duke's gallery. This is two hundred and twelve paces long, and ſeventy broad, and in the antichamber leading to it is a great number of antique inſcriptions, idols, lamps, and ſtatues. The cieling of the gallery is covered with paintings, repreſenting the invention of arts and ſciences, and the moſt eminent perſonages of the city of Florence. The walls on each ſide are hung with portraits of the illuſtrious perſons of the houſe of Medicis. There are alſo ſmall portraits of generals, miniſters of ſtate, princes, and learned men; among which laſt are Newton and Leibinitz. Beſides theſe in the wings, there are ſeventy-two ſtatues and one hundred and two buſtos of men and women, a particular deſcription of which would take more room than we have to ſpare; and therefore we ſhall only ſay with Mr. Addiſon, that in this gallery is the nobleſt collection of curioſities in the whole world. The large diamond which uſed to be ſhewn here, weighs an hundred and forty carrats and a half. The whole collection of the antique medals amount to fourteen thouſand, and the modern to eight thouſand.

The late duke's uſual place of reſidence was the Palazzo de Pitti, ſo called from the family to which it firſt belonged. The front conſiſts of ruſtic work, and unhewn ſtones, which has no beautiful appearance; but towards the court and gardens the architecture is tolerably elegant, particularly the diſpoſition of the Doric pillars in the firſt ſtory, the Ionic in the middle, and the Corinthian in the third. In this palace there are a great number of paintings and ſtatues by the moſt celebrated maſters. From this to thePalazzo Vecchio there is a paſſage through a gallery ſix hundred paces in length, ſix in breadth, and eight in height, and on the walls on both ſides are fine paintings. The garden belonging to the palace de Petti is three miles in circumference, in which is a large fountain, with a Neptune in the middle, bigger than the life, in a ſhell of Egyptian granate, thirty-ſix feet in circumference. Three other ſtatues of the Ganges, Nile, and Euphrates, are repreſented in a ſitting poſture, pouring water into the ſhell. The grottos are falling to decay, but the alleys and covered walks of evergreens are enchanting. Eſpaliers of orange, jeſſamine, lemon, and pomegranate trees every where exhilerate the ſenſes. There are private water-works for wetting people by way of ſport, which cannot be very agreeable.

The chief church is the cathedral, called St. Maria del Fiore, which is about half as big as St. Paul's at London, being in length four hundred and eighty feet, and in height to the top of the croſs three hundred and eighty. The cupola is an excellent piece of workmanſhip, being octangular, and each ſide twenty-five feet in breadth. The upper paintings repreſent heaven, and the lower parts hell; but many of the figures are in indecent poſtures. The pillars which ſupport it are intermixed with the ſtatues of the twelve apoſtles in white marble.

Near the church is a ſquare tower built with red, white, and black marble, on which are erected a great number of fine ſtatues. The height of this is two hundred and eighty-eight feet. St. John's church has three brazen gates, with ſcripture hiſtories thereon in baſſo relievo, which Michael Angelo ſaid were worthy to be the gates of paradiſe. Over the doors there are ſtatues of bronze, and within the church fifteen large pillars of oriental granate. The cieling is of moſaic work, repreſenting eminent perſons. This church is called Il Battiſterio, becauſe all the children in this city are baptized here. The pavement of the church is inlaid; and one ſide repreſents the ſun and the twelve ſigns of the zodiac.

Near Florence there is a quarry of white marble, which ſplits like ſlate; in which, when poliſhed, there appears trees, landſcapes, and ruins, of a yellow or brown colour. Beſides which, there are ſeveral curious petrifications found at different places. Florence is forty-eight miles ſouth of Bologna, ſeventy-two ſouth-eaſt of Parma, ſeventy ſouth-by-eaſt of Modena, one hundred and ſixteen ſouth-by-weſt of Venice, and one hundred and twenty-five north-weſt of Rome. Long. 12. 24. E. Lat. 43. 34. N.

FLORENNES, a town of the Low Countries, in the county of Namur, ſubject to the biſhop of Liege. It is five miles north-eaſt of Philippeville, thirteen ſouth-weſt of Namur, and ſeven eaſt of Walcourt. Long. 4. 29. E. Lat. 50. 20. N.

FLORENTINO, one of the three provinces of Tuſcany in Italy, is greater than the Piſan and the Sienneſe together. Theſe bound it toward the ſouth. It has the republic of Lucca and the ſtate of Modena on the eaſt, Mount Appennine on the weſt, which divides it from the Bologneſe and Romania, and on the eaſt the duchy of Urbino, the county of Citta di Caſtello, and Perugino. The river Arno riſes in this province, and runs almoſt through the middle of it, from eaſt to weſt, and receives a great number of ſmall rivers that water the country, and render it fruitful. Florence is the capital city, beſides which there are Empoli, Piſtoia, Prato, Fieſcola, Borgo, San Sepolchro, and Cortona, which are all biſhop's ſees.

FLORES, an iſland of the Atlantic Ocean, one of the Azores, and ſubject to the Portugueſe. It is ſo called from the plenty of flowers it produces. Long. 32. 12. W. Lat. 39. 25. N.

FLORIDA, a very extenſive country to the ſouth of Georgia, extending from that province to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic Ocean to the river Miſſiſippi, which is about ſix hundred miles. It is now divided by theEngliſh into the two provinces, Eaſt and Weſt Florida. It being ceded by the Spaniards to the crown of Great Britain, by the treaty of Fontainbleau, in 1762.

Eaſt Florida is bounded on the north by St. John's River, which ſeparates it from Georgia; on the eaſtward and ſouthward by the Gulf of Florida; on the ſouthweſt, by Weſt Florida; and on the northweſt by the country of the Creek Indians. The back part of this country contains good land, capable of being improved to great advantage, and accordingly a great number of people have ſince the late peace ſettled there. The metropolis of the province is St. Auguſtine.

Weſt Florida is bounded on the eaſtward by Eaſt Florida; on the ſouth by the Gulf of Mexico; on the weſt by the River Miſſiſſippi and the Lake St. Pier, and on the northward by the country of the Chikitaws. The land is here vaſtly preferable to that in the eaſtern provinces; the ſoil being capable of producing all the valuable commodities of wine, oil, rice, and indigo, in the greateſt abundance. The principal town is Penſacola; and as many of the French, who dwelt here before the treaty, have choſen to become Britiſh ſubjects, this, with the numbers that have flocked thither from Great Britain, will ſoon render the ſettlements very conſiderable. Its ſituation for trade is extremely good, from its having the river Miſſiſippi for its weſtern boundary. The inhabitants of both provinces together, already amount to upwards of ten thouſand.

FLORIO (John) the Resolute, as he uſed to ſtyle himſelf, was deſcended from the Florii of Sienna in Tuſcany, and born in London, at the latter end of the reign of Henry VIII. His father and mother, who were Waldenſes, had fled from the Valtoline into England, from the perſecutions of popery; but on the death of king Edward VI. when the proteſtant religion became oppreſſed, under queen Mary, they left England; but returned ſoon after the acceſſion of queen Elizabeth, when young Florio completed his ſtudies in the univerſity of Oxford, where he at length became teacher of the French and Italian tongues. After king James came to the throne, he was appointed tutor to prince Henry in thoſe languages, and at length was made one of the privy chamber, and clerk of the cloſet to queen Anne, to whom he was alſo tutor. He wrote, 1. Firſt Fruits, which yield familiar Speech, merry Proverbs, witty Sentences, and golden Sayings. 2. Second Fruits, to be gathered of twelve trees, of divers but delightſome taſtes to the tongues of Italian and Engliſh men. 3. Garden of Recreation, yielding ſix thouſand Italian proverbs. 4. Queen Anna's New World of Words; which was by far the beſt Italian and Engliſh dictionary then extant. 5. He alſo tranſlated into Engliſh, Montaigne's Eſſays. He died of the plague at Fulham, in Middleſex, in 1625, when he was about eighty years of age.

FLORUS (Lucius Annæus) a Latin hiſtorian, of the ſame family with Seneca and Lucan. He flouriſhed in the reigns of Trajan and Adrian, and wrote in an elegant ſtyle an Abridgment of the Roman Hiſtory, of which there are many editions. He lived two hundred years after Auguſtus. The beſt editions of his works are ad Uſum Delphini, quarto, & cum Notis variorum & Dukeri, octavo.

FLUDD (Robert) a very famous phyſician and philoſopher, was ſon of ſir Thomas Fludd, knight, treaſurer to queen Elizabeth in France and the Low Countries, and was born at Milgate in Kent, in the year 1574. He was educated at St. John's college, Oxford, after which he ſpent ſix years in travelling through France, Spain, Italy, and Germany; in moſt of which countries he not only became acquainted with the nobility, but read lectures to them. On his return he became famous for his chemical knowledge, and having obtained the degree of doctor of phyſic, practiſed in London, where he became a fellow of the College of Phyſicians. He did not begin to publiſh till the year 1616, but afterwards was a voluminous writer, and was generally eſteemed a prodigious philoſopher: this reputation he owed to that paſſion in human nature, which makes us admire what we leaſt underſtand. He became a zealous brother of the order of Roſa-cruſians, in whoſe defence he drew his pen; and, captivated by the wonders of chemeſtry, derived every thing from thence, not excepting the miracles mentioned in the ſcriptures, in doing which he ſo profaned the ſacred writings by his ridiculous and ſenſeleſs explications, as to draw upon himſelf the ſevereſt cenſures. His books, which amount to about twenty, are moſtly written in very abſtruſe Latin, and are as dark in the language as the matter, whence they were greatly admired, and ſought after, by the alchemiſts, aſtrologers, ſearchers after the philoſophers ſtone, and, in ſhort, by all the madmen in the republic of letters. He died at his houſe in Coleman-ſtreet, in the year 1637.

FLOUR (St.) a town of France in Upper Auvergne, with a biſhop's ſee. At the fairs that are kept here, they ſell a great number of mules, for Languedoc, Spain, and other countries; they likewiſe carry on a great trade in corn. It is ſeated on a mountain, forty-five miles ſouth of Clermont, thirty ſouth of Aurillac, and two hundred and ſeventy-two ſouth of Paris. Long. 2. 51. E. Lat. 45. 10. N.

FLUSHING, a ſea-port town of Holland, in the province of Zealand, and iſland of Walcheren. It is fortified with a ſtrong ſtone wall towards the ſea, well mounted with braſs guns, and towards the land with thick broad bulwarks, and a ditch an hundred feet broad. Above one half of it is ſurrounded by the ſea. This is one of the cautionary towns delivered to queen Elizabeth by the Dutch, as a ſecurity for the money ſhe had advanced in their defence againſt the Spaniards. It was reſtored to them by king James I. for a ſmall part of the money they were indebted to England. It is reckoned the richeſt town in Zealand, next to Middleburg, and is one of the moſt important quays in the Low Countries. The town-houſe is a magnificent ſtructure, it being built after the model of that of Antwerp. The houſes of the gentlemen and merchants are very fine, and kept in good order. The houſe of the princes of Orange is alſo worth ſeeing. It is five miles ſouth weſt of Middleburg, eight north-eaſt of Sluys, and fifteen north-weſt of Ghent. Long. 3. 30. E. Lat. 51. 25. N.

FOES or Foesius (Annutius) doctor of the faculty of Paris, was born at Metz, and practiſed phyſic in Lorrain and other places with reputation. He wrote an excellent tranſlation in Latin of Hippocrates, and other works, and died in 1596, aged ſixty-eight.

FOGARAS, a town and caſtle in Tranſilvania, twenty-five miles weſt of Cronſtadt, and thirty miles north-eaſt of Harmanſtat. Long. 24. 18. E. Lat. 46. 46. N.

FOGLIETA (Oberto or Hubert) a Genoeſe prieſt, and one of the moſt learned writers of the ſixteenth century. He had a ſhare in the diſturbances that were raiſed at Genoa, for which he was baniſhed, and died at Rome on the 5th of September, 1581, aged ſixty-three. He wrote a Hiſtory of Genoa in Italian, which is highly eſteemed, and many works in Latin, moſt of which are admired.

FOGO or Fuego, a ſmall iſland in the Atlantic Ocean, and one of the Cape de Verds. It is remarkable for a mountain that vomits fire and flames, like Mount Vetuvius. It ſometimes throws out large ſtones, with a noiſe like thunder. The few inhabitants that are here, live at the foot of this mountain. Long. 24. 47. W. Lat. 15. 20. N.

FOHI, the firſt king of China, is ſaid to have civilized that people; to have given them laws, and to have lived one hundred and ſifteen years. But every thing relating to that prince is fabulous.

FOI, a town of France in Guienne and in the Agenois, ſeated on the ſouth bank of the River Dordogne. Long. 0. 15. E. Lat. 45. 53. N.

FOIX, a town of France, capital of a diſtrict of the ſame name in Upper Languedoc. It is ſeated on the River Ariege, at the foot of the Pyrenean mountains, eight miles ſouth of Pamiers, forty ſouth of Thouloufe, twenty five eaſt of St. Liſiers, and four hundred and five ſouth of Paris. Long. 1. 25. E. Lat. 43. 27. N.

Foix (Odet de) lord of Lautrec, marſhal of France, and governor of Guienne. He followed Lewis XII. into Italy, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery, and was dangerouſly wounded at the battle of Ravenna, in 1512. After his cure he was made governor of Milan, by Francis I. when he took Breſcia and Verona; and in 1521 raiſed the ſiege of Parma; but the following year, having loſt the battle of Bicoque, he was diſgraced, and retired to his eſtate at Guienne. However, in 1528, he was made lieutenant-general of the league in Italy againſt Charles V. where, having taken Pavia, he marched directly to Naples; but a contagious diſeaſe having ſpread through his army, he himſelf was ſeized by it, and died on the 15th of Auguſt, 1528.

Foix (Lewis de) a famous engineer, born at Paris, acquired great reputation by his invention of machines. He built the monaſtery and palace of the Eſcurial, by order of Philip II. king of Spain. At his return to France, in 1579, he made a canal from the Adour to the port of Bayonne, and in 1515, built the light-houſe, called the Corduan-tower, at the mouth of the Geronne.

Foix (Margaret de) ducheſs of Epernon, is celebrated for her courage and intrepidity. In 1588, the chiefs of the league in France, reſolving to ruin the duke of Epernon, rendered him ſuſpected at court, and obtained an order for taking him at the caſtle of Angouleme, of which he was governor. The officers entruſted with the execution of this order, reſolved to ſecure the ſucceſs, by ſeizing the ducheſs, in order to oblige the duke to ſurrender up himſelf, and conducted that lady to the principal gate of the caſtle, that ſhe might prevail on the duke. But, regardleſs of their menaces, ſhe exhorted him to defend himſelf, and not to be moved by his tenderneſs for her. Such courage aſtoniſhed the officers. They deliberated on other means of obliging him to ſurrender: but in this interval he received ſuccours, and his ducheſs entered the caſtle in triumph.

FOKIEN, a province of China in Aſia, commodiouſly ſituated for navigation and commerce, part of it bordering on the ſea, in which they catch large quantities of fiſh, which they ſend ſalted to other parts of the empire. Its ſhores are very uneven, by reaſon of the number and variety of its bays; and there are many forts built thereon to guard the coaſts. The air is hot, but pure and wholeſome.

The mountains are almoſt every where diſpoſed into a kind of amphitheatres, by the labour of the inhabitants, with terraſſes placed one above another. The fields are watered with rivers and ſprings, which iſſue out of the mountains, which the huſbandmen conduct in ſuch a manner as to overflow the fields of rice when they pleaſe; becauſe it thrives beſt in watery ground. They make uſe of pipes of bamboe for this purpoſe.

They have all commodities in common with the reſt of China, but more particularly muſk, precious ſtones, quick-ſilver, ſilk, hempen-cloth, callico, iron, and all ſorts of utenſils wrought to the greateſt perfection. From other countries they have cloves, cinnamon, pepper, ſandal-wood, amber, coral, and many other things. The mountains are covered with trees fit for building ſhips. They have oranges of the taſte and ſmell of Muſcadine grapes, beſides red oranges, and other fruit proper to this country, mentioned elſewhere. The capital city is Foutcheou Fou. Or, as others would have it written, Fucherofu. But as for Fokien, which moſt geographers make the capital, there is no ſuch place.

FOLARD (Charles) famous for his ſkill in the military art, was born at Avignon, on the 13th of February, 1669, of a noble, but not rich family. He early diſcovered a turn for the ſciences, and a ſtrong inclination to arms, which laſt was ſo implanted by his reading Cæſar's Commentaries, that he enliſted at ſixteen years of age, and tho' his father got him off, and ſhut him up in a monaſtery, he made his eſcape about two years after, and entered himſelf a ſecond time as a cadet. The great pains he now took, in order to obtain a perfect knowledge in military affairs, recommended him to notice, and M. Vendome, who, in 1702, commanded in Italy, made him his aid-de-camp, and ſoon after ſent him with part of his army into Lombardy, where no meaſures were concerted, or ſteps taken, without conſulting him; and by purſuing his plans many advantages were gained, and places taken. In ſhort, ſuch were his ſervices, that he obtained a penſion of four hundred livres, and was honoured with the croſs of St. Lewis. In 1705, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf greatly at the battle of Caſſano, where a wound he received deprived him of the uſe of his left hand, and where he received the firſt idea of that ſyſtem of columns, which he afterwards prefixed to his Commentaries on Polybius. In 1706, the duke of Orleans ſending Monſ. Vendome into Italy, Folard was ordered to throw himſelf into Modena, to defend it againſt prince Eugene; where, though he acquitted himſelf with his uſual ſkill, he was near being aſſaſſinated. At the battle of Malplaquet he received a dangerous wound in his thigh, and was ſome time after made priſoner by prince Eugene: but being exchanged in 1711, he was made governor of Bourbourg. In 1714, he went to Malta to aſſiſt in defending that iſland againſt the Turks. He afterwards went to Sweden, whence Charles XII. ſent him back to France to negociate the re-eſtabliſhment of James II. on the throne of England, and that project being dropped, he returned to Sweden, attended Charles XII. in his expedition into Norway, and ſerved under him at the ſiege of Frederickſhall, where that prince loſt his life. Folard then returning to France, made his laſt campaign in 1719, in the quality of colonel, under the duke of Berwick. From thence forward he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the art military, building his theories on his own experience and obſervations on facts. The principal of his works are, 1. Commentaries upon Polybius, ſix volumes, quarto. 2. A Treatiſe on the Defence of Places. 3. A book of new Diſcoveries in War, &c. All his works are written in French. In 1749 he was made a fellow of the Royal Society at London, and on the 23d of March, 1752, died at Avignon, at eighty-three years of age.

FOLENGIO (Theophilus) a native of Mantua, better known by the fictitious name of Merlin Coccaius, was the author of many burleſque pieces in verſe, compoſed of a mixture of Italian and Latin words, to which he gave the name of Macaroons, from a kind of cakes, made in Italy, of flour, eggs, and cheeſe, from whence came the name of

Macaro-

Macronic verſes. Theſe pieces, of which there have been ſeveral editions, involved him in ſome trouble; but ſeveral nobleman took him under their protection. He died in the territories of Venice, on the 9th of December, 1544. The moſt known of his works is his Macaronea, or Macaronic Hiſtory.

FOLIETA. See FOGLIETA.

FOLIGNI, or FULIGNO, a town of Italy, in Umbria, with a biſhop's ſee. It is remarkable for its confectionary, paper-mills, and manufactures of ſilk. It is ſeated on the declivity of a mountain, near a delightful plain, thirteen miles north of Spoletto, and ſixty-four north of Rome. Long. 13. 38. E. Lat. 43. 15. N.

FOLKINGHAM, a town of Lincolnſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, and ſeven fairs; on Aſh-Wedneſday, and Palm-Monday, for horſes and ſheep; on May 12, for horſes, ſheep, and tradeſmens goods; on June 16, for horſes and horned cattle; on July 3, for hemp, hardware, and baſons; on November 10, for horſes, horned cattle, and tradeſmens goods; and on November 22, for the ſame. It is ſeated on the ſide of a hill, and is a very ancient town, formerly of good account, but now much decayed, and its caſtle is in ruins. It is fourteen miles north of Market Deacon, twenty-four ſouth of Lincoln, twenty-eight north-north-eaſt of Boſton, and one hundred and ſix north of London. Long. 0. 30. W. Lat. 52. 55. N.

FOLKSTONE, a ſea-port of Kent, with a market on Thurſdays. It is chiefly inhabited by fiſhermen, and has a fair on the 28th of June for pedlar's ware. It is ſeated on a cliff, which is not of chalk, as at Dover, but of ſtone. A plentiful ſpring runs through the town, and near the church, upon the ſea-ſide, is a ſquare plain. There are alſo two pieces of old wall hanging over the dreadful cliff, which ſeem to have been of Roman work. Many Roman coins have been found here. It was once a a flouriſhing town, containing five pariſh churches, which are now reduced to one. It ſeventeen miles ſouth-eaſt of Canterbury, five ſouth-weſt of Dover, and ſeventy-two eaſt-ſouth-eaſt of London. Long. 1. 20. E. Lat. 51. 2. N.

FONDI, a town of Naples, in Italy, and in Terra di Lavoro, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated in a fertile plain, near a lake of the ſame name, but the air is bad. It is forty-three miles north-weſt of Capua, fifty north-weſt of Naples, and fifty-five ſouth-eaſt of Rome. Long. 13. 28. E. Lat. 41. 42. N.

FONT (N. DE LA) a French poet, born at Paris in 1686, was the author of five comedies, namely, 1. Danaë, or Criſpin Jupiter; 2. Le Naufrage; 3. L' Amour vengé; 4. L' Epreuve Réciproque; and, 5. Les trois Freres Rivaux. The laſt of theſe pieces had great ſucceſs. He alſo compoſed interludes, a comic opera, intitled, Le Monde renverſé; and ſeveral operas, viz. Les Fêtes de Thalie; Le Entrée de La Provence; Hypermneſtre; Les Amours de Prothée; and the opera of Orion, which he left imperfect. He died at Paſſy, near Paris, in 1725, at thirty-ſix years of age.

FONTAINE (JOHN DE LA) a celebrated French poet, was born at Chateau-Thiari, in Champagne, on the 8th of July, 1621, a year after the birth of Moliere. He was the ſon of John de la Fontaine, overſeer of the water-courſes and foreſts, and at nineteen years of age entered amongſt the fathers of the Oratory, which he quitted eighteen months after. He was twenty-two years of age before he diſcovered his talent for poetry; but hearing one of Malherbe's odes repeated, was ſeized with ſuch admiration, that his poetic fire ſeemed kindled at that of this great poet. He immediately ſet himſelf to read Malherbe's works, to ſtudy them, repeat, and at length to imitate them. He ſhewed his firſt attempts to one of his relarelations, who encouraged him, and made him read the beſt Latin authors, Horace, Virgil, Terence, Quintillian, &c. after which he read the French and Italian authors, and applied him alſo to the ſtudy of the Greek writers, particularly, Plato and Plutarch. He obtained great and generous protectors, and contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with Moliere, Racine, and Deſpreaux. He was invited into England by madam Mazarine and St. Evremont, who promiſed him all the delicacies of life, but the difficulty of learning the Engliſh language deterred him from that voyage. He was received into the French Academy in 1684, and died at Paris on the 13th of March, 1695, aged ſeventy-four. His principal works are, 1. His Fables, which are eſteemed his maſter-piece, a fine edition of which was printed in 1743, with ſhort notes by M. Coſter; 2. His Tales; and, 3. His Miſcellanies, 4 vols.

His compoſitions have a great deal of nature without the leaſt affectation; his wit ſeems unſtudied, he never grows languid, but is always new and ſurpriſing; yet he himſelf was a very dull companion. But there was as little affectation in his life as in his writings, for he was all nature, without a grain of art. He had a ſon, whom, after keeping a ſhort time at home, he recommended to the patronage of Mr. Harley. Fontaine being one day in the ſame houſe with his ſon, did not know him, but obſerved, that he thought him a boy of good parts and ſpirit; when being told that this promiſing youth was his ſon, he anſwered very unconcernedly, "Ha! I am "very glad of it." This apathy vainly affected by ſo many philoſophers, ran through every part of Fontaine's behaviour, and ſeemed to render him perfectly inſenſible to every thing.

FONTAINE (NICHOLAS) a famous writer in the ſeventeenth century; born at Paris, wrote a great number of works, the moſt famous of which is a tranſlation of St. Chryſoſtom, which made much noiſe. He died at Milan on the 28th of January, 1709, aged eighty-four.

FONTAINEBLEAU, a town of the iſle of France in the Gatinois, famous for its royal palace. It is ſeated in the middle of a foreſt, about three miles from the river Seine, ten from Melan, and thirty-five ſouth-eaſt from Paris. It conſiſts only of two large ſtreets, with croſs lanes, full of inns, which lead to the palace. Lewis XIV. added a new building to the old palace, called the apartment of of the princes. He alſo enlarged the old apartments, and made them more magnificent and commodious.

The conniſſeurs affirm, the architecture of the old caſtle is very fine; it has ſeveral turrets and gardens which run all round the court. The moſt remarkable things are the cabinet, which is adorned with curious paintings, highly finiſhed, and the palace, with a cieling of exquiſite workmanſhip. From the old caſtle the paſſage to the court of Fontaignes is adorned with ſeveral ſtatues of bronze and marble, from whence the water ſpouts in different manners, This court is over-againſt the body of apartments which compoſe another palace, inſomuch, that there are four palaces, and as many gardens. But the old one is moſt eſteemed for the beauties of its apartments and its galleries. That of the Cerfs, which is about an hundred paces in length, runs all along the orangery. It is enriched with paintings, which repreſent all the royal houſes and the fine palaces of France. Theſe plans are divided by ſtags horns of a prodigious ſize, which were killed in the foreſt, and over each is the date of the year when they were killed. Now, as a ſtag in French is Cerf, it is obvious whence the name of this gallery is derived. Near this gallery there is another, in which are repreſented the chaces of Henry IV. Over this there is another, which contains the victories of the laſt kings of France, with ſeveral figures of Diana, the huntreſs. From this there is a paſſage to the cabinet of Clorinda, enriched with very fine paintings. The chamber of the queen is to be entered next, which is only remarkable for the cieling and the gilding. The cabinet of the king contains paintings of Andrè del Sarto, Raphael, and Michael Angelo.

Afterwards you may viſit the gallery of Francis I. where divers hiſtories of this king's reign are repreſented. But theſe paintings, which were in freſco, are almoſt effaced. The little cabinet next to the gardens where the pond is, is worth ſeeing, being inriched with very exquiſite paintings. The ſculpture and the gilding of the cieling are in an excellent taſte. The grand altar of the church of the Trinity is richly adorned, the paintings are fine, and the pavement is worthy of remark. The gardens are adorned with curious ſtatues, fine walks, grottos, caſcades, parterres, and other embelliſhments. Long. 2. 47. E. Lat. 48. 36. N.

FONTAINES (PETER FRANCIS GUIOT DES) a famous French critic, born at Roen on the 29th of June, 1685. His principal works are, 1. A Tranſlation of Virgil, with Remarks, 4 vols 12mo; 2. The Noveliſt of Parnaſſus, or, Reflections on Works newly publiſhed, a periodical Work, from the year 1735 to 1745, in 33 volumes, 12mo. He wrote in the Works of the Learned from 1724 to 1727, and died at Paris on the 16th of December, 1745, aged ſixty.

FONTANA (PUBLIO) a famous Latin poet in the ſixteenth century, was born at Palucio, near Bergamo, and acquired great reputation by his poems, the principal of which is his Delphinis Carmina. He died about the year 1598.

FONTE, MODERATA, a famous Venetian lady, whoſe true name was Modeſta Pozzo, was born at Venice in 1555, and loſt both her father and mother before ſhe was a year old. While ſhe was young ſhe was put into the convent of the nuns of St. Martha of Venice; but afterwards quitted it and was married; but after living twenty years in great union with her huſband, died in child-bed on the firſt of November, 1592. She was the author of a poem, intitled Il Floridoro, and another on the Paſſion and Reſurrection of Jeſus Chriſt. She publiſhed a book on the Merit of Women, in which ſhe maintained, that women are not inferior in wit and real merit to men. It is ſaid ſhe had ſo prodigious a memory, that after hearing a ſermon, ſhe could repeat it word for word.

FONE-

FONTENAI LE COMTE, a town of France, in Poitou, ſeated on the river Verdé. The ſuburbs are larger than the town, which conſiſts of three pariſhes, and has two convents for men, and three nunneries. There was a caſtle here, of which two towers are remaining. It is ten miles north-weſt of Mallezais, twenty-five north-eaſt of Rochelle, and two hundred and ſixty-five ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 47. W. Lat. 46. 31. N.

FONTENAY (JOHN BAPTIST BLAIN DE) a very famous painter of fruit and flowers, was born at Caen in 1654. Lewis XIV. gave him a penſion, and an apartment in the galleries of the Louvre, and he was nominated counſellor of the Academy of Painting. His fruit and flowers have all the freſhneſs and beauty of nature; the very dew ſeems to trickle down their ſtalks, with all the luſtre and tranſparency of the diamond, while the inſects upon them ſeem perfectly alive and animated. This ingenious painter died at Paris, in 1715.

FONTENELLE (BERNARD LE BOVIER DE) one of the fineſt geniuſes France has produced. Mr. Voltaire compares him to lands ſituated in ſo happy a climate, as to bear all ſorts of fruit. Before he was twenty he wrote a great part of his opera of Bellerophon, and ſome time after appeared his Thetis and Peleus, which met with great ſucceſs; but his Æneas and Lavinia did not ſucceed ſo well. He wrote ſeveral little pieces, in which we may obſerve that delicacy of wit, and profoundneſs of thought which diſcover a man to be ſuperior to his own works. In his poetical performances and Dialogues of the Dead, may be diſcerned the ſpirit of Voiture, though more extended and philoſophical. His Plurality of Worlds is a moſt agreeable and inſtructive dialogue; and his Diſcourſe on Oracles is an entertaining book, but his exploding the opinion of their anſwers being uttered by the devil raiſed him ſecret enemies. He at length applied to geometry and natural philoſophy, and was as ſucceſsful in theſe ſtudies as he had been in that of polite literature. He was appointed perpetual ſecretary to the Academy of Sciences, and diſcharged that truſt above forty years, with the greateſt applauſe. His Hiſtory of the Academy of Sciences frequently throws great light on their Memoirs. If he ſhould ſometimes be thought to have interwoven more beauties that the nature of the ſubject would admit of, Voltaire ſays, we muſt look upon it as on a plentiful crop, where flowers naturally grow among the corn. In his more advanced age he publiſhed comedies, which ſhewed the elegance of Fontenelle; but were little fit for the ſtage. He had the honour of being the firſt who introduced elegance into the ſciences, and may be conſidered as the great maſter of the new art of treating abſtracted ſubjects in a manner that makes their ſtudy at once eaſy and agreeable. He died in the year 1756, when above an hundred years of age.

FONTENOY, a village of the Low Countries, in Flanders, near the river Scheld, and three miles from Tournay; famous for a battle fought here between the French and Engliſh, May the 11th, 1745. Long. 3. 24. E. Lat. 50. 37. N.

FONTERABIA, a little ſtrong town of Spain, in the province of Guipuſcoa, in Biſcay, with a good caſtle. It is but one pariſh, and contains about two hundred houſes. It is looked upon as the key of Spain on this ſide, and is near the ſea, at the mouth of the river Bidaſſoa, twenty-three miles ſouth-weſt of Bayonne, ſixty-three eaſt of Bilboa, and four hundred and thirty-eight ſouth-by-weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 38. W. Lat. 43. 27. N.

FONTEVRAULT, a ſmall town of France, in Anjou, with a celebrated nunnery or abbey for women. It is three miles from the river Loire, eight from Saumur, and one hundred and ſixty ſouth weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 7. E. Lat. 47. 11. N.

FONTINALIA, in Pagan mythology, a feſtival dedicated to Fontinalis, the god of fountains, in which the Romans adorned their ſprings and wells with chaplets.

FONTIUS (BARTHOLOMEW) a learned writer in the fifteenth century, born at Florence. He was honoured with the friendſhip of Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, who gave him the direction of the famous library at Buda. His works were collected together, and printed at Francfort, in 1621.

FORBES (PATRICK) biſhop of Aberdeen, was born in the year 1564, and was diſtinguiſhed by his family, as well as his extraordinary merit, he being lord of Corſe, and baron of O'Neil, in the ſhire of Aberdeen. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by encouraging pious and peaceable miniſters, and by inſtructing the people both in ſet conferences and occaſional diſcourſes; eſpecially the papiſts, who would hear nothing from the pulpit. By acting in this laudable manner as a layman, his abilities became ſo conſpicuous, that he was often ſollicited by the moſt eminent perſons in church and ſtate to enter into the miniſtry, and at laſt ſubmitting to their judgment, was ordained a preſbyter at forty years of age, when he was made miniſter of Keith, where he continued till the year 1618. Then at the earneſt deſire of the clergy and laity, he was promoted to the biſhoprick of Aberdeen; but it was with great difficulty that king James made him accept that dignity; for deſiring to live in a leſs conſpicuous ſtate, he continued to refuſe it during ſeveral months. It was ſoon ſeen that this refuſal was the real effect of his humility; for in all his behaviour he diſplayed an apoſtolic character; and viſited his dioceſe without pomp and noiſe, attended only by one ſervant, that he might be the more eaſily informed of what was neceſſary for him to know. As he was chancellor of the univerſity of Aberdeen, he improved that ſeat of learning, by repairing the fabric, augmenting the library, reviving the profeſſions of divinity, canon-law, and phyſic, and procuring another profeſſorſhip in divinity to be added. He publiſhed a Commentary upon the Revelations, and died on the 28th of March, 1635, aged ſeventy-one, after having two days before ſent for all the clergy in Aberdeen to receive the ſacrament with him.

FORBES (JOHN) in Latin, Forbeſius, biſhop of Aberdeen, the place of his birth, was the ſon of Patrick Forbes, alſo biſhop of Aberdeen. He ſtudied in ſeveral univerſities in Germany, and acquired great ſkill in divinity and the Hebrew language. At his return to Aberdeen he obtained the profeſſor's chair, founded by his father, and taught with great reputation; but declaring in favour of epiſcopacy, and being choſen biſhop of Aberdeen by king James VI. he was expelled; he then retired to Holland, where he ſtaid above two years, and upon his return to Scotland, ſpent the remainder of his life privately at his eſtate of Corſe, and died on the 29th of April, 1648. An edition of all his works was publiſhed at Amſterdam, in 1703, in two volumes, folio.

FORBES (WILLIAM) biſhop of Edinburgh, was born at Aberdeen, in the year 1585. He was admitted maſter of arts at the age of ſixteen, and immediately after was made profeſſor of logic; the duties of which place he diſcharged for four years. He afterwards travelled, and made great progreſs in divinity and Hebrew in the univerſities of Germany; and at his return, coming to England, the univerſity of Oxford offered him a profeſſorſhip of Hebrew, which he did not accept. After ſeveral promotions in the church in Scotland, king Charles I. on his founding an epiſcopal church at Edinburgh, choſe him to fill that new ſee. He died on the firſt of April, 1634, aged forty-nine, after he had enjoyed the biſhoprick only three months. He wrote Conſiderationes modeſtæ & pacificæ Controverſiarum de Juſtificatione, Purgatorio, Invocatione Sanctorum, Chriſto Mediatore, Euchariſtia; which was not publiſhed till after his death.

FORBES (JAMES) an eminent Independent miniſter, was deſcended from an honourable family in Scotland, and educated at Aberdeen, where he took the degree of maſter of arts, and was afterwards admitted to the ſame degree at Oxford. In 1654 he began to exerciſe his miniſtry at Gloceſter, and exerted himſelf ſo much, that his life was apparently in danger. After the act of uniformity was paſſed, he was warmly ſollicited by dean Frampton, afterwards biſhop of Gloceſter, to conform to the church; but he perſiſted in his nonconformity, and was very aſſiduous in preaching privately, when he could no longer do it in public, which occaſioned his being ſeveral times impriſoned, and once for a whole year together. With reſpect to his tenets, he was a ſtrict Calviniſt; he was liberal and charitable to a degree beyond his circumſtances, and was greatly reſpected for his learning and piety. He died on the 31ſt of May, 1732, in the eighty-third year of his age. The moſt conſiderable of his works is his Chriſtian directed in the Way to Heaven.

FORBIN (CLAUDE) a famous ſea captain, better known by the name of the chevalier or count de Forbin, uſed the ſea from his youth, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a great number of brave actions; he commanded a French ſquadron in 1707, and defeated the Engliſh fleet; the next year was ordered to convoy king James to Scotland, in which he failed. His Memoirs were printed at Paris, in 1730, in two volumes, duodecimo.

FORBISHER. See FROBISHER.

FORCE (JAMES NOMPAR DE CAUMONT, duke DE LA) a peer and marſhal of France, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in his youth, under the reign of Henry IV. and ſided with the Calviniſts againſt Lewis XIII. but afterwards ſubmitting to the king, was made marſhal of France, and lieutenant-general of the army in Piedmont. He took Pignerol; in 1630, defeated the Spaniards at Carignan, and performed many other conſiderable ſervices, in conſideration of which, the king, in 1637, erected his eſtate into a duchy and peerage. He died at Bergerac, on the 10th of May, 1652, in a very advanced age.

FORCE (CHARLOTTE ROSE DE CAUMONT DE LA) an ingenious lady, was the daughter of Francis de Caumont, marquis de Caſtelmoron, and marſhal de camp, and was born at the caſtle of Caſenove, in Guienne, about the year 1650. This lady diſtinguiſhed herſelf by writing in French ſeveral novels, among which are, 1. The Hiſtory of Margaret de Valois, queen of Navarre. 2. The Hiſtory of Guſtavus Vaſa. 3. The ſecret Hiſtory of Burgundy, &c. and, 4. many Poems. She died in 1724.

FORCALKIER, a town of France, in Provence, capital of a county of the ſame name. It is ſeated on a mountain, eighteen miles north-weſt of Siſteron, thirty north-eaſt of Aix, and three hundred and fifty ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 41. E. Lat. 44. 12. N.

FORCHEIM, a town of Germany, in Franconia, and in the biſhoprick of Bamberg, ſeated on the Rednitz. It is fortified, has a caſtle, and is accounted the ſtrongeſt town in Franconia. It is ſixteen miles ſouth of Bamberg, and fifteen north of Nuremberg. Long. 10. 56. E. Lat. 49. 41. N.

FORD (John) a dramatic writer, in the reign of king Charles I. was a gentleman of the Middle Temple. He wrote ſeven plays, beſides joining in writing one or two with Decker and Rowley. He died about the year 1656.

FORDINGBRIDGE, a town in Hampſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and a fair on September 9, for foreſt colts and pedlary ware. It is ſeated on the river Avon, twenty miles ſouth-weſt of Wincheſter, and ninety-one weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 1. 50. W. Lat. 50. 52. N.

FORDYCE (David) an elegant and learned writer of the preſent age, was born in Scotland, and became profeſſor of philoſophy in the Mariſchal college, Aberdeen. He was originally deſigned to be a miniſter of the church of Scotland, to which he was early diſpoſed, both by his genius and diſpoſition; to prepare himſelf for it was the whole aim of his ambition, and for a courſe of years the whole purpoſe of his ſtudies. How well he was qualified to appear in that character, appears from his Theodorus, a dialogue, concerning the art of Preaching. After having finiſhed this work, he went abroad on his travels, in order to obtain freſh ſtores of knowledge and experience, to fit him for acting his part in ſociety with greater uſefulneſs and reputation. He travelled through France, Italy, and ſeveral other parts of Europe; but when he was returning home, he loſt his life in his full prime, by a ſtorm on the coaſt of Holland. Beſides the above work, he wrote Dialogues on Education, 8vo. and a Treatiſe of Moral Philoſophy publiſhed in the Preceptor. The third edition of his Theodorus was publiſhed in London, after his untimely death, by his brother, the Rev. Mr. James Fordyce, an eminent diſſenting miniſter, in 1755.

FORE, or Foehr, a ſmall iſland in the German Ocean, on the weſtern coaſt of Sleſwick. It abounds in corn and cattle, and the inhabitants preſerve the language, manners, and dreſs of the ancient Friſons. Long. 11. 5. E. Lat 54. 46. N.

FOREST (Black) a large foreſt of Germany, in the circle of Swabia, between the county of Furſtenberg, and the duchy of Wirtenberg. It is called the Black Foreſt, becauſe the trees ſtand ſo cloſe together. It extended formerly as far as the Rhine, whence Rheinfelden, Seckinghen, Lauffenburg, and Waldſhut, are called the four foreſt towns.

FOREZ, a territory in France, bounded on the weſt by Auvergne, on the ſouth by Velay and Viverois, on the eaſt by Lyonnois and Beaujolois, and on the north by the duchy of Burgundy and the Bourbonnois. It is ſixty-two miles in length, and thirty-ſeven in breadth. It is watered by the river Loire, and ſeveral others, which render it fruitful. It has mines of coal and iron, which enables the inhabitants to make a large quantity of fire-arms and cutlery ware, and to ſell them cheap. It is divided into Upper and Lower. The Upper is towards the ſouth, and its principal towns are Feurs and St. Etienne. The Lower is towards the north, and the chief places are Kouane and Monſbriſſon.

FORFAR, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Angus, fourteen miles weſt of Montroſe, and forty north of Edinburgh. Long. 2. 42. W. Lat. 56. 37. N.

FORLI, a town of Italy, in Romania. It is more large than handſome, and more rich in churches and religious houſes than in fine buildings. It is a biſhop's ſee, and the cathedral is large. It is ſeated in a good air, and a fruitful ſoil, ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Faenza, twenty ſouth-weſt of Ravenna, and forty-five north-eaſt of Florence. Long. 12. 47. E. Lat. 44. 32. N.

FORMOSA, an iſland on the eaſtern coaſt of China, two hundred miles in length, and ſeventy in breadth, ſituated between twenty-two degrees eight minutes, and twenty-five degrees twenty minutes north latitude. It abounds with hills, intermixed with many fertile vallies, producing great ſtore of graſs, and watered by ſeveral fine rivers. The country produces rice and ſugar in abundance, as well as moſt of the Indian fruits. They have beeves, hogs, goats, hares, rabbits, and deer. But theſe laſt have no horns, and are only hunted for their ſkins and tongues, their fleſh being of no value. They have elks, which they uſe to draw with inſtead of horſes. Some call theſe elks buffaloes, but who is in the right we are not able to determine; perhaps they are properly neither. They have partridges, pigeons, and other wild fowl, as well as tygers and bears, and ſome ſay lions. The mountains are full of ſulphur, which is thought to occaſion the frequent earthquakes that are felt here. The country is very populous, for beſides the natives, there are twenty-five thouſand Chineſe, who were forced out of China by the Tartars. The original inhabitants are of an olive colour, fat, ſtrong, well-limbed, and nimble; for ſome of them will run as faſt as a wild boar. The women are ſtrong bodied, have ſhining black hair, which they tye in a knot on the top of the head. In the ſummer they are quite naked, but in the winter, ſince the coming of the Chineſe, they have ſilk or callico wrapt round their bodies, which by the women is brought below the knees. Though ſome have ſtuffs made of dogs hair.

Their bread is made of ſeveral roots, though rice is in the greateſt eſteem, and their drink is water and arrack made of rice. The women cultivate the ground, manage the rice, ſugar, ginger, and other fruits of the earth. At leiſure times they catch oyſters, crabs, and ſhrimps. The men are employed in hunting and killing wild beaſts, ſome of which they catch in ſnares, others they kill with bamboo javelins. Their houſes are but one ſtory high, built with bamboo canes, and are very capacious. They have doors facing the four winds, and ſometimes more. They always raiſe their houſes three or four feet from the ground, to render them more healthful. Thoſe who are near the Chineſe adorn their houſes with callico hangings, boars and deer's heads, bows, arrows, pick-axes, and the bones and ſkulls of their enemies. They have earthen pots to dreſs their victuals in, and eat and drink out of veſſels made of bamboo canes or other wood.

They have no kings, but every village has its own government, which conſiſts of twelve perſons above forty years of age, who hold their place for life, and whatever is reſolved among them has the force of a law. They are obliged to go quite naked for three months, otherwiſe they ſay they ſhall want rain. However there is no corporal puniſhment among them, which is a proof that their laws are carefully obſerved. They have no writings nor books among them.

They believe the world to have neither beginning nor end, and that the ſouls of ſuch as have done well ſhall be rewarded hereafter. It is ſaid that they worſhip two gods, the one good and the other evil, and their prieſts are all of the female ſex.

FORMOSUS, elected pope after the death of Stephen V. on the 19th of September, 891, being then biſhop of Oporto, which was the firſt inſtance of a biſhop being tranſlated from another ſee to that of Rome. He died in 896. Stephen VI. who ſucceeded Boniface VI. cauſed Formoſus's body to be dug up, treated with indignity, and thrown into the Tyber with a ſtone about its neck; but the following popes condemned what Stephen had done, and reſtored his reputation.

FORRES, a parliament-town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Murray, thirteen miles weſt of Elgin. Long. 3. 20. W. Lat. 57. 40. N.

FORSTER (John) a proteſtant divine, born at Augſburgh, in 1495, was the friend of Melancthon and Luther; he taught Hebrew with reputation at Wittemburg, and died there on the 8th of December, 1556. He was the author of an excellent Hebrew Dictionary.

FORT de Cataracouy, a fort in Canada, built on the bank of the river St. Laurence, almoſt at the entrance of the lake Ontario. It is otherwiſe called Fort Frontenac. Long. 75. 15. W. Lat. 44. 20. N.

Fort de Chambly, a fort in Canada, over againſt a ſmall lake formed by the river Sorel. It was deſigned as a defence againſt the Engliſh, and the Iroquois Indians, on the ſide of Montreal. Long. 71. 55. W. Lat. 45. 25. N.

Fort de Fuentes, a fort of Italy, in the duchy of Milan, on the mountain Montechio, near the confluence of the Adda, with the lake Como. Long. 9. 0. E. Lat. 46. 5. N.

Fort Lewis, a ſtrong place of France, in Alſace, built by Lewis XIV. on an iſland in the river Rhine, twenty miles from Straſburg and Landaw, thirty from Philipſburg, fifty from Briſach, fifteen from Weiſſenburg, and two hundred and ſeventy eaſt of Paris. Long. 8. 9. E. Lat. 48. 48. N.

FORTESCUE (Sir John) lord chief juſtice of the king's bench, and lord high chancellor of England, in the reign of king Henry VI. was deſcended from the ancient family of Forteſcue, in the county of Devon. He ſtudied the municipal laws of England in Lincoln's-Inn, of which he was made one of the governors in the fourth and ſeventh years of the reign of king Henry VI. In 1430 he was called to the degree of a ſerjeant at law, and in 1441 was conſtituted the king's ſerjeant. The following year he was made lord chief juſtice of the king's bench, in which honourable ſtation he continued till near the end of that king's reign, who ſhewed him many particular marks of his favour, and advanced him to the poſt of lord high chancellor of England. During the reign of king Edward the IV. he followed the fortunes of the houſe of Lancaſter, and was many years in exile with queen Margaret and prince Edward her ſon. At length, they having a proſpect of retrieving their deſperate fortunes, the queen and prince returned to England, and ſir John Forteſcue, with many others, accompanied them; but ſoon after the deciſive battle of Tewkſbury, he was thrown into priſon and attainted, with other Lancaſtrians; but found means to procure his pardon from Edward IV. He wrote, in Latin, a learned Commentary on the politic Laws of England, for the uſe of prince Edward, to one edition of which Mr. Selden wrote notes; The Difference between an abſolute and limited Monarchy, as it more particularly regards the Engliſh Conſtitution; this work was publiſhed, with ſome remarks, by John Forteſcue, afterwards lord Forteſcue, in octavo, in 1714, and a ſecond edition was publiſhed, with amendments, in 1719; and ſeveral works which ſtill remain in manuſcript. He died at near ninety years of age, and was buried in the pariſh church of Ebburton, where a monument was erected to his memory, in 1677, by one of his deſcendants.

FORTEVENTURA, one of the Canary Iſlands, in the Atlantic Ocean, fifty miles from the coaſt of Africa. It is about eighty miles long, and twenty broad, and is accounted a very fruitful place. It has ſeveral towns, but Forteventura is the chief. It belongs to the Spaniards. Long 13. 5. W. Lat. 28. 25. N.

FORTIUS, or rather STERCK, a philoſopher and mathematician of the ſixteenth century, better known under the name of Joachimus Fortius Rhingelbergius, was greatly eſteemed by Eraſmus and other learned men of his time. He taught the Greek language and mathematics in the Netherlands, in France, and other countries. He was highly eſteemed at the court of the emperor Maximilian I. and wrote ſeveral works, the moſt eſteemed of which is his Treatiſe De Ratione Studendi. He died about the year 1536.

FORTNOVA, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Parma, remarkable for a battle gained by Charles VIII. of France, over the Italians, in 1495. Long. 10. 1. E. Lat. 44. 44. N.

FORTUNA, in the pagan worſhip, the goddeſs of Chance. She had a variety of names, and ſeveral temples, the principal of which was that at Prænesſte. She was uſually repreſented blind, ſtanding on a wheel, and holding a cornucopia, from which ſhe poured wealth and all the emblems of proſperity.

FORTZO DE AGRO, a town of Sicily, in the valley of Di Demona, ſeated on a craggy rock, near a rivulet, twenty miles from Meſſina.

FOSSANO, a town of Italy, in Piedmont, with a good caſtle, and a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Stura, ten miles north-eaſt of Conni, and twenty-five ſouth of Turin. It is ſubject to the king of Sardinia. Lon. 7. 48. E. Lat. 44. 25. N.

FOSSE (CHARLES DE LA) an able painter, born at Paris, practiſed under Le Brun, and afterwards in Italy. He was rector of the academy of painting; he painted the dome of the Invalids at Paris, and particularly ſucceeded in his diſpoſition of lights and ſhades. He died very old, in 1716.

FOSSE (ANTHONY LA) nephew to the former, was the ſon of a goldſmith, at Paris. He wrote a French tranſlation of the Odes of Anacreon; four tragedies, the beſt of which is that of Manlius, and other poetical works. He died at Paris, on the 2d of November, 1708, aged fifty-five.

FOSSOMBRONE, a town of Italy, in the territory of the pope and duchy of Urbino, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated near the river Metro, eighteen miles ſouth-weſt of Peſaro, and thirteen ſouth-eaſt of Urbino. Long. 14. 10. E. Lat. 43. 46. N.

FOSTER (SAMUEL) an eminent mathematician and profeſſor of aſtronomy at Greſham college, was born in Northamptonſhire, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of mathematics, in which he arrived at a great proficiency, and not only obtained the above profeſſorſhip, but was one of that worthy and learned ſociety who had ſtated meetings for cultivating the new philoſophy, and were afterwards eſtabliſhed by charter in the reign of Charles II. under the name of the Royal Society. He was particularly famous for inventing as well as improving aſtronomical inſtruments, and wrote, 1. The Deſcription and Uſe of a ſmall portable Quadrant. 2. The Art of Dialling. 3. Miſcellanies, or mathematical Lucubrations. 4. The Sector altered; and other works. After a long declining ſtate of health, he died in July, 1652, at his apartment in Greſham college.

FOSTER (JAMES) D. D. an ingenious diſſenting miniſter of the baptiſt perſuaſion, diſtinguiſhed by his humanity and his eloquence, was born at Exeter, on the 16th of September, 1697, and educated at an academy in that city. After preaching ſome years in the country, where he had a very narrow ſubſiſtence, he became chaplain to Robert Houlton, eſq. and, in 1724, was choſen to ſucceed the Rev. Dr. Gale, at Barbican; and having preached there above twenty years, was, in 1744, choſen, in the room of Dr. Hunt, at Pinner's-hall. In 1728, he began his ſunday-evening lecture, in the Old Jewry, which he alſo continued for above twenty years, where his commanding elocution brought a confluence of perſons of every rank, ſtation, and quality; and, in 1748, the univerſity of Aberdeen, without the leaſt ſollicitation, voluntarily conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity. He wrote, 1. A Defence of Chriſtianity againſt Tindal's Chriſtianity as old as the Creation. 2. An Eſſay on Fundamentals. 3. Four volumes of Sermons. 4. Diſcourſes on natural Religion and ſocial Virtue, in quarto, to which he had two thouſand ſubſcribers; and other works. This great and good man, who was equally beloved and admired, died on the 5th of November, 1752.

FOTHERGILL (GEORGE) D. D. and principal of St. Edmund's hall, Oxford, was born on the 31ſt of December, 1705, N. S. at Locholme, in Weſtmoreland, and ſtudied at Kendal ſchool, and at Queen's college, in Oxford, where he became fellow, and an eminent tutor. On the 17th of October, 1751, he was elected principal of St. Edmund's hall, and preſented to the vicarage of Bromley, in Hampſhire, in the room of the late Dr. Shaw; but after being long afflicted with an aſthma, died on the 5th of October, 1760. He was the author of two volumes of excellent Sermons, in octavo. The firſt conſiſts of occaſional diſcourſes, publiſhed by himſelf, and the ſecond was printed from his manuſcript, and publiſhed by his brother. Our author's life, we are aſſured, was, in every reſpect, as excellent as his writings, an example of true rational piety, and ſuch as became a Chriſtian divine.

FOUGERES, a town of France, in Brittany, with an ancient caſtle. It carries on a great trade in hides, and is ſeated on the river Couenon, twenty-five miles north of Rennes, twenty-three ſouth-eaſt of Avranches, and one hundred and fifty weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 18. E. Lat. 48. 27. N.

FOULEYS, or PHOLEYS, a people of Africa, living near the rivers Senegal and Gambia, in Guinea. They are not black, but of a tawny colour like the Arabs, and ſpeak the ſame language, that is Arabic, and are doubtleſs of the ſame original, which is no wonder, conſidering the propenſity of this people to wander from one place to another. They live in hords and clans, build towns, and are not ſubject to the kings of the country, in which they live; and therefore, if they are ill treated in one place, they break up their towns and remove to another. Each clan has a chief of their own, who governs them with great mildneſs. Now as the negroes, where they live, never trouble their heads about any particular ſpot of land, the Fouleys are at liberty to cultivate what they pleaſe. Round their houſes they plant tobacco, and about their towns cotton, which they fence in. Beyond this are their corn-fields, in which they ſow Indian corn, or maize, rice, the greater and leſs Guinea corn, a ſort of pulſe between a kidney-bean and a pea, potatoes, and yams. The Indian corn they ſet in holes, the ſtalks of which grow to the height of eight or ten feet. They are the fondeſt of rice, which they ſet in rills as we do peaſe, in wet grounds; the ears or tops reſemble oats. The larger Guinea corn is round, and the grains are about the ſize of ſmall peaſe; they ſow it as we do wheat, and the ſtraw or reeds grow to nine or ten feet high; the grain is at the top in a large tuft. The leſſer Guinea corn is called manſeroke by the Portugueſe; this is likewiſe ſowed by hand, and ſhoots as high, the ſtalk being a large reed, on the top of which the corn grows on a head like a bulruſh, and is not much larger than canary ſeed.

Neither theſe people, nor the natural inhabitants, make bread nor cakes, but thicken liquids with the flour of the corn. The Indian corn is moſt uſed while green, which they parch like peaſe. They eat the rice boiled like the Turks and other eaſtern nations. The Fouleys are very induſtrious and frugal, and raiſe much more corn and cotton, than they conſume, which they ſell at reaſonable rates, and are ſo very hoſpitable, that a Fouley town is reckoned a bleſſing to the neighbourhood. They will not ſuffer any of their people to be made ſlaves, when it is in their power to redeem them, nor will they ſuffer any of thoſe to want, who are unable, through age or accident, to labour; beſides, they are a brave warlike people, and will not ſuffer any inſult without reſenting it in a proper manner. Their arms are lances, bows and arrows, ſhort cutlaſſes, and ſometimes guns. They commonly ſettle near a Mundingo town, and are ſtrict Mahometans, ſeldom drinking any thing ſtronger than water and ſugar.

They are great breeders of cattle, which they feed all the day in the ſavannahs, and, when the crop is off, in the rice-grounds.

grounds. The have always herdſmen to keep them within bounds. In every town they have a diſtinct place for the cattle, in the midſt of which is a ſtage eight or ten feet from the ground, and the ſame width, over which is a thatched roof, open on all ſides. Round this they drive ſtakes in a circular form, to tie the cattle to in the night. Four or five men are placed on this ſtage every night, to defend them from lions and other wild beaſts. They milk their cows morning and evening, while they are tied up.

They are great huntſmen, and will kill lions, tygers, and other wild beaſts; they hunt elephants, in a company of twenty or thirty, for their teeth and fleſh, which laſt they dry and eat. The elephants are ſo numerous, and ſo miſchievous, that they are ſometimes forced to make fires all round their corn to keep them away. They are almoſt the only people of that country, who make butter; this they barter up the rivers for ſalt. They dreſs in white cotton cloth of their own manufacture, and are always very clean, eſpecially the women. Their houſes, in every town, are placed at a diſtance from each other, and are of a circular form, and ſmall, thatched at the top, and are without windows, but the doors are large. The towns themſelves are ſurrounded with ſtakes or pales, and farther at a diſtance with a ſtrong thick hedge, to keep off the wild beaſts. On one ſide of the town, between the pales and the hedge, they plant their tobacco; and on the other is the place where the cattle are kept in the night.

FOULON, or FOULLON, (JOHN ERRARD) a learned Jeſuit, born of a noble family at Liege. He wrote ſeveral works, the moſt eſteemed of which is his Hiſtory, in Latin, of the Biſhops of Liege, in three volumes, folio. He died on the 25th of October, 1668.

FOULON (WILLIAM) in Latin Gnatheus, a Flemiſh Latin poet of the ſixteenth century, principally diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his comic verſes.

FOULSHAM, a town in the county of Norfolk, with a market on Tueſdays, and a fair on Eaſter-Tueſday, for petty chapmen. It is fifteen miles north-weſt of Norwich, and one hundred and eleven north-north-eaſt of London. Long. 1. 10. E. Lat. 52. 48. N.

FOUQUIERE (JAMES) an excellent Flemiſh painter of landicapes, born at Anvers. De Piles ſays, the difference between his pictures and theſe of Titian conſiſt rather in the countries repreſented than in the goodneſs of the pieces; the principles of both are the ſame, and the colouring alike good and regular. He painted for Rubens, of whom he learned the moſt eſſential part of his art. The elector Palatine employed him at Heidelberg, and thence going to Paris, he painted the Louvre, under the reign of Lewis XIII. and acquired great reputation by his pictures. He died at Paris, in 1659, aged ſeventy-nine.

FOUR (DOM THOMAS DU) a learned writer, was born at Fecamp, in Normandy, in 1613, and not only taught Hebrew, but maintained philoſophical theſes in that language at ſeventeen years of age. He alſo underſtood the Greek and Latin tongues. He became a Benedictine of the abbey of St. Maur, at Jumiege, in 1637, where he died on the 1ſt of February, 1647. He wrote, 1. An Hebrew Grammar. 2. A Paraphraſe on Solomon's Songs. 3. A ſpiritual Teſtament, to ſerve as a Preparation for Death, &c.

FOURMONT (STEPHEN) profeſſor of the Arabic and Chineſe languages, and one of the moſt learned men of his time, was born Herbelai, a village four leagues from Paris, on the 18th of June, 1683. He ſtudied in Mazarine college, and afterwards in the Seminary of Thirty-three. He was at length profeſſor of Arabic in the Royal college, and was made a member of the Academy of Inſcriptions. In 1738, he was choſen a member of the Royal Society, in London, and of that of Berlin, in 1741. He was often conſulted by the duke of Orleans, firſt prince of the blood, who had a particular eſteem for him, and made him one of his ſecretaries. He wrote a great number of books, the moſt conſiderable of thoſe which have been printed are, 1. The Roots of the Latin Tongue, in verſe. 2. Critical Reflections on the Hiſtories of ancient Nations, two volumes, quarto. 4. A Chineſe Grammar, in Latin, folio. 5. Several Diſſertations printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inſcriptions, &c. He died at Paris, on the 18th of December, 1745, aged ſixty-two.

He ought not to be confounded with Michael Fourmont, his youngeſt brother, who took orders, was profeſſor of the Syriac language in the Royal college, and a member of the Academy of Inſcriptions. He died on the 5th of February, 1746.

FOWEY, or FOY, a borough town of Cornwall, with a market on Saturdays. It is well fortified, and its haven is ſecured with block-houſes. It is ſeated on the weſt ſide of the river Foy, near the Engliſh Channel, and ſends two members to parliament. Its fairs are on May 1, and September 10, for horſes, oxen, ſheep, cloth, and a few hops. It is eighty-two miles weſt-by-ſouth of Exeter, and two hundred and forty weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 5. 2. W. Lat. 50. 20. N.

FOWLER (EDWARD) biſhop of Glouceſter, was born at Weſterleigh, in that county, and educated at Corpus-Chriſti college, Oxford, from whence he removed to Cambridge, where, having taken the degrees of bachelor and maſter of arts, he was preſented to the rectory of North-hill, in Bedfordſhire. He ſcrupled embracing, for ſome time, the terms of conformity enjoined at the Reſtoration; but he afterwards conformed, and became a great ornament to the church. In 1673, he was collated to the rectory of Allhallows, Bread-ſtreet, in London, and ſoon after to the vicarage of St. Giles's, Cripplegate. During the ſtruggle between proteſtantiſm and popery, he ſignaliſed himſelf by his writings and ſermons. After the Revolution, he was promoted to the biſhoprick of Glouceſter; and in this ſee he continued till his death, which happened at Chelſea, on the 26th of Auguſt, 1714, in the eighty-ſecond year of his age. He was the author of many excellent works, among which are, 1. A dialogue, intitled, the Principles and Practices of certain moderate Divines of the Church of England, abuſively called Latitudinarians, greatly miſunderſtood, truly repreſented, and defended. 2. The Deſign of Chriſtianity. 3. A Diſcourſe of Chriſtian Liberty. 4. Some pieces againſt popery, &c.

FOX, or FOXE, (RICHARD) an eminent ſtateſman and biſhop, in part of the fifteenth and ſixteenth centuries, and founder of Corpus-Chriſti college, in Oxford, was born at Ropeſley, near Grantham, in Lincolnſhire, and ſtudied at Magdalen college, in Oxford; but the plague obliged him to retire from thence, and proſecute his ſtudies at Pembroke-hall, in Cambridge, after which, he went, for his farther improvement, to Paris. He was there introduced to Henry, earl of Richmond, who was then meditating a deſcent upon England, in order to dethrone Richard III. and was employed by him in procuring men and money from the court of France. Henry, on his obtaining the crown of England, by his victory at Boſworth, on the 22d of Auguſt, 1485, made doctor Fox, one of his privy counſellors, and a prebendary of Sarum, and he was ſoon after nominated biſhop of Exeter. On the 24th of February, 1486-7, he was appointed keeper of the privy ſeal, and he was alſo made principal ſecretary of ſtate, and maſter of St. Creſſe, near Wincheſter. He was afterwards employed in embaſſies abroad of great importance, and on the 8th of February, 1491-2, was tranſlated to the ſee of Bath and Wells, from whence he was the next year tranſlated to that of Durham. In 1500, he was made biſhop of Wincheſter, where he principally ſpent the reſt of his life in great affluence and honour, but met with ſeveral mortifications in the reign of Henry VIII. particularly by Wolſey's being introduced to court. However, in 1513, he attended the king, in his expedition into France with a large retinue, and was at the taking of Terouenne. In 1515, he retired to his dioceſe, and employed himſelf in works of charity and munificence. About this time, he was employed in the noble foundation of Corpus-Chriſti college, in Oxford. In 1522, he founded a free-ſchool at Taunton, in Somerſetſhire, and alſo at Grantham, near his native place. At Wincheſter, he covered the choir of the cathedral, the preſbytery, and iſles adjoining, with a good vault, &c. He had the misfortune of being blind for about ten years before his death, which happened on the 14th of September, 1528.

FOX (EDWARD) biſhop of Hereford, and almoner to king Henry VII. was born at Durſley, in Glouceſterſhire, and, after paſſing through Eton ſchool, was, on the 27th of March, 1512, admitted of King's college, in Cambridge, of which he was elected provoſt in December, 1528. Being a perſon of great addreſs, he was, in 1528, ſent ambaſſador to Rome, jointly with Stephen Gardiner, afterwards biſhop of Wincheſter, to obtain new bulls from pope Clement VII. for king Henry's divorce, from Catharine of Arragon, and was afterwards employed in embaſſies both in France and Germany. In 1535, he was promoted to the biſhoprick of Hereford, and a few months after his conſecration, was ſent ambaſſador to the proteſtant princes in Germany, then aſſembled at Smalcald, whom he exhorted to unite, in point of doctrine, with the church of England. He ſpent the winter at Wirtemberg, and held ſeveral conferences with ſome of the German divines, in order to conclude a treaty with them upon many articles of religion; but nothing was effected. He was reputed one of the beſt divines in England, and a principal pillar of the Reformation, as to the politic and prudential part of it. He publiſhed a work, intitled De vera Differentia Regiæ Poteſtatis et Eccleſiaſticæ, et quæ ſit ipſa Veritas et Virtus utriuſque, which was afterwards tranſlated into Engliſh by Henry, lord Stafford. He alſo wrote Annotations upon Mantuan, the poet. He died at London, on the 8th of May, 1538.

FOX (JOHN) an eminent eccleſiaſtical hiſtorian, was born at Boſton, in Lincolnſhire, and was educated at Oxford. He diſdiſcovered in his youth a genius for poetry, and compoſed ſeveral Latin Comedies in an elegant ſtyle. He afterwards applied himſelf entirely to divinity, and diſſatisfied with the ſtate of religion under Henry VIII. was ſuſpected of hereſy, which greatly diſpleaſed his friends; his father-in-law in particular grew implacable, and reſolved to detain from Mr. Fox his own father's eſtate, ſo that he was reduced to diſtreſs. At this time he was taken into the houſe of Sir Thomas Lacy of Warwickſhire, to inſtruct his children, where he married, and continued till they had no longer occaſion for a tutor. Being now again reduced to great neceſſity, he with ſome difficulty procured entertainment from his father-in-law, and a few years after removed to London, when, in the midſt of the greateſt diſtreſs imaginable, he was made tutor to the children of the earl of Surry; in this family he lived at Ryegate, in the laſt years of the reign of king Henry VIII. and the whole reign of king Edward VI. and was the firſt man who preached the goſpel in that place, which he did, even when the popiſh religion was in great ſtrength. Upon the acceſſion of queen Mary to the throne, Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, being reſolved to ſeize him, the duke of Norfolk, his pupil, cauſed a bark to be hired for him at Ipſwich haven, in which he, with ſome difficulty, made his eſcape to Newport, from whence he went to Antwerp, Francfort, and afterwards to Baſil, where he maintained himſelf by correcting the preſs for Oporinus, a printer. After queen Elizabeth was ſettled on the throne, he returned to England, and might have been raiſed to very conſiderable preferments in the church, if he would have accepted them; but the only ones he enjoyed were the prebend of Shipton, in the church of Saliſbury, and the vicarage of St. Giles's, near Cripplegate, London. He publiſhed in England his Acts and Monuments of the Church, in 3 vols. folio. "This great work, ſays the ingenious and reverend "Mr. Granger, may be regarded as a vaſt Gothic build-"ing, in which ſome things are ſuperfluous, and others "manifeſtly wrong; but which altogether infuſe a kind "of religious reverence, and we ſtand amazed at the la-"bour, if not at the ſkill of the architect. This book "was, by order of queen Elizabeth, placed in the com-"mon-halls of archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, archdeacons, "and heads of colleges, and was long looked upon with "a veneration, next to that for the Scriptures themſelves. "The ſame has been ſaid of Fox, which was afterwards "ſaid of Burnet, that ſeveral perſons furniſhed him with "accounts of pretended facts, with a view of ruining the "credit of his whole peformance. But the author does "not ſtand in need of this apoloogy, as it was impoſſible, "in human nature, to avoid many errors in ſo volumi-"nous a work, a great part of which conſiſts of anecdotes." This worthy divine, who was as remarkable for his piety and humanity, as he was for his zeal for the proteſtant religion, wrote ſeveral other works. He died on the 18th of April, 1587, and was interred in the church of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, where a monument was erected to his memory.

FOX (GEORGE) the founder of the ſect of Quakers, was born at Drayton, a village in Leiceſterſhire, and was by trade a ſhoe-maker; but imagining himſelf under the divine illumination, ſhut up his ſhop, which was at Nottingham, and ſet up for a preacher, when he exclaimed with great vehemence againſt the diſorders of the times, and advanced many new and ſingular doctrines. Cromwell cauſed him to be ſeized, and thrown into priſon, and forbid his followers holding any aſſemblies, but this prohibition was of little effect, for his ſect ſoon grew very numerous. He died in 1681.

FOX (MORZILLO SEBASTIAN) in Latin Foxus Morzillus, a learned writer, born at Seville in 1528. He ſtudied in Spain and the Netherlands, and acquired an extraordinay reputation by his works. Philip II. king of Spain, having nominated him to be preceptor to the infant Don Carlos, he quitted Louvain, and embarked on board a veſſel to attend that prince, but was unhappily caſt away, and periſhed in the flower of his age. He wrote a Commentary on the Timæus and Phœdo of Plato, and ſeveral other works, which are eſteemed.

FRACASTOR (JEROME) a famous poet and phyſician, born at Verona in the year 1482. He made ſuch a progreſs in polite literature and the ſciences, that beſides his becoming a good poet and phyſician, he became diſtinguiſhed for his knowledge in philoſophy and aſtronomy. Pope Paul IV. made uſe of him in removing the Council of Trent to Bologna in 1547, under the pretence, that he foreſaw that the former city would be afflicted with a contagious diſtemper. Fracaſtor was the intimate friend of cardinal Bembo and Julius Scaliger. He died of an apoplexy at Caſi, near Verona, on the 6th of Auguſt, 1553, aged ſeventy-one. The city of Verona erected a ſtatue to his memory in 1559. He wrote an excellent poem, intitled Syphillis; another, intitled Joſeph; A Treatiſe on contagious Diſeaſes; another on Sympathy and Antipathy, &c. The beſt edition of his works is that of Padua, in 1735, printed in 2 volumes, quarto.

FRACHETTA (JEROME) a native of Rovigo in Italy, acquired a great reputation in the ſixteenth century, by his political works, the moſt conſiderable of which is his Il Seminario de Governi di Stato & di Guerra, in 4to. He died at Naples at the beginning of the ſeventeenth century.

FRAGA, an ancient town of Spain, in the kingdom of Arragon. It is ſtrong by ſituation, being in the midſt of mountains, near the river Cinca, whoſe banks are very high, and on the back of a hill, which keeps it out of the reach of large cannon. The gardens of this town produce ſeveral pot-herbs, but the grounds about it are quite barren. There is a bridge over the Cinca. It is thirty miles ſouth of Balbaſtro, and fifty ſouth-eaſt of Saragoſſa. Long. 0. 5. E. Lat. 41. 21. N.

FRAGUIER (CLAUDE FRANCIS) a learned member of the French Academy, and of that of Inſcriptions, was born at Paris on the 28th of Auguſt, 1666. He wrote ſome Latin poems which are much eſteemed, and many excellent diſſertations, printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inſcriptions. He died of an apoplexy on the 3d of May, 1728.

FRAMLINGTON, or FRAMLINGHAM, a town of Suffolk, with a market on Saturdays, and two fairs, on Whit-Monday, and September 29, for millenery goods, cloths, and toys. It is ſeated near the head of a ſmall rivulet, running into the Orford, and is a large town, ſtanding on a clay-hill. It is defended by a ſpacious lofty caſtle, built by the Saxons, which is walled, and has double ditches on one ſide, and a large meer on the other. It had thirteen high towers, but is now gone to decay, there being only a large dwelling-houſe left, with a grammar ſchool-houſe; but its out-works are more like a caſtle than the ruins of one. Its chief ornament is the church, wherein are ſeveral monuments. It is eighteen miles north-north eaſt of Ipſwich, and eighty-ſeven north-eaſt of London. Long. 1. 30 E. Lat. 52. 25. N.

FRAMPTON, a town of Dorſetſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, and four fairs, on March 4, March 7, Auguſt 1, and September 4, for all ſorts of cattle. It is pleaſantly ſeated on a good river which affords excellent trouts, and other fiſh. It is forty-one miles ſouth of Wells, twelve north of Weymouth, ſeventy-four ſouth of Briſtol, and one hundred and thirty weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 2. 42. W. Lat. 50. 43. N.

FRANC (MARTIN LE) prothonotory of the holy ſee, and afterwards ſecretary to the anti-pope Felix V. and pope Nicholas V. He flouriſhed about the middle of the fifteenth century, and paſſed for one of the beſt French poets in his time. He wrote a Poem againſt the Romance of the Rape, intitled, The Champion of the Ladies, in which he mentions pope Joan; another work in proſe and verſe, intitled, l'Eſtrif de la Fortune, & de la Vertu, printed at Paris in 1505.

FRANCE, a kingdom of Europe, bounded on the north by the Low Countries; on the eaſt by Germany, Swiſſerland, Savoy, and the Alps; on the ſouth by the Mediterranean Sea and the Pyrenean mountains, which ſeparate it from Spain; and on the weſt by the ocean. It is in length from Dunkirk in Flanders, to Rouſſillon, ſeven hundred and twenty miles, and in breadth ſix hundred and ſixty. The Roman Catholic religion is only allowed ſince the revocation of the Edict of Nantz in 1685.

All that part of Germany lying between the Rhine, the Elbe, and the Weſer, had formerly the name of France, becauſe the inhabitants being united againſt the Romans, aſſumed the name of Franks, that is, Free Men. This people conquering part of Gaul and Germany, gave the name of France to all the countries they ſubdued. Thus there were four large countries which bore this name, France Trans-Rhenan, France Gauloiſe Mineure, France Gauloiſe Majeure, and New France. This laſt is part of Germany from which the name of Franconia is derived.

The kingdom of France, of which we are now treating, is very ancient, having continued ſince the year 425, which is above thirteen centuries. But this monarchy has not always had the ſame extent which it now hath. Under the firſt race of kings it only contained the provinces of Paris, Soiſſons, Orleans, Aquitain, Brittany, Burgundy, Auſtraſia, and Metz, which comprehended all that part of Gaul, which lies along the Rhine, Suabia in Germany, Thuringia, Frieſland, and a part of Saxony. Charlemagne, the head of the ſecond race of kings, added the remaining part of Germany, the two Pannonias, Upper Mœſia, Lombardy in Italy, and part of Spain, and then it was called the empire of France. But it was diſmembered during the reign of the firſt emperor. It not only only loſt that part inhabited by the Gauls, but ſeveral ſovereignties were formed in Gaul itſelf, as the duchies of Lorrain and Normandy, and the kingdoms of Burgundy, Arles, &c. by which the bounds of the kingdom of France were much contracted.

The number of kings from the firſt foundation of this monarchy to the preſent time, is ſixty-five; that is, twenty-two of the firſt race, thirteen of the ſecond, and thirty-one of the third, including Lewis XV. now reigning. The firſt were called Merovingians, the ſecond, Carlovingians, and the other, Capetians. This kingdom contains twenty-one univerſities, eighteen archbiſhopricks, one hundred and twelve biſhopricks, twelve boards of accounts, twelve courts of aides, two courts and thirty hotels belonging to the mints, three ſupreme councils, beſides the grand council, as will be mentioned more particularly hereafter.

The air of France is very temperate and healthful, being in the middle of the temperate zone, and the land is agreeably diverſified with riſing hills, beautiful valleys, vaſt plains, and is generally cultivated throughout the whole kingdom.

The rivers are, the Loire, the Seine, the Rhone, and the Garonne, beſides ſeveral leſſer rivers which will be taken notice of when the provinces are particularly deſcribed.

The ports, havens, or harbours of France, are ſeventeen, namely, 1. Dunkirk, and, 2. Gravelines in Flander; 3. Calais in Picardy; 4. Dieppe, and, 5. Havre, in Normandy, 6. St. Malo, 7. Breſt, and, 8. L'Orient, at which laſt the ſhips for the Indies put in; 9. Port Lewis, in Britany, 10. Rochelle, in the territory of Aunis, which receives the veſſels that come from America; 11. Rochfort, 12. Bourdeaux, 13. Bayonne, and, 14. St. John de Luz, in Guienne; on the Mediterranean there are, 15. Cette, in Languedoc, 16. Toulon, and, 17. Marſeilles in Provence.

In the north there are three medicinal ſprings, at Forges in Upper Normandy, Plombieres in the ſouth part of Lorrain, and Bourbonne le Bains, near Langres in Champagne. In the middle, two; at Bourbon l'Archambaud, near Moulins in Bourbonnois; and Vicher on the river Allier, near Riom in Auvergne. Three in the ſouth; at Barrege and Bagnieres in the diſtrict of Bigorre, near the Pyrenean mountains in Gaſcony; and Balaruc, near Montpelier in Languedoc.

The provinces of France are, Alſace, Angoumois, Anjou, Armagnac, Artois, Aunis, Auvergne, Beaujolois, Beauce, Berri, Bigorre, Bourbonnois, Burgundy, Breſſe, Britany, La Brie, Bugey, the three biſhopricks, Cambreſis, Champagne, Dauphiny, Flanders, Forez, Franche-Comté, Gaſcony, Guienne, Hainault, the Iſle of France, Languedoc, Limoſin, Lorraine, Lyonnois, Le Maine, La Marche, Navarre, Nivernois, Normandy, Orleannois, Perche, Perigord, Picardy, Poitou, Provence, Querci, Rouergue, Rouſſillon, Saintonge, Touraine, and Viverais, which ſee in their proper places.

France contains eighteen archbiſhopricks, 1. Lions, 2. Rouen, 3. Tours, 4. Sens, 5. Paris, 6. Beſanzon, 7. Rheims, 8. Cambray, 9. Bourges, 10. Alby, 11. Bourdeaux, 12. Narbonne, 13. Toulouſe, 14. Aix, 15. Vienne, 16. Arles, 17. Avignon, and, 18. Embrun in Dauphiny. The biſhopricks of Lorrain, Metz, Verdun, and Treves, are not reckoned here, becauſe they are ſuffragans of Treves in Germany.

The archbiſhoprick of Cambray has four ſuffragans, Arras, St. Omer, Tournay, and Namur, in the Low Countries. The archbiſhoprick of Rouen in Normandy has ſix, viz. the biſhoprick of Liſieux and Evreux, in Upper Normandy; Sees, Avranches, Coutance, and Bayeux, in Lower Normandy. The archbiſhoprick of Paris, in the Iſle of France, contains four biſhopricks, Meux in la Brie Champenoiſe, Chartres in Beauſſe, Orleans in Orleannois, and Blois in Blaſois. The archbiſhoprick of Rheims, in Champagne, comprehends eight, Soiſſons, Senlis, Beauvais, Laon, and Noyon, in the Iſle of France; Amiens, and Boulogne, in Picardy; and Chalons-ſur-Marne, in Champagne.

The archbiſhoprick of Sens, in Champagne, includes four biſhopricks, Troyes, in the ſame province; Auxerre, in Bethleem; and Nevers, in the Nivernois. The archbiſhoprick of Tours of Touraine, contains eleven, Mans, in Maine, Rennes, Dol, St. Malo, St. Brieux, Trequier, St. Paul in Bretagne, Nantes, Vannes, and Quimper-Corentin, all in Brittany. The archbiſhoprick of Bourges, in Berry, includes five, Limoges and Tulles in Limouſin, St. Flour, in Auvergne, and Puy, in Velay. The archbiſhoprick of Benſançon, in French-Comté, comprehends three, Bellay in Bugey, Bazil and Lauſanne in Swiſſerland. The archbiſhoprick of Lyons, in Lyonnois, contains five biſhopricks, thoſe of Macon, Chalons-ſur-Saone, Autun, and Dijon, in Burgundy; St. Claude, in Franche Comté; and Langres, in Champagne. The archbiſhoprick of Vienne, four, Grenoble, Valence, and Die, in Dauphiny; Viviers, in Viverais. The archbiſhoprick of Embrun, in Dauphiny, has five, Digne, Sennez, Glandenns, Grace, and Vens, in Provence. The archbiſhoprick of Arles, in Provence, comprehends four, Marſeilles and Toulon, in Provence; Orange, in the principality of that name, and St. Paul-trois-Chatevaux. The archbiſhoprick of Aix, in Provence, contains five, Apt, Siſteon, Riez, and Frejus, in Provence; and Gap, in Dauphiny. The archbiſhoprick of Narbonne, in Languedoc, contains eleven biſhopricks; viz. Carcaſſonne, Alet, Agde, Beſiers, St. Pons, Lodeve, Montpellier, Niſmes, Alais, and Uſez, in Languedoc; and Perpignan, in Rouſſillon. The archbiſhoprick of Alby, in Languedoc, has five Cahors in Quercy; Rodez, and Vahors, in Rouerge; Minde, in Gevaudan, and Caſtres, in Languedoc. The archbiſhoprick of Toulouſe, in Languedoc, comprehends ſeven, Lavaur, St. Papoul, Rieux, and Mirepoix, in Languedoc; Pamiers, in the diſtrict of Foix, Lombez, in Gaſcony; and Montauban, in Quercy. The archbiſhoprick of Auch, in Vienne, contains ſeven, Leiture, Bazas, Aine, Dax, and Bayonne, in Gaſcony; Leſcar, ond Oleron, in Bearne; Comminges, and Conſerans, in Gaſcony. The arbiſhoprick of Bourdeaux, in Guienne, includes eight, Rochelle; in the diſtrict of Aunis; Poitiers, and Luzan, in Poitou, Saintes, in Saintonge; Angouleſme, in Angoumois; Perigueux, and Sarlat, in Perigord; Agen, in Guienne; and Condom, in Gaſcony. Archbiſhopricks, biſhopricks, and abbeys, pay the profits of the firſt year to the pope; they are called by us, firſt fruits, and by the French, annates. The king fills up the vacant ſees and abbeys, and preſents to the benefices which depend thereon, till they are filled up, except thoſe with the cure of ſouls, and likewiſe receives the revenues during the vacancy.

The king of France has the title of the moſt Chriſtian king, and eldeſt Son of the Church, notwithſtanding which, there have been ſeveral quarrels between him and the pope. Beſides, there have been diviſions in the Gallican church itſelf. That which now exiſts, was occaſioned by the bull Unigenitus, in which pope Clement XI. condemns one hundred and one propoſitions in the New Teſtament of P. Queſnel. Thoſe who oppoſe this bull are called Janſeniſts, becauſe they follow the ſentiments of Cornelius Janſenius, biſhop of Ypres, in Flanders, who died in 1638. Great numbers of the clergy have thought proper to refuſe the ſacrament to the Janſeniſts, which has occaſioned great diſputes.

Though the religion now profeſſed in France is only the Roman Catholic, yet there were formerly a great number of Proteſtants called Hugonots. Theſe were tolerated by the famous edict of Nantes, made by Henry IV. in their favour in 1597. Before this edict, they were determined to root the reformed out of the kingdom, and this gave riſe to the civil wars, which did ſo much miſchief in that kingdom, and occaſioned the dreadful maſſacre at Paris in 1572, on the night of St. Bartholomew, when thirty thouſand of the principal Proteſtants were murdered in cold blood. After the promulgation of the famous edict, the Papiſts endeavoured to undermine them by degrees, by taking poſſeſſion of all their fortified places, then by excluding them from all public offices, and then by the revocation of the edict itſelf, in 1685, when all the Proteſtant clergy were baniſhed the kingdom, and the dragoons were ſent from place to place, exerciſing unheard-of cruelties, to force the Hugonots to change their religion, at the ſame time that their children were ſhut up in convents. In conſequence of theſe proceedings, great numbers turned Papiſts, and others ſtole out of the kingdom, flying into England, Holland, Germany and Swiſſerland, while others, who were taken, were commited to priſon, and ſent to the galleys, or otherwiſe cruelly puniſhed. Some again who were newly converted, being troubled in mind, fled to the mountains of Cevennes, where they ſtood on the defenſive.

There are twenty-one univerſities in France, of which ſix are in the north, as Douay, in Flanders; Caen, in Normandy; Paris, in the iſle of France; Rheims, in Champagne; Pont-à-Mouſſon, in Lorrain; and Straſburgh, in Alſace. Seven are in the middle, viz. Nantes, in Bretagne; Angers, in Anjou; Orleans, for law only; Bourges, in Berry; Poitiers, in Poitou; Beſançon, in the Franche Comté; and Dijon, in Burgundy. The remaining eight are in the ſouth, namely, Valence, in Dauphiny; Cahors, in Quercy; Bourdeaux, in Guienne; Aix, in Provence; Orange, in the Comtat of Avignon; Toulouſe and Montpelier, in Languedoc; and Perpignan, in Rouſſillon.

Beſides theſe, there are ſeveral academies, deſigned to cultivate and bring to perfection ſeveral ſciences; as, the French Academy, founded by cardinal Richlieu, in 1635. They aſſembled, for the firſt time, on the 10th of July, 1657. Every three months they have a new director and a new chancellor, who are choſen by lots. The members of this academy meet three times a week, in the Old Louvre. Their principal deſign is to improve the French language, eloquence, and poetry. They celebrate the feaſt of St. Lewis every year, on the 24th of Auguſt; and on this day they diſtribute the prizes, which conſiſt of two medals of gold, the one two hundred livres in value, for him who produces the beſt piece of eloquence; the other has the buſt of the reigning king, and is worth three hundred livres: it is beſtowed on him who delivers in the beſt poem.

The Academy of Inſcriptions and Belles Lettres was founded by Lewis XIV. at the ſollicitation of John Baptiſt Colbert, his prime miniſter. At firſt they only ſtudied medals, devices, and inſcriptions; but afterwards they applied their minds to the belles lettres, and the learned languages. The academicians are forty in number, and they meet twice a week in the Louvre.

The Academy of Sciences likewiſe owes its eſtabliſhment to Colbert, who laid down the plan in 1666. It conſiſts of ſeventy members, who meet on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, in the Palace Royal. Theſe publiſh their Memoirs every year, which are not unlike the Philoſophical Tranſactions.

The Academy of Painting and Sculpture began in 1643. The academicians have two large halls in the Louvre, where they work, and young people go for inſtruction. The profeſſors are judges of their performances.

The Academy of Architecture is alſo owing to M. Colbert, who founded it in 1671. It is divided into two claſſes; the firſt conſiſts of eleven academicians, and the ſecond of ſeventeen.

The Academy of Politics was founded by the marquis de Torcy, miniſter of ſtate. It is not ſo public as the others, becauſe they treat of affairs of ſtate therein. They admit a certain number of young men, to whom they intruſt ſeveral acts, treaties, and documents. They are ſkilled in the languages of ſeveral nations: thoſe who are found to have great capacities are advanced to the moſt important offices in the kingdom, and employed in negociations with foreign countries.

Beſides theſe, there is an Academy of Muſic, much frequented by thoſe who have a taſte for this art, eſpecially foreigners. To theſe we may add, five mathematical ſchools, erected by Lewis XIV. in different parts of the kingdom, where young gentlemen are inſtructed in all ſuch learning as will qualify them to ſerve his majeſty, as well by land as by ſea.

The king of France is a ſovereign monarch, and the ſucceſſion is ſo well eſtabliſhed that the king never dies. The law which excludes the women from the throne is called the Salique law. The king has a great number of officers, inſomuch that it would take up a great deal of room only to mention their names, and diſtinguiſh their different poſts and employs. The chief officer of the court was formerly the conſtable; but this high place was aboliſhed in 1627. The principal eccleſiaſtical officer at preſent is the grand almoner; and the temporal, the grand maitre de hotel.

The officers employed in the government of provinces are likewiſe very numerous; it being a maxim in France to multiply employments as much as poſſible, to create a great number of dependents on the court, and to raiſe an emulation who ſhall beſt perform their duty.

It is difficult to enumerate the chambers of boards of the king's council, they are altered ſo often; and therefore we ſhall only mention the principal. Theſe are,

I. The council of the regency, which aſſembles three times a week in the palace of the Thuilleries.

II. The council of conſcience, which meets twice a week in the palace of the archbiſhop of Paris, and of which he is preſident.

III. The council of foreign affairs, who aſſemble twice a week in the Louvre.

IV. The council of war, which is likewiſe held twice a week in the Louvre.

V. The council for marine affairs, which is alſo kept twice a-week at the Louvre.

VI. The council of the finances. The members of this meet twice a-week in the Louvre.

VII. The council for home affairs is held twice a-week.

VIII. The council of trade have likewiſe their meeting twice a-week, as the former.

The peerage of France is a dignity connected to certain eſtates in land. The dukes and peers have the ſame functions in the conſecration of the king of France, as the electors of Germany have at the coronation of the emperor. But the common functions, are to aſſiſt the parliament of Paris, where they have a right to vote ſitting. The body of the peers is very ancient, and it was formerly compoſed only of a dozen, of whom ſix were ſpiritual, and ſix temporal. Among the ſpiritual there were the archbiſhops of Rheims, Laon, and Langres; and the biſhops of Beauvais, Chalons, and Noyon. Among the temporal there were the three dukes of Burgundy, Normandy, and Guienne; and the three counts, or earls, of Toulouſe, Flanders, and Champagne.

There is no alteration in this body with regard to the ſpiritual peers, only the dignity of a duke and peer has been conferred on the archbiſhop of Paris, and that of Metz. As to the temporal peers, the families were no ſooner extinct, but their eſtates were united to the crown, inſomuch that at this day ſix perſons of the firſt diſtinction are choſen to occupy the places of the three dukes and the three earls.

In proceſs of time the dignity of peer of France became very common, inſomuch that there are few duchies in the kingdom that have not been erected into peerages. At preſent there are fifty-eight, which we ſhall enumerate in an alphabetical order; 1. Albert; 2 Antin; 3. Aumale; 4. Aumont; 5. Berwick; 6. Bethune; 7. Bouflours; 8. Bourbon; 9. Briſac; 10. Chateau Roux; 11. Chartres; 12. Chateau Thierri; 13. Chateau Villain; 14. Chaunes; 15. Chatillon; 16. Coiſlin; 17. Damville; 18. Elbeauf; 19. Eſtrees; 20. Eu; 21. Fleuri; 22. Force; 23. Fronſac; 24. Gramont; 25. Guiſe; 26. Harcourt; 27. Hoſtun Tallard; 28. Joyeuſe; 29. Luines; 30. Meilberage; 31. Montbazan; 32. Montmorenci; 33. Montpenſier; 34. Montemar; 35. Nemours; 36. Noailles; 37. Orleans; 38. Penthievre; 39. Piney; 40. Rambouillet; 41. Rhetel; 42. Richlieu; 43. Rochefaucaut; 44. Rohan Chabot; 45. Rohan Rohan; 46. Rouannois; 47. St. Aignan; 48. St. Simon; 49. Sulli; 50. Thouars; 51. Tremes; 52. Valentinois; 53. Valois; 54. Vaujours; 55. Villars; 56. Villars Brancas; 57. Villeroi; 58. Uſez.

Juſtice in general is diſtributed by the parliaments, which are the ſupreme courts from whence there is no appeal. Of theſe there are twelve, five of which are in the north, viz. Rouen, Paris, Douay, Rennes, and Metz. Two are in the middle, Dijon and Beſançon; and five are in the ſouth, namely, Bourdeaux, Pau, Toulouſe, Aix, and Grenoble. Their juriſdiction extends no farther than the governments in which they are ſituated, except that of Paris, whoſe juriſdiction extends all over the kingdom.

The parliament of Paris is the moſt illuſtrious, not only for its antiquity and extent, but alſo becauſe it is the court of peers, in which they have a right to be judges. The ancient peers who had this right have been mentioned above. It has been ſaid that the parliaments were always obliged to regiſter the edicts of the king, but the late ſtand made by the parliaments, and particularly that of Paris, ſhews the contrary, though it muſt be owned they have ſtruggled hard for their liberties.

We may likewiſe obſerve that there are four ſupreme councils in France, 1. the grand council eſtabliſhed at Paris, whoſe juriſdiction extends all over the kingdom, though it is now reſtrained to beneficial matters, and to a few others by commiſſion: 2. the ſupreme council of Artois; it is ſettled at Arras: 3. the ſupreme council of Alſace, ſettled at Colmar: 4. that of Rouſſillon, which reſides at Perpignan.

The juſtices who depend on the parliaments and the ſupreme councils are the preſidials, the bailliages, and the ſeneſchals. Theſe are inferior courts, deſigned to determine cauſes, from whence there lies an appeal to higher courts in matters of importance.

The boards of accounts are ſuperior courts, which are very ancient. In theſe they take an account of the money belonging to the king, and put it down in a regiſter. They likewiſe take care of whatever concerns the king's domains. Of theſe there are fifteen in the kingdom, namely, at Liſle in Flanders, Aire in Artois, Rouen in Normandy, Paris in the Iſle of France, to which all the reſt ſend in duplicates of their accounts; Nantes in Bretany, Blois for the Apanage of the duke of Orleans; Dijon in Burgundy, being the court of Aydes, united to the parliament of Dijon; Dole in the Franche Comté, Grenoble in Dauphiny, united to the parliament, Aix in Provence, Montpellier in Languedoc, and Pau in Bearn, united to the parliament of the ſame city.

The courts of Aydes are ſuperior juriſdictions, eſtabliſhed to determine cauſes relating to the king's revenue, except the domain. Of theſe there are twelve; Paris, Rouen, Metz, united to the parliament of the ſame city; Rennes, united to the parliament of the ſame place; Dijon likewiſe united to the parliament; Clermont in Auvergne; Grenoble united to the parliament; Montpellier, united to the board of accounts; Montauban in Quercy; Bourdeaux and Pau in Bearn, united to the parliament.

A generality is the extent of a board of the treaſurers of France, eſtabliſhed to facilitate the receipt of the taxes, and and other revenues of the crown. Each generality has a particular intendant, comptroller, or ſurveyor, except Toulouſe and Montpellier, which are under the ſame. There are twenty generalities divided into elections, and twelve without elections.

The elections are courts which try cauſes relating to the taxes and impoſts, except gabels and the domain of the king. The twenty generalities divided into elections are,

I. Amiens, which has ſix, viz. Amiens, Abbeville, Dourlens, Peronne, St. Quentin, Montdidier. Artois is contained in the ſame generality, but has no elections.

II. Rouen has fourteen elections, namely, Rouen, Arques, Eu, Neufchatel, Lyons, Giſors, Chaumont, Andelis, Evereux, Pont de l'Arche, Pont l'Eveque, Ponteaudemes, Caudebec, and Montivilliers.

III. Caen has nine, Caen, Bayeux, Valogne, Carentan, St. Lo, Coutance, Vire, Avranche, and Mortain.

IV. Alençon has nine elections, Alençon, Domfront, Argentan, Falaiſe, Liſieux, Bernay, Conches, Verneuil, and Mortagne.

V. Paris has twenty-two elections, Paris, Maute, Dreux, Monfort l'Aumaury, Pontoiſe, Beauvais, Senlis, Compiegne, Meaux, Coulommiers, Roſoy, Melun, Provins, Montreaux, Nemours, Etampes, Nogent ſur Seine, Ivigny, St. Florentin, Tonerre, and Veſelay.

VI. Soiſſons has ſeven elections, Soiſſons, Laon, Guiſe, Noyen, Clermont, Crepy, and Chateau-Thierry.

VII. Chalons ſur Marne has twelve elections, Chalons, Epernay, Reims, Rhetel, Sedan, St. Menehoult, Vitry-Joinville, Chaumont, Langres, Bar ſur Aube, Troyes, and Seſanne.

VIII. Orleans has twelve elections, Orleans, Pitiviers, Montagis, Dourdan, Chartres, Chateaudan, Vendome, Blois, Beaugency, Gien, Clamecy, and Romorantin.

IX. Poitiers has nine, Poitiers, Conſolent, St. Maixent, Niort, Fontenay, Les Sables, d'Olenne, Moleon, Thouars, and Chatelleraud.

X. Rochelle has five, Rochelle, St. Jean d'Angely, Marenes, Saintes, and Coignac.

XI. Tours has ſixteen elections, Tours, Amboiſe, Loches, Chinon, Loudun, Richlieu, Montreuil-Bellay, Saumur, Angers, Beaugé la Fleche, Chateau du Loire, Mans, Mayenne, Laval, and Chateau-Gontier.

XII. Bourges has ſeven elections, Bourges, Iſſoudun, Chateau-Roux, Le Blanc, La Chatre, St. Amand, and La Charité.

XIII. Moulins has ſeven elections, Gannat, Moulins, Nevers, Chateau-Chinon, Mont Luzon, Garet, and Cambrailles.

XIV. Limoges has five elections, Limoges, Bourganeuf, Tulle, Brive, and Angouleſme.

XV. Riom has ſix elections, Riom, Clermont, Iſſoire, Brioude, St. Flour, and Aurillac.

XVI. Lyons has five elections, Lyons, St. Etienne, Montbriſſon, Roanne, and Ville-Franche.

XVII. Grenoble has five elections, Grenoble, Vienne, Romans, Montelimar, and Gap.

XVIII. Bourdeaux has five elections, Bourdeaux, Perigueux, Sarlat, Agen, and Condom.

XIX. Auch has twelve elections, Auch, Bayone and Le Pays de Labour, Dax and Les Landes, Le Pays de Marſanne, Le Pays de Gabardin, La Lomagne, Riviere de Verdun, Mirande and Eſterac, Le Bigorre, Le Nebouſan, Les quatre Valleos, and Le Comminges.

XX. Montauban has ſix elections, Montauban, Cahors, Figeac, Ville-Franche, Rodez, and Milhau.

Theſe elections in all amount to one hundred and eighty. The twelve generalities without elections are Flanders, which is divided into thirteen ſubdelegations, Hainault and Maubouge, Lorrain, Metz, which contain the diſtrict of Meſſin, the biſhopricks of Toul and Verdun. Alſace is divided into thirteen bailliages, or bailiwicks. Brittany is divided into nine dioceſes. Burgundy comprehends twenty-three bailliages. Franche Compté is divided into fourteen bailliages. Languedoc contains two generalities under the ſame intendant, namely, thoſe of Toulouſe and Montpellier. Rouſſillon, which has three vigueries or magiſtracies; and Aix is divided into twenty vigueries.

The countries of the ſtate are the provinces which have a right to form aſſemblies to tax themſelves, as well as to regulate the taxes and ſee them paid. There are ſeven of theſe, namely, Artois, Brittany, Burgundy, Franche Comté, Languedoc, Rouſſillon, and Provence.

The boards or courts of the mint are ſuperior courts, which determine differences relating to the mint and the value of money, without appeal. They appeal to theſe from all the leſſer courts throughout the kingdom. Formerly there was no court of the mint any where but at Paris, but in 1704 that at Lyons was eſtabliſhed, and its juriſdiction extended over the provinces and departments of Lyons, Auvergne, Dauphiny, Languedoc, Bayonne, Montauban, the territory of Breſſe, Dugey, Valronney, and Gex. All the reſt of the provinces belong to Paris.

There are thirty cities in France where they coin money, namely, 1. Liſle, 2. Amiens, 3. Rouen, 4. Caen, 5. Paris, 6. Rheims, 7. Troyes, 8. Metz, 9. Straſburg, 10. Rennes, 11. Nantes, 12. Angers, 13. Orleans, 14. Tours, 15. Bourges, 16. Dijon, 17. Beſançon, 18. Poitiers, 19. Rochelle, 20. Limoges, 21. Riom, 22. Lyons, 23. Grenoble, 24 Bourdeaux, 25. Bayonne, 26. Pau, 27. Touloufe, 28. Montpellier, 29. Perpignan, 30. Aix.

Theſe cities make uſe of a letter of the alphabet to denote where any piece of French money is coined, which are as follows, A. Paris, B. Rouen C. Caen, D. Lyons, E. Tours, F. Angers, G. Poitiers, H. La Rochelle, I. Limoges, K, Bourdeaux, L. Bayonne, M. Touloufe, N. Montpellier. O. Riom, P. Dijon, Q. Perpignan, R. Orleans, S. Rheims, T. Nantes, V. Troyes, X. Amiens, Y. Bourges. Z. Grenoble and Aix, 9. Rennes, A. A. Metz, B. B. Straſburg, C. C. Beſançon, W. Liſle; the figure of a cow, Pau.

The forces of France, as in all other countries, are ſometimes more, and ſometimes leſs, but perhaps there never have been more than in 1706, for then the French had fifty thouſand men in Brabant, ten thouſand in Flanders, twenty thouſand on the Meuſe, fifteen thouſand on the Moſelle, thirty-five thouſand on the Rhine, forty thouſand in Piedmont, twenty thouſand in Lombardy, thirty thouſand on the coaſts of Spain, and three thouſand in their fleets, which make in all two hundred and thirty thouſand. They have generally a good many German ſoldiers in their armies, and have always forty thouſand Swiſs in their pay. The troops belonging to the king's houſhold are a diſtinct body of themſelves, in which are comprehended the body guards, the great and little gens d'armes, the light horſe, the grand muſqueteers, the horſe grenadiers, and an hundred Swiſs.

The orders of knighthood are that of St. Michael, which is the oldeſt they have in France. The collar of this order is compoſed of ſea-ſhells, and at the bottom is the image of the archangel caſting the devil out of heaven into the bottomleſs pit, with this device, Immenſi tremor oceani, The terror of the great ocean. This order was almoſt forgot, when it was revived by Lewis XIV. in 1664.

The ſecond order of knighthood is that of the Holy Ghoſt, which was inſtituted by Henry III. in 1579, becauſe he had been proclaimed king of Poland, and afterwards king of France the Whitſuntide following. The collar of this order repreſents trophies of arms, from whence iſſue flames, under which is a croſs of Malta, charged with a pigeon's heart, with this motto, Duce & Auſpice, to expreſs the protection of the Holy Ghoſt.

The third order is that of St. Lewis, which Lewis XIV. inſtituted May 10, 1693, which he deſigned as a mark of diſtinction for officers of merit. The enſigns of the order are a croſs with eight points, between which are four fleurs de lis. On one ſide there is this inſcription, Ludovicus M. Inſtituit. M.DC.XCIII. and on the other ſide, Bellica virtutis præmium, The reward of military virtue.

The moſt modern and laſt of all the orders is that of the Pavillion, which was inſtituted by Lewis XV. in 1723. The enſign of the order is a medal, on one ſide of which is a croſs, and on the other a pavillion.

With regard to the character and genius of the French, we ſhall preſent the reader with what a French author ſays on this point.

"The French are of an advantageous ſize and ſhape, lively, laborious, generous, ready, and of a gay diſpoſition; in converſation they are engaging, polite, agreeable, and complaiſant, eſpecially with regard to ſtrangers. Theſe qualities, which gain them the eſteem of other nations, are the cauſe why a great number of foreigners delight to travel into France; inſomuch, that ſome think a young gentleman can neither have politeneſs, nor good manners, nor learning, unleſs he ſpends a large ſum of money at Paris. For this reaſon the French commonly find acquaintance whereever they go; and when they do not, they readily inſinuate themſelves into the good graces of thoſe to whom they addreſs themſelves. The French are not only diligent and laborious, for there is ſcarce a ſpot in the kingdom that is not cultivated, but they have a genius for languages, arts, and ſciences, which they often carry to the higheſt degree of perfection. Add to theſe qualities, their readineſs for inventions, eſpecially for dreſs, both for ladies and gentlemen, in which they are imitated by other nations. They are almoſt all good ſoldiers, and make war their principal trade, which their neighbours have often experienced to their great damage." However, it is obſerved that the ardour which they ſhew at the beginning of a battle is generally changed into a coolneſs before the end.

However it cannot be denied but the French are flighty, inconſtant, fantaſtical, reſtleſs, haughty in proſperity, and impatient and dejected in adverſity. Self-love is their predominant paſſion, and they look upon the reſt of mankind with with contempt. They are ſo aſſuming, that they think all the reſt of the world ſhould pay homage to them. Their attachment to their king is incredible, and the great magnify his moſt inconſiderable actions. The French women are in general but ordinary, for which reaſon they paint their faces, in which they are ridiculouſly extravagant, and they ſtudy nothing more than the art of pleaſing in converſation. They are very free upon many occaſions, and take liberties that we ſhould hardly think decent. The nobility are very numerous, and conſequently many of them are very poor, and yet they deſpiſe any trade or profeſſion but that of war, which is the cauſe why ſo many of them get into the army. The French peaſants are generally very miſerable, and yet as they never knew better, they are more contented with their condition than might otherwiſe have been expected.

FRANCE (ISLE of). See ISLE OF FRANCE.

FRANCE (NEW). See CANADA.

FRANCES, or FRANCESCA, (St.) was born at Rome, and was married at twelve years of age to Lorenzo Ponzlani, who being baniſhed from Rome in 1413, St. Frances founded the monaſtery of Oblates, alſo called Collatines, in 1425, and died there on the 9th of March, 1440, aged fifty-ſix. She was canonized in 1608, by Paul V.

FRANCESCA (PIETRO DELLA) an eminent Venetian painter, took a pleaſure in repreſenting night-pieces and battles. Pope Nicholas employed him in painting the Vatican. He alſo drew ſeveral portraits, and wrote of geometry and arithmetic. He died in the year 1443.

FRANCESCA, a poor Italian girl, born at Caſal, in Montferrat, diſtinguiſhed herſelf by her courage at the ſiege of that city, in 1630, when ſhe fought with great bravery in ſeveral ſallies, and killed many of the enemy with her own hand. John de Thoiras, who defended Caſal, rewarded her by allowing her the pay of four ſoldiers, and making her one of the light horſe in his own company.

FRANCHE COMPTE, otherwiſe called BURGUNDY, is a conſiderable province of France. It is bounded on the eaſt by Swiſſerland, on the weſt by the duchy of Burgundy, on the north by Lorraine, and on the ſouth by Breſſe and Dauphiny. Its length from north to ſouth is ninety miles, and its breath ſixty from eaſt to weſt. When it firſt came into the hands of France, it was full of trees, but the greateſt part have been grubbed up, inſomuch that wood for building is now ſcarce about the towns.

Franche Compte is partly level and partly mountainous. The level country contains the bailliages of Veſoul, Gray, Dole, Lons de Saunier, and Poligni. It is fertile in corn, wine, graſs, nuts, hemp, &c. One part of the mountainous country, called Franche Montagne, comprehends the bailliages of Pontarlier and Orgelet, St. Claude, and a part of the bailliages of Salins, Ornans, and Baume, in which there grows none but ſmall grain, nevertheleſs it is rich, on account of the great number of cattle which it feeds. In the other part are Beſançon, Quingey, Arbois, and a part of the bailliages of Salins, Ornans, and Beaume; which produces wheat, oats, and a great deal of wine.

This province is watered by five principal rivers, which are the Saone, Lougnon, Dou, Louve, and Dain. The Saone has been taken notice of elſewhere. The Lougnon ariſes in the mountains of Voſge, and enters the Franche Compte by Val de Servance; afterwards it paſſes by Lure, Montbozon, Marnay, Peſme, and falls into the Saone, at Talnay, a village in the duchy of Burgundy. It is not navigable, but they float wood upon it for the ſervice of the marine. Theſe rivers are full of fiſh, and produce trouts, umbers, pikes, carps, barbels, lampreys, eels, ſhads, perch, &c. In particular, they boaſt of the carp of the Saone, the barbels of the Lougnon, the pikes of the Dou, the umbers of the Louve, and the trouts of the Dain.

Beſides theſe rivers, there are many brooks, which water the meadows, and produce plenty of graſs; beſides which, there are two wells or pits, the one near a village called Frote, three miles from Veſoul, and the other near Ornans; this laſt is exceeding deep, and in a rainy ſeaſon it overflows greatly, throwing a vaſt quantity of umbers into the river Louve: that near Frote is thirty yards in diameter at the top, and forty deep, but narrow at the bottom, where there is a ſpring, which proceeds from the cleft of a rock. When it has rained for two days together, the water riſes up, and fills the pit, riſing ten yards above the top, and overflowing the neighbouring fields.

In this province, there are mines of copper, lead, iron, and ſilver. The mineral waters at Luxeuil are hot and very ſalutary, and are proper both for bathing and drinking. The mineral ſpring at Repel, near Veſoul, was diſcovered by chance, in 1716, which was only by the cattle refuſing to drink of the ſtreams which ran from it. It operates both by ſtool and urine, and contains much ſalt.

In a large grotto, about three miles from Quingey, there are ſeveral petrifications, which a lively imagination will fancy to reſemble all ſorts of animals, pillars, &c. but they are continually changing their ſhapes by the addition of new matter, inſomuch that it is probable the whole cavity will be filled up in proceſs of time. Near Leugne, a village about eight miles from Beaumes, there is a natural ice-houſe; it is a cavern, from the top of which iſicles hang in the hotteſt days of ſummer. The entrance is on the top of a high mountain, and is eighteen paces wide; from this there is a deſcent of three hundred paces, which leads to the gate. This is twice as high and wide as the gate of any city, and the ciſtern itſelf is ſixty paces broad, covered with a vault ſixty feet high, to which the ice adheres; but the greateſt is in a little brook, in the ſummer time, which runs through the cavern, but in the winter it does not freeze. At the bottom there are ſtones which perfectly reſemble candied citron-peel. When there is a fog in this cavern, it is a certain ſign of rain the next day.

This province formerly belonged to the kings of Spain, of the houſe of Auſtria; but it was conquered by Lewis XIV. in 1674, and confirmed to France by the treaty of Nimeguen, in 1678.

The chief trade of this province is in wheat, oats, wine, and hay, which they ſell in time of peace to the adjacent countries; but the greateſt riches of the country conſiſts in cattle, and the cheeſe and butter which they make of their milk. The ſtuds of horſes kept on the mountains produce about five thouſand colts every year, which are moſt of them ſold before they are twelve months old. They drive a ſmall trade in hogs, but there are few or no ſheep. It is obſervable, that the graſs on the mountains is much the beſt for fattening cattle; for when they are drove from thence into the plains, they ſoon grow lean. There are about thirty forges along the ſides of the rivers Saone, Dou, and Lougnon, where they make a great quantity of iron bombs, cannon-balls, and artillery, both for land and ſea; and at Beſançon and Montallier, there are manufactories of fire-arms. On the mountains there are trees which are fit for the maſts of ſhips, and in ſeveral parts of this province they make great quantities of ſalt-petre.

This province contains two thouſand one hundred and thirty-four cities, towns, pariſhes, and villages, and the principal places are Beſançon, Gray, Dole, Salins, Arbois, and Veſoul.

FRANCHIMONT, a town of Germany, in the biſhoprick of Liege, capital of the ſmall marquiſate of Franchimont. Some call it a large village. It is thirteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Liege. Long. 5. 4. E. Lat. 50. 30. N.

FRANCHI (NICHOLAS) or rather NICOLO FRANCO, a famous ſatirical poet in the ſixteenth century, was born at Benevento, he travelled all over Italy, and publiſhed ſeveral works in Italian, in which he ſpared neither the popes nor other princes. He was at firſt the friend, and afterwards the enemy of Peter Aretine, to whom he dedicated ſome of his ſonnets. At length, pope Pius V. having cauſed him to be arreſted, he was hanged at Rome, in 1569.

He ought not to be confounded with Vincent Franchi, preſident of Naples, and a famous civilian, who wrote Deciſiones ſacri Regii Conſilii Neapolitani, and died in 1601, aged ſeventy.

FRANCIA (FRANCESCO) a celebrated painter, who excelled in deſigning, was born at Bologna, in 1450. He was at firſt a goldſmith or jeweller, and afterwards an engraver of coins and medals, but at laſt applying to painting, acquired a great reputation, particularly by a piece of St. Sebaſtian, who was drawn bound to a tree, with his hands over his head; for, beſides the delicacy of the colouring, the proportion of the parts was ſo admirably juſt and true, that all the ſucceeding Bologneſe painters, even Hannibal Caracci himſelf, ſtudied its proportions as their rule, and followed them in the ſame manner as the ancients had done the canon of Polycletus. He drew for ſeveral of the princes in Italy, but chiefly for the duke of Urbino. Raphael's reputation made him very deſirous of ſeeing his works; but his age would not permit his taking a journey to Rome; however, they carried on a friendly correſpondence, and Raphael having painted a picture of St. Cecilia for a church in Bologna, ſent it to Francia to place it in a proper light, and even to correct its faults, if he found any; but Francia is ſaid to have been ſo ſtruck with the beauty of the piece, that deſpairing of ever arriving at ſo great a degree of perfection he fell into a kind of melancholy, that bringing on a conſumption, occaſioned his death, which, according to Vaſari, happened in the year 1518, or, according to others, in 1530.

FRANCIS I. king of France, ſurnamed the Great, and the Reſtorer of Learning, ſucceeded his father-in-law, Lewis XII. who died without iſſue, in 1515. He was the only ſon of Charles of Orleans, count of Angoulême, and was born at Cognac, on the 12th of September, 1494. Soon after his coronation, he took the title of duke of Milan, and put himſelf at the head of a powerful army to make good his right right to that duchy. The Swiſs who defended it gave him battle, but were cut to pieces, and about fifteen thouſand left dead in the field. This victory rendered him maſter of the Milaneſe. Pope Leo X. terrified at his ſucceſs, had a conference with him at Bologna, and obtained from him the abolition of the pragmatic ſanction, and there concluded the concordat, which was confirmed the next year at the council of Lateran, and the following year, 1516, he concluded a treaty with Charles V. by which he reſtored to him Navarre. After the death of Maximilian I. Charles V. being elected emperor in 1519, a jealouſy was kindled between thoſe two princes, which occaſioned a long war. The French, commanded by Andrew de Foix, conquered Navarre, in 1520, and loſt it immediately after. They drove the Engliſh and imperialiſts from Picardy, made themſelves maſters of Heſdin, Fontarabia, and ſeveral other places; but in 1521, loſt Milan and Tournay. The following year Odet de Foix, viſcount de Lautrec, was defeated in the bloody battle of Becoque, which was followed by the loſs of Cremona, Genoa, and a great part of Italy. In 1523, Charles of Bourbon, conſtable of France, went over to the emperor, who gave him the command of his armies, and, in 1524, he defeated admiral Bonevet's rear-guard, at the retreat of Rebec, and retook all the Milaneſe. He afterwards entered Provence with a powerful army; but was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Marſeilles. In the mean time, Francis I. had marched into Italy, where he retook Milan, and laid ſiege to Pavia; but having injudiciouſly ſent a part of his troops to Naples, he was defeated by Charles V. and the conſtable of Bourbon, in a bloody battle fought before Pavia, on the 24th of February, 1525, in which he had two horſes killed under him, was taken priſoner, and carried to Madrid, where he was kept priſoner, but returned from thence the following year, after the concluſion of a treaty in that city. On his arrival in France, he ſent troops into Italy, under the command of Lautree, who delivered pope Clement VII. by raiſing the ſiege of Rome, and at firſt obtained great advantages; but at length both Lautree and his army periſhed by diſeaſes. In 1529, the king, being a widower, married Eleanor of Auſtria, the emperor's ſiſter; yet, in 1535, he took Savoy; in 1536, he drove the emperor out of Provence, entered into an alliance with Solyman II. emperor of the Turks, took Heſdin, with ſeveral other places; and, in 1538, concluded a truce with Charles V. for ten years; but this truce was of ſhort duration; the emperor reſolving to chaſtiſe the inhabitants of Ghent, who had revolted, obtained a paſſage for his troops through France, on promiſing the king to grant the inveſtiture of the duchy of Milan to which of his children he pleaſed; but after having been received in France, in 1539, with all poſſible marks of honour and reſpect, he no ſooner arrived in Flanders than he refuſed to keep his promiſe. This refuſal broke the truce and rekindled the war; the king's troops entered Italy, Rouſſillon, and Luxemburgh. Francis de Bourbon, gained the battle of Cerizoles, and made himſelf maſter of Montferrat. Francis I. brought over to his intereſt Barbaroſſa and Guſtavus Vaſa, king of Sweden; and, on the other hand, Henry VIII. king of England, took the part of Charles V. and, in 1544, made himſelf maſter of Boulogne. In ſhort, a peace was concluded, at Creſpi, with the emperor, on the 18th of September, 1544, and with Henry VIII. on the 7th of June, 1546; but Francis I. did not long enjoy the tranquility produced by this peace, for he died on the laſt day of March, 1547, in the fifty-third year of his age, and the thirty-third of his reign. He was ſucceeded by Henry II.

This prince was endowed with many excellent qualities; he had great wit, was magnanimous, generous, and of a mild and beneficent diſpoſition. To him was principally owing the revival of polite literature in Europe; he protected the learned, founded the Royal College at Paris, at a great expence collected a library at Fontainbleau, and built ſeveral palaces, which he adorned with pictures, ſtatues, and the moſt valuable moveables. He alſo ordered, that all public acts of his kingdom ſhould from thenceforward be publiſhed in French.

FRANCIS II. the ſon of Henry II. and Catharine de Medicis was born at Fontainbleau, on the 19th of January, 1544. In 1558, he married Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland, the only daugnter of James V. and ſucceeded king Henry II. on the 10th of July, 1559. The duke of Guiſe, and the cardinal his brother, took advantage of the youth of this prince, whoſe conſort was their niece, and ſeized the government, which raiſed up againſt them the princes of the blood, Anthony of Bourbon, king of Navarre, and Lewis, his brother, prince of Condé; theſe princes engaged the Calviniſts in their party, whilſt the Guiſes, on the contrary, brought over the papiſts to their intereſts. This was the origin of the troubles and civil wars, which laid waſte the kingdom under the following reigns, from the proteſtants having chiefs and protectors of ſuch diſtinguiſhed rank, and the Guiſes being at the head of the government. The partizans of the prince of Condé formed, in 1560, the conſpiracy of Ambois, and aſſembled on all ſides about that city, with a deſign to carry off the king, and to maſſacre the Guiſes; but the conſpiracy was diſcovered. The king afterwards publiſhed an edict at Romorantin, by which the examination of religious opinions were referred to the biſhops and taken away from the parliaments; and the Calviniſts were denied the privilege of holding religious aſſemblies. In ſhort, the prince of Condé was ſeized at Orleans, and condemned to loſe his head for being concerned in the above conſpiracy; but this ſentence was not executed on account of the king's death, which happened on the 5th of December, 1560, in the ſeventeenth year of his age. He is ſaid to have been accidentally killed at a tilt by a lance, but this is a miſtake, his death being occaſioned by an impoſtume in his right ear.

FRANCIS of France, duke of Alençon, Anjou, and Brabant, and brother to Francis II. quitted the court in 1575. on his being refuſed the poſt of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and made war on his brother Henry III. but this difference being afterwards reconciled, he was called to the aſſiſtance of the confederates in the Netherlands, and, in 1578, took Bins. Some time after, he was declared prince of the Netherlands, and, in 1581, raiſed the ſiege of Cambray, which was inveſted by the duke of Parma, drove the enemy from Sluis and Arleux, and obliged Chateau Cambreſis to ſurrender at diſcretion. This prince went into England the ſame year to marry queen Elizabeth, but without ſucceſs. He was crowned duke of Brabant at Anvers, and count of Flanders at Ghent, in 1582. Afterwards uſing thoſe ill who had been the means of his advancement, he was obliged to retire into France, and died at Chateau Thierri, on the 10th of February, 1584.

FRANCIS of Bourbon, duke of Montpenſier, &c. was the ſon Lewis of Bourbon. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſiege of Roan, in 1562, and at the battles of Jarnac and Montcontour, in 1569. After the death of Henry III. he joined with Henry IV. to whom he was of conſiderable ſervice. He commanded the vanguard at the battle of Arques, and ſignalized himſelf at the battle of Ivry. He died at Liſieux, on the 4th of June, 1592, aged fifty.

FRANCIS of Bourbon, count of St. Pol and Chaumont, &c. was the ſon of Francis of Bourbon, count of Vendôme, and was born at Ham, in 1491. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battle of Marignan, in 1515, ſuccoured Meziere, when beſieged by the imperialiſts, in 1521, and defeated the Engliſh at the battle of Pas. He was alſo at the fatal battle of Pavia, in 1525, and died at Cotignan, near Rheims, on the 1ſt of September, 1545.

FRANCIS of Bourbon, count of Anguien, &c. was the youngeſt ſon of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendôme, and was born on the 23d of September, 1519. He gave ſuch early proofs of his valour and prudence, that Francis I. entruſted him with the command of an army. He defeated the marquis Duguaſt, Charles the Fifth's general, at Cerizoles, on the 14th of April, 1544. After this ſignal victory, he made himſelf maſter of all Montferrat, except Caſal; but the following year, playing with ſome lords, he was unhappily killed, on the 23d of February, 1545, at twenty-ſeven years of age.

FRANCIS of Lorraine, duke of Guiſe and Aumale, prince of Joinville, &c. was the eldeſt ſon of Claudius of Lorraine, duke of Guiſe, and was born on the 17th of February, 1519. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the taking of Montmedi, in 1542, and on ſeveral other occaſions. King Henry II. honoured him with his particular eſteem. He made him duke of Aumale in 1547, and, in 1552, erected his eſtate of Joinville into a principality. The following year the duke of Guiſe obliged the emperor Charles V. to raiſe the ſiege of Metz. In 1554, he defeated the imperialiſts at the battle of Renty, and, in 1557, obliged the Spaniards to conclude a peace with pope Paul IV. At his return to France, he took Calais from the Engliſh, and Thionville from the Spaniards. This prince was declared lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and had, under Francis II. the management of all public affairs, in conjunction with his brother the cardinal; but his power excited the jealouſy of the great, and it was reſolved to murder him at the conſpiracy of Ambois, in 1560. Some of the guilty were puniſhed, and the parliament gave him the title of the Preſerver of his Country. After the death of Francis II. the Guiſes being excluded from the management of public affairs, the duke joined with the conſtable Montmorency and the marſhal de St. Andrew, which union the Calviniſts named the Triumvirate. Some time after, the duke of Guiſe going to Vaſſy, his ſervants had a quarrel with the proteſtants, when going to pacify them, he was wounded in the cheek with a ſtone, which ſo exaſperated his attendants, that they killed near ſixty perſons, and wounded about two hundred. This affair, which happened in 1561, was called by the proteſtants the maſſacre of Vaſſy, and ſerved as a ſignal for a religious war; people on all ſides ran to arms; the duke took Roen and Bourges from the Calviniſts, and defeated them at the battle of Dreux. He at length went to beſiege Orleans, which was made in a manner the arſenal of the proteſtants, and was on the point of taking it, when John Poltrot de Meré ſhot him in the ſhoulder with a piſtol, as he was returning from the trenches. He died of this wound ſix days after, on the 24th of February, 1563. Admiral de Coligny was ſuſpected of being concerned in this aſſaſſination.

There have been ſeveral other princes of the name of Francis.

FRANCIS of Aſſiſi, founder of the order of Franciſcan or Mendicant friars, and one of the greateſt ſaints of the Romiſh church, was the ſon of a merchant, who brought him up to trade, but he renounced all right to his father's ſubſtance, and, in ſpite of the admonitions of his parents, made a profeſſion of poverty, and obtained a great number of diſciples, whom he formed into a religious order, about the year 1209. He founded many convents in Italy, Spain, and France; and having held a general chapter at Rome, went into Egypt to preach the goſpel there. At his return to Europe, he continued founding monaſteries, and at length retired into one of the higheſt of the Appenine mountains, where it is pretended he ſaw a crucified ſeraphin all on fire, with marks on his fleſh, repreſenting the wounds of our Saviour on the croſs, whence he obtained the name of Seraphic, which has ſince been given to all of his order. His pretended ſermon to the fiſhes is a very extraordinary performance, and Mr. Addiſon has given an Engliſh tranſlation of it in his Travels through Italy, &c. He died at Aſſiſi, on the 4th of October, 1226, aged forty-five, and was canonized two years after his death by pope Gregory IX. He wrote Two Rules, and ſeveral other works, in which he forbids his diſciples preaching without the permiſſion of the biſhop, enjoins their not having any thing they could call their own, yet at the ſame time exhorts them to labour with their hands, and to be ſatisfied with receiving the value of their work in the neceſſaries of life, provided it be not in money.

FRANCIS, of Paula, founder of the order of Minims, thus called from Paola, a city in Calabria, where he was born, in 1416. He was educated amongſt the monks of St. Francis, and at length retired to a ſolitude, where ſeveral perſons coming to him, he built a monaſtery, and founded the above order, which was approved by pope Sixtus IV. in 1473. He died in 1507, aged ninety-one, and was canonized by Leo X. in 1519. His followers at firſt called themſelves Hermits of St. Francis.

FRANCIS XAVIER, ſurnamed the Apoſtle of the Indies, was born of a noble family, in the caſtle of Xavier, at the foot of the Pyrennean mountains, on the 7th of April, 1506. He ſtudied at Paris, obtained there the degree of maſter of arts, and taught philoſophy in the college of Beavais, with a deſign of being received into the ſociety of the Sorbonne; but having contracted a friendſhip with Ignatius Loyola, he laid aſide all thoughts of an eſtabliſhment, and became one of the firſt diſciples of that founder of the Jeſuits. He afterwards went into Italy, where he waited upon the ſick in the hoſpital of incurables at Venice, and was there ordained prieſt. He was ſome time after ſent to preach the Goſpel in the Eaſt Indies, where he made many converts to the Chriſtian religion at Goa, on the coaſt of Comorin, at Malacca, in the Molucca iſlands, and in Japan, and died in an iſland within ſight of the kingdom of China, where he had an extreme deſire to propagate his doctrines, on the ſecond of December, 1552, aged forty-ſix, and was canonized by Gregory XV. in 1622. He wrote five books of Epiſtles, a Catechiſm, and ſome other ſmall pieces.

FRANCIS of Borgia, duke of Gandia, and viceroy of Catalonia, renounced the world after the death of his wife, and entered into the order of the Jeſuits, of which he was three times general. He died at Rome in 1572, aged ſixty-two, after having ſeveral times refuſed a cardinalſhip and other eccleſiaſtical dignities. He wrote ſeveral works, which have been tranſlated from Spaniſh into Latin.

FRANCIS of Sales, biſhop and prince of Geneva, and founder of the order of Viſitation, was born in the caſtle of Sales, in the dioceſs of Geneva, on the 21ſt of Auguſt, 1567. He ſtudied at Paris, afterwards applied himſelf to the law at Padua, was employed in preaching againſt the Zuinglians and Calviniſts, and in 1610 inſtituted the order of the Viſitation. He died of an apoplexy at Lyons, in 1622, aged fifty-ſix, and was canonized in 1665. He wrote ſeveral works, the moſt eſteemed of which is his Introduction to a devout Life.

FRANCIS (SIMON) a French painter, born at Tours, in the year 1606. In his youth he was very deſirous of engaging in a religious life, and becoming a capuchin; but was prevented by his friends. However, ſeeking for a profeſſion that might aſſiſt him in raiſing his ſoul to the love of God, and ſeeing a picture of our Saviour's nativity, he was ſo moved by it, that in hopes of being able to draw ſome pieces that might have as lively an effect on the ſpectators, he reſolved to turn painter. He had no maſter, but taught himſelf by copying good pictures. He at firſt drew ſome portraits, and Monſ. de Bethune, his patron, procured a penſion to be ſettled on him, to encourage him in his ſtudies, and going embaſſador to Rome, took him with him. He lived in Italy till the year 1638, and in his return home paſſed through Bologna, where he contracted a friendſhip with Guido, who drew his picture. On his arrival in France, he was the firſt painter who had the honour of drawing the dauphin, of whom the queen was juſt delivered. The miniſters ſatisfied with his performance, promiſed him their protection, and he flattered himſelf that his fortune was made; but undeſervedly falling into diſgrace, he retired from court, and reſuming his firſt reſolution, employed himſelf only on religious ſubjects. Among all his virtues, his patience was moſt conſpicuous; for being afflicted with the ſtone for eight years together, he ſupported his pain with incredible conſtancy, and died of that dreadful diſeaſe in 1671, when the ſtone that was taken out of him after his death, weighed above a pound. Some of his pictures are to be ſeen in the churches of Paris; from which it appears that he had more devotion than ſkill.

FRANCK DE FRANKENAU (GEORGE) a celebrated German phyſician, born at Naumburg, in 1643. At eighteen years of age he went to Jena, where he was crowned poet, on account of his being able to write verſes in German, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. At length he became profeſſor of medicine at Heidelburg, and afterwards at Wittemburg, whence Chriſtian V. king of Denmark, ſending for him, made him his phyſician, and aulic counſellor. The emperor Leopold ennobled him in the year 1692, and the following year nominated him count Palatine. Franck was a member of the Leopoldine Academy, of that of the Ricovrati of Padua, and of the Royal Society of London. He died in 1704, at ſixty years of age. His printed works are, 1. Flora Francica. 2. Satyræ Medicæ: and 3 Many letters. He alſo left a great number of manuſcripts, which it is ſaid deſerve to be printed.

FRANCKE (AUGUSTUS HERMAN) a celebrated German divine, born at Lubeck, on the 12th of March, 1663. He began his ſtudies at Erfort, continued them at Kiel, and finiſhed them at Leipſic, where he was made maſter of arts in 1685. He there founded, with ſome of his friends, a kind of regular conference, for cultivating the ſtudy of the Holy Scriptures, which ſtill ſubſiſts under the name of Collegium Philobiblicum. In 1690 he became miniſter of Erfort; but his ſermons involving him in ſome troubles, he was obliged to leave that city in 1691. He then accepted the offers of the elector of Brandenburg, and became profeſſor of the Greek and oriental languages at Hall; and in 1698 profeſſor of theology. In that city he formed the celebrated foundation, known thoughout Europe by the name of the Houſe of the Orphans of Hall, in which poor children are taught all the arts and ſciences, at the ſame time that they are inſtructed in religion and virtue; and to him alſo the proteſtant miſſion of Malabar owes its foundation. He died in 1727, at ſixty-four years of age, univerſally regretted throughout all Germany, on account of his virtue, his charity to the poor, and the indefatigable pains he took in founding the Houſe of Orphans. That Houſe proſpered ſo extremely, that at the time of his death, it contained two thouſand one hundred and ninety-ſix young men, and had above one hundred and thirty preceptors. M. Francke wrote ſome ſermons and books of devotion in German. His Latin works are, 1. Programmata. 2. Prælectiones Hermeneuticæ. 3. Methodus ſtudii Theologici. 4. Introductio ad Lectionem Prophetarum. 5. Commentatio de Scopo Librorum Veteris & Novi Teſtamenti. 6. Manuductio ad Lectionem Scripturæ Sacræ. 7. Obſervationes Biblicæ. 8. Idea Studioſi Theologiæ. 9. Monita Paſtoralia Theologica.

FRANCKENBERG (ABRAHAM DE) a famous myſtic writer, of the ſeventeenth century, was lord of Ludwigſdorff and Schwirſe. He refuſed the conſiderable employments which the elector of Brandenburg, and the duke of Oels offered him; and ſpent the greateſt part of his life in his retreat at Ludwigſdorff, where he was born, in 1593. He wrote a great number of myſtical books in Latin and German. The moſt known are, The Life of James Boehmen, and Via veterum Sapientum, &c. He died at Ludwigſdorff, on the 25th of June, 1652.

FRANCONIA, the circle of, which the Germans call Frankenland, is one of the nine great provinces of which the empire of Germany is compoſed. It is bounded by Suabia on the ſouth, by Bavaria and Bohemia on the eaſt, by Upper Saxony on the north, and by Heſſe, Mentz, and the palatinate of the Rhine on the weſt. The figure of this province is almoſt round. It is one hundred miles in length, from the kingdom of Bohemia to the archbiſhoprick of Mentz, Mentz, and ninety in breadth from the frontiers of Suabia to Thuringia. The Maine is the principal river, beſides which there are the Tauber, the Rednitz, and the Sala. The air is temperate, and the country is in the middle fruitful in corn paſtures and wine. The eccleſiaſtics are rich and powerful, whence it follows that the people muſt be poor, and therefore it is commonly ſaid that Franconia furniſhes beggars enough for all Germany. There are Catholics, Calviniſts, and Lutherans in this province, but the laſt are more numerous than either of the former. The circle of Franconia is compoſed of a great number of ſovereignties, which are the biſhopricks of Wurtzburg, Bamburg, and Aichſtet, the territories of the Teutonic Knights, the marquiſates of Culembach and Auſbach, the counties of Henneberg, Holach, Caſtel, Wertheim, Erpach, and Reinech; the principality of Swartzenberg, the baronies of Limburg, Sinſheim, and Lowenſtein. The imperial cities of Nuremberg, Rottenburg, Winſheim, Schwinfurt, and Weiſſenburg. The directors of this circle are the biſhops of Bamberg, and the marquiſs or margrave of Brandenburg Culembach.

FRANEKER, a town of the province of Frieſland, in the Low Countries. It is a well fortified handſome town, and has four canals. The houſes are well built, the ſtreets are handſome and clean, and the caſtle is ſuperb. The univerſity was founded in 1585, and is well endowed. The pariſh church is large, and the ſteeple is very high. They have the privilege of chooſing their own magiſtrates. The country about abounds with corn and paſtures. It is ſeated five miles from the Zuiderſee, between Leuwarden and Harlingen, five miles from each, and fifteen north of Slooten, with a biſhop's ſee. Long. 5. 38. E. Lat. 53. 21. N.

FRANKENDAL, a town and fort, in the palatinate of the Rhine, ſeated on the weſt ſide of the river Rhine, ten miles ſouth of Worms, and ſixteen north-weſt of Heidelberg. It was entirely ruined by the French in 1689. Long. 8. 22. E. Lat. 49. 27. N.

FRANKENSTEIN, a town of Sileſia, in the duchy of Munſterberg, where there is a fine caſtle, but it is not quite finiſhed. The princes of Auerſberg have ſettled a council of the regency here. The land about it produces very fine wheat. It is thirty miles ſouth-ſouth-weſt of Breſlaw. Long. 20. 19. E. Lat. 50. 42. N.

FRANKENSTEIN, a town of Germany, in the palatinate of the Rhine, and duchy of Zuebruggen, twelve miles north-weſt of Landaw. Long. 7. 41. E. Lat. 49. 32. N.

FRANKFORT, on the Maine, is a free imperial city of Wetteravia, in Germany. It is handſome, large, and well fortified, and lies on a great road. The houſes are partly built with red ſtone, and partly with wood and plaiſter, and caſed with ſlate. The ſtreets are ſpacious, and the town-houſe is a large building in the Gothic taſte. In this is a room where the German emperors are commonly elected. Likewiſe here the golden bull is kept. Inſtead of a ſeal there is a golden medal hanging to it; on the one ſide there is the figure of the emperor Charles IV. with this inſcription round it, Carolus Quartus divina favente, clementia, Romanorum imperator, ſemp. aug: Charles the Fourth, by the divine clemency, emperor of the Romans, always auguſt. On the reverſe is the city of Rome, with Aurea Roma written thereon, and round about it this monkiſh rhyme, Roma caput mundi, regit orbis frœna rotundi, which literally tranſlated is thus, Rome the head of the world, holds the bridles of the round globe. The bull itſelf is a book in quarto, containing twenty-four parchment leaves, ſewed together and covered with another parchment, without any ornament. This bull was deſigned as a perpetual rule for the emperor and the electors, but it has been broken through in various particulars.

The river Maine divides this city into two parts, the leſſer of which is on the ſouth ſide, and is called Saxhauſen. They are joined by a ſtone bridge, which conſiſts of fourteen arches, and is four hundred paces long. The inhabitants are moſtly Lutherans, and all the ſenate. The Roman Catholics have the great church of St. Bartholomew, and three convents for men, and one for women. They are not allowed to carry the hoſt about publicly in proceſſion. In this church the ceremonies are performed when the emperor is conſecrated here. The Calviniſts have their church without the city, at the diſtance of two or three miles. But they are obliged to marry and baptize in the Lutheran churches. The city is governed by forty-two ſenators, two burgomaſters, a prætor or mayor, and fourteen ſcabins or aldermen. The ſenators are divided into three benches, the firſt is of the ſcabins, the ſecond of the literati, and the third of the artificers. When one of the ſcabins dies, or is removed, they chooſe another from the bench of the literati; for thoſe of the bench of artificers can riſe no higher. Theſe ſenators chooſe the two conſuls or burgomaſters yearly out of their own number.

There are a great many Jews, but they are very poor, and live only by hawking their goods about from inn to inn. They are locked into their own quarters every night for fear of diſturbance.

The things worth obſerving here, beſides the town-houſe, are the emperor's palace, the caſtle, the Dominican convent, and the Lutheran church of St. Catharine. The two fairs at Frankfort, the one at Eaſter, and the other in September, for three weeks each, render it a place of great traffick. All ſorts of commodities are brought hither from the different parts of Europe, which are almoſt free from tolls or duties. In this city all ſorts of diverſions are allowed; they having a great number of coffee-houſes, a play-houſe, and other houſes of entertainment.

The villages all round the city are very pleaſant, and the inhabitants are chiefly employed in making wine. The territory of this place is pretty large. It is fifteen miles north-weſt of Mentz, forty-five north of Heidleburg, thirty-three north-eaſt of Worms, ſeventy-five ſouth-eaſt of Cologne, and three hundred and fifty north-by-weſt of Vienna. Long. 7. 36. E. Lat. 50. 16. N.

FRANKFORT on the Order, is a city of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, and the marquiſate of Brandenburg. It was formerly one of the Hans-Towns, and an imperial city, but is now ſubject to the king of Pruſſia, as marquis of Brandenburg. It is divided into two parts by the river Oder, and joined together by a wooden-bridge, which is two hundred and ninety paces long. The ſtreets are ſpacious, and the houſes tolerably well built. The market-place is handſome, and ſurrounded with good houſes, and the fortifications, the armoury, the ſtadt-houſe, and the two colleges, are worth the notice of travellers.

It is a well frequented place, not only on account of the univerſity, which was founded in 1506, but alſo for its three fairs. There are two cities through which all the merchandize of Pomerania, Pruſſia, and Poland, muſt paſs, namely, Frankfort, for thoſe which are tranſported into Lower Germany; and Breſlaw, when they are carried into Upper Germany; which has rendered theſe two places very flouriſhing. The univerſity has always been provided with learned and ingenious profeſſors, which have brought a great number of ſtudents, and the rather, becauſe all ſorts of proviſions are very reaſonable, which render living here very cheap. The faculty of theology are Calviniſts; however, there are extraordinary profeſſors of the confeſſion of Augſburg, that the proteſtant candidates in theology may purſue their ſtudies at this place. And here it may be noted, that the Calviniſts are never called proteſtants by the Germans. The other faculties may be filled up by the profeſſors of both religions. Frankfort has a communication with the Baltick ſea by the river Odre. It is eighty miles ſouth of Stettin, forty-five ſouth-eaſt of Berlin, ſeventy-five north-eaſt of Wittemberg, and two hundred and fifty north-by-weſt of Vienna. Long. 14. 58. E. Lat. 52. 34. N.

FRANS-FLORIS, an eminent painter, called the Raphael of Flanders, was the ſon of a good ſculptor at Antwerp, where he was born in the year 1520. He worked at his father's buſineſs till he was twenty years of age, and then went to learn the art of painting at Leige, under Lambert Lombard. Afterwards he travelled to Italy, where he applied himſelf to deſigning, and ſtudying Michael Angelo's works. On his return to his native country, his performances being numerous and juſtly admired, he grew rich, though he was greatly addicted to drinking; but he worked ſeven hours a-day with equal diligence and pleaſure, and ſpent the remaining part of his time with his bottle companions. He died at fifty years of age.

FRASCATI, or FRESCATI, a town of Italy, in the Campania of Rome. It is a ſmall town, ſeated on the brow of a hill. About two miles from hence are the ruins of the famous Tuſculum, where Cicero compoſed his Tuſculan Queſtions, at a place called Grotto Ferraſe. There is now a fine proſpect from the town, but it muſt have been much more delightful formerly, when Campania was thick ſet with towns, villas, and plantations. There are ſeveral villas, or pleaſure-houſes, here, belonging to ſome of the chief perſons at Rome. The principal are Monte Dracone, Belvidere, and Villa Ludviſſa. Monte Dracone is a large houſe ſeated on an eminence, from whence Rome may be ſeen, and all the plain which lies between. But Rome is rather too diſtant for a diſtinct view of it, and the verdure of the plain is too uniform to be very agreeable to the eye, there being no variety in the landſcape. On the Monte Portico, there is a greater diverſity, but then the view is too much bounded. The avenues to Monte Dracone are very difficult, and to ſay the truth, neither the gardens nor the fountains are worth deſcribing.

Belvidere has much the ſame ſituation as Monte Dracone, but it has a fine caſcade and a grotto, wherein is Apollo on the top of Parnaſſus with the nine Muſes.

Their

Their ſtatues played on the flute, when the machines were in good condition. The caſcade of the Villa Ludviſia, is the principal ornament of the garden. It is twelve miles ſouth-eaſt of Rome, and ten ſouth-weſt of Paleſtrina. Long. 11. 43. E. Lat. 41. 48. N.

FRASSEN (CLADIUS) a learned Cordelier and doctor of the Sorbonne, acquired great reputation by his works, the moſt eſteemed of which are his Theology, in 5 vols. folio; and his Diſquiſitiones Biblicæ, in 2 vols. quarto.

FRAWENFELD, a town of Swifferland, and capital of Thurgow. The town is not large, but it has an advantageous ſituation upon an eminence, at the foot of which runs the river Mourg. The palace of the bailiffs is at one extremity of the town, ſeated on a rock. There are two churches, one for the Catholics, and the other for the Proteſtants. The abbey of Rychenaw has ſome rights in this town, and all the inhabitants were formerly its ſubjects. They ſtill take an oath to the abbot, but on condition, that he ſhall never ſell or alienate the rights he has over them. The town has a council, and a court of juſtice; but when a criminal is to be tried for his life, the juſtices, who are twelve, call in twelve other perſons to their aſſiſtance. Long. 9 0 E. Lat. 47. 40. N.

FREDEGARIUS SCHOLASTICUS, is ſuppoſed to have lived in the 8th century. To him is attributed an abridgement of Gregory de Tour's Hiſtory, and its Continuation; but that Continuation was done by four different authors.

FREDEGONDA, the wife of Chilperic I. king of France, rendered herſelf odious by her incontinence, cruelty, and treachery; ſhe cauſed Galſuinte, Ordouaire, Sigebert, Pretextat, and even according to ſome, her huſband, Chilperic to be aſſaſſinated. She afterwards took up arms againſt Childebert, defeated his troops, ravaged Champagne, took Paris, with the neighbouring towns, and died triumphant, though loaded with crimes, in 597, leaving the affairs of her ſon Clotaire II. in good condition.

FREDERIC I. otherwiſe called Barbaroſſa, emperor of Germany, ſucceeded his uncle Conrade III. in 1152. Having quieted the diſputes in Germany, he marched into Italy, and was crowned by pope Adrian IV. on the 18th of June, 1155, he then took and raſed Tortona; obliged Verona to acknowledge him; forced Tivoli to ſubmit to the church, and beſieged Milan. The next year he divorced the empreſs Adelaide, in order to marry Beatrice, the daughter of the count of Burgundy, and by this marriage joined Burgundy to his dominions. He at length quarrelled with Adrian IV. and this quarrel was attended with fatal conſequences; for, after Adrian's death, he ſet up three antipopes againſt Alexander III. and in 1162 took Milan, which he intirely deſtroyed, and cauſed the country belonging to it, to be ſowed with ſalt. In 1168, Alexander III. excommunicated him, depoſed him from the empire, and freed his ſubjects from their oath of allegiance. Frederick at firſt laughed at this excommunication, but having loſt a great battle in 1177, againſt the Milaneſe, who had rebuilt their city, and his ſon Otho being conquered in a ſea-fight by the Venetians, he thought ſeriouſly of becoming reconciled to the pope, and a peace was concluded at Venice, whither they had both repaired for that purpoſe, on the firſt of Auguſt, 1177; the next day, the emperor being on his knees in the church, the pope gave him abſolution, and the communion. It is ſaid, that he then ſet his foot on his neck, ſaying, "It is written, thou "ſhalt walk upon the aſp and the baſiliſk, and trample "the lion and dragon under thy feet." To which Frederick replied, "It is not to you I make this ſubmiſſion, but "to St. Peter." To which the pope replied, "It is to "St. Peter, and to me." But Baronius endeavours to prove this ſtory fabulous. The emperor Frederick had freſh diſputes with the ſucceſſors of Alexander III. After the taking of Jeruſalem by Saladin in 1187, he engaged in a cruſade at Mentz with ſeveral German princes, and marched, the following year, at the head of an army of 150,000 men. He defeated the troops of the ſultan of Iconium, took that city by aſſault, and marched towards Paleſtine. The greateſt ſucceſs was expected from this expedition; but bathing himſelf in the Cydnus, which runs by the city of Tarſus, in Celicia, he was drowned, on the 10th of June, 1190, after a reign of thirty-eight years.

This prince was courageous, liberal, firm in adverſity, a protector of the ſciences, and endowed with a prodigious memory. He was called the father of his country, and was ſucceeded by Henry VI.

FREDERIC II. emperor of Germany, was the ſon of the emperor Henry VI. and the grandſon of Frederic I. He was elected emperor, in oppoſition to Otho, who was eſteemed an enemy to the church, on the 13th of December, 1210, and was left in the peaceable poſſeſſion of the empire by the death of Otho, in 1218. He was crowned at Rome, with his conſort, on the 22d of November, 1220, when he renounced all his pretenſions to the duchies of Spoletto and Tuſcany, in favour of the holy ſee, to which he gave the earldom of Fondy; he alſo promiſed to undertake nothing contrary to the privileges of the church, and renewed a vow he had made, of carrying a war into the Eaſt againſt the Saracens; but the following year, Frederic marched againſt Richard and Thomas, princes of Tuſcany, and the brothers of Innocent III. who had cauſed ſome of the cities of Puglia to revolt, and took the firſt priſoner, put the other to flight, and baniſhed the biſhops who were concerned in the defection, on which he was excommunicated by Innocent III. Pope Gregory IX. ſummoned the emperor to execute his vow of going to the Holy Land, and finding that he deferred it, excommunicated him in 1227 and 1228. He then attacked the dominions of the church, but the pope raiſing an army, he ſet out for the Holy Land, and arrived there in the month of September, 1228, but the armies of the Chriſtians refuſed to obey him, becauſe Gregory IX had not taken off his excommunication. However, Frederic concluded a peace on the 18th of February, 1229, with Meladin, ſultan of Babylon, who reſtored to him Jeruſalem, Bethlehem, Nazareth, Thoron, and Sydon, with the Chriſtian priſoners; upon which the emperor went to the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jeruſalem, and took the crown from the altar himſelf, there being no biſhop who would place it upon his head, and then returned to Europe. He now ſeized the eſtates of the Templars and Hoſpittalers; conquered Romania; the marquiſate of Ancona, and the Milaneſe; ſubdued Sardinia; defeated the forces of the Venetians and Genoeſe, rendered himſelf maſter of the duchies of Urbino and Tuſcany, and in 1240, went to lay ſiege to Rome. The following year, Gregory IX reſolved to aſſemble a council againſt him, but the prelates of France, England, and Spain, who had ſet out to attend that council, were made priſoners by Henry king of Sardinia, the emperor's natural ſon, at which the pope died with vexation. Celeſtine IV. who ſucceeded him, ſat in the papal chair but eighteen days; and Innocent IV. who was not elected till about nineteen after, retired into France; but in 1245, held a general council at Lyons, in which he excommunicated Frederic, and degraded him from the empire. The emperor complained of this violent proceeding, in a letter to St. Lewis king of France; however, after this depoſition, all his affairs fell into diſorder; the people who had entered into a league againſt him in Lombardy, defeated his troops; all the princes conſidered him as an impious wretch, and the Germans, in 1245, elected Henry of Thuringia emperor in his room, and afterwards, in 1248, William earl of Holland. In ſhort, this unhappy prince, filled with vexation, and abandoned by every body, died at Fiorenzuela, in the duchy of Parma, on the 13th of December, 1250, aged fifty-ſeven.

This prince ſpoke ſix languages, had a quick and penetrating judgment; was courageous, learned, liberal, and fond of magnificence; but was cruel, debauched, and paid little regard to his word. He cauſed to be tranſlated from the Greek into Latin, ſeveral of Ariſtotle's works, and granted ſeveral privileges to univerſities. The diſſenſions between this prince and the popes, gave riſe to the factions of the Guelphs and Gibbelines.

FREDERIC III. ſurnamed the Fair, the ſon of Albert I. emperor and duke of Auſtria, was ſet on the imperial throne by ſome electors, in 1314, after the others had elected Lewis of Bavaria. Frederic had at firſt ſome advantages over his competitor, but was taken priſoner in a battle fought in 1322, and died in priſon on the 13th of January, 1330. He is not reckoned by ſome authors in the number of the emperors.

FREDERIC IV. ſurnamed the Pacific, was the ſon of Erneſt duke of Auſtria, and was elected emperor in 1440, after the death of his firſt couſin Albert II. and was crowned at Rome, with his wife Eleanor of Portugal, by pope Nicholas V. on the 9th of March, 1452. This prince was fond of peace and tranquility. He diſſembled with ſuch care the ſubjects of diſcontent given by the popes, that the Italians ſaid, "He had a dead ſoul in a living body." He conveened, in conjunction with the pope's legates, the concordat of the Germanic body, and publiſhed a code of fiefs. Frederic forgot nothing in endeavouring to put an end to the factions formed in his dominions; but all his endeavours were ineffectual, for Germany was never more torn in pieces by civil wars. Matthias king of Hungary having taken Vienna on the firſt of June, 1485; it is ſaid, that Frederic gave himſelf no pain about it, and that travelling then in Germany, he was contented with writing on the walls of the place where he lodged, Rerum irrecuperandarum ſumma Felicitas, Oblivio; that is, The Forgetfulneſs of Happineſs, when we cannot recover it, is ſupreme Felicity. He marched into Flanders in 1488, to the aſſiſtance of his ſon Maximilian I. and died on 7th of September, September, 1493, aged ſeventy-eight. Under his reign printing was invented in Germany.

FREDERIC I. king of Denmark, and duke of Holſtein, was elected in 1523, in the room of his nephew Chriſtiern, who was depoſed on account of his cruelty. He introduced Lutheraniſm into his dominions, and died in 1533. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Chriſtiern III.

FREDERIC II. king of Denmark, ſucceeded his father Chriſtiern III in 1559. He conquered the provinces of Ditmarſen, defended Livonia and the liberty of the Baltic Sea, againſt Lubec and the Swedes, protected Tycho Brahe and other learned men, made the arts and ſciences flouriſh in his dominions, and died on the 4th of April, 1588, aged fifty-four. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Chriſtiern IV.

FREDERIC III. king of Denmark, ſucceeded his father Chriſtiern IV. in 1648. He engaged in a war with Charles Guſtavus, king of Sweden, who penetrated as far as his capital, which would inevitably have fallen into the enemies hands, had not the emperor, and the kings of England and Poland, interfered in the quarrel; but by the treaty of Roſchild, concluded in 1659, he was obliged to cede to the Swedes Schonen, Hallandt, Bleking, Bahus, Drontheim, &c. Afterwards Frederic obtained from the ſtates of Denmark the power of making the crown hereditary in his family, though it was before elective, and died on the 9th of February, 1670, aged ſixty-one. He was ſucceeded by Chriſtiern V.

FREDERIC IV. king of Denmark, ſucceeded his father Chriſtiern V. in 1699. He made war on Charles XII. king of Sweden, who obliged him to conclude a peace; but the king of Sweden being conquered by Peter the Great, czar of Muſcovy, Frederic rekindled the war, gained great advantages over the Swedes, took from them ſeveral places, and died in 1730.

FREDERIC AUGUSTUS I. king of Poland, and elector of Saxony, was born at Dreſden, on the 12th of May, 1670. He was the ſecond ſon of John George III. elector of Saxony, and of Anna Sophia, the eldeſt daughter of Frederic III. king of Denmark, and ſucceeded his brother John George IV. elector of Saxony, on the 27th of April, 1694. Frederic Auguſtus, the following year, commanded the Chriſtian army againſt the Turks, and gained the battle of Oltaſch. He embraced the popiſh religion on the 23d of May, 1697, and was elected king of Poland, on the 27th of July following. He had afterwards a long war with the Swedes, in which Charles XII. ſpreading the terror of his arms through Upper Poland, Sileſia, and Saxony, he ſued for peace, chuſing to ſurrender himſelf to the diſcretion of the conqueror, rather than into the arms of Peter the Great, emperor of Ruſſia, his protector, and his plenipotentiaries ſigned the convention, by which he not only reſigned the crown of Poland, but promiſed never more to aſſume the title of king: at the ſame time, he acknowledged the royal dignity of Staniſlaus Leſzinſki, waiwode of Poſnania, who was placed on the throne of Poland, in 1704; renounced the alliance of the czar his benefactor, and, to complete his humiliation, contrary to the law of nations, delivered into the hands of Charles XII. John Reinold Patkul, the czar's ambaſſador, and general in the Ruſſian ſervice, who had been fighting in his defence; but after the defeat of Charles XII. king of Sweden, by Peter the Great, Frederic Auguſtus remounted the throne of Poland, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral important places belonging to the Swedes, and died on the 1ſt of February, 1733.

Frederic Auguſtus II. his only ſon, ſucceeded him in the electorate of Saxony, and was choſen king of Poland, on the 5th of October, 1733.

FREDERIC I. elector of Brandenburg, and the firſt king of Pruſſia, was the ſon of Frederic William the Great, and was born at Konigſberg, in 1657. This prince inſtituted and diſtributed the order of the Black Eagle, and the next day, on the 18th of January, 1701, erected his duchy of Pruſſia, of which he was ſovereign prince, into a kingdom, by cauſing himſelf to be crowned, with great ceremony, in the cathedral of Konigſberg. However, he was not generally acknowledged as king till the peace of Utrecht, at which he had the poſſeſſion of the city of Gueldres, and ſome others, of which he had made himſelf maſter in 1703, guarantied to him. In 1707, he purchaſed the county of Tecklenburg, and took poſſeſſion of the principality of Neufchatel and Valengin, as a deſcendant from the houſe of Naſſau. He died on the 25th of February, 1713. This prince was a zealous protector and defender of the proteſtants, and a patron of learned men. He founded the Royal Society at Berlin, and the univerſity at Halle.

FREDERIC WILLIAM I. king of Pruſſia, and elector of Brandenburg, was the ſon of Frederic I. elector of Brandenburg, the firſt king of Pruſſia, and was born on the 15th of Auguſt, 1688. He was preſent at the bloody battle of Malplaquet, on the 11th of September, 1709, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his perſonal bravery. He aſcended the throne after the death of the king his father, which happened on the 25th of February, 1713, when he took for the general rule of his conduct this maxim of Cyrus, That "the "moſt effectual means to render a people happy, is to have "a good army of well-choſen ſoldiers, and to govern his "his ſubjects with wiſdom;" he therefore reformed the ſuperfluous expences of his palace, would have no prime miniſter, and kept an army of an hundred thouſand men. This prince was ridiculouſly fond of having very tall men in his troops, and would ſometimes give even a thouſand pounds ſterling for a ſingle ſoldier, when he was greatly above the ordinary height. Frederic William added to his dominions the principality of Neufchatel, and ſeveral other conſiderable territories, made a ſucceſsful war againſt Charles XII. king of Sweden, limited all criminal proſecutions to three months, amaſſed great treaſures, built an hoſpital at Potſdam for the education and maintenance of the ſoldiers, and died on the 31ſt of May, 1740, aged fifty two. He was ſucceeded by Charles Frederic, king of Pruſſia, and elector of Brandenburg, who was born at Berlin, on the 24th of January, 1712, and has diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a great warrior, a great philoſopher, and a great politician.

FREDERIC, prince of Heſſe Caſſel, married on the 4th of April, 1714, Ulrica Eleanora of Bavaria, a ſiſter of Charles XII. king of Sweden. This princeſs, after the fatal death of her brother, ſucceeded to the kingdom of Sweden, on the 3d of February, 1719, and abdicated the throne in favour of Frederic, who was elected king of Sweden on the 4th of April, 1720.

There have been ſeveral other princes of the ſame name.

FREDERICA, a town and fort of Georgia, in North America, ſeated in the iſland of St. Simon's, in the mouth of the river Alatamaha. The Spaniards invaded this iſland in 1742, took the fort, and were marching to the town, but were repulſed by general Oglethorpe, and were obliged to abandon the enterprize. St. Simon's Iſland is thirteen miles long, three or four broad, and ſixty miles north of St. Auguſtin. The fort, by ſome called St. Simon's, is about ſeven miles from the town. There are ſome other ſmall iſlands in the river, which the Engliſh have fortified. Long. 81. 42. W. Lat 31. 12. N.

FREDERICKSBERG, a palace of the king of Denmark, near Copenhagen, ſeated on a mountain. It is three ſtories high, and built after the Italian manner. The entrance into the garden is by two large ſtone ſtair-caſes, in which there are a great number of grottoes, fountains, caſcades, and hermitages. There is likewiſe a place, where all ſorts of birds and beaſts are kept, both wild and tame. This palace was repaired in 1735, and the king reſided there till that in Copenhagen was finiſhed. Long. 12. 29. E. Lat. 55. 36. N.

FREDERICKSBURG, a caſtle and palace of the king of Denmark, in the iſle of Zealand, twenty miles north of Copenhagen. It had a great many rich ornaments, ſome of which, belonging to the caſtle, were of maſſy ſilver, but it was taken and pillaged by the Swedes, in 1659, who carried off all the riches. Near this is a park, in which there is plenty of game. Long. 12. 33. E. Lat. 55. 58. N.

FREDERICKSBURG, a ſtrong fort, on the coaſt of Guinea, in Africa, where there is a colony of Brandenburghers, ſubject to the Danes. It is on the Gold Coaſt, near Cape Three Points, ſeventy-five miles weſt of Cabo Corſo, or, as it is vulgarly called, Cape Coaſt. Long. 2. 12. W. Lat. 4. 30. N.

FREDERICKSTADT, a town of Denmark, in South Jutland, ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Eyder and Treern. It is a handſome town, which was built by the Arminians, when they were driven from Holland, in 1621. All ſorts of proteſtants are now tolerated there, but the Lutherans are moſt numerous. It is eight miles north-eaſt of Tonningen, and eighteen ſouth-weſt of Sleſwick. Long. 9. 5. E. Lat. 54. 41. N.

FREDERICKSTADT, a town of Norway, in the province of Aggerhuys, near a gulph of the ſame name. It is a town lately built, and well fortified. It is defended by a rock, called Iſegrim, and by Chriſtian caſtle, ſeated on a mountein, which was conſtructed by Chriſtian IV. in 1685. There is a court of juſtice in this town. It is on the frontiers of Sweden, ſixty miles north of Gottenburg. Long. 11. 31. E. Lat. 59. 12. N.

FREDERICKSHALL, a ſtrong town of Norway, in the province of Aggerhuys, near Suineſund, which ſeparates the territories of Sweden from thoſe of Denmark. It is but ſmall, but has a good harbour, and is defended by a fort, and is built in a place extremely high; and near the harbour is a rock, on which there are fortifications. Near this, there is a fort called Frederickſtein, and at a ſmall diſtance that of Gueldenleow. Between theſe two forts, Charles XII. king of Sweden, was killed by a ſhot, December 11, 1718. The late king of Denmark cauſed a pyramid to be erected on the ſpot, twenty feet high. with two inſcriptions, one in Latin, and the other in the language of the country. It is twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Anſlow, ſixty-five north-by-weſt of Bahus, and thirty-five ſouth-eaſt of Aggerhuys. Long. 11. 31. E. Lat. 59. 22. N.

FREDERICK's Ode, a town of Denmark, in Jutland, built by Frederic III. It is well fortified and defended by nine baſtions. All religions are tolerated here; and, in 1719, a colony of French ſettled here, who cultivate a great quantity of tobacco. It was taken by the Swedes, in 1657. It is near the ſea, thirty miles ſouth of Arhus, fifty north of Sleſwick, and thirteen north-eaſt of Colding. Long. 10. 12. E. Lat. 55. 42 N.

FREKE (William) a gentleman of conſiderable learning, was born at Hannington, in Wiltſhire, in the year, 1663, and ſtudied at Wadham college, Oxford, whence he removed to the Temple, in London, where he purſued the ſtudy of the law, and became a barriſter; but, in 1687, he publiſhed Eſſays towards an Union between Divinity and Morality, Natural Religion and Revelation. He likewiſe wrote a Dialogue concerning the Deity, and a work, intitled A brief Confutation of the Doctrine of the Trinity, which two pieces were printed together about the beginning of December, 1693, and ſent by the penny-poſt to ſeveral members of parliament, who laying them before the houſe of commons, they were voted to be burnt, as they accordingly were, in the Palace-yard, Weſtminſter; and the author being afterwards diſcovered, was indicted in the king's bench, for writing theſe pamphlets, and being found guilty, was fined five hundred pounds, and obliged to give ſecurity for his good behaviour for three years.

FREGOSA (Paul) archbiſhop of Genoa, a famous cardinal in the fifteenth century, and three times doge of Genoa. He had great abilities, which he employed in gratifying his ambition. Though he had not lived in a manner becoming an eccleſiaſtic, he had ſuch intereſt as to obtain the archbiſhoprick of Genoa. In 1462, he cauſed himſelf to be elected doge; and being ſoon after deprived of that dignity, found means to reinſtate himſelf, in 1463; but the outrages he committed obliged the Genoeſe to call in to their aſſiſtance Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, and to ſhake off his yoke. Fregoſa, now abandoned by his beſt friends, left Genoa, but ſome time after returned, and began to raiſe freſh cabals. Baptiſta Fregoſa, his nephew, who was elected doge in 1478, procured him a cardinal's hat: but the reſtleſs ambition of this prelate cauſed him to diſpoſſeſs his benefactor and relation, and to get himſelf inſtalled in his room, and thus became doge for the third time. His tyranny, however occaſioned his being again removed in 1488, on which he retired to Rome, where he continually ſolicited, but in vain, the enemies of his country to change its government. He died at Rome on the 2d of March, 1498.

Fregosa (Baptista) alſo called Fulgosa, nephew to the former, was elected doge of Genoa, on the 15th of November, 1478; but the above-mentioned cardinal uſurped his poſt, and baniſhed him to Tregui. Baptiſta then applied himſelf to ſtudy, and compoſed in Italian nine books of Memorable Examples, on the plan of Valerius Maximus, which have been tranſlated into Latin by Camillus Ghilini, of Milan. It has had ſeveral editions, the beſt of which are printed with the additions and corrections of Juſtus Gaillard. Baptiſta alſo wrote ſeveral other works.

Fregosa (Frederic) archbiſhop of Salerno, and a famous cardinal, was employed in ſeveral important negociations. He afterwards defeated Cortogoli, a famous Barbary corſair, and having ſailed to Tunis and Gerbes, returned to Genoa with a great booty. Genoa being ſurpriſed by the Spaniards, in 1522, Frederic Fregoſa retired into France, where Francis I. gave him an abbey. He afterwards returned into Italy, was made biſhop of Eugubio and cardinal. He died on the 22d of July, 1541.

FREGUS, an ancient town of France, in Provence, with a biſhop's ſee. It was taken by the duke of Savoy, in 1707. It had formerly a conſiderable harbour, which is now filled up. It is ſeated near the ſea, on the river Argens, in a moraſs which renders the air unwholeſome. It is forty miles north-eaſt of Toulon, thirty ſouth-eaſt of Nice, and four hundred ſixty-two ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 6. 31. E. Lat. 42. 51. N.

FREHER (Marquard) a gentleman of diſtinguiſhed learning and abilities, was deſcended from a noble family, and born at Augſburg, on the 26th of July, 1565. When very young, he went into France to ſtudy civil law under the celebrated Cujacius, yet paid ſuch attention to hiſtory and criticiſm, that he became eminent in both. He had ſcarce arrived to the 23d year of his age, when he was choſen one of the counſellors of John Caſimir, prince Palatine, and in the following year was made profeſſor of philoſophy at Heidelberg. Some time after reſigning his profeſſor's chair, the elector, Frederic IV. made him vice-preſident of his court, and ſent him in quality of ambaſſador to ſeveral places. In the midſt of theſe employments, he conſtantly adhered to his uſual method of ſtudying, and wrote many works in relation to hiſtory, law, and criticiſm. He was alſo perfectly ſkilled in coins, medals, ſtatues, antiques of all ſorts, and could paint very well; ſo that from the number of books he wrote, and his various learning, it might be imagined that he muſt have lived a very long life, and yet he died in the forty-ninth year of his age. Douza obſerves, that he ſeems to have been born for the ſupport and advancement of polite literature; and Thuanus ſays, that it would be difficult to find his equal in all Germany. Scioppius obſerves, that he joined great acuteneſs and ſubtility to an incredible depth of learning; and Caſaubon calls him a man of profound and univerſal knowledge. His moral qualities are repreſented as not inferior to his intellectual; ſo that Melchior Adam ſeems with great juſtice to have lamented, that a man who ſo much deſerved to be immortal, ſhould die ſo ſoon.

FREIGIUS (John Thomas) a learned civilian, born at Friburgh in Briſgaw, taught the law at Friburgh, Baſil, and Altorf. He wrote a great number of books, among which are, 1. Queſtiones Geometricæ & Stereometricæ. 2. Ciceronis Orationes perpetuis nobis Logicis, Arithmeticis, Ethicis, Politicis, Hiſtoricis, illuſtratæ, in three volumes, octavo. 3. A Latin tranſlation of Frobiſher's Voyages. He died of the plague, about the year 1583.

FREIND (Dr. John) a celebrated Engliſh phyſician and elegant writer, was born at Croton, in Northamptonſhire, in year 1675, and after being educated at Weſtminſter ſchool, under Dr. Buſby, completed his ſtudies at Oxford. In 1696, he publiſhed, in conjunction with Mr. Foulkes, an edition of two Greek Orations, with a new Latin verſion. In 1703, his Emmenologia appeared, which gained him a very great reputation. The next year he was choſen profeſſor of chemiſtry in the univerſity of Oxford; and, in 1705, he attended the earl of Peterborough to Spain, as phyſician to the army, and, on his return, publiſhed an account of the earl's conduct in that kingdom. In 1712, he was elected a member of the Royal Society, and the ſame year attended the duke of Ormond into Flanders. He ſat as member for the borough of Launceſton, in Cornwall, in the parliament which was called in 1722, when he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral ſharp ſpeeches in oppoſition to the meaſures of the adminiſtration, on which he was, on the 12th of March, 1722-3, taken into cuſtody, and, on the 15th of the ſame month, committed to the Tower, on a charge of high treaſon, but on the 21ſt of June following, was admitted to bail. While he was in priſon, he began his Hiſtory of Phyſic, from the time of Galen to the beginning of the ſixteenth century, in two volumes, octavo. Upon the acceſſion of his late majeſty to the throne, he was appointed phyſician in ordinary to the queen, who had the utmoſt eſteem for him. He died at London, on the 26th of July, 1728, in the fifty-third year of his age, and was interred at Hitcham, in Buckinghamſhire, but a monument, with a Latin inſcription, is erected to his memory in Weſtminſter abbey. His widow, in conſideration of his merit, had a handſome penſion ſettled on her by her majeſty. Beſides the works already mentioned, he publiſhed ſeveral others; all his Latin works were collected and publiſhed together, in folio, by Dr. Wigan, in 1733.

FREINSHEMIUS (John) a famous writer, born at Ulm, in 1608. He is ſaid to have underſtood almoſt all the European languages, beſides Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He was profeſſor of eloquence at Upſal, librarian and hiſtoriographer to Chriſtina, queen of Sweden, and afterwards profeſſor at Heidelburgh, where he died, in 1660, aged fifty-two. He wrote Supplements to Tacitus, Quintus Curtius, and Titus Livy; with notes on Quintus Curtius, Tacitus, Florus, and ſeveral other Latin authors, to which he has alſo added excellent Tables.

FREIRE de Andrada (Hyacinthus) a famous Portugueſe poet and hiſtorian, born of a noble family at Baja. His principal work is the Life of John de Caſtro, the fourth viceroy of the Indies. This Life is much eſteemed, and paſſes for one of the beſt-written books in the Portugueſe language. He died at Liſbon, on the 13th of May, 1657.

FREISINGEN, a town of Germany, in Bavaria, capital of a biſhoprick of the ſame name. The cathedral church and the epiſcopal palace are ſuperb buildings. It has an agreeable ſituation, partly on a hill, and partly on the ſide of the river Iſer. The biſhop is a prince of the empire. It is twenty miles north of Munich, twenty ſouth-weſt of Landſhut, thirty-eight ſouth-weſt of Neubourg, and thirty-eight eaſt of Augſburg. Long. 11. 50. E. Lat. 48. 20. N.

FREMINET (Martin) an excellent painter. See Friminet.

FREMIOT (JANE FRANCES) baroneſs of Chantal, foundreſs of the order of the Viſitation, was born at Dijon, on the 23d of January, 1572. She married Chriſtopher de Rabutin, baron of Chantal, at twenty years of age, and had ſix children; but her huſband being accidentally killed, when hunting, by one of his friends, madam de Chantal put herſelf under the direction of St. Francis de Sales, and took the habit of a nun, on the 6th of June, 1610, in the ſuburb of d'Annecy, where ſhe founded the order of Viſitation, and governed that order with great wiſdom and prudence. She died at Moulins, on the 13th of December, 1641, while viſiting the monaſteries which had ſubmitted to her direction. She was beatified by pope Benedict XIV.

FRENICLE (NICHOLAS) a French poet, born at Paris in 1600, wrote ſeveral theatrical pieces, as 1. Palemon, a paſtoral. 2. Niobe. 3. The Shepherds, a paſtoral; alſo a poem intitled Jeſus Crucified, and a Paraphraſe on the Pſalms, in verſe. He lived till after the year 1660.

FRERET (N.) a learned member of the Academy of Inſcriptions and Belles Lettres, at Paris, was the author of many learned pieces, moſt of which are printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inſcriptions. He died at Paris in January, 1749.

FRESNE (CHARLES DU). See CANGE.

FRESNOY (CHARLES ALPHONSE DU) an able painter and poet, was born at Paris, in the year 1611, and from his infancy gave ſuch extraordinary proofs of his attachment to the Muſes, that he would probably have been one of the greateſt poets in his time, if the art of painting had not divided and weakened his talent. His father, who was a famous apothecary, made him apply to ſtudy, with a view of making him a phyſician; but to this profeſſion he had an invincible averſion. When he was about twenty years of age, he learned to deſign under Perrier and Vouet, and in 1634 went to Rome, where he contracted an intimate friendſhip with Mignard, which laſted as long as his life. He was familiarly acquainted with the Greek and Latin poets; ſtudied anatomy and the elements of geometry, with the rules of perſpective and architecture; deſigned after the life in the Academy, after Raphael in the Vatican, and after the antiques wherever he found them; and making critical remarks as he proceeded, drew up a body of them in Latin verſe, and laid the plan of his excellent poem De Arte Graphica, or of the Art of Painting, which he endeavoured to make the rule of his own conduct; but having never been well inſtructed in the management of the pencil, his hand was extremely ſlow, and his performances, excluſive of his copies after others, do not exceed fifty hiſtorical pieces. He had a particular veneration for Titian, whom he followed in his manner of colouring, as he did the Carracci in their guſto of deſign. His poem was the fruit of above twenty years ſtudy and labour. He communicated it to the maſters of greateſt note, in all places where he went, and particularly to Albani and Guercino at Bologna; but it was not printed till after his death, which happened in the year 1565, at fifty-four years of age. This poem, which is an admirable performance, has had many editions; and there is a French tranſlation of it, with remarks, by De Piles, and an Engliſh tranſlation by Mr. Dryden.

FRESNOY (NICHOLAS LENGLET DU). See LENGLET.

FRESNY (CHARLES RIVIERE DU) valet de chambre to Lewis XIV. comptroller of his gardens, and a French poet, was born at Paris in 1648. He had a natural taſte for muſic, deſigning, painting, ſculpture, architecture, and all the polite arts. He added to theſe talents, that of laying out gardens, which procured him the poſt of comptroller of the king's gardens. Du Freſny alſo obtained the privilege of manufacturing plate-glaſs, which had great ſucceſs, tho' he himſelf reaped no advantage from it. Some time after he quitted the court, and went to live at Paris, where he contracted an acquaintance with Rennard, a famous comic poet, and had a ſhare in writing the comedy of the Gameſter. He laboured a long time in writing for the old Italian theatre, afterwards for the French theatre, and at laſt in writing for the Mercure gallant. He died at Paris on the ſixth of October, 1724, aged ſeventy-ſix. His works have been printed at Paris, in ſix volumes, duodecimo. Theſe conſiſt of theatrical pieces, ſongs, hiſtorical novels, and ſerious and comical amuſements.

FREUDENBERG, the name of two ſmall towns of Germany, the one in Franconia, on the river Mein, and the other in Weteravia, in the county of Naſſau, remarkable for its trade in iron and ſteel.

FREUDENSTADT, a town of Germany, in the circle of Suabia, ſeated near the Black Foreſt, at the foot of a mountain called Knibis. It was built by Frederick duke of Wirtenberg, to defend the entrance into the Black Foreſt, and to ſerve as a retreat for the proteſtants, who were perſecuted in Auſtria. The church is built in the form of a ſquare, and the pews are ſo contrived, that the men and women cannot ſee each other while they are at church. In the neighbourhood there are mills for the working of copper. It is thirty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Tubingen, and twenty-three ſouth-eaſt of Straſburg. Long. 8. 27. E. Lat. 48. 25. N.

FREYSTADT, a town of Sileſia, in the duchy of Teſſin, where the greateſt number of the inhabitants are weavers. It hath a caſtle where the dukes formerly reſided. It is ſixteen miles eaſt of Troppeau. Long. 17. 46. E. Lat. 50. 12. N.

FREZZI (FREDERIC) a celebrated Spaniſh poet, born at Foligno, a town of Umbria, became a Dominican monk, and obtained the degree of doctor in divinity. He was well ſkilled in polite literature, philoſophy, theology, and civil and canon law. Pope Boniface IX. in 1403, gave him the biſhoprick of Foligno, and in that quality he aſſiſted at the council of Piſa in 1409, and in that of Conſtance in 1414, where he died, during the ſitting of the council in 1416. He was the author of a celebrated poem, much eſteemed by the Italians, the beſt edition of which is that of Foligno, in 1725, with the notes of many of the learned. This poem is intitled Quadrireggio, ò Poëma dè quatro Regni, that is, The Poem of the four Reigns of Human Life, in four books. The firſt of which is the reign of Cupid, the ſecond that of Satan, the third that of the Vices, and the laſt that of Minerva and Virtue.

FRIAS, a town of Spain, in Old Caſtile, ſeated on a mountain near the river Ebro, thirty-five miles north-eaſt of Barcos. Long. 3. 27. W. Lat. 42. 50. N.

FRIBERG, or FREYBERG, a town of Germany, in Upper Saxony, and the marquiſate of Miſnia. It is ſeated on the river Muld. It is a pleaſant town, of a circular figure, and encompaſſed with good walls. The ſtreets are broad and handſome, and the market-place ſpacious. Here are rich mines of ſilver, which were diſcovered by a carrier of ſalt belonging to Goſlar. They are ſtill worked, and it is ſaid that the town itſelf is all undermined by the workmen. Here is a court of juſtice which is ſo famous, that it has ſerved as a model for other countries. The moſt ancient margraves of Miſnia were buried in a mountain called Peterſberg. But afterwards, Henry the Pious declared he would live and die with his dear Fribergers. Upon which, the mauſoleum of the electors was transferred into the cathedral of Friberg. Among the monuments in that church, that of Maurice duke of Saxony is thought to be the fineſt in Germany, the buſt being of black marble, admirably well wrought, and has many ſtatues of white marble and alabaſter about it. The other buildings are not worth mentioning, except the elector's palace, which is a handſome ſtructure. Near the town, which is in a very pleaſant ſituation, there are other mines of ſilver, copper, lead, and antimony. They have a mint at Friberg, wherein rix-dollars and other money are coined, which are looked upon as the pureſt ſilver in Germany. It is twenty miles ſouth weſt of Dreſden, and twenty-one weſt of Koningſtein. Long. 13. 35. E. Lat. 50. 55. N.

FRIBURG, or FREYBURG, a town of Germany, in Suabia, and in the province of Briſgaw, once an important fortreſs, defended by a citadel and two caſtles, ſeated on a mountain. It is remarkable for its great church, which, except that of Straſburg, is the fineſt in Germany, and for its univerſity. The inhabitants are noted for poliſhing cryſtal and precious ſtones. This town has ſuſtained ſeveral ſieges, and was the laſt place taken by the French in 1713, but it was reſtored by the peace of Raſtadt the next year. Likewiſe when prince Charles of Lorrain paſſed the Rhine in 1744, with a flouriſhing army, having been obliged to return into Bohemia, to oppoſe the king of Pruſſia, who had made an irruption into that country, the French laid hold of the opportunity to beſiege this place. It was defended forty-five days, but the garriſon being weakened, it capitulated November 6, and the forts November 25 following. After this the caſtles and fortifications were demoliſhed. It is ten miles eaſt of Briſach, thirty ſouth of Straſburg, and two hundred and fifty eaſt of Paris. Long. 7. 46. E. Lat. 48. 21. N.

FRIBURG, one of the thirteen cantons of Swiſſerland, is ſurrounded by the canton of Bern, except on the ſide of the bailiwick of Eſtavayer, which lies on the bank of the lake of Neufchatel. The land produces plenty of grain, fruit, and paſture, and the country is very populous, it being ſaid they can bring eighteen thouſand men into the field. The inhabitants are all Roman Catholics. It is divided into eight bailiwicks and two lordſhips. In the country of Vaud the Friburgers poſſeſs four bailiwicks in common with the people of Bern. The city of Friburg governs the whole canton by bailiffs, who are always burgeſſes of the city. The chief towns are Friburg the capital, Gruyere, Romont, and Eſtravayer.

FRIBURG, the capital city of a canton of the ſame name, is a large handſome place, ſeated on the banks of the river Sane. There is only one part toward the weſt which is level, for the the reſt is built on rocks and hills, inſomuch, that going which way you will, you muſt either aſcend or deſcend. However, in general, it is very pleaſant, the ſtreets are neat and large, and the houſes handſome. The public buildings are of the religious kind, and finely adorned. The cathedral of St. Nicholas is in the middle of the city. It is large and curiouſly embelliſhed, it being gilded within and without. The grand portico is ſet off with ſeveral images of the ſaints, with crowns of gilt paper, and other trinkets, with which the ſuperſtitious inhabitants are greatly affected, and, as is pretended, greatly excited to devotion. Over this there is a magnificent high ſteeple, built in 1283. The church of Our Lady is near to this, there being but a ſtreet between them. It is ſmall, and not worth notice, if compared with the former.

The Jeſuits have an handſome convent, ſeated on an eminence, in the higheſt part of the town, and have a college and a fine church belonging to it. Before it there is a large pond, with a bridge over it, which is the entrance of the convent. Beſides, you muſt go up to this bridge by a ſtair-caſe of ſeveral hundred ſteps covered over. The other religious houſes are the convent of the Auguſtines, founded in 1245, wherein is a magnificent altar; that of the Cordeliers, founded in 1245, wherein there is a repreſentation of a dance of the dead; that of the nuns, which is among the rocks, on a point of land by the ſide of the river, at the extremity of the city.

The Sane runs in a deep channel at the foot of craggy rocks, which ſerve as a defence to the town. The town-houſe is on one of thoſe rocks, having the ſtreet on the Sane behind it. It ſtands on the ſame ſpot where there formerly was a caſtle.

The city of Friburg, as well as the reſt of the canton, is of the Roman Catholic religion, and is in the biſhoprick of Lauſanne; the biſhop reſides here. The inhabitants ſpeak two languages, German and Romande, which laſt is a very corrupt ſort of French. Friburg has its great and little council, the firſt has the ſupreme authority, and conſiſts of an hundred counſellors; the other has the adminiſtration of common affairs, and is made up of twenty-four ſenators; beſides theſe magiſtates, there are two avoyers for life, who preſide in both councils alternately, each a year at a time. There are alſo four banderets, which are the head of the militia, and a burſor, or general, who has the adminiſtration of the revenues of the canton, and the overſeeing of the public buildings. Friburg is eighteen miles ſouth-weſt of Bern, thirty north-eaſt of Lauſanne, thirty-five ſouth-weſt of Soleure, and ſeventy-five ſouth-weſt of Zurich. Long. 7. 51. E. Lat. 46. 39. N.

FRICENTO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, in the Farther Principality, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated near the river Tripalto, twenty-eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Benevento, thirty-five north eaſt of Salerno, and forty-three eaſt of Naples. Long. 15. 46. E. Lat. 41. 21. N.

FRIDBERG, an imperial city of Germany, in Wetteravia, formerly much more conſiderable than it is at preſent. It is ſeated on a mountain, ten miles north-eaſt of Frankfort, and thireen ſouth of Gieſſen. Long. 8. 50. E. Lat. 50. 14. N.

FRIDBURG, a town of Germany, in the circle of Bavaria, ſeven miles eaſt of Augſburg, and is an imperial city, governed by its own magiſtrates. Long. 11. 12. E. Lat. 48. 41. N.

FRIDBURG, a town of Saxony, in the circle of Upper Saxony, ſubject to the elector of Saxony, nine miles ſouth-weſt of Dreſden. Long. 12. 3. E. Lat. 50. 51. N.

FRIDBUG, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, and province of Thuringia, ſeated on the river Unſtruc, thirty miles weſt of Leipſic. Long. 11. 48. E. Lat. 51. 26. N.

FRIDING, a town of Germany, in Swabia, belonging to the houſe of Auſtria. It is ſeated on the Danube, twenty miles ſouth eaſt of Tubingen, and thirty north of Conſtance. Long 9. 1. E. Lat. 47. 50. N.

FRIDLAND, a town of Bohemia, ſeated on the confines of Luſatia, fifty-five miles from Dreſden, and ſubject to the houſe of Auſtria. Long. 15. 10. E. Lat. 50. 49 N.

FRIDLINGEN, a town of Germany, in the circle of Swabia, three miles from the Rhine, and five north of Baſil. Long. 7. 36. E. Lat. 47. 29. N.

FRIESLAND, one of the United Provinces of the Low Countries. It is bounded on the eaſt by the river Lauvers, which parts it from the lordſhip of Gronningen, on the ſouth by Overyſſel, on the weſt by the Zuider-Zee, and on the north by the German ocean. It is thirty miles from north to ſouth, and twenty-eight from eaſt to weſt. The land is very fertile in corn and paſture, the horſes are large, and the cows and ſheep fruitful. It is divided into three parts, Weſtergo to the weſt, Oſtergo to the eaſt, and Sevenwalden to ſouth. The iſlands of Sheling, Ameland, and other ſmall ones, are dependent on this province. The principal towns are Leuwarden, the capital, Franeker, Dockum, Harlingen, and Staveren.

FRIESLAND, EAST, a province of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, lying near the German ocean. It is bounded on the ſouth by the biſhoprick of Munſter, on the eaſt by the county of Oldenburg, on the weſt by the province of Groningen, and on the north by the ſea. It is about fifty miles in length, and thirty in breadth, and was formerly called the county of Embden. It is a very fertile country, and feeds a great number of cattle; but it was greatly damaged by an innundation in 1717, and the repair of the damaged dykes coſts an immenſe ſum. The principal towns are Norden, Leer, Eſſens, Whitmunde, and Aurick. Embden was an imperial city, and the principal place in the country, but now belongs to the king of Pruſſia, who bought it of the Dutch.

FRIMINET (MARTIN) an eminent French painter, was born at Paris, and was the diſciple of his father, a very indifferent painter; but travelling to Italy, he lived there ſeven years, chiefly at Rome, and more particularly applied himſelf to the works of Michael Angelo, whence his manner became not very unlike that great painter's, as may be ſeen by the chapel of Fontainbleau, which is chiefly of his painting. He began this work in the reign of Henry IV. who honoured him with his eſteem, and continued it in the reign of Lewis XIII. who conferred on him the order of St. Michael; but he did not long enjoy the favours of the court, for, before he had quite finiſhed that chapel, he died in the year 1619, at fifty-two years of age.

FRISCHLIN (NICODEMUS) a Latin poet, born at Balingen, in the duchy of Wirtemburg, on the 22d of September, 1547. He underſtood the languages, and polite literature, and taught with reputation at Tubingen. In 1580, he publiſhed an Oration in Praiſe of a Country-Life, with a Paraphraſe on Virgil's Eclogues and Georgics, in which, with ſome ſeverity, he compared the lives of ſome modern courtiers, with thoſe of the ancient huſbandmen, ſhewing how thoſe courtiers had degenerated from the virtue and ſimplicity of their anceſtors; which gave ſuch offence, that his life was in danger, and though he made many public apologies, and even his prince interceded for him, he could not remain at home in ſafety, and therefore retired to Laubach, in Carniola, where he ſet up a ſchool; but the air not agreeing with his wife and family, he paſſed from place to place, till at length, being reduced to neceſſity, he applied to the duke of Wirtemberg for relief. His application was however diſregarded; and he, imagining that this proceeded from the malice of his enemies, wrote ſeverely againſt them, for which he was at laſt impriſoned in Wirtemberg caſtle, from whence attempting to eſcape by ropes that were not ſtrong enough to ſupport him, he fell down a prodigious precipice, and was daſhed to pieces. He was thus killed on the 28th of November, 1590, at the age of forty-three. He alſo wrote, 1. Notes on Perſius and on Horace's Epiſtles; 2. Tranſlations of Oppian, Ariſtophanes, Calimachus, and Heliodorus; 3. Some Elegies, Comedies, and other pieces, in verſe.

FRINWALT, or FRIDLAND, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, and marquiſate of Brandenburg, ſeated on the weſt ſide of the river, thirty miles north of Berlin, ſubject to Pruſſia. Long. 14. 43. E. Lat. 52. 45. N.

FRITZLAR, a town of Germany, in Lower Heſſe, ſeated on a very fruitful hill, near the river Edor, and belongs to the elector of Mentz. It is an ancient place, but is ill built; however, there is a handſome convent. It is ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Waldeck, and eighteen ſouth-weſt of Caſſel. Long. 8. 43. E. Lat. 51. 12. N.

FRIULI, a province of Italy, in the territory of Venice, bounded on the north by Corinthia, on the ſouth by the Gulph of Venice, on the eaſt by Goritz and the Gulph of Trieſt, on the weſt by the Treviſano, Feltrino, and the Belluneſe. It is fertile in wine and fruit, and partly belongs to the Venetians, and partly to the houſe of Auſtria. It is watered by ſeveral rivers, of which Tajamento and Liſonzo are the principal. The chief towns are Udina the capital, Marano, and Palma Nuovo. Long. 13. 0. E. Lat. 45. 46. N.

FRIZO (JOHN-WILLIAM) prince of Orange. See ORANGE.

FRIZON (PETER) doctor of the Sorbonne, was born in the dioceſe of Rheims, and publiſhed, in 1629, a hiſtory of the French cardinals, under the title of Galicia purpurata, and other works. He died in 1651.

FROBENIUS (JOHN) a famous and learned printer in the ſixteenth century, was born at Hamellburgh, in Franconia, and ſettled at Baſil. He had before ſtudied in that univerſity, where he acquired the reputation of being uncommonly learned; and now ſetting up a printing-houſe in that city, was the firſt of the German printers who brought brought that admirable art to any degree of perfection. Being a man of great probity and piety, as well as ſkill, he was particularly choice in the authors he printed, and would never, for the ſake of profit, ſuffer libels, or any thing that might hurt the reputation of another, to go through his preſs. The great reputation of this printer was the principal motive, which induced Eraſmus to reſide at Baſil, in order to have his own works printed by him. A great number of valuable authors were printed by Frobenius, with great care and accuracy, among which were the works of St. Jerome, Auguſtine, and Eraſmus. He deſigned to have printed the Greek Fathers, but died in 1527, before he could execute his deſign. Eraſmus wrote his epitaph in Greek and Latin.

John Frobenius left a ſon named Jerome Frobenius, and a daughter maried to Nicholas Epiſcopius, who joining in partnerſhip, continued Frobenius's printing-houſe with reputation, and printed correct editions of the Greek Fathers.

FROBISHER, or FORBISHER (ſir MARTIN) an excellent navigator and ſea-officer in the ſixteenth century, was born near Doncaſter, in Yorkſhire, and was from his youth brought up to navigation. He was the firſt Engliſhman who attempted to find a north-weſt paſſage to China, and in 1576, he ſailed with two barks and a pinnace, in order to attempt that paſſage; in this voyage he diſcovered a cape, to which he gave the name of Queen Elizabeth's Foreland, and the next day diſcovered a ſtreight to which he gave his own name. This voyage proving unſucceſsful, he attempted the ſame paſſage in 1577, but diſcovering ſome ore in an iſland, and his commiſſion directing him in this voyage only to ſearch for ore, and to leave the farther diſcovery of the north-weſt to another time, he returned to England. As the gold ore he brought had the appearance of great riches and profit, and the hopes of a north-weſt paſſage to China was greatly increaſed by the ſecond voyage, queen Elizabeth ſent a fleet, with one hundred adventurers, who willingly offered to ſtay in that cold and deſert country all the year round, forty of whom were mariners for the uſe of the ſhips, thirty miners to dig the ore, and thirty ſoldiers to guard the whole company, in which laſt number were included the refiners, bakers, carpenters, and other uſeful perſons. He ſailed with fifteen ſhips, twelve of which were to return at the end of ſummer with a lading of gold ore; but being obſtructed by the ice, and driven out to ſea by a violent ſtorm, they, after encountering many difficulties, returned home, without making any ſettlement, but brought a large quantity of ore. He afterwards commanded the Aid in Sir Francis Drake's expedition to the Weſt Indies, in which St. Domingo in Hiſpanoila, Carthagena, and Santa Juſtina, in Florida, were taken and ſacked. In 1588 he bravely exerted himſelf in defence of his country, againſt the Spaniſh armada, when he commanded the Triumph, one of the largeſt ſhips in that ſervice; and as a reward for his diſtinguiſhed bravery, received the honour of knighthood from the lord high-admiral at ſea. He afterwards commanded a ſquadron, which was ordered to cruize on the Spaniſh coaſt, and, in 1592, took two valuable ſhips and a rich carrac. In 1594, he was ſent to the aſſiſtance of Henry IV. king of France againſt a body of the Leaguers and Spaniards, who had ſtrongly fortified themſelves at Croyzon near Breſt; but in an aſſault upon that fort, on the 7th of November, Sir Martin was unfortunate wounded with a ball in the hip or ſide, of which he died ſoon after he had brought back the fleet to Plymouth, and was buried in that town.

FROBISHER's Straits. This ſtrait lies a little to the northward of cape Farewell in Weſt Greenland. It was diſcovered by ſir Martin Frobiſher. Long. 48. 10. W. Lat. 63. 12. N.

FRODLINGHAM, a town in the Eaſt riding of Yorkſhire, ſeated on the river Hull, with a market on Thurſdays. It has two fairs, on July 10, and October 2, for toys and pedlary ware. It is thirty miles eaſt of York, and one hundred and ninety-ſix north of London. Long. 0. 6. W. Lat. 55. 55. N.

FRODSHAM, a market town of Cheſhire, ſeated on the river Weaver, near its confluence with the Merſey. The town conſiſts of one ſtreet at the weſt-end of which is an ancient caſtle, formerly the ſeat of the noble family of the Rivers. It has a market on Wedneſdays; and two fairs, held on May 6, and Aug. 21, for cattle and pedlars ware. It is eleven miles north-north-eaſt of Cheſter, and one hundred and eighty-three north-eaſt of London. Long. 51. 0. E. Lat. 53. 20. N.

FROELICH (WILLIAM) a native of Zurich, ſerved with great zeal and reputation the French kings Francis I. Henry II. and Charles IX. and commanded in quality of colonel ſeveral Swiſs regiments, in the ſervice of thoſe princes. It was in a great meaſure owing to his intrepidity and the bravery of his regiment, that Francis I. obtained the victory of Cerizoles. Froelich was created a knight by Henry II. and died at Paris, on the 4th of December, 1562, after being forty years in the ſervice.

FROIDMONT (LIBERTUS) in Latin Fromondus, doctor of Louvain, in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Haccour, between Maeſtricht and Liege, taught with reputation at Louvain, where he was profeſſor of divinity in 1635, and died there, on the 27th of October, 1653, aged ſixty-ſix. He wrote Commentaries on the Acts of the Apoſtles and St. Paul's Epiſtles, and ſeveral other works, ſeveral of which have been condemned at Rome. He was the intimate friend of Janſenius, and was greatly admired by Deſcartes.

FROISSARD, or FROISSART, (JOHN) a famous hiſtorian in the fourteenth century, canon and treaſurer of Chimay, was born at Valenciennes, about the year 1337. He wrote a Chronicle, which includes what paſſed in France Spain, and England, from 1326 to 1400; Enguerrand de Monſtrelet continued this Chronicle till 1467, and John Sleiden made an Abridgment of it in Latin. Froiſſard alſo compoſed ſeveral poetical pieces, and died about the year 1402.

FROMAGEAU (GERMAIN) doctor of the Sorbonne, applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the deciſion of caſes of conſcience, and to works of charity. He for a long time aſſiſted thoſe who were condemned to be publicly executed, and died on the 7th of October, 1705. His deciſions have been printed with thoſe of Monſ. De Lamet, in two volumes, folio.

FROME, a town of Somerſetſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays. It carries on a great manufacture in broad-cloth. The fairs are on February 24, and July 22, for cattle and cheeſe; September 14, for cheeſe; and November 25, for cattle and cheeſe. It is ſeated on the river Frome, and is eleven miles ſouth of Bath, eighteen ſouth-ſouth-eaſt of Briſtol, and one hundred and five weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 2. 25. W. Lat. 51. 20. N.

FROMONDUS. See FROIDMONT.

FRONSAC, a town of France, in Guienne, ſeated on the river Dordogne, twenty-three miles north-eaſt of Bourdeaux. Long. 0. 13. W. Lat 46. 0. N.

FRONTEIRA, a town of Portugal, in Alentejo, with an old caſtle. It is famous for the battle gained by the Portugueſe over the Spaniards, in 1663. It is ſeated on the river Avis, ten miles north-eaſt of Eſtremos, twenty ſouth-weſt of Port-Allegro, and thirty-three eaſt of Liſbon. Long. 6 43. W. Lat. 43. 48. N.

FRONTENAC, a fort of Canada, ſeated on the river St. Lawrence, where it falls into the lake Ontario. This lake is one hundred and eighty miles long, and ſixty broad, being ſupplied with water by ſeveral freſh rivers. Fort Oſwego ſtood on the north-eaſt end of this lake, belonging to the Engliſh, but was taken and demoliſhed by the French.

FRONTIGNIAC, or FRONTIGNAN, a town of France, in Lower Languedoc. It is remarkable for its fine town-houſe, its muſcadine wines, and its jar-raiſins. It is ſeated near the ſea, on the edge of the lake Maguelone, fifteen miles north-eaſt of Agde, eighteen ſouth-weſt of Montpellier, and three hundred ſouth of Paris. Long. 3. 41. E. Lat. 43. 28. N.

FRONTINUS (SEXTUS JULIUS) a celebrated Roman captain, flouriſhed under Veſpaſian, Nerva, and Trajan. He was prætor and conſul, and ſignaliſed himſelf on ſeveral occaſions, and, in particular, commanded the Roman armies with ſucceſs in England and elſewhere. Frontinus was the friend of Martial, and was greatly extolled by all the writers of his time. He died about the end of the firſt century. There is ſtill extant his Four Books of Military Stratagems, written under the reign of Domitian. His will, which was made in the year 85, has this remarkable clauſe, impenſa monumenti ſupervacua eſt; memoria noſtra durabit, ſi vitâ meruimus.

FRONTO (MARCUS CORNELIUS) a celebrated Roman orator, taught eloquence to Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. The firſt of theſe princes had a ſtatue erected to his honour by the ſenate, and cauſed him to enjoy the conſulſhip for two months. He ought not to be confounded with Marcus Julius Fronto, who was conſul, for the third time, under Trajan, in the year 100.

FROWDE (PHILIP) a learned Engliſh poet, was the ſon of a gentleman who had enjoyed the office of poſt-maſter in the reign of queen Anne. At a proper age he was ſent to the univerſity of Oxford, where he was particularly diſtinguiſhed by the ingenious Mr Addiſon, who took him under his protection, and while he was there, he compoſed ſeveral poems, ſome of which were in Latin, and wrote with ſuch purity and elegance, that they were inſerted in the Muſæ Anglicanæ. He alſo wrote two tragedies, The Fall of Saguntum, and Philotas; but it is ſaid, that the politeneſs of his genius was the leaſt amiable part of his character, he eſteeming the talents of wit and learning only as they were conducive to the excitement and practice of honour and humanity; and that, with a mind chearfully benevolent and virtuous, he was in converſation greatly delightful, in friendſhip punctually ſincere, and in death reſigned. He died at his lodging, in Cecil-ſtreet, in the Strand, on the 19th of December, 1738.

FRUMENTIUS, the apoſtle of Ethiopia or Abyſſinia, was a native of Tyre. Meropus, a merchant and philoſopher of that city, who was his relation, carried him into Ethiopia, with Edecius, another young man, who was related to him; but Meropus dying as ſoon as he landed in the country, theſe young men ſo pleaſed the king by their learning and wiſdom, that he made them his favourites, and at his death appointed them tutors to his ſon. Frumentius made uſe of his credit to eſtabliſh the Chriſtian religion in Abyſſinia; he favoured the Chriſtian merchants; was ordained biſhop by St. Athanaſius, in 331, and after having erected ſeveral churches in that great empire, died about the year 360.

FRUTER, or rather FRUITIERS, in Latin Fruterius, a learned and judicious critic, in the ſixteenth century, was a native of Bruges, and went to Paris, in 1566, where he died before he was twenty-five years of age. He was the friend of Muret and ſeveral other learned men, and was the author of ſome works in Latin, which are extremely well written.

FRYTH (JOHN) an ingenious and learned man, who was a martyr to the reformation, was born at Sevenoake, in Kent, and educated at King's college, Cambridge, where he took a bachelor's degree; and afterwards removing to Oxford, became one of the junior canons of cardinal Wolſey's college. Some time before the year 1525 he became acquainted with Mr. William Tyndale, a zealous Lutheran, who made a convert of him; on which Mr. Fryth acknowledging his ſentiments, was ſeized and examined by the commiſſary of the univerſity, and impriſoned within the limits of the college. On his being releaſed in 1528, he went abroad, and about two years after returned greatly confirmed in his religious ſentiments. Now wandering about, he was taken up at Reading in Berkſhire as a vagabond, and ſet in the ſtocks; but a ſchool-maſter there, diſcovering his learning and merit, not only procured his releaſe, but generouſly ſupplied him with food and money. Afterwards going to London, and endeavouring to make proſelytes there, ſir Thomas More, then lord-chancellor, cauſed him to be ſeized, and ſent priſoner to the Tower, where he had ſeveral conferences with ſir Thomas and others. At length, being examined by the biſhops ſitting in St. Paul's cathedral, and refuſing to recant, was cruelly condemned to be burnt, and accordingly ſuffered in Smithfield, on the 4th of July, 1533. He wrote ſeveral pieces againſt popery, which were collected and printed together in folio, in 1573.

FUEGO, an iſland in the Atlantic ocean, and one of thoſe of Cape de Verd. It is ſmall, and throws out ſtones of an incredible bigneſs, and with a thundering noiſe. What inhabitants there are live at the foot of the mountain, in a very poor manner. Long. 24. 47. W. Lat. 15. 20. N.

FUESSEN, a town of Germany, in Suabia, and the biſhoprick of Augſburg, with an old caſtle. It is on the frontiers of Bavaria, and in the great road to Tirol. It is ſeated on the river Lech, fifty miles ſouth-weſt of Augſburg. Long. 9. 30. W. Lat. 57. 45. N.

FUGALIA, a feſtival among the Romans, kept in memory of the expulſion of their kings, on the 23d of February.

FUGGER (HULDRIC) born of a rich and ancient family at Augſburg, became chamberlain to pope Paul III. and afterwards turned proteſtant. He diſcovered a great affection for learning and learned men, and was at ſuch expence in purchaſing good manuſcripts, and getting them printed, that his relations brought an action againſt him, and had him declared incapable of managing his affairs; he was however afterwards reſtored to his eſtate. He died at Heidelburg, in 1584, aged fifty-eight, and bequeathed his library, which was a very conſiderable one, to the elector Palatine.

FULDE. The territory of the abbey of Fulde, has been erected into a principality, and depends on the circle of the Upper Rhine. It is ſeventy-five miles in length, and as much in breadth, and is ſituated between Heſſe and Franconia, in a country called Buchgow, and the river Fulde runs through the middle of it. The abbot is more powerful than many of the biſhops, for he is arch-chancellor of the emperor, and has a right to crown him as chief officer. In 1727 the pope gave him a power of chooſing a vicar-general. He is the primate of all the abbeys of the empire, and after his election pays four hundred florins to the pope, on whom he immediately depends. The monks of this abbey are of the order of St. Benedict, and ought to be all of noble families, and they have a right to elect an abbot from among themſelves. The capital is FULDE, a town ſeated on a river of the ſame name, in the above territory. The moſt remarkable thing in it is the ancient library, which contains a great number of curious manuſcripts. It is fifty-five miles ſouth of Caſſel, thirty five north of Wurtzburg, thirty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Marpurg, and fifty-eight north-eaſt of Frankfort. Long. 9. 53. E. Lat. 50. 40. N.

FULGENTIUS, biſhop of Ruſpæ, in Africa, ſurnamed the Auguſtine of his age, for having defended St. Auguſtine's doctrines againſt the Demi-Pelagians, was born at Leptæ, about the year 463. In 500 he went to Rome, to viſit the tomb of the apoſtles, and at his return to Africa was choſen biſhop of Ruſpæ; but on his oppoſing the Arians with great zeal, Thraſimond, king of the Vandals, baniſhed him into Sardinia. During his exile he compoſed his works. He was afterwards recalled, and died on the firſt of January, 533. Some of his works are ſtill remaining, of which there have been ſeveral editions.

He ought not to be confounded with Fulgentius Plantiades, a grammarian at Carthage, in the ſixth century, nor with Goteſcalc, alſo called Fulgentius. See GOTESCALC.

FULK (WILLIAM) D. D. a learned divine of the church of England, was born at London, and in 1555 was ſent to St. John's college, in Cambridge, of which he was choſen fellow in 1564. He had ſpent ſix years of this interval in the ſtudy of the law at Cliſford's Inn, London, agreeable to his father's inclination, who was ſo offended at his returning to the college, that he refuſed to grant him any ſupplies, tho' he was very rich. Fulk however eaſily made his way by his parts and learning. He applied himſelf to the mathematics; to the languages, particularly to the oriental; and to divinity. Being at length ſuſpected of puritaniſm, he was expelled the college, when coming to London, he maintained himſelf for ſome time by reading lectures; but ſoon the earl of Leiceſter took him under his patronage, and in 1571 preſented him to the living of Warley, in Eſſex, and two years after to that of Didington, in Suffolk. Soon after, the earl ſent him to Cambridge, with a mandamus for the degree of doctor in divinity, in order to qualify him to attend, as he afterwards did, an ambaſſador into France. Upon his return he was made maſter of Pembroke-hall, and Margaret profeſſor of divinity. In the poſſeſſion of theſe preferments he died, in Auguſt, 1589. His works in Latin and Engliſh are very numerous, the moſt conſiderable of which is his Comment upon the Rhemiſh Teſtament, printed in 1580, and reprinted in 1601, 1617, and 1633, in folio.

FULLER (NICHOLAS) a learned Engliſh divine, was born at Southampton in the year 1557, and was ſucceſſively ſecretary to Robert Horn, biſhop of Wincheſter, miniſter of the church of Aldington, canon of Saliſbury, and rector of Waltham. He wrote Miſcellanea Theologica & Sacra, and alſo an Appendix to that work, and died at Aldington, on the 13th of February, 1623.

FULLER (Dr. THOMAS) a learned Engliſh divine, was born at Allvinckle, near Oundle, in Northamptonſhire, about the year 1608, and ſtudied at Cambridge. He was choſen miniſter of St. Bennet's there, and at about twenty-three years of age, his merit procured him a fellowſhip in Sidney college, and a prebend in Saliſbury cathedral; he was ſoon after preſented to the rectory of Broad Windſor, in Dorſetſhire, and afterwards was made lecturer of the Savoy in London; but upon the preſſing of the Covenant, he retired to Oxford, and ſoon after accompanied ſir Ralph Hopton as his chaplain in the army, which he attended in their marches from place to place. After the death of king Charles I. he obtained the living of Waltham-abbey, and was appointed lecturer of St. Clement's, and ſhortly after removed to the lecture of St. Bride's, Fleet-ſtreet. Upon the Reſtoration he recovered his prebend in the cathedral of Saliſbury, and was appointed chaplain extraordinary to his majeſty, and created doctor of divinity. It is remarkable that his memory was ſo amazingly tenacious and comprehenſive, that he could repeat five hundred ſtrange words after twice hearing them, and could make uſe of a ſermon verbatim if he once heard it. He once undertook in paſſing to and from Temple-Bar to the Poultry, to tell at his return every ſign as it ſtood in order on both ſides the way, repeating them either backwards or forwards; and this taſk he actually performed. He wrote, 1. A Hiſtory of the Holy War. 2. The Church Hiſtory of Britain, in folio. 3. Andronicus, or the unfortunate Politician, in octavo. 4. A Piſgah's Sight of Paleſtine. 5. A Hiſtory of Engliſh Worthies; and other works. He died in Auguſt, 1661, and was interred in the chancel of Cranford church, in Middleſex, whither his body was attended by at leaſt two hundred of his brethren of the miniſtry.

FULLER (ISAAC) an eminent Engliſh painter, in the reign of king Charles II. had a great genius for deſigning hiſtory-pieces, yet did not always execute them with proper decency, he being apt to modernize and burleſque his ſubjects; but though this maſter wanted the regular improvements obtained by travelling and correcting his judgment by ſtudying the antiques, he may be reckoned among the foremoſt of the Engliſh painters. He was many years in France under Perrier, and underſtood the anatomical part of painting perhaps as well as Michael Angelo, following it ſo cloſely, that he was very apt to make the muſcling too ſtrong and prominent. The reſurrection at All-ſouls college, Oxford, and that at Magdalen-college chapel in the ſame univerſity, were of his doing. There is alſo at Wadham-college a hiſtory-piece of his, admirably performed in only two colours. He died in London, about the end of the reign of Charles the Second.

FULVIA, a Roman lady, of the illuſtrious family of the Fulvii, married firſt Clodius the enemy of Cicero, and then Curio, who was killed in Africa, in defending Cæſar's party, and at laſt Mark Antony the triumvir. She was a bold, ambitious, and enterprizing woman, who reſolved to have a ſhare in the government, and to have a hand in the adminiſtration of public affairs. After the battle of Phillippi, ſhe quarrelled with Auguſtus, and cauſed a war to be raiſed againſt Lucius Antonius, her huſband's brother. Some time after ſhe retired into the Eaſt, where ſhe was very ill received by Mark Antony, who did not deſire that this jealous and vindictive woman ſhould be a witneſs of his paſſion for Cleopatra. Fulvia was ſo ſhocked at this ill treatment, that ſhe died with vexation at Sicyon, in the fortieth year before the Chriſtian æra. This woman was filled with ſuch joy at the murder of Cicero, that his head being brought to her, ſhe ſpit upon it, and placing it on her lap, drew out the tongue, which ſhe pierced ſeveral times with her bodkin, uttering at the ſame time the moſt opprobrious language.

She ought not to be confounded with Fulvia, another Roman lady, who diſcovered to Cicero Cataline's conſpiracy, taking him for Curius, who was one of the accomplices.

FULVIUS URSINUS, or FULVIO ORSINI, a famous critic in the ſixteenth century, was born at Rome, and wrote a Treatiſe De Familiis Romanorum, Notes on Cicero, Varro, &c. and ſeveral other works which are eſteemed. He died at Rome, on the 18th of June, 1600, aged ſeventy, and left a part of his manuſcripts to the Vatican library.

FUNCH, FUNECCIUS, or FUNCCIUS, (JOHN) a famous Lutheran miniſter, born at Werden, near Nuremberg, in 1518, followed the doctrine of Oſiander, whoſe daughter he married, and was a miniſter in Pruſſia. He compoſed a Chronology, from Adam to the year 1560, and ſeveral Treatiſes; but being convicted of giving Albert, duke of Pruſſia, to whom he was chaplain, ſuch council as was of diſadvantage to the ſtate of Poland, he, and ſome others were condemned as diſturbers of the public tranquility, and he was beheaded at Konigſberg, on the 28th of October, 1566.

FUNCHAL, the capital of Madeira, an iſland in the Atlantic Ocean. It ſtands at the foot of a high hill, and is of a narrow, long form. The churches are beautiful, and enriched with fine pictures, gildings, and plate. The town is populous; but beſides Portugueſe, there are Engliſh and French who are Catholics, and live in the Portugueſe manner. There are likewiſe a great number of mulattoes and negroes, both free men and ſlaves. The ſtreets are drawn in a line, and the houſes are pretty well built, with lattice windows, which they can lift up or let down at pleaſure. The ladies often repair to theſe windows, and the gentlemen in the ſtreet court them by ſigns, for theſe people are very expert in converſing with their fingers. The ladies never go to church but on Saturday and holidays, and then they throw a thin veil over their faces, but expoſe their breaſts quite naked. They are generally guarded by an old man, who carries a ſword and dagger and a ſtring of beads; but this does not hinder the lovers from appearing before their miſtreſſes at a ſmall diſtance, who court them in dumb ſhow, in a very ingenious manner. It is the ſee of a biſhop, and the reſidence of the king of Portugal's adelantado, or governor. The town is not very large, and yet there are near twenty churches in it.

The valley near which it is ſeated, is watered with ſeveral rivulets, and is fertile in wine, corn, ſugar, and fruits. The climate is very enchanting, there being almoſt a perpetual ſpring, with bloſſoms and fruit every month in the year. The onions are ſo ſweet, that they are eaten like apples; the lemons are of a monſtrous ſize; and they have oranges of all ſorts. The inhabitants have an excellent manner of preſerving and making ſweet-meats. Their ſugars are extremely fine; and the ſugar-canes were firſt carried to America from this place. They have ſeveral ſorts of wine beſides that which is brought to us by the name of Madeira. It bears heat the beſt of any wine in the world, inſomuch that it is greatly improved by being carried to the Weſt Indies.

Among all their fruits, the bananoe is moſt in eſteem, not only for its natural pleaſantneſs, but becauſe they ſuppoſe the leaves of the tree to be the ſame wherewith Adam and Eve covered their nakedneſs. The inhabitants pretend, like the Moors, to keep their maids from the ſight of any man, even their intended huſbands, before marriage; but their precautions are often eluded, for here both ſexes ſtudy gallantry more than any thing elſe; and the women, after they are wedded, think conjugal unfaithfulneſs no more a ſin than the men; for which reaſon a ſtranger generally meets with invitations in abundance. Chaſtity in the male ſex is no recommendation to matrimony; for the old ladies will not chooſe a huſband for their daughters, except among thoſe who have given proofs of their abilities, for a want of converſation with women is with them a ſign of impotency; and yet, for all this, as the reverend Mr. Ovington aſſirms, a modeſt ſalute is an inſufferable offence. However, with regard to eating and drinking, they are very temperate: and the poorer ſort, in the time of the vintage, make a comfortable repaſt with bread and ripe grapes.

The reputable inhabitants are very careful not to match with the deſcendants of Moors and Jews; but they have no objection to foreign merchants, provided religion is no bar, for in that reſpect they are very ſtrict, inſomuch that they will not allow the Engliſh heretics, as they are termed, a burying-place; but this is no wonder, ſince the clergy are rich, numerous, and bear a great ſway.

Funchal is four hundred and ten miles from the coaſt of Africa. Long. 14. 30. E. Lat. 32. 33. N.

FUNDY BAY, in North America, is ſituated between Nova Scotia and New England, and has a remarkable fiſhery.

FUNEN, one of the iſlands of Denmark, is ſeated between the Great Belt, which ſeparates it from the iſle of Zealand, and the Little Belt, which parts it from North Jutland. It is about fifty miles in length, and forty in breadth. It is fertile in corn, and produces plenty of apples, of which they make cyder, which they ſend abroad. They are likewiſe famous for mead and fine horſes, which are bought by the Germans. Game of all ſorts is very plenty as well as fiſh. Odenſee is the chief town; beſides which there are Nyburg, Schwinberg, Middlefar, and Aſſens.

FURETIERE (ANTHONY) a native of Paris, abbot of Charleroy, and a celebrated member of the French academy, acquired great reputation by his works, and died on the 14th of May, 1688, aged ſixty-eight, after having had great diſputes with his brethren the academicians. The moſt celebrated of his works is his Univerſal Dictionary of the French Language, two volumes, folio, which was not printed till after his death.

FURIES, in fabulous hiſtory. See EUMENIDES.

FURIUS BIBACULUS, a Latin poet, born at Cremona, about the one hundred and third year before the Chriſtian æra. He wrote Annals in verſe, ſome fragments of which are mentioned by Macrobius. Horace ſpeaks of him in this ſatirical verſe.

Furius hibernas canâ nive conſpuit Alpes.

FURIUS (FREDERIC) ſurnamed CÆRIOLANUS, was a native of Valentia, in Spain, and flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century. He ſtudied at Paris, and afterwards went to Louvaine, where he publiſhed a Treatiſe of Rhetoric, and aſſerted, in oppoſition to a profeſſor in that univerſity, that the Scriptures ought to be tranſlated into the vulgar tongue. He wrote a very fine Treatiſe on that ſubject, and went into Germany to print it. This brought him into trouble; but the emperor Charles V. being informed of his learning, piety, and candour, ſent him into the Low Countries, and placed him near Philip his ſon, and made him his hiſtorian. He died in Valadolid, in 1592. His treatiſe of the Counſellor has been much eſteemed.

FURNES, a town of Flanders, in the Auſtrian Netherlands. It is ſeated on the canal between Bruges and Dunkirk, and is about three miles from the ſea. The rivers Colme and Loo fall into the ſea near this town. It is not large, though well built and fortified, and the air is very unwholeſome for thoſe who are not uſed to it. It has been often beſieged and taken; and the laſt time was by the French, in 1744, when it was one of the Dutch barrier-towns. It is five miles ſouth-weſt of Newport, eight north-weſt of Dixmude, thirteen caſt of Dunkirk, and one hundred and ſixty north of Paris. Long. 2. 45 E. Lat. 51. 4. N.

FURSTEMBERG (WILLIAM) grand maſter of the order of Livonia, was deſcended from a noble and ancient family in Weſtphalia. He oppoſed the Muſcovites who attempted to make themſelves maſters of Livonia, and, in 1557, made the archbiſhop of Riga priſoner; but the Muſcovites taking the fortreſs of Velin, in 1560, they took Furſtemberg priſoner, priſoner, and carried him into Muſcovy, where he died ſome time after.

FURSTEMBERG (FERDINAND DE) biſhop of Paderborn, afterwards of Munſter, and apoſtolical vicar of all the countries in the North, was of the ſame family with the former, and was born at Bilſtein, on the 21ſt of October, 1626. He wrote ſeveral works, the principal of which is intitled Monumenta Paderbornenſia, and died on the 26th of June, 1683.

FURSTENBERG (the principality of) in the circle of Suabia, in Germany. It is one hundred and ſixty miles in length, but very narrow. It extends from the marquiſate of Baden, croſs the Black Foreſt, and along the Danube, to Ulm. It is compoſed of ſeveral ancient ſmall provinces, namely the landgravate of Bar, the county of Hauſen, that of Zimbern, that of Lippen, the landgravate of Stulingen, the county of Werdenberg, and the lordſhip of Meſkirk. The weſtern part is almoſt all in the Black Foreſt, and contains the towns of Haſlach, Wolfach, Merin, Engin, Neyding, and the caſtle of Furſtenberg, which gives its name to the whole territory. In the eaſtern part there are the towns of Mulheim, Begern, and Meſkirk. It alſo comprehends Pfullendorf and Uberlingen; but they are imperial free towns. The houſe of Furſtenberg is divided into two branches, whereof one are princes, and the other counts.

FURSTENFELD, a town of Germany, in Lower Stiria. It is ſeated on the river Feiſtritz, near the frontiers of Hungary. It has the title of a principality, and the knights of Malta have a commandery here. It is thirty miles north-eaſt of Gratz, thirty north-weſt of Raniſca, and fifty ſouth of Vienna. Long. 16. 35. E. Lat. 47. 35. N.

FURSTENWALD, a town of Germany, in the Middle March of Brandenburg, ſeated on the river Spree. It is a handſome well-built town; and the cathedral church is its greateſt ornament. It is twenty miles ſouth of Frankfort upon the Oder. Long. 14. 30. E. Lat. 52. 45. N.

FURSTIUS (WALTER) the name of that valiant Swiſs, of the canton of Uri, who, with Werner Stouffacher and Arnold Melchthal, in 1308, deſtroyed the authority of the archdukes of Auſtria, and ſet his country at liberty.

FUSCHIUS, or FUSCH, (LEONARD) one of the moſt celebrated phyſicians in the ſixteenth century, was born at Wembdingen, in Bavaria, in 1501. He taught and practiſed phyſic with great reputation, at Munich, Ingoldſtadt, and other places. He excelled particularly in the knowledge of plants, and was ennobled by Charles V. He died at Tubingen, on the 10th of May, 1566, aged ſixty-five. He wrote a great number of works in Latin, which are eſteemed; one of the principal of them is his Hiſtory of Plants.

FUZELIER (LEWIS) a French poet, who was born at Paris, and early applied himſelf to poetry. He wrote for the French and Italian comedians, the Royal Academy of Muſic, and the comic opera. He died at Paris, on the 19th of September, 1752, at eighty years of age He wrote a conſiderable number of theatrical pieces, among which are particularly eſteemed his comedy of one act, intitled Momus Fabuliſt, and his operas intitled the Ages, the Loves of the Gods, and the Carnaval of Parnaſſus.

G.

GABALIS (count of). See VILLARS.

GABARET, a town of France, in Gaſcony, the capital of a ſmall territory of the ſame name. It is ſeated on the river Geliſſe, twenty-three miles weſt of Condom, and three hundred and thirty-eight ſouth-by-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 1. E. Lat 43. 49. N.

GABINIUS (AULUS) a Roman conſul, in the fifty-eighth year before the Chriſtian æra, obtained the government of Syria and Judea. He obliged Alexander, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, to ſue for peace, and reſtored Hyrcanus to the dignity of high prieſt. Ariſtobulus eſcaping from Rome, entered his dominions with Antigonus, his other ſon, but they were defeated, and carried to Rome. Gabinius, after this expedition, being enriched with the ſpoils of Syria, reſolved to make a war on the Parthians, whoſe riches excited his inſatiable avarice. He had already paſſed the Euphrates, where Ptolomy Auletes came to offer him a thouſand talents to be reſtored to the kingdom of Egypt, on which Gabinius immediately marched into Egypt, and protracted the war, on his receiving conſiderable ſums from Archelaus, Ptolomy's enemy; however, Archelaus being killed in battle, Ptolomy was put in poſſeſſion of the kingdom. Gabinius at length reſigned his government of Syria to Craſſus, and returned to Rome in the fifty-fourth year before the Chriſtian æra. He was then accuſed by the people; but the credit of Pompey, and the money he diſtributed to his judges and accuſers, made them acquit him; but ſome time after he was accuſed of extortion, and condemned to ſuffer baniſhment. On this laſt occaſion, Cicero, at Pompey's deſire, made an oration in his favour, though he before conſented to his condemnation during his abſence, a circumſtance that does no honour to that celebrated orator.

GABRIEL (SEVERUS) a learned archbiſhop of Philadelphia in the ſixteenth century, was a native of Epidaurus. Finding that he had but few Greeks in his church he retired to Venice, where he was made biſhop to the Greeks in the territories belonging to that republic. He printed, at Venice, in 1600, a Treatiſe on the Sacraments, in Greek, and an Apology, in 1604. Richard Symon publiſhed a new edition of his works, in 1671, in Greek and Latin, with notes.

GABRIEL SIONITE, a learned Maronite, was profeſſor of the oriental languages at Rome, from whence he was ſent for to Paris, to aſſiſt in writing M. Le Jay's Polyglot Bible. He brought with him Syriac and Arabic Bibles, which he had tranſcribed with his own hand, from manuſcript copies at Rome, theſe Bibles were printed, for the firſt time, in M. Le Jay's Polyglot, and afterwards in the Polyglot of England. Gabriel Sionite alſo tranſlated from the Arabic Geographia Nubienſis, and ſome other works. At length quarrelling with M. Le Jay, Abraham Ecchellenſis was ſent for from Rome to ſupply his place.

GABRIEL (JAMES) a celebrated French architect, was born at Paris, in 1667, and acquired ſuch reputation, that he became inſpector-general of the buildings, gardens, arts, and manufactures, firſt architect and firſt engineer of the bridges and cauſeways of the kingdom, and was created knight of St. Michael. He drew plans for a great number of public buildings, and died at Paris, in 1742, leaving a ſon, who is firſt architect to the king.

GABRIELLA of Bourbon, a princeſs illuſtrious for her wit, her piety, and her works, was the daughter of Lewis I. of Bourbon, count of Montpenſier. In 1485, ſhe married Lewis de Tremouille, who was killed at the battle of Pavia, by whom ſhe had Charles, count of Tolmond, who was killed at the battle of Marignan. She wrote, in French, 1. Inſtructions for young Maids. 2. The Temple of the Holy Ghoſt. 3. The Penitent's Voyage, and other pious works. She died on the 31ſt of December, 1516.

GABRINUS FUNDULUS, famous for his perfidy and cruelty, took part with the Cavalcabos, who rendered themſelves maſters of Cremona, after the death of John, duke of Milan. Gabrinus afterwards aſpiring to the ſovereignty, invited Charles of Cavalcabos, the chief of that family, with nine or ten of his relations, to go to his country-houſe, where he aſſaſſinated them all at a banquet, and immediately ſeized the government of the city, when he practiſed all kinds of cruelty, but was at length ſeized and carried to Milan, where Philip Viſconti, ſucceſſor to John, duke of Milan, cauſed him to be beheaded.

GACON (Francis) a French poet, well known by his ſatirical ſtrokes againſt Boſſuet, Roſſeau, La Mothe, &c. was born at Lyons, in 1677. He gained the prize of poetry of the French Academy, in 1717, and died in his priory of Baillon, near Beaumont-ſur-Oiſe, on the 15th of November, 1724, aged fifty-eight. He wrote, in French, 1. The Poet without Paint, a ſatirical work, in duodecimo. 2. A French tranſlation of Anacreon, with notes. 3. The Anti-Rouſſeau. 4. Homer revenged againſt M. De la Mothe. He alſo attacked M. De la Mothe, and turned him into ridicule, in a ſmall work, intitled the Fables of Monſ De la Mothe, tranſlated into French Verſe, by P. S. F. at the Coffee-Houſe of Mount Parnaſſus, &c.

GAD, the ſeventh ſon of Jacob, by Zilpah, Leah's handmaid, was born about the one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-eighth year before the Chriſtian æra.

GADBURY (John) a famous aſtrologer and almanac-maker, was a native of Oxfordſhire, and was born in the year 1596. He ſerved an apprenticeſhip to a taylor at Oxford, but leaving that occupation, followed the violent inclination he had to aſtrology, and ſoon learned ſo much of his art from Lilly, as to be able to ſet up the trade of almanac-making and the telling of fortunes, and his pen was employed for many years on nativities, almanacs, and prodigies. Other aſtrologers were contented with exerciſing their art for the benefit of their own country alone, but Gadbury, in 1674, publiſhed a Weſt-India or Jamaica almanac for that year. He calculated the nativities of Charles I. the king of Sweden, and ſir Matthew Hale, all which are in print. He ſtyles ſir Matthew, the Juſt and Pious Scorpioniſt, he being born under the celeſtial ſcorpion. He took great care to do juſtice to all the conſtellations, particularly to that juſt mentioned, as appears from his "Obſequium rationabile, or a reaſonable Service per-" formed for that celeſtial Sign, Scorpio, in twenty re-" markable Genitures of that glorious, but ſtigmatiſed Ho-" roſcope, againſt the malicious and falſe Attempts of that " grand but fortunate Impoſtor, Mr. William Lilly." He was no leſs careful to do juſtice to the memory of his friend, Mr. George Wharton, moſt of whoſe works he collected and publiſhed in octavo. He was living in 1690, and was thought to be alive many years after his deceaſe, as his name continued affixed to an almanac, ſimilar to that wrote by him. The Black Life of John Gadbury was written by Partridge.

GADDI Gaddo, an ingenious artiſt, applied himſelf to Moſaic work, and as he deſigned better than all the other painters of his time, was highly eſteemed at Rome and Florence. He died in the year 1312, at ſeventy-three years of age.

Gaddi (Angelo) an excellent painter and architect, was the ſon of Taddeo Gaddo Gaddi, and both he and his father were the diſciples of Giotto, and painted after his manner. Angelo took great pains to expreſs the paſſions well, and was ingenious in his inventions. As an architect, he built the tower of Santa Maria del Fiore, and the bridge over the Arno, in Florence. He died in the year 1350, in the fiftieth year of his age.

GADROIS (Claudius) one of the moſt able and zealous partizans of the philoſophy of Des Cartes, wrote a Treatiſe, 1. on the Influence of the Stars; 2. the Syſtem of the World; 3. Logical Tables, &c. He died in 1678, in the thirty-ſixth year of his age.

GAETAN of Tiena (St.) founder of the order of Theatines, was deſcended from an ancient and noble family, and born at Vicenza, in 1480. After having finiſhed his ſtudies, he was made apoſtolical prothonotary of Rome, and formed the deſign of inſtituting a congregation of regular clerks. John Peter Carraffe, then biſhop of Chieti, and afterwards pope, under the name of Paul IV. Boniface de Colle, a Milaneſe gentleman, and Paul de Ghiſleri, joined him in the ſame deſign. Theſe four founders, of whom Gaetan was the chief, having renounced their benefices, made their vows in St. Peter's church, in the Vatican, on the 14th of September, 1524. The pope approved their order, under the name of Regular Clerks; but having elected the biſhop of Chieti their ſuperior, they were called Theatines, from the name of that city, which, in Latin, is called Theate. The three years of the biſhop of Chieti's office being expired, Gaetan was elected ſuperior. Three years after he was ſent to Naples by the pope, where he founded a houſe of his order, and died on the 17th of Auguſt, 1547, at ſixty-ſeven years of age. He was canonized by Clement X.

GAFFAREL (James) doctor of divinity and of the canon law, was born at Vannes, in Provence, about the year 1601, and acquired great ſkill in the oriental languages. He was librarian to cardinal de Richelieu, who ſent him into Italy to purchaſe the beſt printed books and manuſcripts. Gaffarel publiſhed, 1. A Paraphraſe on the CXXXVIth Pſalm; 2. A work entitled, Strange Curioſities on the Taliſmanic Sculpture of the Perſians, &c. He undertook alſo the Hiſtory of the ſubterranean World, but did not live to finiſh it. He was the author of ſome other works, and died at Segovia in 1681, aged eighty.

GAGE (Thomas) a famous traveller, born in Ireland, became a Dominican monk in Spain, and was choſen, in 1625, to preach the goſpel to the infidels in Mexico, where he became very rich, and then coming to England, renounced the popiſh religion. He wrote a Hiſtory of the Weſt Indies.

GAGNIER (John) profeſſor of Arabic at Oxford, was born and educated at Paris, and applying himſelf to the ſtudy of the Eaſtern languages, became a great maſter of the Hebrew and Arabic; but at length growing diſſatisfied with the Romiſh religion, he was forced to quit his native country, and therefore coming hither in the beginning of the preſent century, embraced the doctrines of the church of England. He was here patronized by archbiſhop Sharp, and the earl of Macclesfield, then lord-chancellor. He received the degree of maſter of arts from both univerſities, and ſupported himſelf at Oxford by teaching Hebrew; he was at length choſen Arabic profeſſor in the room of Mr. Willis, and continued to read that lecture with applauſe till his death. He publiſhed Joſeph Ben Gorion's Hiſtory of the Jews, in the original Hebrew, with a Latin tranſlation and notes, quarto; and in 1723 Abulfeda's Life of Mohammed in Arabic, with a Latin tranſlation and notes, in folio.

GAGO, a kingdom of Nigritia, in Africa, lying to the ſouth of the kingdom of Tombut, on which it now depends. Gago, which is the principal town, is an open place. Moſt of the houſes, except that of the king, are poor miſerable huts. The inhabitants are merchants, always abroad in the country trading from place to place. The negroes bring a great quantity of gold to buy the goods which are brought from Europe and Barbary. It is a civilized place, if compared with the towns round about, and has plenty of rice, bread, fleſh, melons, and cucumbers; but it has neither wine nor fruits. It has ſeveral wells of freſh water, and a large market-place, where they ſell ſlaves of both ſexes. Six ducats will purchaſe a boy or a girl of fifteen years old. The king has a great number of wives or concubines, and eunuchs to look after them. He has ſeveral officers, as councellors, captains, treaſurers, and factors. Every thing is dear here but ſlaves, for a horſe that would not ſell for ten ducats in Europe, fetches forty or fifty here. An ell of ordinary cloth ſells for four ducats; and ſcarlet, blue, and other lively colours, when the cloth is good, ſells for thirty ducats. A very ordinary ſword will bring three or four ducats, and every thing elſe in proportion. But ſalt is the deareſt commodity of all.

Moſt of the inhabitants of this country live in huts and villages, and go quite naked, only they have a covering for their private parts, and ſome tye a piece of camels ſkin to their feet. They have not the leaſt tincture of learning, for they can neither read nor write; and they are ſo fleeced by the king, that they have ſcarcely wherewithal to live upon.

GAIETA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples. It is ſeated on a rock, near a bay of the ſea of the ſame name, and is a biſhop's ſee. The ſteeple of the cathedral is worth taking notice of, and the font in the baptiſtery is a curious piece of workmanſhip. They pretend to have a pillar of Solomon's temple, and on an eminence at a little diſtance is the mauſoleum of Minucius Plancus, now called the tower of Orlando, or Della Guardia. Here is alſo the monument of Charles duke of Bourbon, conſtable of France, who was killed at the ſiege of Rome in 1527. Not far from hence is a hill, which they affirm was rent in two at our Saviour's paſſion. There are ſtairs to go down into the cleft, and a chapel dedicated to the Holy Trinity.

This town is an important fortreſs, and the beſt in this country, and the harbour is defended by two caſtles. The Spaniards became maſters of this place in 1734. It is thirty miles north-weſt of Capua, thirty-eight north-weſt of Naples, and ſixty-ſix ſouth-eaſt of Rome. Long. 13. 37. E. Lat. 41. 30. N.

GAGUIN (Robert) in Latin, Gaguinus, a famous hiſtorian, of the fifteenth century, was a native of Calline, on the confines of Artois, and was employed by king Charles VIII. and Lewis XII. in ſeveral embaſſies into England, Germany, and Italy. He was keeper of the royal library, and general of the order of Trinitarians. He died at Paris, in 1502. The moſt conſiderable of his works are, 1. An Hiſtory of France in Latin, which ends in the year 1499. 2. Latin Epiſtles, Orations, and Poems.

GAILLAC, a town of France, in Languedoc, remarkable for an abbey of Benedictines, and for its trade in wine of their own produce. Long. 1. 55. E. Lat. 43. 50. N.

GAILLARD LONJUMEAU (JOHN DE) biſhop of Apt, was born at Aix, on the 22d of May, 1634. Having taken orders, his ſiſter, who was under-governeſs to the children of France, drew him to Paris, and made him known to cardinal Mazarin. Soon after he was made archdeacon of Bayeux, and in 1673 biſhop of Apt. He loved the ſciences, and protected the learned. It was he who firſt formed the vaſt project of a grand hiſtorical and univerſal dictionary, for which purpoſe he ſearched all countries, and particularly the library of the Vatican. But not being willing to have it appear under his own name, he gave his large collections to Moreri, who was his almoner, and who dedicated to him, as to his Mecænas, the firſt edition of his Dictionary, printed at Lyons in 1674. Moreri declared in the epiſtle dedicatory the part this prelate had in that great work, and expreſſed his gratitude. M. de Gaillard had the promiſe of a cardinal's hat, but the death of the pope prevented his obtaining it. He refuſed to accept of the biſhoprick of Limoges, and died at Apt on the 10th of February, 1695.

GAINAS, a Goth, who by his valour became general of the emperor Arcadius's army. In 395 he cauſed the traytor Ruffinus to be put to death as an uſurper. By this means Eutropius becoming the emperor's favourite, Guinas became ſo jealous of him, that in 399 he called in the Barbarians of Aſia, and forced Arcadius to deliver up to him Eutropius, and ſeveral others of his moſt faithful miniſters. He even formed a deſign of burning the imperial palace. Theſe attempts obliged the emperor to declare him an enemy to the ſtate, which ſo enraged Gainas, that he ravaged all Thrace, but he was conquered in a ſea-fight on the Helleſpont, and in the year 400 was killed as he was flying with the remains of his fleet, when his head was carried to the emperor at Conſtantinople.

GAINSBOROUGH, a town of Lincolnſhire, with a market on Tueſdays. This was formerly a famous Daniſh port, and in the ſouth part of the town is or was a chapel of ſtone, where the inhabitants affirm a great many Danes were buried. The pariſh church was rebuilt in 1735. The fairs are on Eaſter-Tueſday, and October 20, for cattle, ſheep, and all ſorts of ſhop goods. It is fourteen miles north-weſt of Lincoln, and one hundred and forty-nine north of London. Long. 0. 40. W. Lat. 53. 26. N.

GAL (St.) the ſon of a ſenator, having renounced the world, acquired the eſteem of Thierri, king of Auſtraſia, and in 532 was biſhop of Clermont. He died in 552.

He ought not to be confounded with St. Gal, a native of Ireland, who founded in Swiſſerland the famous monaſtery of St. Gal, of which he was the firſt abbot, in 614. He died in 646, and ſome of his works are extant. See GALL.

GALANTHIS, in fabulous hiſtory, ſervant to Alcmena, who when Juno ſat at the gate of Amphitrion's palace, with her legs acroſs, and her fingers interwoven, in order to prevent Alcmena's delivery, ran haſtily out with the news that her miſtreſs was delivered, upon which the goddeſs ſtarting up, broke the inchantment, and Alcmena brought forth Hercules, but Juno was ſo incenſed at Galanthis, that ſhe changed her into a weazel.

GALANUS (CLEMENT) a Theatine monk, who having lived for a long time in Armenia, collected many of the acts and writings of the Armenians, and tranſlated them into Latin. His works (a part of which is in Armenian, and part in Latin) were printed at Rome in 1650, in two volumes, folio; intitled a Reconciliation of the Armenian Church with that of Rome, upon the Teſtimony of the Armenian Fathers and Doctors.

GALAS (MATTHEW) a famous general of the emperor's army, was born at Trent in 1589. He was at firſt page to the baron de Beaufremont, chamberlain to the duke of Lorrain, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſo extraordinary a manner in Italy and Germany, that he was put at the head of the Imperial army. Galas performed very important ſervices, both for the emperor and the king of Spain. In 1636 he attempted to make himſelf maſter of Burgundy, but he and the duke of Lorrain were beat at St. John de Lone. He ſucceeded better againſt the Swedes; however his army being entirely defeated by Tortenſon near Magdeburgh, he was in diſgrace with the emperor. Some time after he was reſtored to the command of the troops, but did not enjoy this poſt long, for he died at Vienna in 1647, aged fifty-eight.

GALATA, a great ſuburb belonging to Conſtantinople, oppoſite to the ſeraglio, on the other ſide of the harbour, where the Greeks, Armenians, Franks, and Jews inhabit, and have each the liberty of worſhipping God in their own way. The private houſes are better built here than in Conſtantinople, and there are ſeveral taverns where wine is openly ſold.

GALATEA, in fabulous hiſtory, a nymph and marine deity, the daughter of Nereus and Doris. She was beloved by Polyphemus, whom ſhe deſpiſed for the ſhepherd Acis, at which that Cyclops was ſo enraged, that he cruſhed Acis to pieces with a rock.

GALATINUS (PETER) a Franciſcan monk, in the ſixteenth century, acquired great reputation by his works, eſpecially by his treatiſe De Arcanis Catholicæ Veritatis, againſt the Jews. Galatinus however had copied this work from Porchet's book, intitled Victoria adverſus Judæos; and Porchet had himſelf copied it from Raymond Martin, but he informed his readers of it, while Galatinus publiſhed it as his own.

GALBA (SERVIUS SULPITIUS) emperor of Rome, was born a little before the birth of Chriſt, and was adopted by Livia Ocellina, his mother-in-law. It is ſaid that being preſented to Auguſtus, with other young Romans, that prince obſerving his aqueline noſe, which gave him the air of an eagle, ſaid to him, "And thou, Galba, ſhalt alſo taſte of the empire," to which Galba replied, "Yes, when a mule becomes fruitful." This prodigy, it is ſaid, actually happened in the reign of Nero, which induced Galba, at the ſollicitation of Vindex, to revolt. He was elected emperor in the year 68, and was the firſt of the Roman emperors who was not of the family of the Cæſars. Galba had acquired the eſteem of every one whilſt a private perſon, but rendered himſelf odious as ſoon as he was placed on the throne. He cauſed Macer and Fonteius Capito to be put to death, and adopted Piſo, with whom he was aſſaſſinated by the order of Otho, on the 10th of January, 69, at the age of ſeventy-three. He was a prince endued with many amiable qualities, and would have been thought worthy of the empire, if he had never been placed on the throne.

GALE (THEOPHILUS) a very pious divine and learned author, among the nonconformiſts, was the ſon of Dr. Theophilus Gale, prebend of Exeter, and vicar of King's Teignton, in Devonſhire, where he was born, in 1628. He was educated at Oxford, and afterwards preached at Wincheſter, but upon the Reſtoration was excluded from the public exerciſe of his office, when he became tutor to the two ſons of Philip lord Wharton, whom he attended in their travels, and upon his return to England in 1665, became aſſiſtant to Mr. John Rowe, who had a private congregation in Holborn. He wrote, 1. The Court of the Gentiles. 2. Philoſophia Generalis. 3. The Anatomy of Infidelity. 4. The true Idea of Janſeniſm; and ſeveral other works. He died in 1678, in the fiftieth year of his age.

GALE (THOMAS) D. D. a learned divine, born at Scruton, in Yorkſhire, in the year 1636, and educated at Cambridge. He at length became profeſſor of the Greek language in that univerſity, and was afterwards choſen head maſter of St. Paul's ſchool, London. In 1676 he was collated to a prebend in the cathedral of St. Paul's, and was likewiſe elected a fellow of the Royal Society, to which he preſented a Roman urn with its aſhes. About the year 1697 he gave to the new library of Trinity college, in Cambridge, a great number of Arabic manuſcripts, and on the 16th of September, 1697, was admitted dean of York. He died in that city, on the 8th of April, 1702, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age, and was interred in York cathedral, where a monument, with a Latin inſcription, was erected to his memory. He was a learned divine, a great hiſtorian, one of the beſt Greek ſcholars of his age, and maintained a correſpondence with the moſt learned men abroad, as well as at home. He publiſhed, 1. Hiſtoriæ Poeticæ Antiqui Scriptores, octavo. 2. A Collection of Opuſcula Mythologica, Ethica, & Phyſica, in Greek and Latin, octavo. 3. Herodoti Hiſtoria, folio. 4. Hiſtoricæ Anglicanæ Scriptores quinque, in folio. 5. Hiſtoriæ Britanicæ, Saxonicæ Anglo-Danicæ, Scriptores quindecim, in folio. 6. Rhetores Selecti, &c.

GALE (Dr. JOHN) a learned diſſenting miniſter of the Baptiſt perſuaſion, was born at London, on the 26th of May, 1680. Having made himſelf in a good degree maſter of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, he was ſent to the univerſity of Leyden, where he obtained the degree of maſter of arts, and doctor of philoſophy; he afterwards ſtudied at Amſterdam under Mr. Limborch, and then returned to England. He was ſcarce entered upon his twenty-ſeventh year, when he had finiſhed his learned Reflections on Dr. Wall's Hiſtory of Infant Baptiſm. He was at length choſen one of the miniſters of the Baptiſt congregation in St. Paul's alley, near Barbican, where his ſermons were prodigiouſly reſorted to by perſons of all perſuaſions. He was honoured with the friendſhip of many eminent perſons, particularly the lord chief juſtice King, afterwards lord-chancellor; Dr. Hoadley, afterwards biſhop of Wincheſter; the celebrated Le Clerc, &c. Beſides the above work, four volumes of his Sermons, in octavo, were printed after his death, which happened in the latter end of December, 1721. It is worthy of remark that Dr. Gale's Reflections is the beſt defence of the Baptiſts ever publiſhed, and that the reading of it induced the learned and reverend Mr. William Whiſton, and the reverend and ingenious Dr. Foſter to become Baptiſts.

GALEANO (Joseph) a famous poet and phyſician of Palermo, in the ſeventeenth century, was ſkilled in polite literature and the ſciences. He taught and practiſed phyſic at Palermo, for near fifty years, with extraordinary reputation; wrote a great number of books, and died on the 28th of June, 1675.

GALEN (Claudius), in Latin, Galenus, prince of the Greek phyſicians, after Hippocrates, was born at Pergamus, in the Leſſer Aſia, about the year 131. His father was poſſeſſed of a conſiderable fortune, and was well verſed in polite literature, philoſophy, aſtronomy, and geometry; and was alſo well ſkilled in architecture: he himſelf inſtructed his ſon in the firſt rudiments of learning, and afterwards procured him the greateſt maſters of the age in philoſophy and eloquence. Galen having finiſhed his ſtudies under their care, choſe phyſic for his profeſſion, and chiefly ſtudied the works of Hippocrates. Having at length exhauſted all the ſources of literature that were to be found at home, he reſolved to travel, in order to converſe with the moſt able phyſicians in all parts, intending at the ſame time to take every opportunity of inſpecting on the ſpot the plants and drugs of the countries through which he paſſed. With this view he went to Alexandria, and ſtayed ſome years in that metropolis of Egypt, from thence he travelled through Cilicia, paſſed through Paleſtine, viſited the iſles of Crete and Cyprus, and made two voyages to Lemnos, in order to examine the Lemnian earth, which was then eſteemed an admirable medicine. With the ſame view he went into the Lower Tyria, in order to obtain a thorough inſight into the nature of the opobalſamum, or balm of Gilead, and having completed his deſign, returned home by the way of Alexandria.

Galen had been four years at Pergamus, where his practice was attended with extraordinary applauſe, when ſome ſeditious commotions induced him to go to Rome, where he reſolved to ſettle: but the proofs he gave of his ſuperior ſkill, added to the reſpect ſhewn him by ſeveral perſons of very high rank, created him ſo many enemies among his brethren of the faculty, that he was obliged to quit the city, after his having reſided there four or five years. But he had not long returned to Pergamus, when the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus, hearing of his fame, ſent for him to Aquilcia, where they then reſided. However, he no ſooner arrived in that city, than the plague, which had appeared a little before, broke out with freſh fury, ſo that the emperors were obliged to remove. Lucius died on the road, but his corpſe was carried to Rome, and our phyſician found means to follow ſoon after; having firſt excuſed himſelf from accompanying Marcus Aurelius into Germany, and during his abſence he wrote his celebrated treatiſe De Uſu Partium, i. e. Of the Uſe of the Parts of the Body.

Mean while, being continually perſecuted by the faculty, he was apprehenſive of ſome deſign being formed againſt his life. He therefore, for his own ſecurity, frequently retired to a country villa, where Commodus, the emperor's ſon, then reſided, and he had there the opportunity of attending the prince in a fever, which, on the firſt acceſs, appeared very violent; but he had the good fortune to remove the diſeaſe. He likewiſe cured Sextus, another of the emperor's ſons, and predicted his ſucceſs contrary to the opinion of all his colleagues. He thus raiſed his fame, and continued not only to preſerve, but to encreaſe it.

Marcus Aurelius, after his return from the German expedition, was ſuddenly ſeized in the night with a violent flux, that threw him into a fever. The next day he took a doſe of hiera picra, and another of the theriacum, after which, the doctors who had attended him while with the army, ordered him to be kept quiet, giving him only a little broth for the ſpace of nine hours. Soon after Galen was called in, and the other phyſicians having felt their patient's pulſe, were of opinion that he would have the ague. The emperor then obſerving that Galen did not approach him, aſked the reaſon; on which he replied, "that his "pulſe being twice felt by his phyſicians, he depended on "them, not doubting that they were better judges of the "pulſe than he." The emperor diſſatisfied with this anſwer, held out his arm, when Galen having carefully examined his pulſe, cried, "I maintain that there is here no "appearance of an ague; but the ſtomach is overcharged "with ſomething that remains undigeſted, which is the "true cauſe of the fever." "That is the very thing," cried the emperor, "thou haſt hit the caſe exactly," and repeating the words, aſked what muſt be done for his relief; Galen immediately preſcribed a proper remedy, and Aurelius being perfectly recovered, ſaid to Pitholaus, his ſon's governor, "We have but one phyſician! Galen is the only man of the faculty." After the death of this prince he returned to Pergamus, where he died, about the year 200. He wrote in Greek, and is ſaid to have compoſed two hundred volumes, which were unhappily burnt in the temple of Peace. The beſt editions of thoſe that remain are, that printed at Baſil, in 1538, in five volumes, and that of Venice, in 1625, in ſeven volumes. Galen was of a weak and delicate conſtitution, as he himſelf aſſerts; but he nevertheleſs, by his temperance and ſkill in phyſic, arrived to a great age; for it was his maxim always to riſe from table with ſome degree of appetite. He is juſtly conſidered as the greateſt phyſician of antiquity next to Hippocrates; and he performed ſuch ſurpriſing cures, that he was accuſed of magic.

Galen (Matthew) a learned divine in the ſixteenth century, was born at Weſtcapel in Zealand, and taught divinity with reputation, at Dilingen, and afterwards at Douay. He at length became chancellor of that univerſity, where he made the ſciences flouriſh, and died in 1573. He wrote, 1. Commentarium de Chriſtiano & Catholico Sacerdote; 2. De Originibus Monaſtices; 3. De Miſſæ Sacrificio; 4. De ſæculi noſtri Choreis; and other works.

Galen (Christopher Bernard de) biſhop of Munſter, and one of the greateſt warriors of the ſeventeenth century. He beſieged the city of Munſter, which refuſed to ſubmit to his authority, took it on the 6th of Auguſt, 1661, and built in it a good citadel. In 1665, he joined with the king of England againſt the Dutch, and gained ſeveral advantages over them. He alſo declared war againſt the Dutch in 1672, on their refuſing to deliver up the Seigniory of Borklo, when being joined by the French, he marched againſt them, and took ſeveral cities and ſtrong places; but the emperor obliged him to conclude a peace in 1674. The following year, he engaged in a war with the Swedes, from whom he alſo took ſeveral places. He died on the 19th of September, 1678, aged ſeventy-four, and was ſucceeded by Ferdinand de Furſtemberg.

GALERIUS Armentarius, or Galerius Valerius Maximianus, emperor of Rome, was born at Dacia, near Sardica, and being married to Veleria, Dioclefian's daughter, was aſſociated to the empire, and, in 292, was, with Conſtantius Florus, created Cæſar. He was ſent againſt Narſes, king of Perſia, who defeated him in a great battle, fought in 296. On which Dioclefian, who was at Antioch, gave him a very bad reception, ſuffered him to walk a long time on foot after his chariot, and made him the moſt bitter reproaches, at which Galerius was ſo moved, that he levied a numerous army, marched the following year againſt Narſes, defeated him, took him, with his wife, children, and ſiſters priſoners, and made himſelf maſter of Meſopotamia, with five provinces. Dioclefian and Maximianus having abdicated the empire in 305, Galerius and Conſtantius Florus divided it between them. Galerius at length raiſed a cruel perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, and it is ſaid, died in 300, eaten up with worms.

GALICIA, a province of Spain, which was formerly a diſtinct kingdom. It is one hundred and twenty-five miles in length, and one hundred in breadth. It is bounded on the north and weſt by the ocean, on the eaſt by Aſturias and the kingdom Leon, and on the ſouth by Portugal. It is reckoned to have ſixty-four towns, and forty-eight ports and harbours. The air of Gallicia is moiſt and unwholeſome, and the land mountainous. It is not very fertile in corn and oil, but has good paſtures and delicate wine. There are mines of copper, iron, lead, and vermilion. But theſe ſort of mines are now neglected in Spain. It is divided into five territories, which take their names from five epiſcopal towns, which are, Compoſtella the capital, Mondonego, Lugo, Oronenes, and Tuy. Beſides theſe there are Corunna, Betancos, and Bayonne.

Galicia New, is a vaſt country of North America, poſſeſſed by the Spaniards. It is in New Spain, and is under the government of the viceroy of Mexico. This part is called the Audience of Guadala Jara, which ſee.

GALILEO Galilei, in Latin Galilæus, a very celebrated mathematician and aſtronomer in the ſeventeenth century, was the natural ſon of Vincenzo Galilei, a noble Florentine, and was born on the 19th of February, 1564. He had from his infancy a ſtrong inclination to philoſophy and the mathematics, and made prodigious progreſs in theſe ſciences. In 1592, he was choſen profeſſor of mathematics at Padua. Coſmo II. grand-duke of Tuſcany, ſent for him to be profeſſor at Piſa, and afterwards removed him to Florence, where he gave him the title of his principal philoſopher and firſt mathematician. Galileo having embraced the ſyſtem of Copernicus, an inſolent monk occaſioned his being put into the inquiſition at Rome in 1615, where he was charged with hereſy, for maintaining, in one of his works, theſe two propoſitions; That the ſun is in the centre of the world, and immoveable by a local motion; and, That the earth is not the centre, nor immoveable, immoveable, but actually performs a diurnal motion. The firſt of theſe propoſitions was declared to be abſurd, falſe in philoſophy, and heretical, as being contrary to the expreſs word of God; and the ſecond was alſo alledged to be philoſophically falſe and abſurd, and erroneous in point of faith. He was detained in the inquiſition till the 25th of February, 1616, when ſentence was paſſed againſt him, that he ſhould renounce his heretical opinions, and no more defend them by word or writing, and he obtained his diſcharge by promiſing to conform to this order. Galileo, however, perhaps imagining, that forced promiſes do not bind the conſcience, went on making new diſcoveries in the planetary ſyſtem, and occaſionally publiſhing them with ſuch remarks as naturally followed from them, though they plainly tended to eſtabliſh the truth of the condemned propoſitions. Meanwhile no judicial notice was taken of it, till the year 1632, when he publiſhed his Dialogue on the ſyſtems of Ptolemy and Copernicus, in which he produces the ſtrongeſt arguments for each of theſe opinions, but left the queſtion undetermined, though his inclination to the Copernican ſyſtem may be eaſily perceived. This work having made much noiſe, Galileo was again cited before the inquiſition at Rome, which obliged him by a decree of the 21ſt of June, 1633, to abjure his ſyſtem as an error and hereſy. By the ſame decree, he was condemned to remain in priſon as long as the cardinal inquiſitor ſhould think fit; but after detaining him in priſon till 1634, and burning his Dialogues on the Syſtem of the World at Rome, they contented themſelves with ſending him into the dominions of the duke of Florence, where he was in a manner a priſoner at large, being confined to the town of Arcatri and its territories. What a cruel return was this for thoſe learned labours with which this great man obliged the world! And what a glaring inſtance of blindneſs and bigotry! Galileo had an admirable genius for the conſtruction of machines. It is ſaid, that having heard of thoſe glaſſes which James Mebius had invented in Holland, by means of which, diſtant objects appeared to be brought near to the ſight, he reflected with ſuch application on the nature of theſe glaſſes, that without having ever ſeen any of them, he invented the teleſcope, and with this inſtrument he was the firſt who diſcovered the four ſatelites of Jupiter, and made other obſervations on the heavenly bodies, that will render his name immortal. He was likewiſe the inventor of the ſimple pendulum, which he had made uſe of in his aſtronomical experiments. He had thoughts of applying it to clocks; but did not execute it; for the glory of that invention was reſerved for Vicenzio his ſon, who made the experiment at Venice, in 1649, and M. Huygens afterwards carried this invention to perfection. Galileo had alſo a good taſte for architecture and painting, and deſigned extremely well. He played admirably on the lute, and when he ſpent any time in the country, he took great pleaſure in huſbandry. He loſt his ſight three years before his death, which happened at Arcetri, near Florence, on the 8th of January, 1642, in the ſeventy-eighth year of his age. Several of his works have been unhappily loſt, through his wife's ſuperſtitious devotion; for ſhe being ſolicited by her confeſſor, gave him leave to peruſe her huſband's manuſcripts, when the ignorant zealot tore and burnt whatever he pretended was not fit to be publiſhed, thoſe which are ſtill extant either in Italian or Latin, are excellent. Several of his works were publiſhed in a collection by Seignor Menoleſſi, under the title of L'Opera di Galileo Galelei Lynceo. Some of theſe, with others of his pieces, were tranſlated into Engliſh, and publiſhed by Thomas Saliſbury, Eſq. in his Mathematical Collections, 2 vols. folio.

GALINDON, more known under the name of Prudentius the Younger, a famous biſhop of Troyes, in the ninth century. He wrote ſome works, in which he defends the opinions of St. Auguſtine, on grace and predeſtination. He died in 861.

GALL (St.) a town of Swiſſerland, in the territory of Thurgaw. It is a large handſome city, ſeated in a narrow barren valley, between two mountains, five miles from the lake Conſtance. The little river Steinbach ſerves to turn its mills, and that called Iron fills its ditches with water. This town owes its preſent flouriſhing condition to the abbey of St. Gall, which ſtands within its bounds. In the tenth century it was an open town, but when the Hungarians ravaged Germany, and advanced into Swiſſerland, they began, in 954, to incloſe it with walls, to build towers, and to encompaſs it with broad ditches. Theſe works were finiſhed in 980; at preſent it has no other fortifications but the ditches. The houſes are well built, and the ſtreets large and handſome. The principal public buildings are the churches of St. Lawrence and St. Magnus, the town-houſe and the arſenal. Half a mile from the town is a narrow and extremely deep valley, hollowed by the little river Goldach. Over this there is a bridge of a wonderful ſtructure, an hundred and ten feet long, fourteen broad, and one hundred and ninety-ſix high. The burgeſſes have a public library in the convent of St Catharine, which formerly belonged to the celebrated Vander Wett, burgo-maſter of St. Gall. The territory of St. Gall produces nothing but graſs. Inſomuch, that in this country there are neither huſbandman, no vine-dreſſer, nor no ploughmen, nor ſhepherds; however, the inhabitants are rich, and generally live at their eaſe, and the out-parts of the city are ſtrewed with fine country houſes. Their riches are derived from their great trade, eſpecially from their linen, which is highly eſteemed throughout Swiſſerland, and elſewhere. Beſides, being near the lake Conſtance, and in the road from Germany to Italy, this town ſerves as a canal of communication between one country and the other, and their halls are magazines of merchandize brought from thence. The inhabitants go into various countries to trade as merchants, and ſome are ſettled even in Spain, notwithſtanding the difference of religion, for they are all Calviniſts. They ſpeak the German language, for which reaſon they built a ſmall church for the French refugees.

When this place was ſmall many years ago, it was under the domination of the abbots; but in proceſs of time it was made free, partly by the emperors, and partly by the abbots themſelves. The abbot now has little or no right to any thing in the town, however, the hoſpitaller does him homage for land belonging to the hoſpital. Appeals are made from the abbot to a court of juſtice, but the preſident of it, and half the members, are nominated by him, and the town elects the other half. Theſe members cannot be controuled either by the abbot or the town. The cognizance of criminal cauſes formerly belonged to the provoſt of the empire, but now to two councils. The grand council conſiſts of ninety members, and the ſmall of twenty-four, and three chiefs, called burgo-maſters, each of which preſide in their turns. The townſmen are divided into ſeven companies, one of which are noblemen, or rather gentlemen, and the other ſix artificers, of which the weavers are the chief. Each company has three maſters, which are choſen by the tradeſmen, and confirmed by the leſſer council; one of theſe is a member of the great council, and the other two of the leſs. Beſides, there are eleven choſen out of each company to form the grand council. The other members of the leſs council are choſen by the counſellors themſelves. This town is in alliance with the cantons of Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Schwitz, Zug, and Glaris. It is one hundred and twenty miles north-eaſt of Berne, and ſixty-three north-eaſt of Lucern.

Gall (the abbey of St.) above mentioned, is nearly allied to the cantons, and conſequently is part of the Helvetic body. It is within the bounds of the town of the ſame name, but has ſcarcely any thing in common with it. It was at firſt a hermitage occupied by a hermit of Great Britain or Ireland, named Gallus. He died in 640, as ſome ſay, ninety-five years old; after which his diſciples built ſeveral little cells in the hermitage; afterwards they built a church, and eighty years after the death of Gallus, whom they now called St. Gall, a monaſtery. This, by the favour of the emperors and the donations of other perſons, ſoon became rich, and the land belonging to it was erected into a principality; inſomuch that the abbots, in 1215, became princes of the empire. It was once a famous academy, and produced a great number of learned men, and its library is now one of the beſt in Europe. This abbey has often felt the deſolations of war; and particularly, in 1712, the territory of it was divided between the cantons of Zurich and Berne. There have likewiſe been frequent bickerings between the town and the abbey, on account of religion.

The buildings of the abbey are conſtructed with a magnificence agreeable to the riches it formerly poſſeſſed. They conſiſt of three principal parts, the minſter, the abbot's palace, and the houſes to lodge the monks, with ſeveral other buildings, gardens, and orchards. It was formerly open on the ſide of the town, which occaſioned various diſorders; but it is now walled all round, and the gate opens into the fields, of which the abbot is maſter.

The lands belonging to the abbey were the Gottſhauſsleut, and the new ſubjects who are the inhabitants of Tockeburg. They are divided into ſeveral ſmall diſtricts, the principal towns of which are Wyl, Goſſau, Rhoſchac, Thumbach, Gold, Underegg, Morſwill, Tablata, Waldkilch, Romiſhor, &c.

GALLAPAGOS, iſlands ſo called, in the South Sea, lying under the line, firſt diſcovered by the Spaniards, to whom they belong. They are not inhabited; but there are a great number of birds and tortoiſes, or turtles, on them.

GALLAND, or Galand, (Peter) in Latin Galandius, principal of the college of Bonjour, at Paris, and canon of Notre Dame, was born at Aire, in Artois. He wrote ſeveral works in Latin, and died in 1559.

GALLAND (AUGUSTUS) procurator-general of Navarre, and counſellor of ſtate, in the ſeventeenth century, was the author of ſeveral works, in French, the principal of which are, 1. Memoirs for the Hiſtory of Navarre and Flanders. 2. Several Treatiſes on the Enſigns and Standards of France. 3. Diſcourſes on the ancient State, Progreſs, and Encreaſe of the City of Rochelle. He died about the year 1644.

GALLAND (ANTHONY) member of the Academy of Inſcriptions, and profeſſor of Arabic in the Royal College at Paris, was born of poor parents, at Rollo, a village in Picardy. Having ſtudied at the Sorbonne, and other univerſities, he travelled into the Eaſt, where he acquired great ſkill in the Arabic tongue, and in the manners of the Mahometans. He wrote ſeveral works, the principal of which are, 1. An Account of the Death of Sultan Oſman, and the Coronation of the Sultan Muſtapha. 2. A Collection of Maxims, drawn from the Works of the Orientals. 3. A Treatiſe on the Origin of Coffee. 4. The Arabian Nights Entertainment, &c. He died at Paris, on the 17th of February, 1715, aged ſixty-nine.

GALLATY (GASPARD) a celebrated Swiſs colonel, born at Glaris. He performed important ſervices in many battles and negociations for the French kings Charles IX. Henry III. Henry IV. and Lewis XIII. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the battle of Montcontour, at that of the Barricades, and at that of Tours, where Henry III. was beſieged by the rebels. Gallaty received the honour of knighthood from that prince, after whoſe death, he prevailed on the regiment under his command to acknowledge Henry IV. This reſolution, which he took in conjunction with three other Swiſs colonels, according to all the hiſtorians of that time, ſaved the new king in that critical moment. Gallaty obtained much honour at the battle of Arques, and his regiment of infantry contributed greatly to fix the victory. He continued to ſerve Henry with inviolable fidelity till his death. He was created firſt colonel of the Swiſs guards in March, 1616, and died at Paris in July, 1619.

GALLI, in antiquity, the prieſts of Cybele, ſo called from Gallus, a river in Phrygia, of which they drank before they began their ſacrifices.

GALLI, a people of Africa, near Abyſſinia, to the inhabitants of which they are great enemies, and have taken ſeveral provinces from them. They are a wandering people, like the Arabs of the Deſart, and live upon their flocks and robberies. They are circumciſed, and take as many wives as they pleaſe.

GALLICANUS (St.) a Roman conſul under the emperor Conſtantine, defeated the Scythians, and ſuffered martyrdom for the Chriſtian faith at Alexandria, by order of the emperor Julian, on the 25th of June, 362.

GALLICZIN (MICHAEL MICHAELOWITZ, prince of) firſt veldt-marſhal of the Ruſſian army, and one of the greateſt captains of his time, was born on the 11th of November, 1674, of one of the moſt noble and powerful families in Ruſſia. He ſignaliſed himſelf againſt the Turks, obtained ſeveral victories over the Swedes, and died at Moſcow, on the 21ſt of December, 1730, aged fifty-ſix.

GALLIENUS (PUBLIUS LICINIUS) the ſon of Valerian, was aſſociated to the empire by his father, in 253. He beat the Germans, defeated the Sarmatians, and ſuppreſſed the rebellion of his ſubjects; but at length Valerian, his father, being taken priſoner by the Perſians, Macrinus, Saturninus, and others, took up arms and the title of emperors. Gallienus truſted the revenge of his father to Odenatus, to whom he gave the title of Auguſtus, as a reward for his ſervices. He made a diſgraceful peace with the Marcomanni, and was almoſt always at war with the tyrants whom it was not in his power to ſuppreſs. In ſhort, he was killed by Cecropius, captain of the Dalmatians, at the ſollicitation of Aureolus, who had taken the title of emperor, and was beſieged by Gallienus in the city of Milan. This was in the month of March, 268, in the eighth year of his reign after the death of his father, and the fiftieth of his age. This prince eſteemed the Chriſtians, and put a ſtop to the perſecution againſt them.

GALLIGAI (LEONORA) the wife of the marſhal d'Ancre, was the daughter of a joiner. Mary de Medicis loved her tenderly, and carried her with her into France, when ſhe went thither to be married to Henry IV. Leonora Galligai governed the queen juſt as ſhe pleaſed; for though ſhe was extremely ugly, ſhe had a great deal of wit, ſhe married Concini, one of the queen's domeſtics; when, by their artifices and tale-bearing, they raiſed, and kept up a continual diſcord between Henry IV. and the queen, and, after that prince's death, they found it ſtill more eaſy to govern their miſtreſs and the young king Lewis XIII. by which means they glutted themſelves with riches and important poſts, and behaved with the moſt inſupportable pride. But the iſſue of theſe actions was extremely tragical; the marſhal d'Ancre, her huſband, was ſhot on the draw-bridge of the Louvre, and his body treated by the people with the moſt horrid inſults. Galligai, at hearing the news of his death, did not ſhed a tear, and her firſt care was to conceal her jewels, which ſhe did in the matting of her bed, and cauſing herſelf to be undreſſed, got into it; but the provoſt's men came into the chamber to ſearch for them, made her get up, and found them. She even ſtill behaved with as much aſſurance as if ſhe apprehended no danger, and even ſaid, that ſhe hoped to be taken again into favour; but ſhe was carried to the Baſtile, and afterwards committed to the Conciergerie, or priſon of the parliament, by which court ſhe was tried for high treaſon againſt God and the king, and was condemned to be beheaded and burnt to aſhes, which ſentence ſhe underwent with great reſolution, on the 8th of July, 1617. See the article CONCINI.

GALLIPOLI, a town of Turky in Europe, in Romania, at the mouth of the Sea of Marmora, with a good haven, and a biſhop's ſee. It was taken by Soliman I. in 1357. It is the reſidence of a baſhaw. It is ſeated on a peninſula, which has two ports, one to the north, and the other to the ſouth. It is ſaid to contain ten thouſand Turks, thirty-five thouſand Greeks, and almoſt as many Jews. The bazar, or bezeſtein, the place where the merchandiſes are ſold, is a handſome ſtructure, with ſeveral domes covered with lead. The town has no walls, and is only defended by an old ſquare caſtle. The doors of the houſes belonging to the Greeks and Jews are only two feet and a half high, to prevent the Turks from riding into them on horſeback. It is forty miles ſouth-weſt of Rodiſto, forty-three north-eaſt of Imbro, and one hundred ſouth-weſt of Conſtantinople. Long. 18. 10. E. Lat. 40. 30. N.

GALLIPOLI, a ſtrong town in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Terra d'Otranto, with a biſhop's ſee, a port, and a harbour. It is ſeated on a rock ſurrounded by the ſea, and is twenty-eight miles weſt of Otranto, and forty-four ſouth eaſt of Tarento. Long. 18. 10. E. Lat. 40. 20. N.

GALLONIUS (ANTHONY) prieſt of the Oratory at Rome, where he was born, lived in the ſixteenth century, and was the author of ſeveral works, the principal of which is a Treatiſe De Martyrum Cruciatibus, which is a very curious performance; he there ſhews the forms of the inſtruments the pagans made uſe of in torturing the martyrs of the primitive church. Gallonius publiſhed this Treatiſe in Italian, in 1591, and in Latin, in 1594, and died at Rome, in 1605.

GALLUS (CORNELIUS) a celebrated Latin poet, born at Frejus, was the favourite of Auguſtus Cæſar, who made him governor of Egypt. He was in love with Cytheris, Volumnius's freedwoman, and celebrated her by his verſes; but ſhe left him for Antony, on which occaſion Virgil compoſed his tenth Eclogue, to comfort Gallus. To this laſt ſix elegies are attributed; but they are not his, all his works being loſt. Virgil alſo praiſes Gallus in his ſixth Eclogue, and, according to ſome authors, in his fourth book of Georgics, under the name of Ariſtæus. Gallus being condemned to ſuffer baniſhment for his extortions, killed himſelf.

GALLUS (VIBIUS) a celebrated author, born in Gaul, was admired by Seneca, who was his friend. He pleaded at Rome with extraordinary ſucceſs; but the love of riches and pleaſure, made him fall into a phrenzy, which occaſioned his loſing a great part of the eſteem he had acquired. Seneca ſays, that Gallus became a fool from ſentiment, while others became ſo only from accident.

GALLUS (VIBIUS TREBONIANUS) was elected emperor of Rome in 251, after the death of Decius, who, by his means, was treacherouſly killed in the war againſt the Scythians. He made his ſon Voluſius his aſſociate in the empire, concluded a ſhameful peace with the Scythians, and perſecuted the Chriſtians. He was killed with his ſon, in 253, after a reign of eighteen months.

GALLUS SULPICIUS. See SULPICIUS.

GALLUS, in fabulous hiſtory, a youth who was the favourite of Mars, who always took him along with him when he went to viſit Venus in private, in order that he might keep watch to prevent their being ſurpriſed; but Gallus falling aſleep, and they both being diſcovered by Vulcan, who entangled them in a net, Mars was ſo enraged, that he metamorphoſed Gallus into a cock; and therefore, to attone for this neglect, he gives conſtant notice of the ſun's approach by his crowing.

GALLUTIUS (JOHN PAUL) a learned Italian aſtronomer, lived in the ſixteenth century, and was a member of an academy at Venice. He invented an inſtrument to obſerve the celeſtial appearances, and publiſhed ſeveral aſtronomical and other works.

GALLUTIUS (ANGELUS) a native of Macerata, in Italy, became a Jeſuit, in 1606, and gained reputation by his eloquence and poetry. He publiſhed ſome Latin orations, and and a Hiſtory of the Wars of the Low Countries, from the Year 1593 to 1609. This hiſtory, which is in Latin, was printed at Rome, in two volumes, folio, and reprinted in Germany, in quarto. He died at Rome, on the 28th of February, 1624.

GALLWAY, a conſiderable town in Ireland, and capital of the county of the ſame name. It is ſeated on an iſland, near the fall of Lough Corry into the Bay of Gallway. It is ſtrong, neat, and rich, and the capital of the weſt of Ireland. It ſtands very well for trade, not only with France and Spain, but with the Weſt Indies. The harbour is capable of containing a large fleet of ſhips. The public buildings are of ſtone, and lofty, and ſo are the houſes of the merchants, who are rich and numerous. Some ſay it is a town of the greateſt trade in Ireland. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth of Tuam, forty weſt of Athlone, forty-two weſt of Limerick, and one hundred and three weſt of Dublin. Long. 9. 18. W. Lat. 53. 2. N.

GALLWAY, a county in the weſt of Ireland, in the province of Connaught. It is bounded on the eaſt and ſouth-eaſt by the counties of Roſcommon and Tipperary; by the ocean on the weſt; by Mayo, Meath, and Roſcommon, on the north and north-eaſt; and by Thomond on the ſouth. It is the largeſt county but one in Ireland, and abounds with corn, paſtures, and cattle. Some think its fertility is owing to the plenty of lime-ſtone which warms the ſoil. The weſt ſide runs out in the form of a peninſula, and is much indented with little bays, and there are green iſlands and rugged rocks all along the ſide. A great number of proteſtants were murdered in this county in the maſſacre of 1641.

GALLOWAY, a territory in Scotland, partly included in the ſhire of Wigton.

GAMA (Vasco de) a Portugueſe admiral, celebrated for his diſcovery of the Eaſt Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, was born at Synes, and, in 1497, was ſent to the Indies by king Emanuel: he returned in 1502, and ſailed thither again with thirteen veſſels richly laden. He was made viceroy of the Indies by king John III. and died at Cochin, on the 24th of December, 1525. Don Stephen and Don Chriſtopher de Gama, his ſons, were alſo viceroys of the Indies, and celebrated in hiſtory.

GAMACHE (Philip de) in Latin Gamachæus, doctor and profeſſor of the Sorbonne, and abbot of St. Julian, at Tours, was eſteemed one of the moſt able divines of his time. He was born in the year 1568, and wrote Commentaries on Thomas Aquinas, intitled Summa Theologica, in two volumes, folio, which are much eſteemed. He died in the Sorbonne, on the 21ſt of July, 1625, aged fifty-ſeven.

GAMALIEL, a celebrated doctor of the law of Moſes, and the ſecret diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt, hindered the Jews from putting the apoſtles to death. St. Paul and St. Stephen had been his diſciples. It has been ſaid, that he was the ſon of Simeon, who took the infant Jeſus in his arms, and the grandſon of the celebrated rabbin Hillel.

GAMBARA (Laurence) a good Latin poet of the ſixteenth century, was born at Breſcia, in Italy, and lived a long time at Rome, with cardinal Alexander Farneſe. He wrote, 1. A Treatiſe on Poetry, in Latin, in which he would have the poets baniſh from their works the fables and deities of paganiſm. 2. A Latin Poem on Columbus's Diſcovery of the New World; and other poetic works. He died in 1586, aged ninety.

GAMBIA, a great river of Africa, ſuppoſed by ſome to be a branch of the Niger Nile, but hitherto without ſufficient proof, few having gone up it above five hundred miles from the ſea.

The river Gambia overflows every year; and in the middle of September, the innundation, like that of the Nile, is at its greateſt height. Sometimes it is ſo extraordinary, that a ſort of floating iſlands will come down it, upwards of twenty yards in breadth, with ſmall trees growing thereon. At the ſame time, all the vallies and vaſt tracts of land are laid under water, very high on each ſide the river, which is no wonder, conſidering the tide flows up it near five hundred miles. For this reaſon, they build all their towns on high ground, otherwiſe they would be carried away by the flood.

Though the African company have ſeveral factories up the river, yet their chief ſettlement is at James's Fort, in an iſland of the ſame name. It is mounted with cannon, and has a ſmall garriſon, which preſerves their right of trading therein. This iſland is about thirty miles up the river, and about three miles from either ſhore, and is very ſmall, being not quite a mile in circumference.

GANDIA, a town of Spain, in Valencia, with a ſmall univerſity. It declared for king Charles, in 1706; but the French took it after the battle of Almanza. It is near the ſea, fifty-five miles north of Alicant, and thirty-two ſouth eaſt of Valencia. Long. 0. 20. E. Lat. 39 6. N.

GANGES, a large and celebrated river of India, which divides it into two parts, India on this ſide the Ganges, and India beyond the Ganges. It riſes in the mountains near Little Thibet, in thirty-five degrees forty five minutes of north latitude. It receives ſeveral rivers in its paſſage, and traverſes ſeveral countries, falling at laſt into the Bay of Bengal, through ſeveral mouths. The water of this river is in great eſteem, the natives of the adjoining countries believing there is a ſanctity peculiar to this river, inſomuch that ſome worſhip it as a god, and it is annually viſited by above one hundred thouſand pilgrims, and many carry their dying friends to expire on its banks.

GANGEA, a town of Perſia, in Georgia, ſeated in a plain eighty miles long. It is a large handſome place, whoſe houſes are intermingled with trees, which yield a very delightful view, when they are in bloom. The gardens which are within the town, are watered with ſeveral rivulets which paſs through it. The bazars, or market-places, are in the middle, and of a large extent, there being a particular quarter for every ſort of merchandize. They are all covered over, and vaulted, and make a very handſome appearance. It is a place of great trade, and much reſorted to by foreign merchants. It is one hundred and ſixty-five miles north-eaſt of Erivan, and one hundred and five north-by-eaſt of Teflis. Long. 47. 35. E. Lat. 41. 32. N.

GANNAT, a town of France, in the Bourbonnois, on the confines of Auvergne, in a country fruitful in corn, wine, and nuts. It conſiſts chiefly of one ſtreet, in which there is a large ſquare. The king's caſtle is flanked with four round towers; and St. Stephen's and that of the Holy Croſs are the two beſt churches in the town. The former has two ſteeples, in one of which is the town-clock. It is thirty miles ſouth of Moulins. Long. 3. 18. W. Lat. 45. 55. N.

GANTERI, or Gantes (John de) a brave general, was deſcended from an ancient and noble family, originally of Piedmont, but had ſettled in Provence, and was born at Cuers on the firſt of June, 1330. He ſignalized himſelf in the quality of knight, under Robert the Good, count of Provence, and commanded a conſiderable body of troops under Jane, Queen of Naples, Sicily, and Jeruſalem, and counteſs of Provence. He followed that princeſs to Naples, where he appeaſed a popular ſedition, and at length ſet out for Rome, where he ſupported the cauſe and intereſt of his ſovereign. On his return to Provence, in 1373, he raiſed a conſiderable body of troops in the country of Cuers, Souliers, and Hieres, to oppoſe a body of robbers, who, under the name of Tuſchians ravaged Provence, and amounted to above twelve thouſand men. The ſtates of the country held at Aix in 1374, nominated John de Simeonis, generaliſſimo againſt theſe robbers, and John de Gantes was his lieutenant-general; theſe defeated them with ſuch ſucceſs, that ſcarce one of them was left. Hence Gantes was ſurnamed the Brave, and declared lieutenant-general of all the queen's troops. He died at Cuers, loaded with honour, on the 4th of July, 1389.

GANYMEDE, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Tros, king of Troy, was the moſt beautiful youth in the world. Jupiter was ſo charmed with him, that he carried him away, and made him his cup-bearer in the room of Hebe. Some authors ſay, that Jupiter cauſed him to be carried off by an eagle; and others affirm, that he was himſelf the raviſher under the form of that bird. He deified this youth, and to comfort his father, made him a preſent of ſome very ſwift horſes. The abbe le Pluche obſerves, that Ganymede was the name of the horſes or image expoſed by the ancient Egyptians, to warn the people before their annual innundations, to raiſe their terraces to a juſt and proper height.

GAOGA, a kingdom of Nigritia, in Africa, bounded on the weſt by that of Borno, on the eaſt by Nubia, on the ſouth by a deſart which joins to a winding of the Nile, and on the north by the deſart of Serta, near Upper Egypt, being five hundred miles in length, from eaſt to weſt, and nearly as much in breadth. The inhabitants are a rude, wild, ignorant, barbarous people, going quite naked, all but their private parts. Their houſes are nothing but ſmall huts, made of the boughs of trees; and their occupation is to feed their flocks and herds. What towns there are does not appear, but there ſeem to be none of note.

GAP, a town of France, in Dauphiny, capital of the Gapenzois, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated at the foot of a mountain, and is an ill-built place. It is pretty large, and the cathedral has been repaired not many years ago. There are ſome houſes in the town which make a tolerable appearance, but the biſhop's palace has nothing remarkable. The walls are not worth mentioning. The convent of the Cordeliers is without the town, and their church is tolerably handſome, It is twenty-eight miles north of Siſteron, twenty weſt of Embrun, and two hundred and fifty ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 6. 9. E. Lat. 44. 35. N.

GARA (Nicholas) palatine of Hungary, who, though of mean birth, raiſed himſelf by his valour to the higheſt dignities. Lewis I king of Hungary, dying in 1381, Elizabeth, that that prince's widow, and Mary her daughter, were acknowledged as queens, on which they gave the government of the kingdom to Gara; but he oppreſſing the nobility, they took up arms, and crowned Charles, the grandſon of Lewis I. Gara cauſed Charles to be ſtrangled, and conducted Elizabeth and Mary through the ſeveral provinces of the kingdom, that they might be acknowledged by the people; but the governor of Croatia, who had been Charles's confidant, revenged the death of that prince: he killed Gara, cauſed the queen-mother to be put into a ſack, which was thrown into the river, and confined Mary her daughter in priſon, when Sigiſmund, marquiſs of Brandenburgh, to whom that princeſs was promiſed in marriage, entered Croatia with an army, put the governor to a cruel death, delivered Mary, and married her.

GARACK, an iſland of Aſia, in the Perſian gulph, remarkable for the fine pearl fiſhery on the coaſt. Long. 49. 40. E. Lat. 28. 45. N.

GARAMOND (Claude) a very ingenious letter-founder, was born at Paris, where he began, in the year 1510, to found his printing types free from all the remains of the Gothic, or as it is generally called the black letter, and brought them to ſuch perfection, that he had the glory of ſurpaſſing all who went before him, and of being ſcarcely ever excelled by his ſucceſſors in that uſeful art. His types were prodigiouſly multiplied; both by the great number of matrices he ſtruck, and the types formed in reſemblance of his, in all parts of Europe. Thus in Italy, Germany, England, and Holland, the bookſellers, by way of recommending their books, diſtinguiſhed the type by his name; and in particular the ſmall Roman, was, by way of excellence, known among the printers of theſe nations by the name of Garamond's ſmall Roman. By the ſpecial command of king Francis I. he founded three ſizes of Greek types for the uſe of Robert Stephens, who with them printed all his beautiful editions of the New Teſtament, and other Greek authors. Garamond died at Paris, in 1561.

GARASSE (Francis) a famous Jeſuit, born at Angouleme. He had a great deal of fire, a vaſt imagination, and good poetical talents; but he had neither the gravity nor depth of learning requiſite for writing on religious ſubjects; he nevertheleſs undertook to refute the libertines and impious, in a book which he publiſhed in French, in 1623, under the title of The curious Doctrine of the Wits of this Time, or ſuch as pretend to be ſo. This work made a great noiſe. M. Ogier, a celebrated preacher, refuted him, and maintained it was more adapted to harden atheiſts and libertines, than to convert them. Father Garaſſe made his apology, and being reſolved to ſhew he was able to write on religious ſubjects, publiſhed his Theological Summary of the capital Truths of the Chriſtian Religion. This work made more noiſe than the former, it was cenſured by the Sorbonne, and he was afterwards baniſhed to Poictiers, where he ended his days, in a very heroic manner; for the plague making dreadful havoc in that city, he earneſtly begged of his ſuperiors, the permiſſion to aſſiſt the ſick; he obtained it, and died in the hoſpital, in the midſt of perſons afflicted with the plague, on the 14th of June, 1631, aged forty-ſix. He alſo wrote The Calviniſtic Elixir, or Reformed Philoſopher's Stone, firſt dug up by Calvin, at Geneva, and afterwards poliſhed by Iſaac Caſaubon, at London, and other works, all in French.

GARCEZ (Julian) a worthy Dominican, diſtinguiſhed by his humanity, was born at Arragon, in Spain, in the year 1460, went to ſtudy at Paris, and became a doctor of the Sorbonne. He at length taught theology in Spain with reputation, and was nominated by Charles V. the firſt biſhop of Tlaſcala, in Mexico, where he fulfilled the duties of his office, and filled with indignation at the horrid cruelty of the Spaniards, defended the Indians with ſuch zeal, as brought upon himſelf the moſt unworthy treatment. Upon this occaſion he compoſed a treatiſe in the form of a letter, which he addreſſed to pope Paul III. He died about the year 1547. Padilla has tranſlated the above treatiſe, which he has inſerted in his Hiſtory of Mexico.

GARCIAS, an able civilian, in the thirteenth century, born at Seville, wrote a Commentary on the Decretals.

He ought not to be confounded with Nicholas Garcias, another learned civilian of Spain, who wrote a treatiſe on Benefices, which is eſteemed.

Garcias Lasso de la Vega, commonly called Garcilasso, a celebrated Spaniſh poet, born of a noble family at Toledo, in the year 1500. His father was counſellor of ſtate to Ferdinand and Iſabella, who employed him in ſeveral important negociations. Garcilaſſo was educated at the court of the emperor Charles V. who had a particular regard for him, and whom he accompanied in his military expeditions, and became as celebrated for his courage as for his poetry. He attended that emperor into Germany, Africa, and Provence; and in this laſt expedition he commanded a battalion, when he received a wound, of which he died, at Nice, about three weeks after, in 1536, and in the thirty-ſixth year of his age. The wound was made by a ſtone which a countryman threw from a high tower, and hit him on the head.

The Spaniſh poetry was greatly improved by Garcilaſſo, who extended its bounds, and enriched it with new beauties. He had ſtrong natural talents for poetry, and did not fail to improve them by culture, and ſtudying the beſt poets ancient and modern. His poems are full of fire, and have great nobleneſs and majeſty. The learned Sanctius has written commentaries upon all his works, and every where illuſtrated them with learned and curious notes, and there have been ſeveral editions of Garcilaſſo's works, in which theſe notes have been inſerted.

He ought not to be confounded with Garcias Laſſo de la Vega, a native of Cuſco, who wrote in Spaniſh the Hiſtory of Florida, and that of Peru and the Incas.

GARDA, a town of Italy, in the Veroneſe, and territory of Venice, ſeated on a great lake of the ſame name, eighteen miles north-eaſt of Verona. Long. 10. 41. E. Lat. 45. 35. N.

GARDE, a bridge of France, in Lower Languedoc, a work of the Romans, and one of the moſt remarkable pieces of antiquity in that kingdom. It is built over the river Gardon, eight miles from Uſez, and ten from Niſmes, near the village Remoulin. It was deſigned for an aqueduct to convey the water to Niſmes. There are two hills thirty yards high on the ſides of the river, to the tops of which the aqueduct extends. This bridge is built with three rows of arches, of free-ſtone, built one upon another. The row next the water has ſix arches, and is one hundred and fifty paces long; the next has eleven arches, and is two hundred and ſixty-five paces in length; the uppermoſt has thirty-ſix arches, and is thirty paces from one end to the other. Theſe laſt are neither ſo high nor ſo large as the former. The ſtones ſeem to be laid one upon another, without any mortar or cement, and yet the places where they join is hardly to be perceived. The whole work together is one hundred and eighty-two feet high. In ſhort, it is a curious and magnificent piece of workmanſhip, but the exact time of its being built is uncertain.

GARDELEBEN, a town of Germany, in the Old March of Brandenburg, ſubject to the king of Pruſſia. Its principal traffic conſiſts in hops and beer. It is ſeated on the river Beiſe, thirty-eight miles north-by-weſt of Magdeburg, and fifty-five north-eaſt of Brunſwick. Long. 11. 55. E. Lat. 52. 44. N.

GARDIE (Pontus de la) grand-marſhal of the armies of Sweden, was a French gentleman, born in the village of la Gardie, near Carcaſſonne. After having diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Piedmont and in Scotland, he entered into the ſervice of the king of Denmark, and was made priſoner in a battle fought againſt the Swedes; when he was preſented to Eric XIV. king of Sweden, who entertained a particular eſteem for him. La Gardie, by his advice and courage, contributed greatly to the acceſſion of John III. to the throne of Sweden; and in 1580. that prince declared him general of his troops againſt the Muſcovites. He rendered himſelf maſter of Carelia, and continued his conqueſts till 1583, when a treaty of peace was begun. He was unhappily drowned on the 5th of November, 1585. From him are deſcended the counts De la Gardie, who are the greateſt lords in Sweden.

GARDINER (Stephen) biſhop of Wincheſter, and chancellor of England, was born at St. Edmund's-Bury, in Suffolk, and educated at Cambridge. He afterwards applied himſelf to the civil and canon law, and became ſecretary to cardinal Wolſey. In 1525 he was, by an accident, at once admitted into the king's preſence and favour. Wolſey had projected a treaty, which was to change the face of affairs in Europe, and the king coming to his houſe at Moor-Park, in Hertfordſhire, found Gardiner buſy in framing that alliance; the king liked his performance extremely; was pleaſed with his converſation, and immediately took him into favour. His majeſty ſent him, in conjunction with Edward Fox, provoſt of King's college, Cambridge, to the court of Rome, to obtain a divorce from queen Catharine of Arragon. Upon his return from thence, he obtained the archdeaconry of Norfolk, and the king having conſtant need of his ſervice, took him from Wolſey, and declared him ſecretary of ſtate. In 1531 he was conſecrated biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſat with Dr. Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, when that prelate pronounced the ſentence of divorce againſt queen Catharine, on the 23d of May, 1533. The ſame year he was ſent over to Marſeilles, where there was an interview between the French king and the pope and there he intimated king Henry the Eighth's appeal to a general council, in caſe the pope ſhould pretend to proceed in his cauſe; and he did the like in behalf of the archbiſhop of Canterbury. Upon his return to England, he was called upon, with ſome other biſhops, not only only to acknowledge the king as ſupreme head of the church, but to defend it, which he did in a famous ſermon preached at court, on True Obedience, which he publiſhed. He was afterwards employed in ſeveral other negociations. He had a ſhare in the divorce of Anne of Cleves, and that of queen Catharine Howard, and upon the death of Thomas lord Cromwell, he was, in 1540, elected chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge. He was concerned in a plot to ruin archbiſhop Cranmer, which was diſcovered by the king, who left all his enemies to his mercy; but the archbiſhop forgave them. After this, the king opening himſelf to biſhop Gardiner, upon ſome ſuſpicions he entertained of queen Catharine Parr, as being inclined to hereſy, he ſo far improved theſe jealouſies, as to prepare a paper of articles againſt her, which the king ſigned, and it was agreed to ſend her to the Tower; but chancellor Wriotheſley, who was intruſted with this paper, dropping it out of his boſom, it was immediately carried to the queen, who ſo wrought upon the king's affections, as to diſpel his ſuſpicions; and this kindling the king's reſentment againſt the biſhop, he would never ſee him afterwards. Upon the acceſſion of king Edward VI. he oppoſed all innovations in church and ſtate, and upon his refuſing to receive the Homilies, and pay obedience to the king's viſitors, was committed cloſe priſoner to the Fleet; but was afterwards diſcharged on the king's general pardon. Upon his obtaining his liberty, he went to his dioceſe, but ſoon after an order was given for his coming before the council, where he was roughly treated, and then directed to keep his houſe till he gave ſatisfaction, in a ſermon publicly preached before the king and his miniſters; but he was ſo far from giving the ſatisfaction demanded in this ſermon, that the very next day he was ſent to the Tower, where he continued during all that reign. Upon the acceſſion of queen Mary, in 1553, he was releaſed from the Tower, and was the ſame year declared chancellor of England, and on the firſt of October had the honour of crowning the queen. He was ſoon after poſſeſſed of a larger compaſs of civil and eccleſiaſtical power than any Engliſh miniſter ever enjoyed, except cardinal Wolſey. He now, notwithſtanding the zeal he had diſcovered in the reign of king Henry VIII. in laying the firſt ſteps of the Reformation, exerted himſelf with ſtill greater vigour, in bringing back the church to its old ſituation, by declaring every thing done under the reign of king Henry, contrary to law, and throwing the whole blame upon Cranmer. He not only acknowledged the pope as ſole head of the church; but was principally concerned in forming laws for the puniſhment of the proteſtants; and though he at firſt ſeemed to behave with moderation, he at length was employed in carrying the laws lately revived into execution, and even ſat by virtue of a commiſſion from cardinal Pole, as the pope's legate, at Wincheſter-houſe, in Southwark, to examine ſuch as were brought before him; but ſoon growing weary, he put this cruel and inviduous taſk upon Bonner. He died on the 13th of November, 1555, at about the age of ſeventy-two.

The reverend Mr. Granger obſerves, that "he was diſtinguiſhed for his extenſive learning, inſinuating addreſs, and profound policy; the maſter-piece of which was his treaty of marriage between Philip and the princeſs Mary, which was an effectual bar to the ambitious deſigns of Philip. His religious opinions appear to have been more flexible than his political, which were invariably fixed to his own intereſt. He was a perſecutor of thoſe tenets to which he had ſubſcribed, and in defence of which he had written." Beſides the treatiſe De Vera Obedientia, already mentioned, he had a great hand in the famous book intitled, The Erudition of a Chriſtian Man, and he alſo wrote An Apology for Holy Water.

GARISSOLES (Anthony) paſtor and profeſſor of divinity, at Montaubon, was born about the year 1587. He compoſed a great many books, ſome of which have been publiſhed, and particularly an epic poem in Latin, in which he celebrated the great exploits of Guſtavus Adolphus.

GARLANDE (John de) a celebrated poet and grammarian, of the eleventh century, was born in a village of that name, in the territory of Brie, in France, and came into England after the conqueſt of William the Conqueror, where he taught with reputation. He wrote a great number of books, ſome of which have been printed, and others are ſtill in manuſcript. Among thoſe that have been printed are, 1. a piece in rhyme, intitled Facetus, on the duties of man towards God, his neighbour, and himſelf. 2. A poem on the Contempt of the World, falſely attributed to St. Bernard. 3. Another poem, intitled Floretus, or Liber Floreti, on the doctrines of faith and Chriſtian morality. 4. A treatiſe on Synonimas, and another on Equivocal or Ambiguous Terms. 5. Dictionarum Artis Alchimiæ, cum ejuſdem Artis Compendio, de Metallorum Tinctura & Præparatione.

GARNET (Henry) provincial of the Jeſuits, memorable for his countenancing by his authority the gun-powder plot. He was born in England, but in 1575, took the Jeſuit's habit at Rome, from whence he returned to England in 1586, as provincial of his order. He here inceſſantly endeavoured to produce a revolution, as the readieſt means of eſtabliſhing popery, and even ſolicited the king of Spain to invade England. But theſe ſchemes proving abortive, he availed himſelf of the cruel zeal of ſome papiſts, who applied to him to reſolve this caſe of conſcience, "Whether "for the ſake of promoting the Catholic religion, it was allowable, in caſe of neceſſity, to involve the innocent in "the ſame deſtruction with the guilty?" to which this inhuman caſuiſt replied without heſitation, that it was, provided the guilty were the greater number. On this impious determination that horrid conſpiracy was ſet on foot, which was at one ſtroke to have deſtroyed the king, the royal family, and both houſes of parliament. But the dreadful plot being providentially diſcovered, Garnet was ſent to the Tower, and being afterwards tried and condemned to be hanged for high treaſon, was executed at the weſt end of St. Paul's, on the 3d of May, 1606. He owned the crime for which he ſuffered, and yet has been placed by the Jeſuits among their martyrs.

GARNIER (Robert) a French poet, born at Ferté-Benard, in the diſtrict of Maine, was counſellor, and afterwards lieutenant-general of Mans. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf under Charles IX. Henry III. and Henry IV. and died at Mans, about the year 1602, aged fifty-ſix. He wrote nine tragedies in the taſte of Seneca, and other poems, which, for want of better, were a long time the delight of France.

Garnier (John) a learned Jeſuit, born at Paris in 1612. He taught humanity, rhetoric, philoſophy, and divinity, in that ſociety, and died on the 26th of October, 1681, aged ſeventy. He publiſhed a great number of works, the principal of which are, 1. An excellent edition of Marius Mercator, with notes and diſſertations. 2. An edition of Liberatus, deacon of Carthage. 3. A Journal of the Popes. 4. A Supplement to the Works of Theodoret, in folio, &c.

He ought not to be confounded with Don Julian Garnier, a learned Benedictine, born at Converai, in the dioceſe of Mans, who publiſhed in 1721 and 1722, the two firſt volumes of an excellent edition of the Works of St. Baſil, and died at Paris, on the 3d of June, 1725, aged fifty-five. Dom Prudentius Maran finiſhed that edition, and publiſhed the laſt volume in 1730.

GARONNE, one of the largeſt rivers of France. It riſes in the Pyrenean Mountains, near Catalonia, in Spain, and runs through part of Gaſcony, Upper Languedoc, and part of Guienne, and having received the Dordogne, it takes the name of Gironda, and falls in the ſea near the tower of Cordoua. It takes in ſeveral ſmaller rivers as it paſſes along, and runs by the tower of St. Bertrand, Reux, Toulouſe, Agen, Bourdeaux, Blay, and ſeveral places leſs conſiderable.

GARRARD (Mark) an eminent hiſtory and face painter, was born at Bruſſels, in Flanders, in 1561, and coming to England, was for ſome time principal painter to queen Elizabeth, and afterwards to queen Anne, the royal conſort of king James I. He painted hiſtory, landſcape, architecture, and portraits; he alſo deſigned and illuminated for glaſs painters. There are ſome of his pieces, and ſeveral prints after him, now extant amongſt us. He died at London in 1635, in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age.

GARRISON, a town of Ireland, in the county of Fermanagh, and province of Ulſter, ten miles ſouth of Ballyſhannon. Long. 8. 20. W. Lat. 54. 16. N.

GARSTANG, a town of Lancaſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, and a fair on Holy Thurſday, for horned cattle; as alſo on July 21, and December 3, for horned cattle, wool, and cloth. The church is a vicarage, whoſe value in the king's books is 14 l. 3 s. 4 d. and yearly certified value 73 l. 10 s. It is ſeventy-eight miles ſouth of Carliſle, and two hundred and twenty-three north-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 40. W. Lat. 53. 50. N.

GARTH (ſir Samuel) an excellent phyſician and poet, was deſcended from a good family in Yorkſhire, and was educated at Peter-houſe in Cambridge, where he was created doctor of phyſic, on the 7th of July, 1691. In 1692 he was admitted a fellow of the College of Phyſicians in London, and in 1696 zealouſly promoted the erecting the diſpenſary, which is an apartment in the college for the relief of the ſick poor, by giving them advice gratis, and diſpenſing medicines to them at low rates, which expoſing him and many other phyſicians to the envy and reſentment of ſeveral perſons of the ſame faculty, as well as the apothecaries, he ridiculed them in his Diſpenſary, a poem, which raiſed him a prodigious reputation; procured him vaſt practice, and gained him the friendſhip and eſteem of moſt of the nobility and gentry of both ſexes. He was one of the moſt eminent members of the ſociety called the Kit-cat club, which conſiſted of above thirty noblemen and gentlemen, diſtinguiſhed guiſhed by their abilities and affection to the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover. On the 3d of October, 1702, he was elected one of the cenſors of the college of phyſicians. He was in particular favour and eſteem with the duke of Marlborough, whoſe diſgrace and voluntary exile he lamented in a fine copy of verſes. Upon king George the Firſt's acceſſion to the throne, he had the honour of knighthood conferred on him, with the duke of Marlborough's ſword, and was alſo made phyſician in ordinary to his majeſty, and phyſician general to the army. He wrote ſeveral other poems, beſides thoſe we have mentioned, and died on the 18th of January, 1718-19, and was interred on the 22d of the ſame month in the church of Harrow on the Hill.

Dr. Garth was endowed with extenſive benevolence, a circumſtance more valuable than all the luſtre which genius can confer. Mr. Pope, though of different religious and political principles, in one of his letters ſays, "The beſt "natured of men, Sir Samuel Garth, has left me in the "trueſt concern for his loſs. His death was very heroical, "and yet unaffected enough to have made a ſaint or philo"ſopher famous. But ill tongues, and worſe hearts, have "branded his laſt moments as wrongfully as they did his "life, with irreligion; you muſt have heard many tales "upon this ſubject, but if there ever was a good Chriſtian "without knowing himſelf to be ſo, it was Dr. Garth."

GARZI (Lewis) a celebrated painter, born at Piſtoia, in Tuſcany, in 1638. He was the diſciple of Andrew Sacchi, and became admired for the correctneſs of his deſigns, the beauty of his compoſitions, and his colouring. At eighty years of age he painted, by order of pope Clement XI. the vaulted roof of the church of the Stigmates, which paſſes for his maſter-piece. He died at Rome in 1721.

GASCOIGNE (Sir William) lord chief juſtice of the king's bench, was born at Gawthorp, in Yorkſhire, about the year 1350, and being bred to the law, was, in 1398, made one of the king's ſerjeants, and the next year, on the acceſſion of Henry IV. was raiſed to the rank of chief juſtice of the king's bench. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his integrity, his loyalty, and inflexible juſtice, and particularly by a memorable tranſaction in the latter end of that reign. A ſervant of the prince of Wales, afterwards Henry V. being arraigned for felony, at the king's bench-bar; the prince, his maſter, haſted to the court, and not only ordered Sir William to releaſe him, but attempted his reſcue. When being oppoſed by the lord chief juſtice, who ordered him to leave the priſoner and depart, he ruſhed with fury up to the bench, and ſtruck that judge, while he was ſitting in the execution of his office. Upon which Sir William, after ſome grave expoſtulations on this outrage and unwarrantable interruption of the courſe of juſtice, committed that young prince to the king's bench priſon, there to wait his father's pleaſure; and the royal youth was ſo ſtruck with the reproof, that he ſubmitted to that diſgraceful puniſhment with a calmneſs as ſudden and ſurpriſing as the offence which occaſioned it. The king on hearing the affair, approved this bold action, and ſaid, that he thanked God for having given him both a judge who know how to adminiſter, and a ſon who could obey juſtice. This action had a happy effect on the prince, who had for ſome time led a diſſolute life; but he now became reformed, and being ſoon after raiſed to the throne, by the title of Henry V. was far from ſhewing the leaſt reſentment againſt Sir William, who was called to the parliament, which met in the firſt year of his reign, but died before the end of that year, on the 17th of December, 1413.

Gascoigne (George) a gentleman of good education in the reign of queen Elizabeth, ſerved with reputation in the wars in the Low Countries; and after his return to England, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings in proſe and verſe, among which are ſeveral books of poems with fantaſtic titles, namely, Flowers, Herbs, Weeds, The Steele Glaſs, a ſatyr, &c. Before the laſt are Commendatory verſes, by Walter Rawley, and others. He died in the year 1578.

GASCONY, is a large province of France, and one part of the general government of Guienne. It is bounded on the north by Guienne, on the eaſt by Languedoc and the Comté of Foix, on the ſouth by the Pyrenean mountains, which part it from Spain, and on the weſt by the ſea of Gaſcony. It is one hundred and twenty eight miles in length along the Pyrenees, and ninety-five in breadth from the Pyrenees to Guienne. It is watered by a great number of rivers, of which the principal are the Adour and the Guienne. The air is temperate, and the land is fertile in corn, paſtures, and wine. It is divided into eleven territories, which are Conflans, the county of Comminges, and that of Armagnac, Condmois, Proper Gaſcony, Chaloſſe, Landes, Terre de Labourd, Lower Navarre, the Vicomté of Soul, Bearne, and Bigorre. The principal towns are Aux, St. Sever, Condom, Dax, Bayonne, St. Palais, Mauleon, Pau, Tarbe, St. Bertrand, and St. Liziers.

GASPAR (Simeoni, or de Simeonibus) a celebrated Latin and Italian poet, a native of Aquila, was ſecretary to pope Innocent X. His poems are greatly eſteemed.

GASPARINI of Bergamo, a famous grammarian at the beginning of the fifteenth century, was born at Barzizia, a village in the neighbourhood of Bergamo, and was one of the authors to whom the revival of polite literature in Italy was principally owing. He taught with reputation at Padua, and afterwards at Milan, where he died in 1431. He was the author of Commentaries on ſeveral of Cicero's Works; A Collection of Epiſtles; and other works. His Epiſtles were printed in the Sorbonne, in 1469, and this was the firſt book printed in France.

GASSENDI (Peter) canon and provoſt of the cathedral church of Digne, profeſſor of mathematics at the Royal College at Paris, and one of the moſt celebrated philoſophers France has produced, was born at Chanterſier, about three miles from Digne, in Provence, in 1592. When a child, he took particular delight in gazing at the moon and ſtars, as often as they appeared in clear unclouded weather. This pleaſure frequently drew him into bye places, in order to feaſt his eye freely and undiſturbed, by which means his parents had him often to ſeek, not without many anxious fears and apprehenſions. They thereput him to ſchool at Digne, where he, in a very ſhort time, made ſuch an extraordinary progreſs in learning, that ſome perſons who had ſeen ſpecimens of his genius, reſolved to have him removed to Aix, in order to ſtudy philoſophy under Feſay, a learned Minor friar. This propoſal was ſo diſagreeable to his father, who intended to breed him up in his own way, to country buſineſs, as being more profitable than that of a ſcholar, that he would conſent to it only upon condition that he ſhould return home in two years at fartheſt. Accordingly young Gaſſendi, at the end of the allotted time, repaired to Chanterſier; but he had not been long there, when he was invited to be a teacher of rhetoric at Digne, before he was quite ſixteen years of age; and he had been engaged in that employ but three years, when his maſter Feſay dying, he was made profeſſor in his room at Aix. When he had been there a few years, he compoſed his Paradoxical Exercitations, which coming to the hands of Nicholas Peireſc, that great patron of learning, joined with Joſeph Waller, prior of Valette, in promoting him, and he having entered into holy orders, was firſt made canon of the church of Digne, and doctor of divinity, and then obtained the wardenſhip or rectory of that church. Gaſſendi's fondneſs for aſtronomy grew up with his years, and his reputation daily encreaſing, he was, in 1645, appointed royal profeſſor of mathematics at Paris. This inſtitution being chiefly deſigned for aſtronomy, our author read lectures on that ſcience to a crowded audience. However, he did not hold this place long, for a dangerous cough and inflammation of the lungs obliged him, in 1647, to return to Digne for the benefit of his native air.

Gaſſendi wrote againſt the Metaphyſical Meditations of Des Cartes and divided with that great man, the philoſophers of his time, almoſt all of whom were Carteſians or Gaſſendians. He alſo wrote againſt Morin, the famous aſtrologer, who not being able to defend himſelf at the bar of reaſon and learning, had recourſe to the ſtars, and boldly predicted that Gaſſendi, who was of a delicate conſtitution, would die at the end of Auguſt, 1650; but he had reaſon to repent his too great credulity in a thing ſo vain as aſtrology; for Gaſſendi never enjoyed better health than during the courſe of that year. Gaſſendi had embraced the ſyſtem of Epicurus, which he reformed and rendered valuable; he joined to his knowledge of philoſophy and the mathematics, an acquaintance with the languages and profound erudition; he was beloved and eſteemed by cardinal de Richelieu, and all the protectors of learned men did themſelves honour in becoming his friends. He wrote, 1. three volumes on Epicurus's Philoſophy, and ſix others, which contain his Philoſophy; 2. Aſtronomical Works; 3. The Lives of Nicholas de Peireſc, Epicurus, Copernicus, Tycho Brahe, Peurbachius, and Regiomontanus; 4. Epiſtles, and other Treatiſes; all his works were collected together, and printed at Lyons in 1658, in 6 vols. folio, and are greatly eſteemed. He died at Paris on the 24th of October, 1655, aged ſixty-three. Sorbieſe and father Bougerel have written his Life.

GASSENHOVEN, a town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, four miles eaſt of Tirlemont, and twenty-five eaſt of Louvain. Long. 4. 50. E. Lat. 50. 55. N.

GASSION (John de) marſhal of France, governor of the Netherlands, and a great general in the ſeventeenth century, was born on the 20th of Auguſt, 1609. After having ſignalized himſelf in Piedmont, he entered into the ſervice of Guſtavus the Great, king of Sweden, diſtinguiſh-ed himſelf by his valour at the taking of ſeveral places, and contributed to the victory of Leipſick. After the death of Guſtavus, who was killed at the battle of Lutzen, in 1632, Gaſſion returned to France with his regiment, joined the marſhal de la Force's army in Lorrain, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral ſieges and battles, particularly at the victory of Rocroi, in which the duke d'Anguien divided the honour with him. Gaſſion was made marſhal of France in 1643, and the following year was lieutenant-general of the army in Flanders, commanded by Gaſton, duke of Orleans. He died at Arras, on the 2d of October, of a wound he had received at the ſiege of Lens, and was interred in the proteſtant church at Charenton, he being of that perſuaſion.

GASTON (Phœbus) count of Foix, and viſcount of Bearn, is celebrated by the French for his valour, the buildings he erected, and his magnificence. Not being willing to pay homage to king John, that monarch kept him priſoner at Paris, but afterwards gave him the command of an army in Guienne. He compoſed a book intitled, Le Miroir de Phœbus; and others on Hunting. He died ſuddenly at Ortez, in 1391, at his return from the chace, when he was waſhing before ſupper.

Gaston de Foix, duke of Nemours, was the ſon of John de Foix, count d'Etampes, viſcount of Narbonne, &c. and of Mary of Orleans, the ſiſter of king Lewis XII. This prince being made governor of Milan, and general of the French army in Italy, diſcovered great military talents, and gained the battle of Ravenna, on the 11th of April, 1512, but purſuing a body of four thouſand Spaniards, who had made their retreat, he was encompaſſed and ſlain, in the 24th year of his age. Lewis XII. his uncle, and the whole kingdom, were ſenſibly afflicted at his death.

Gaston (John Baptist) duke of Orleans, the youngeſt ſon of Henry IV. and the brother of Lewis XIII. was born at Fontainbleau, on the 25th of April, 1608. He for ſome time commanded the army at the ſiege of Rochelle, in 1628, and afterwards at that of Picardy, in 1636. His favourites frequently prevailed upon him to ſhew public marks of his diſcontent, and engaged him to retire ſeveral times from court under the miniſtry of cardinal de Richelieu. He was lieutenant-general of the kingdom during the minority of Lewis XIV. and commanded the French army in the Netherlands, in 1644 and 1645. He died at Blois, on the 2d of February, 1660.

GASTRELL (Francis) biſhop of Cheſter, was born at Slapton, in Northamptonſhire, about the year 1662. He was educated at Weſtminſter ſchool under the famous Dr. Buſby, and completed his ſtudies at Oxford. About the year 1694, he was choſen preacher to the ſociety of Lincoln's Inn; and, in 1697, was appointed to preach at Boyle's lecture, and he afterwards publiſhed eight Sermons upon that occaſion. Theſe raiſed his character as a divine ſo high, that, after ſeveral preferments in the church, he was, in 1714, conſecrated biſhop of Cheſter. He publiſhed, beſides the above Sermons, 1. The Certainty of the Chriſtian Revelation and the Neceſſity of believing it eſtabliſhed. 2. Some Conſiderations concerning the Trinity. 3. Remarks upon Dr. Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity. 4. The Chriſtian Inſtitutes; and other works. He died in November, 1725, in the ſixty-ſecond or ſixty-third year of his age.

GATAKER (Thomas) a learned critic and divine, was born at London, on the 4th of September, 1574, and ſtudied at St. John's college, Cambridge. He was afterwards choſen preacher at Lincoln's Inn, which he quitted, in 1611, for the rectory of Rotherhithe, in Surry. In 1620, he made a tour thro' the Low Countries; and, in 1624, publiſhed, at London, a book, intitled Tranſubſtantiation declared by the confeſſion of the Popiſh Writers to have no neceſſary Foundation in God's Word; he wrote likewiſe a Defence of this diſcourſe. In 1642, he was appointed one of the aſſembly of divines, and was engaged with them in writing annotations upon the Bible. He died on the 29th of July, 1654, in the eightieth year of his age. Beſides the above works, he publiſhed, 1. A Diſſertation upon the Stile of the New Teſtament. 2. De Nomine tetragrammata. 3. De Diphthongis, ſive Bivocalibus. 4. An edition and tranſlation of the emperor Marcus Antoninus's Meditations. 5. A Collection of Sermons, in folio; and many other works. His piety and charity were very exemplary, and his modeſty ſo great, that he declined all eccleſiaſtical dignity and court preferments. His extenſive learning was admired by Salmaſius and other great men abroad, and his houſe was a private ſeminary for young gentlemen of this nation, and many foreigners reſorted to him to receive advice in their ſtudies.

Gataker (Charles) ſon of the preceding, was born at Rotherhithe, in Surry, about the year 1614, and ſtudied at Cambridge; but after he had obtained the degree of bachelor of arts, he retired to Oxford, and was entered a commoner of Pembroke college. At length he became rector of Hoggerſton, or Hoggeſton, near Winſlow, in Buckinghamſhire, where he continued till his death, which happened on the 20th of November, 1680, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age. He wrote, 1. An Anſwer to five captious Queſtions. 2. An Examination of the Caſe of the Quakers concerning Oaths. 3. Ichnographia Doctrinæ de Juſtificatione; and other works.

GATE, a long chain of mountains of Aſia, in the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges, which runs through all its length and divides it into two equal parts. But it is remarkable that on that ſide of the mountains towards the coaſt of Malabar, the ſeaſon begins in June which they call their winter, while on the other ſide towards the coaſt of Coromandel, they enjoy the fineſt ſeaſon of the year.

GATIANUS (St.) the firſt biſhop of Tours, and one of the apoſtles of France, came into Gaul about the year 250. He converted a great number of perſons to the faith of Chriſt, and died about the end of the third century.

GATIMOZIN, the laſt king of Mexico, was cruelly treated by the Spaniards, who put him to death, which he ſuffered with a conſtancy and courage worthy of the greateſt man.

GATTON, a town in Surry, which has neither market nor fair, but ſends two members to parliament. It was formerly pretty conſiderable, but is now no more than a village. The members are returned by the conſtable. It is two miles north-eaſt of Rygate, and eighteen ſouth from London. It is a rectory of 9 l. 2 s. 8 d. in the king's books. Long. 0. 10. W. Lat. 51. 18. N.

GAUDE (Henry) count Palatine, an excellent deſigner and engraver, was deſcended from an illuſtrious family, and was born at Utrecht. He was early ſo fond of deſigning, that he excelled all the young painters of his time. Going to Rome while Adam Elſheimer was there, he contracted a cloſe friendſhip with him, bought of him all the pictures he had finiſhed, and paid him before-hand for as many as he could make in ſeveral years; then returning to Utrecht, engraved the ſeven pictures from Elſheimer, that are admired by the curious for their ſingular beauty. Unhappily a young woman who was in love with him, gave him a philtre, which, inſtead of making him return her paſſion, took away his ſenſes, and on every ſubject, except painting, he talked like an ideot; but upon that he diſcourſed very rationally and judiciouſly as long as he lived.

GAUDEN, or Gawding, (John) ſucceſſively biſhop of Exeter and Worceſter, was born, in 1605, at Mayland, in Eſſex, of which pariſh his father was vicar. He ſtudied at St. John's college, in Cambridge, and, about the year 1630, removed to Wadham college, in Oxford, where he became tutor to Francis and William Ruſſell, the ſons of ſir William Ruſſel, of Chippenham, in Cambridgeſhire, bart. He afterwards became chaplain to Robert, earl of Warwick, rector of Brightwell, in Berkſhire, and vicar of Chippenham. In 1641, he was preſented to the rectory of Bocking, in Eſſex. This preferment he held after the breaking out of the civil wars, and continued there the uſe of the Common Prayer longer than any church in that neighbourhood. In 1643, he was choſen one of the aſſembly of divines, and openly continued in the intereſt of the parliament till they began to proceed farther than he expected, and then wrote a piece called A Proteſtation againſt the declared Purpoſes and Proceedings of the Army and others, about the trying and deſtroying our ſovereign Lord the King; and alſo a piece called A juſt Invective againſt thoſe of the Army and their Abettors who murdered King Charles I. with ſome other poetic pieces in Latin. He likewiſe made a great merit of having publiſhed, and as ſome ſay, written, Εἰκὼν Βασιλικὴ, The Portraicture of his ſacred Majeſtie, in his Solitudes and Sufferings. Some time before the Reſtoration, being diſſatisfied with the various forms of government ſet up in this kingdom, he compoſed a folio volume, intitled The Tears, Sighs, Complaints, and Prayers of the Church of England; ſetting forth her former Conſtitution compared with her preſent Condition. At the Reſtoration, he heartily came into all the meaſures of the court, was made one of the king's chaplains, and, in 1660, was promoted to the biſhoprick of Exeter. Though that biſhoprick yielded him twenty thouſand pounds in fines, in a few months, yet it is ſaid, that he was not ſatisfied with it, but importuned his majeſty to tranſlate him to the rich ſee of Wincheſter. He was, however, forced to ſit down contented with the biſhoprick of Worceſter, to which he was elected in May, 1662; but this he did not long enjoy, for being ſeized with a violent fit of the ſtone and ſtrangury, he died on the 20th of September following. He wrote many other works, beſides thoſe we have mentioned, but is moſt remarkable for his having given riſe to the diſpute whether king Charles I. or he wrote the above Εἰκὼν Βασιλικὴ.

GAUDENS (St.) a populous town of France, capital of a ſmall diſtrict called Nebouſan. It is not large; but the market, market, which is kept every Thurſday, renders it rich. It has a collegiate church and ſeveral convents, particularly a handſome rich nunnery. It is ſeated on the river Garronne, five miles north-eaſt of St. Bertrand. Long. 1. 2. E. Lat. 43. 8. N.

GAUL was one of the celebrated regions of Europe; it had Germany on the eaſt, from which it was ſeparated by the Rhine; as alſo Italy, from which it was parted by the Alps, whence it was called Tranſalpine Gaul; the German Ocean and the Sea of Brittany were on the north, the Weſtern Ocean on the weſt, and the Mediterranean on the ſouth; the Pyrenean mountains divided it from Spain between the ſouth and the weſt. This region was not a particular monarchy; but was inhabited by a great variety of people, independent on each other, whoſe names we ſhall mention when we deſcribe the various parts of Gaul. The moſt conſiderable mountains were the Alps, the Pyrenees, Mount Jura, and the mountains of the Cevennes. The principal rivers were the Rhine, the Meuſe, the Seine, the Loire, the Garonne, the Rhone, and the Saone. It comprehended the kingdom of France, Savoy, Swiſſerland, a ſmall part of the country of the Griſons, and all that part of Germany and the Low Countries which lies to the weſt of the Rhine. This was Gaul properly ſo called; but when the Gauls had paſſed the Alps, and conquered a part of Italy, their acquiſitions were called Gaul. This occaſioned Gaul to be divided into the Ciſalpine and Tranſalpine. The firſt was ſubdivided into the Ciſpadana and Tranſpadana; and the Tranſalpine was called Gaul Comata and Braccata. After Gaul was conquered by the Romans, it was diſtinguiſhed by the names of Narboneſe, Aquitanic, Lyoneſe, and Belgic Gaul. Hence, collectively, theſe people were called Gauls, in the plural.

Gaul Aquitanic, or Gallia Aquitanica, was anciently one of the four general parts of Tranſalpine Gaul, and in the time of Cæſar was comprehended between the Garonne, the Pyrenees, and the Ocean; afterwards it was extended as far as the Loire, which parted it from Lyoneſe Gaul, from its ſource to its mouth. Thus it comprehended all that part of France which at preſent includes Poitou, Saintonge, Perigord, Guienne, Gaſcony, Bearn, Quercy, Rovergne, Auvergne, Limouſin, and Berry. They divided this into three parts, called the Firſt, Second, and Third. The capital of the Firſt was called Avaricum, now called Bourges; the capital of the Second was Bourdeaux, and of the Third, Auch.

Belgic Gaul was anciently the largeſt and moſt northern part of Tranſalpine Gaul. It had Germany on the eaſt, Narboneſe Gaul on the ſouth, Lyoneſe and the Sea of Brittany on the weſt, and the German Ocean on the north. It comprehended all that part of Germany to the weſt of the Rhine, with Alſace, Lorrain, part of the Low Countries, Picardy, the greateſt part of Champaigne, and the Iſle of France, and was divided into the Firſt and Second. Treves was the capital of the Firſt, and Rheims of the Second.

Gaul, or Gallia Braccata was a part of Tranſalpine Gaul, and took its name from a ſort of garment which was worn by the inhabitants. Circumſpadane Gaul had its name from its lying about the river Po, in Italy. Ciſalpine Gaul was part of Italy, bounded on the north and weſt by the Alps, on the ſouth by the Mediterranean Sea, on the eaſt by the river Arſa, which parted it from Dalmatia, by the Adriatic Gulph, by the river Eſino, which parted it from the country of the Picenians, and by the river Arno, which ſeparated it from Etruria. This was nearly the ſame country as Lombardy. Ciſpadane Gaul was that part of Celtic Gaul to the ſouth of the Po, where we now find the greateſt part of Romandola, the duchies of Modena and Parma, the republic of Genoa, part of Tuſcany, Montferrat, and Piedmont. Gaul or Gallia Comata, that is the Hairy, was the largeſt part of Tranſalpine Gaul, and was called Comata, or the Hairy, becauſe the inhabitants wore their hair long. It comprehended Belgic, Lyoneſe, and Aquitanic Gaul.

Lyoneſe or Celtic Gaul was a great part of Tranſalpine Gaul, bounded on the north by the Belgic and Aquitanic, on the ſouth by the Narboneſe, on the weſt by the ocean, and on the eaſt by the Alps. It was divided into five parts, called Firſt, Second, &c. Lyons was the capital of the Firſt, Rouen of the Second, Tours of the Third, Agendicum, or Sens, of the Fourth, and Beſançon of the Fifth. Narboneſe was another part of Tranſalpine Gaul. It extended, from eaſt to weſt, from the Alps to the Pyrenees and Acquitanic Gaul. It had Lyoneſe Gaul on the north, and the Mediterranean on the ſouth. It was divided into the Firſt, Second, and Third, which were at length incorporated into Vieneſe Gaul. Gaul or Gallia Togata was ſo called from their wearing a garment called a toga, like the Romans. Gaul or Gallia Tranſpadana was ſeated on the river Po. Gaul Viennenſe, or Gallia Viennenſis, had its name towards the decadence of the Roman empire, from Vienne, the capital. It was divided into Firſt, Second, &c. Vienne was the capital of the Firſt, Narbonne of the Second, Aix of the Third, Ambrun of the Fourth, and Tarantaſia, now Moutier, of the Fifth.

GAULMIN (Gilbert) ſieur de Montgorges, a Latin poet of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Moulins, and became well ſkilled in polite literature. He was well acquainted with many languages, and became counſellor of ſtate, and intendant of Nivernois. He wrote Epigrams, Odes, and Hymns, in which are diſcovered much fire and invention, and obtained great reputation by his Latin poems. He was the firſt who publiſhed the romance attributed to Euſtathius, on the Amours of Iſmenus and Iſmenia, in Greek, with a Latin tranſlation. He wrote Notes and Commentaries on the work of Pſellus which treats of the Operations of Demons; and on the Life and Death of Moſes, by an anonymous Rabbin, and ſeveral other works.

GAURES, a people of Aſia, ſcattered over Perſia and the Indies, having been formerly the ancient inhabitants of Perſia. They have a great veneration for fire, and are chiefly employed in huſbandry. They worſhip one God, and ſay light and fire are his reſemblance. They acknowledge Zoroaſter as the founder of their religion, and look upon him as a prophet. They pretend their ſacred fire has been kept burning four thouſand years. They have a great averſion for Alexander the Great and Mohammed, and look upon them to be bad men. They have prieſts, whoſe buſineſs it is to take care of and keep in the ſacred fire. They never bury their dead, but expoſe them in incloſed places to be devoured by ravenous birds. Some have endeavoured to repreſent them as an inceſtuous ſet of people, who uſed their women in common, eſpecially on certain feſtivals, while others affirm, they marry but one wife. In ſhort, there are ſuch different accounts of them, that we can affirm nothing as to their religious principles, but their adoration of fire. However, in general, they are looked upon as a poor harmleſs ſort of people, zealous in their ſuperſtition, rigourous in their morals, and exact in their dealings.

GAURICO (Luca) a famous aſtrologer in the ſixteenth century, was born at Giſoni in the kingdom of Naples, and became very famous under the pontificates of Julius II. Leo X. Clement VII. and Paul III. This laſt pope had a particular eſteem for him, and gave him the biſhoprick of Civita Ducale; but notwithſtanding the many ſurpriſing predictions related of him, it is certain that he abuſed the credulity of the public, and that though they ſometimes happened true, it was only by chance. He greatly deceived himſelf in his prediction relating to Henry II. king of France. He wrote Tractatus Aſtrologicus, and other works, and died at Ferrara, in 1559, at eighty-two years of age.

Pomponio Gaurico, his brother, was alſo the author of ſeveral works.

GAUTHIER, the name of three celebrated French muſicians. The firſt, named the Old, excelled in playing on the lute. His principal pieces are the Immortelle, the Nonpareille, and Le Tombeau de Mezangeau. Denis Gauthier, his couſin, was alſo an excellent player on the lute. The moſt eſteemed of his pieces are the Homicide, the Canon, and Le Tombeau de l'Enclos. Peter Gauthier, a native of Sciotat, in Provence, excelled particularly in all kinds of inſtrumental muſic. He was director of an opera alternately held at Marſeilles and at Lyons; but embarking with all his effects, at the port of Cette, in Languedoc, the veſſel was loſt, and he drowned, within ſight of the port, in 1697, at fifty-five years of age. His collection of duos and trios for the violin and flute is eſteemed.

GAY (John) an excellent Engliſh poet, born of an ancient family in Devonſhire, in 1688, near Barnſtable, in that county, and educated at the free-ſchool there, after which he was put apprentice to a ſilk mercer in London; but the ſhop ſoon becoming his averſion, he was ſeldom ſeen in it; and in a few years his maſter, upon the offer of a ſmall conſideration, willingly gave him up his indentures. Having thus procured his freedom from ſervitude, he followed the courſe of life to which he was drawn by his genius and inclination, and applied himſelf to poetry. This recommended him to the company and acquaintance of thoſe he moſt admired, and, among others, to dean Swift and Mr. Pope, who were ſtruck with the open ſincerity, the eaſineſs of his temper, and undiſguiſed ſimplicity of his manners. To this laſt gentleman he addreſſed the firſt fruits of his muſe, intitled Rural Sports, printed in 1711, which met with ſome agreeable atteſtations of its merit that would have been enjoyed with a higher reliſh, had not his finances been now in an ill ſtate. His purſe was an unerring barometer of his ſpirits, which ſinking with it, left him in the apprehenſion of a ſervile dependence, which he dreaded above any thing that could befal him. The clouds were however diſpelled by the kindneſs of the ducheſs of Monmouth, who, in 1712, appointed him her ſecretary, with a handſome ſalary. This ſeaſonable favour ſeating him in a coach, though not his own, produced his celebrated poem called Trivia, or the

Art

Art of walking in the Streets; and about two years after he publiſhed his paſtorals, intitled The Shepherds Week.

The moſt promiſing views now opened to him at court, he was careſſed by ſome leading perſons in the miniſtry, and his patroneſs rejoiced to ſee him taken from her houſe to attend the earl of Clarendon, as ſecretary in his embaſſy to the court of Hanover; but his hopes, with reſpect to this new advancement, began and ended almoſt together; for queen Anne died within fifteen days after their arrival at Hanover. Soon after his return to England, he wrote his excellent farce called the What d'ye call it, the profits of which brought ſome uſeful recruits to his fortune; and his poetical merits being endeared by the ſweetneſs and ſincerity of his temper, procured him an eaſy acceſs to perſons of the firſt diſtinction.

In 1720, he recruited his purſe by a handſome ſubſcription to his Poems, which he collected and printed in two volumes, quarto; but falling into the general infatuation of that year, he loſt all his fortune in the South-Sea ſcheme. In 1724, he finiſhed his tragedy, intitled the Captives, which he had the honour of reading from the manuſcript to queen Caroline, then princeſs of Wales, when her royal highneſs promiſed him farther marks of her favour, if he would write ſome fables in verſe for the uſe of the duke of Cumberland. Accordingly he undertook the taſk, and publiſhed his excellent Fables in 1726, with a dedication to that prince.

Upon the acceſſion of his late majeſty to the throne, he was offered the place of gentleman uſher to the young princeſs Louiſa, a poſt which he thought beneath his acceptance; and being out of humour with the court, wrote his Beggar's Opera, which was brought upon the ſtage, at the theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, in the beginning of November, 1727, and had an unprecedented and incredible ſucceſs; for, beſides its being acted ſixty-three evenings without interruption, and renewed the next ſeaſon with ſucceſs, it was played fifty times both at Bath and Briſtol. The ladies carried about with them the favourite ſongs of it in fans, and houſes were furniſhed with it in ſcreens.

His opera, intitled Polly, which was deſigned as a ſequel to the former, was prohibited by the lord chamberlain from being repreſented on the ſtage. He alſo wrote a comedy, called the Wife of Bath, and Achilles, an opera, &c. He died at the duke of Queenſberry's houſe, in Burlington-gardens, in December, 1732, and was interred in Weſtminſter abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory, by the duke and ducheſs of Queenſberry, with the following epitaph, written by Mr. Pope, who had the warmeſt friendſhip for him.

Of manners gentle, of affections mild,
In wit a man, ſimplicity a child;
Above temptation in a low eſtate,
And uncorrupted ev'n among the great;
A ſafe companion, and an eaſy friend,
Unblam'd through life, lamented in thy end;
Theſe are thy honours! not that here thy buſt
Is mixt with heroes, or with kings thy duſt,
But that the worthy and the good ſhall ſay,
Striking their penſive boſoms——Here lies GAY.

Then follows this farther inſcription:

Here lie the aſhes of Mr. JOHN GAY,
The warmeſt friend,
The moſt benevolent man;
Who maintained
Independency
In low circumſtances of fortune;
Integrity
In the midſt of a corrupt age;
And that equal ſerenity of mind,
Which conſcious goodneſs alone can give,
Through the whole courſe of his life.
Favourite of the muſes,
He was led by them to every elegant art;
Refined in taſte,
And fraught with graces all his own;
In various kinds of poetry,
Superior to many,
Inferior to none.
His works continue to inſpire
What his example taught,
Contempt of folly, however adorned;
Deteſtation of vice, however dignified;
Reverence of virtue, however diſgraced.

GAZA (THEODORE) a famous Greek in the fifteenth century, was born in Theſſalonica, in 1398, and went into Italy after the taking of Conſtantinople by the Turks; and immediately applied himſelf to learn the Latin tongue, which he made himſelf ſuch a maſter of, that he ſpoke and wrote it with the ſame facility and elegance as if it had been his native language. His uncommon parts and learning ſoon recommended him to public notice, and particularly to cardinal Beſſarion, who procured him a benefice in Calabria. He was one of thoſe to whom the revival of a good taſte and polite literature in Italy were principally owing. He tranſlated, from the Greek into Latin, Ariſtotle's Hiſtory of Animals, Theophraſtus on Plants, and Hippocrates's Aphoriſms; and put into Greek, Scipio's Dream, and Cicero's Treatiſe on Old Age. He wrote ſeveral other works in Greek and Latin, and died at Rome, in 1475, aged eighty.

GAZA, an ancient and celebrated city of Aſia, in Paleſtine, about three miles from the ſea. It ſtands on a hill ſurrounded with valleys, and theſe again encompaſſed with hills. Moſt of them are planted with delicate fruits. The buildings are mean, both as to the form and matter. The beſt are of ſtone, arched within, and flat on the top, with a quadrangle in the middle, like the Turkiſh houſes. The walls are higher than the roofs, and have potſherds ſo managed and placed, as to ſtrike down the refreſhing winds, with ſpouts of the ſame, in colour, ſhape, and ſituation, reſembling great ordnance. Other houſes are covered with mats and hurdles, and others built with mud. It was formerly in a better condition, as appears from the handſome pillars of Parian marble, which ſupport ſome of the roofs, while other pieces are diſpoſed of here and there, in different parts of almoſt every beggarly cottage. On the top of the hill, at the north-eaſt corner of the town, are the ruins of large arches, ſunk low into the earth, and other foundations of a ſtately building, from whence one of the baſhaws carried off marble pillars of an incredible ſize, which he employed in building a moſque in the valley. The caſtle is a contemptible ſtructure, and the port is ruined. In a valley on the eaſt ſide of the town, between that and a hill, are two high pillars of marble of very great antiquity. The doors of the houſes of the Chriſtians in this town are exceeding low, to prevent the ſudden entrance and inſults of the Turks. The Greeks have vineyards in their gardens, but they dare not own they make wine of the grapes. They keep their corn under ground, as in Egypt, to preſerve it from worms. In the principal part of the town, there is an old church frequented by the Copts. The Greek women, contrary to their cuſtom in other places, cover their faces, dye their hands black, and are dreſſed like the Mooriſh women of Cairo. Every Saturday they go into this churchyard, and howl over the graves of the dead in a ſtrange manner. Beſides what is mentioned in the Scripture of this place, it was beſieged by Alexander the Great, who afterwards took it, and laid it in ruins. It is fifty miles ſouth-weſt of Jeruſalem. Long. 34. 55. E. Lat. 31. 28. N.

GAZELLI, prince of Apamia, and governor of Syria for the ſultan of Egypt. He at firſt oppoſed the Turks; but ſeeing Tomenbey, ſultan of Egypt, was taken priſoner, and put to death by Selim, in 1517, he implored the clemency of the conqueror, and was continued in his government. After the death of Selim, he ſent to Cayerbey, governor of Egypt, to ſollicit him to reſtore the power of the Mamalukes; however, that prince put his ambaſſadors to death. Notwithſtanding this, Gazelli gave battle to the Turks near Damaſcus, and was killed fighting valiantly, in 1520.

GEBER, a celebrated phyſician and aſtronomer in the ninth century, compoſed ſeveral works in Arabic, which are greatly praiſed by Boerhaave, who ſays, that he found many chemical experiments in them, which at preſent paſs for new.

GEDDES (JAMES) a lawyer of diſtinguiſhed learning, was the eldeſt ſon of a reſpectable family, in the ſhire of Tweedale, in Scotland, and was born about the year 1710. He learned Latin, Greek, and the elements of philoſophy from private tutors in his father's family, and afterwards ſtudied the different branches of philoſophy at the univerſity of Edinburgh, where he made a great proficiency in mathematical learning, under the celebrated M'Laurin; after which he turned his thoughts to the law, and having completed the uſual courſe of preparatory ſtudy, was admitted advocate, and practiſed at the bar for ſeveral years with increaſing reputation, but was cut off by death before he was forty years of age. He had a very amiable character, and the time he could ſpare from the duties of his profeſſion, was devoted to the ſtudy of the ancient poets, philoſophers, and hiſtorians. The fruit of theſe ſtudies was an Eſſay on the Compoſition and Manner of Writing of the Ancients, particularly Plato, in one volume.

GEDOYN (NICHOLAS) a member of the French Academy, and of that of Inſcriptions, was born at Orleans, on the 17th of June, 1667. He ſtudied at Paris, and became a Jeſuit, but quitted that ſociety ſome time after, and became canon of the Holy Chapel, at Paris, and abbot of Notre Dame de Beaugenci. He died on the 10th of Auguſt, 1744, aged ſeventy-ſeven. He wrote, 1. a French tranſlation of of Quintilian; 2. that of Pauſanias; 3. miſcellaneous works; 4. ſeveral Diſſertations inſerted in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inſcriptions.

GEET, a river of the Auſtrian Netherlands, which riſes in the ſouth-eaſt part of Brabant, runs north near the confines of Liege, and paſſing by Lande and Leaw, falls into the Demer, a little below Halen.

GEGENBACH, a ſmall free imperial town of Germany, in Suabia, under the protection of the houſe of Auſtria. It is ſeated on the river Kinzie, fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Straſburg, and twenty-five north of Friburg. Long. 8. 6. E. Lat. 48. 25. N.

GEINOZ (FRANCIS) a learned member of the Academy of Inſcriptions and Belles Lettres, was a native of Bull, a ſmall town in the canton of Friburg. He acquired great ſkill in the Greek and Hebrew languages, and laboured for a long time with ſucceſs at the Journal des Sçavans, and at a new edition of Herodotus, corrected from the manuſcript in the king's library. He alſo wrote many learned Diſſertations on Oſtraciſm, &c. in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inſcriptions. He died at Paris, on the 23d of May, 1752, aged fifty-ſix.

GEISLENGEN, an imperial town of Germany, in Suabia, eighteen miles north-weſt of Ulm. Latitude 48. 38. N.

GELASIUS I. ſucceeded pope Felix II. on the 1ſt of March, 492. He defended with great firmneſs what his predeceſſor had done againſt Acacius, refuſed to admit to his communion Euphemius, patriarch of Conſtantinople, for not eraſing the name of Acacius from the Diptychs, and maintained a conſtant warfare in behalf of the dignity and ſuperiority of his ſee. Beſides his Letters, he left four Tracts, 1. On the Bond or Tie of the Anathema, De Anathematis Vinculo, in which he maintains, that the temporal power ſhould be left entire to the princes, and the ſpiritual to the prieſts, it being no leſs foreign to the inſtitution of Chriſt for a prieſt to uſurp the functions of ſovereignty, than it is for a ſovereign to uſurp thoſe of the prieſthood. 2. A Remonſtrance againſt reſtoring the Lupercalia. 3. A Confutation of the Doctrine of the Pelagians, that a Man may live free from Sin. 4. A Treatiſe of the two Natures of Chriſt againſt Eutyches and Neſtorius. He died on the 19th of November, 496, and was ſucceeded by Anaſtaſius II.

GELASIUS II. before called John de Gaete, from the place of his birth, was elected pope on the 25th of January, 1118, after the death of Paſchal II. Cincio Frangipani, who was for having one of his creatures elected, was ſo enraged at this election, that he obliged Gelaſius to leave the city of Rome. About the ſame time, the emperor Henry V. cauſed Gregory VIII. to be elected. Henry leaving Rome, Gelaſius returned thither privately; but Frangipani's family drove him out again, which obliged him to take ſhelter in France, where he was received with honour, and died in the abbey of Cluni, on the 29th of January, 1119. He was ſucceeded by Caliſtus II.

GELDENHAUR (GERARD) in Latin Geldenhaurius, an hiſtorian and proteſtant divine in the ſixteenth century. He was a native of Nimeguen, and ſtudied claſſical learning at Deventer; he went through his courſe of philoſophy at Louvaine, where he contracted a very ſtrict friendſhip with ſeveral learned men, and particularly with Eraſmus. He was afterwards made reader and hiſtorian to Charles of Auſtria; but not thinking proper to attend him to Spain, he became reader and ſecretary to the biſhop of Utrecht, and at length executed the ſame functions at the court of Maximilian of Burgundy. At length going to Wittemberg, he embraced the proteſtant religion, after which he taught youth at Worms, and afterwards at Auxburgh; he at length taught hiſtory at Marpurg, and afterwards divinity, till his death, which happened on the 10th of January, 1542, at the age of threeſcore. He wrote, 1. a Hiſtory of Holland; 2. that of the Low Countries; 3. that of the Biſhops of Utrecht; and other works.

GELHAUSEN, a ſmall imperial town of Germany, in Weteravia, under the protection of the elector Palatine, with a caſtle, built by the emperor Frederic I. It is ſeated on the river Kintzig, twenty-five miles north-eaſt of Hanau, and the ſame diſtance north from Aſchaffemburg. Long. 8. 13. E. Lat. 50. 20. N.

GELLENIUS (SIGISMUND) a learned man in the ſixteenth century, was born of a good family at Prague, and began very early to travel through Germany, France, and Italy. Eraſmus recommended him to John Frobenius, as corrector of his printing houſe, where he continued thirty years, and beſides correcting for the preſs, publiſhed ſeveral works, the principal of which are, 1. A Dictionary in four Languages. 2. Notes on Pliny and Livy. 3. A Tranſlation of Joſephus's Jewiſh Antiquities, &c. He died in the year 1504 or 1505.

GELLERT (C. F.) one of the fineſt geniuſſes and moſt excellent poets Germany has produced, was born at Hainichen, near Freyburg, in Saxony, and ſtudied at Leipſic, at which univerſity he was for many years profeſſor of philoſophy and the belles lettres. He early diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his talent for poetry: and though of a weak frame was eaſy of acceſs, and an excellent companion. He had an air of ſweetneſs that was expreſſive of his diſpoſition, and rendered him beloved by all his young pupils. He contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with the moſt learned and polite writers in Germany, particularly with Rabner, Gærtner, Schlegel, Cramer, and Gieſeck. All his works are filled with ſentiment, and bear the impreſſion of the ſweetneſs of his diſpoſition. The moſt conſiderable of them are his comedies, his ſpiritual ſongs, his moral poems, and particularly his ſacred odes, his fables, and his tales. A perſon receiving a mortal wound at the battle of Roſbach, in the late war, was heard to cry out, "Gellert, I thank thee, thou haſt taught me "to die!" An officer who had been dangerouſly wounded, diſtributed, after his cure, a number of Gellert's works among his company, when a muſqueteer, thirty-eight years of age, began firſt learning the alphabet, in order to have the pleaſure of reading them. This amiable and ingenious gentleman died on the 13th of December, 1769, in the fifty-fifth year of his age. As he drew near his end, his phyſician permitted him to drink a little water, on which he cried, "My Saviour, when dying, did not receive this "comfort: he too was athirſt, but they did not give him "water; it was gall they gave him to drink: he likewiſe, "when dying, ſuffered inſults, and I, notwithſtanding "my unworthineſs, ſee my laſt moments honoured by the "favours of my prince." Gellert's death was much lamented by his countrymen, and a multitude of poems were written on that melancholy occaſion.

GELLI (JOHN BAPTIST) an eminent Italian writer, was born of mean parents, at Florence, in the year 1498, and brought up a taylor, but had ſo extraordinary a genius, that he acquired ſeveral languages, and made an uncommon progreſs in the belles lettres; and though he always continued to work at his trade, became acquainted with all the wits and learned men of Florence, and his merit was univerſally known. He was choſen a member of the academy there: and the city, to do him honour, made him a burgeſs. He excelled in his native tongue, and acquired the higheſt reputation by his works, which are, 1. I. Capricci del Bottaio, quarto, which contains ten dialogues. 2. La Circe, octavo: this work, which alſo contains ten dialogues, and treats of human nature, has been tranſlated into Latin, French, and Engliſh. 3. Diſſertations, in Italian, on the Poems of Dante and Petrarch. 4. The comedies of La Sporta and La Errore; and other works. He alſo publiſhed ſome tranſlations from the Latin. This extraordinary man died on the 24th of July, 1563, in the ſixty fifth year of his age.

GELLIBRAND (HENRY) an eminent mathematician in the ſeventeenth century, was born in London, on the 17th of November, 1597, and was educated at Oxford, where he did not diſtinguiſh himſelf to any advantage, till hearing one of ſir Henry Saville's mathematical lectures, he was ſo extremely pleaſed with it, that he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the mathematics, in which he made a vaſt progreſs. Upon the deceaſe of Mr. Edmund Gunter, in December, 1626, he was choſen profeſſor of aſtronomy in Greſham college, in London, where he became celebrated on account of his lectures and writings. In particular, he wrote, 1. A Diſcourſe on the Variation of the magnetical Needle. 2. An Inſtitution Trigonometrical. 3. An Epitome of Navigation. 4. An Almanack for the Year 1631. 5. An Appendix to Capt. Thomas James's Voyage for the Diſcovery of the North-weſt Paſſage, concerning the Longitude. He alſo publiſhed Mr. Henry Briggs's Trigonometrica Britannica, and Mr. John Wells's Sciographia, or the Art of Shadows. He died in February, 1637.

GELLIUS (AULUS). See AULUS GELLIUS.

GELO, the ſon of Hipparchus, king of Gela, ſeized the kingdom of Syracuſe, and reigned there with glory. He defeated the Carthaginians commanded by Hamilcar, and died after a reign of ſeven years, in the four hundred and ſeventy-eighth year before the Chriſtian æra.

GEMBLOURS, a town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in Brabant, with an ancient abbey. Don John of Auſtria gained a battle near this town over the States General, in 1572. It is ſeated on the river Orne, eighteen miles ſouth of Louvaine, ten miles weſt of Namur, and twenty-three ſouth-eaſt of Bruſſels. Long. 4. 45. E. Lat. 50. 32. N.

GEMISTUS (GEORGE) ſurnamed PLETHO, a famous Platonic philoſopher and mathematician, was born at Conſtantinople, lived in great credit at court, and, in 1528, obtained the admiration of the council of Florence by his learning and prudence. He wrote a Commentary on the magic Oracles of Zoroaſter, a book on the Difference between the Philoſophy of Plato and that of Ariſtotle; and other works.

GEMMA (Reinier) a learned mathematician and profeſſor of phyſic, at Louvain, was commonly called Le Friſon, or The Friezelander, from his being a native of Dockum, in Friezeland. He wrote, 1. Methodus Arithmeticæ. 2. De Uſu Annuli aſtronomici; and other works which are eſteemed. He died at Lovain, on the 26th of May, 1558, aged fifty.

Cornelius Gemma, his ſon, was alſo a famous aſtronomer. He compoſed ſeveral treatiſes, and one among the reſt on the ſtar which appeared in 1572. He died on the 12th of October, 1579.

GEMUND, a town of Germany, in the circle of Franconia, and biſhoprick of Wurtzburg. It is ſeated on the river Maine, twenty miles north of Wurtzburg. Long. 9. 45. E. Lat. 50. 8. N.

Gemund, a ſmall imperial town of Germany, in Suabia. Its principal trade conſiſts in chaplets. It is ſeated on the river Reims, twenty eight miles eaſt of Stutgard, and thirty north-by-weſt of Ulm. Long. 9. 45. E. Lat. 48. 40. N.

GREMUYD, a town of Germany, in Upper Auſtria, noted for its ſalt works. It is ſeated on the river Draun, to the north of a lake of the ſame name. Long. 11. 3. E. Lat. 47. 45. N.

GENAP, a town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in Brabant, with an ancient caſtle. It is ſeated on the river Dyle, fourteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Bruſſels. Long. 4. 29. E. Lat. 50. 36. N.

GENARO (Beneditto) an eminent Italian painter, was the nephew and diſciple of Guercino, and was born in the year 1633. He imitated the darkneſs of his uncle's ſhades, caught the roundneſs of his fleſh, but with a diſagreeable lividneſs, and poſſeſſed at leaſt as much grace and dignity. On his coming to England he painted for king Charles I. and ſeveral of his pieces are in the royal palaces. Three of them are at Chatſworth, and Lot and his daughters at Coudray. He died in 1715.

GENCA (Girolams) a famous painter and architect, in the ſixteenth century, was born at Urbino, and died in 1551, aged ſeventy-five.

GENDRE (Lewis le) an able hiſtorian, born at Roan. He became canon of Notre Dame, at Paris, ſubchanter of the ſame church, and abbot of Notre Dame at Claire Fontaine, in the dioceſe of Chartres. He died at Paris, on the firſt of February, 1733, aged ſeventy-eight. He wrote a great number of works, the principal of which are, 1. The Life of M. de Harlay, archbiſhop of Paris, his benefactor, in Latin. 2. The Manners and Cuſtoms of the French, in the different times of that monarchy. 3. An Hiſtory of France, in three volumes, folio, and in ſeven volumes, duodecimo. 4. The Life of Cardinal d'Amboiſe. Theſe works are eſteemed.

Gendre (Gilbert Charles le) marquiſs of St. Aubin, counſellor in the parliament of Paris, and afterwards maſter of requeſts in the king's houſhold. He wrote, 1. A Treatiſe on Opinion, the beſt edition of which is in eight volumes, duodecimo. 2. Antiquities of the Houſe of France, &c. printed at Paris, in 1739, in quarto, with ſeveral other works that are ſtill in manuſcript. He died at Paris, on the 8th of May, 1746, aged fifty-nine.

GENDRON (Claude Deshais) a famous doctor of phyſic, of the faculty of Montpellier, phyſician in ordinary to the brother of Lewis XIV. and to the duke of Orleans, regent of the kingdom. He diſcovered from his youth very extraordinary talents for natural hiſtory, and the ſtudy of phyſic, and diligently ſearched for the company of men diſtinguiſhed by their learning. He performed from his own knowledge, and a practice peculiar to himſelf, a prodigious number of cures, where the patient ſeemed incurable, and acquired a very great reputation, particularly in the cure of cancers, and the diſeaſes of the eyes; and having at length amaſſed a conſiderable fortune, he retired to Auteuil, near Paris, where the nobility, miniſters, ambaſſadors, the principal magiſtrates, the learned, and a great number of perſons of both ſexes, went to viſit or conſult him. He died there on the third of September, 1750, aged eighty-ſeven. He left his manuſcripts to one of his nephews. The principal of which is intitled, Recherches ſur l'Origine, le Developpement, & la Reproduction de tous les Etres vivans, which we are aſſured is an excellent work.

GENEBRAUD (Gilbert) archbiſhop of Aix, and one of the moſt learned men of his time, was born at Riom. He ſtudied at Paris, became doctor of the Sorbonne, and afterwards profeſſor of Hebrew at the royal college. He was nominated archbiſhop of Aix in 1591. He wrote, 1. A Sacred Chronology. 2. A Commentary on the Pſalms. 3. A French tranſlation of Joſephus. 4. Three Books on the Trinity. 5. A treatiſe on the Election of the Biſhops by the Clergy and People, againſt the Nomination of the King. This treatiſe made a great noiſe, and brought him into much trouble; he alſo wrote ſome other works, and died at Samur, on the 14th of March, 1597, aged ſixty.

GENEHOA, a kingdom of Nigritia, in Africa, bounded on the north by Gualata, between which and it there is a large deſart; on the eaſt by Tombut, on the ſouth by Melli, and on the weſt by the ocean. It was called by the Portugueſe, who were the firſt among the Europeans who diſcovered it, Ghinea, whence, in all probability, that part of Africa now called Guinea had its name. This country extends along the river Niger, or Senegal, two hundred miles, to the place where that river falls into the ocean. The commodities are rice, cattle, cotton, and fiſh; and the merchants of Barbary uſed formerly to trade with the inhabitants of this kingdom, exchanging arms, cloth, copper, braſs, and the like, for gold. It produces no fruit trees, for the dates they had from Numidia and Gulata. It has neither town nor city, but a large village, inhabited by the principal men. Their houſes in this village are nothing but huts, whited with chalk, and covered with ſtraw. Three months in the year it has the appearance of an iſland, that is in July, Auguſt, and September, and then the merchants of Tombut come down the river in canoes, with their merchandiſe, to trade with the inhabitants of this kingdom.

Le Maire, one of the late travellers into this country, ſays, the people are extremely poor, and that the houſes, as well of the king as his ſubjects, are built of nothing but ſtraw and palm-leaves, though in ſome places they are more commodious than others. They are in form like a bee-hive, and have neither windows nor doors, except a hole like the mouth of an oven, which one man can hardly creep in at. And though the heat muſt be exceſſive in ſo cloſe a hut, yet it is always full of ſmoak, which, through cuſtom, they are very fond of. Their beds are made of ſticks, placed at the diſtance of two inches from each other, and faſtened together with ſtrings or ſmall cords, ſomewhat like a hurdle. Theſe, as well as their houſes, are ſupported by forked branches of trees. They generally lie on theſe beds without any thing to cover them, but ſome of the better ſort lay a mat over the ſticks.

The women manage the traffic in all ſmall matters, and under pretence of carrying their merchandiſes, they go and divert themſelves with the ſailors, who never ſcruple to make uſe of theſe ſooty damſels. The men trade in ſlaves, ivory, hides, and gum seneka. The Moors to the ſouth of theſe people wander about in the deſart like the Arabs, and are probably of the ſame race, they being of a complexion more inclining to the white than black, and of a ſhort ſtature, and lean, but cunning and quick-witted. On the contrary the negroes are large, and well-ſhaped, and very ignorant. The deſart is nothing but a barren ſand, deſtitute of all verdure; whereas, that of the negroes is fruitful in paſture and corn, and produces trees always green, but bear no fruit proper for uſe. The Moors make no ſcruple of travelling an hundred miles to ſell a quintal of gum, and ride ſtark naked on their horſes, oxen, and camels. The moſt conſiderable among them have a ſort of a capuchin, made of a ſkin with the fur on, while the reſt cover their nakedneſs only with a ſlip of leather. Their nouriſhment is chiefly milk, in which they diſſolve ſome gum.

GENEP, a ſtrong town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, with a good caſtle. It is ſubject to the king of Pruſſia, and is ſeated on the river Neers, five miles ſouth-weſt of Cleves, thirteen ſouth-eaſt of Nimeguen, and twenty-five north of Venlo. Long. 4. 29. E. Lat. 51. 42. N.

GENEST (Charles Claude) a gentleman diſtinguiſhed by his taſte for natural philoſophy, poetry, and polite literature, was born at Paris, and became abbé of St. Vilmer, almoner to the ducheſs of Orleans, ſecretary to the duke of Maine, and member of the French academy. He contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with Rohault, Regis, and Mallebranche. The moſt conſiderable of his works is intitled The Principles of Deſcartes's Philoſophy, in French verſe. He alſo wrote four tragedies, of which that intitled Penelope had great ſucceſs. His Joſeph highly delighted the ducheſs of Maine, who condeſcended to act a part in it. The lords of the court, of the greateſt wit and taſte, could not ſee her act in it, or even hear her read it, without ſhedding tears. The duke, whom no tragedy had ever moved, was poſitive that nothing could make him feel what he called the common weakneſs; but ſcarce had he heard the firſt act, when all his firmneſs left him, and he was as weak as the others. Yet this piece no ſooner appeared on the French theatre, than it was damned. The other tragedies of the abbé Geneſt are Zenolida, princeſs of Sparta; and Polymneſtra; but this laſt has not been printed. He died at Paris, on the 19th of November, 1719, at eighty-four years of age.

GENET (Francis) biſhop of Vaiſon, was born at Avignon, on the 18th of October, 1640. He wrote a treatiſe on moral divinity, known by the name of Morale de Grenoble; noble; the beſt edition of which is that of Paris, in 1715, in eight volumes, duodecimo. He was drowned in returning from Avignon to Vaiſon, on the 17th of October, 1702, at the age of ſixty-two.

GENEVA, the city and republic of. Geneva is a place conſiderable for its antiquity, beauty, extent, ſtrength, and advantageous ſituation, which renders it in a ſenſe the bulwark and key of Swiſſerland, eſpecially of the canton of Berne, which lying between France and Savoy, have always ſufficient reaſon to diſtruſt thoſe two powers. It had formerly its particular earls, or counts, whoſe family was extinct in 1316. The dukes of Savoy afterwards endeavoured to bring this city and territory under their dominion. They gained many of the burgeſſes over to their ſide, who had the name of Mammelues, and thoſe who maintained their liberty were called Eidgnots, and theſe ſought the alliance of the Swiſs, particularly the cantons of Zurich, Bern, and Friburg. In 1526 they laid hold of a favourable conjuncture, and drove away all thoſe who were in the intereſt of the duke of Savoy. Afterwards the biſhop endeavoured to make them uneaſy by every method which lay in his power, but the inhabitants defended themſelves ſo well, that he was glad to transfer his ſee to Annecy, in the duchy of Savoy. Upon this the inhabitants embraced the reformed religion in 1535, and in 1584 they entered into a ſolemn alliance with the cantons of Swiſſerland. However, the houſe of Savoy did not abandon the project of ſeizing Geneva, for they made a freſh attempt, and had like to have ſucceeded.

On the 12th of December, 1602, in a very dark night, the Savoyards attempted to ſcale the walls of Geneva, and above one thouſand two hundred had got upon the ramparts, when a young man who was going to conduct ſomebody home, perceived what they were about, and began immediately to cry out for help. He made ſo great a noiſe, that the inhabitants were under arms almoſt in a moment. Thirteen burgeſſes had the misfortune to be killed by the firſt fire; but their fellow citizens having repulſed the Savoyards, took ſixty-ſeven, who were almoſt all officers; and the next day they hanged thirteen of the principal. However, the court of Turin took no notice of what paſſed; but thenceforward they never thought proper to renew their former pretenſions.

The territory of Geneva is ſmall, conſiſting only of thirteen pariſhes, but it is a fertile pleaſant country. The villages are large, and well built; and the pariſhes are full of country ſeats, which belong to the citizens. The fruits are very good, and though they have but little white wine, they have plenty of red. They ſow nothing but wheat, which yields very good crops; but the republic keeps a plentiful magazine of all ſorts of corn, which, in times of dearth, they ſell at a reaſonable price. The bakers are obliged at all times to buy corn from hence.

Geneva is ſeated at a corner of the lake Leman, at the place where the river Rhone runs out of this lake, to take its courſe through part of France. This river divides Geneva into two parts. The greateſt, which is properly the city, ſtands on the ſouth ſide of the river. It is partly built on a plain, and comprehends the quarter called the Rues Baſſes, the low ſtreets; and partly upon a hill, which riſes gradually to the quarter called the Town. The aſcent in ſome places is very gentle, and in others pretty ſteep. The other part of the city called St. Gervaſe is on the north ſide of the Rhone. In the middle of the river is an iſland ſeven hundred feet in length, and two hundred in breadth, which is full of inhabitants. The two parts of the city are joined to the iſland, on one ſide by a ſingle bridge, and on the other by two large ones, conſtructed with wood.

This city is very large, and proportionably populous, many having ſettled here, partly on account of religion, and partly for trade; inſomuch, that it contains upward of thirty thouſand ſouls. Hence the ſuperb houſes of private perſons become every day more numerous, and are built of hewn ſtone. Indeed, ſome think they are rather too magnificent for a little republic.

Among the public buildings we may take notice of St. Peter's church, which was formerly the cathedral. It is antique, ſpacious, and built in the form of a croſs. In the nave behind the pulpit, there are the images of the twelve apoſtles, in wood, and as the doors of the church are always open, it is no uncommon thing to ſee a Roman Catholic on his knees before theſe ſtatues. There is a large monument erected to the memory of the duke of Rohan, in black marble, upon which ſtands his ſtatue of white marble. He died in 1638, and his wife Margaret de Sully cauſed this mauſoleum to be built. It was this prince that made the grand walk and mall without the gates of the city, planted on each ſide with trees. Near the church are two lofty chapels, which ſerve for public ſchools, where they read lectures in theology and philoſophy. They likewiſe ſerve for Italian and German churches. The Germans have likewiſe another church for the Lutheran perſuaſion. A few paces from the cathedral is the town-houſe, remarkable for a ſtair-caſe paved with ſmall flint ſtones, and ſo contrived that a perſon may ride up it on horſeback, or in a coach. In the porch there are a collection of ancient urns, in which were buried the bones and aſhes of the dead, in the times of paganiſm. They have likewiſe a great many ancient medals, and other monuments of antiquity.

From the town-houſe you may go to the arſenal, which is handſome, well kept, and has arms and ammunition in abundance. There they ſhew the ſcaling ladders, dark lanterns, petards, and other machines, brought by the Savoyards in 1602. On the other ſide of the city is the college, where there is a library containing a great many ancient manuſcripts, and various curioſities. The college and academy were built ſince the Reformation, and have never been without men of diſtinguiſhed merit, though Geneva was ſcarce known out of Swiſſerland before that time. And here it will not be improper to take notice of the vulgar error which aſcribes the reformation of this city to John Calvin, whereas it was begun before he ſet foot within the walls. From the library we may proceed to the general hoſpital, which is now magnificently built, and where the poor are well lodged and taken care of. This ſtructure coſt above two hundred thouſand crowns.

There are now fountains in every ſtreet, and pipes from thence to convey the water into private houſes. This water is raiſed from the Rhone by a machine, into the aqueducts, which diſtribute it through the city. The iſland of the Rhone is adorned with an antique tower, which they ſuppoſe to be built in the time of Julius Cæſar. As the arms of Geneva are an eagle and a key, the republic always keeps a certain number of eagles in cages; and it is ſurpriſing to ſee how they will tear cats and other animals to pieces which are given them.

The fortifications are both a defence and an ornament to the city, on account of the fine walks that are thereon. It is fortified after the modern manner, and with as much art as lay in their power. Theſe have been repaired and augmented from time to time; but in 1734 the contributions required on this account were ſo great, that they cauſed an inſurrection which was not preſently pacified, for the troubles continued till 1738, when they were terminated by the mediation of France and the cantons of Zurich and Bern. However, this did not hinder them from adding other works when the Spaniards entered the ſtates of Savoy in 1741.

The ſupreme authority of this republic is in the hands of the grand council of two hundred perſons, except the general aſſembly, which meets every five years. From the grand council they chooſe twenty-ſeven, whereof ſixteen are the heads of the republic, and are called ſyndics; but of theſe, only four at a time are in office, which continues for a year; inſomuch, that in four years time the whole ſixteen take their turns. Beſies this there is a council of ſixty, whoſe buſineſs it is to examine important affairs, which require ſecrecy and diſpatch. In January every year they chooſe new officers, or confirm the old ones in their places. There are ſeveral other courts for the adminiſtration of juſtice, and for the good management of the city affairs, which would be too long to mention.

The principal revenue of this republic ariſes from the cuſtoms on all ſorts of merchandize carried out of the city, and from the prodigious quantities of corn which the magiſtrates purchaſe and ſell again to the citizens. But they muſt always have enough in their granaries to ſerve for two years; and they muſt buy no corn for this purpoſe which grows within twelve miles of Geneva. The inhabitants maintain themſelves by their manufactures, which are ſilks, clocks, watches, gold and ſilver lace, bone-lace, ſhammy-leather, piſtols, and printing books. Their religion every one knows is the Preſbyterian, and their language the Savoyard, or a ſort of corrupt French. But the better ſort of people ſpeak that language in its purity.

The inhabitants of Geneva are polite, witty, and gay, and much addicted to paſtimes, inſomuch, that this city is now called the court of the Alps, whither the proteſtant cantons ſend their children to improve themſelves in the languages. The French proteſtants have contributed greatly to the refinement, or as others ſay, to the corruption of the Genevois. It is certain they have much forgotten the advice of Calvin a little before his death, who recommended to them above all things an exemplary modeſty and humility; and as great a ſimplicity in their manners as in their religion.

A great part of Geneva, as before obſerved, ſtands upon a hill, and has its views bounded on all ſides by ſeveral ranges of mountains; which are however at ſo great a diſtance, that they leave open a wonderful variety of beautiful proſpects. The ſituation of theſe mountains has ſome particular effects on the country which they incloſe; as firſt, they they cover it from all winds, except the north and ſouth; and it is to the firſt of theſe winds the inhabitants of Geneva aſcribe the healthfulneſs of their air. Another effect of the Alps is that the ſun here riſes ſooner, and ſets later than in any other country in the ſame latitude. On one ſide there are a long tract of hills, covered with vineyards and paſtures; and on the other, huge precipices of naked rocks, riſing up in a thouſand odd figures, and cleft in ſome places, ſo as to diſcover high mountains of ſnow, that lie ſeveral leagues beyond them. Towards the ſouth the mountains riſe more inſenſibly, and leave the eye a vaſt uninterrupted proſpect for many miles. But the moſt beautiful view of all is the lake, and the borders of it that lie north of the town. It reſembles a great ſea in the colour of its waters, the ſtorms that are raiſed on it, and the ravages it makes on its banks. It produces abundance of good fiſh, eſpecially trouts of an enormous ſize. The republic have three or four frigates, with ſails and oars, with which they entertain great perſons with ſailing on the lake. Geneva is ſeventy miles north-eaſt of Lyons, ſixty-five ſouth of Beſançon, forty north-eaſt of Chamberry, one hundred and thirty-five north-by-weſt of Turin, and two hundred and thirty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 6. 15. E. Lat. 46. 13. N.

GENEVIEVE (St.) the patroneſs of Paris, was born at Nanterre, two leagues from Paris, about the year 422. It is commonly believed, that ſhe paſſed her youth in the ſtate of a ſhepherdeſs, and had all the innocence and virtue of one in that ſtation; but, according to M. de Valois, ſhe was of an illuſtrious family. She became known to St. Germain, biſhop of Auxerre, when that prelate paſſed by Nanterre with St. Loup, when going into England to oppoſe the opinions of Pelagius. Genevieve ſome time after went to Paris, and received the veil from the hands of the biſhop of that city. The girls who then made the vow of virginity had no need of any other ceremonies. After the death of her father and mother, ſhe lived at Paris with a lady who was her godmother. Her virtue and auſterities acquired her a great reputation, which however did not prevent her being expoſed to perſecution and the blackeſt calumnies, which ſhe bore with patience, and was contented with weeping and praying for her enemies in ſecret. They addreſſed themſelves to St. Germain when he came to Paris, in order to make a ſecond voyage to England, and accuſed Genevieve of hypocriſy and ſuperſtition; but the biſhop deſpiſed theſe accuſations, and made known her innocence. Attila, king of the Huns, being entered into Gaul with a formidable army, the Pariſians reſolved to abandon their city; but were prevented by Genevieve, who aſſured them that their city would be preſerved, and that thoſe who left it would be plundered by the barbarians. The event juſtified her prediction, and the Pariſians were now filled with veneration and confidence in her; and it is ſaid, that the ſanctity of her life was rewarded with the power of working miracles, and that her reputation ſpread into the moſt diſtant countries. She died on the 3d of January, 512, at about ninety years of age, and was buried in the church of St. Peter and St. Paul, which at preſent bears the name of St. Genevieve.

GENGA (Girolmo) an eminent painter, was born at Urbino, and was the diſciple of Pietro Perugino, at the ſame time with Raphael. He particularly applied himſelf to architecture, and died in the year 1551, aged ſeventy-five.

GENGENBACH, a town of Germany, in the circle of Suabia, ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Straſburg, and twenty north of Friburgh. Long. 7. 45. E. Lat. 48. 30. N.

GENGISKHAN, one of the moſt celebrated conquerors that has appeared in the world, was born at Diloun, in 1154, and was the ſon of Piſouca, one of the khans of the Moguls. After his father's death, a conſpiracy of his ſubjects and neighbouring ſtates obliged him, at thirteen years of age, to retire to Avenk Unkhan, khan of the Tartars. Gengiſkhan at firſt met with a favourable reception, and performed very important ſervices for that prince; but at length finding that they reſolved to deſtroy him, he made his eſcape. Avenk Khan, and Schockoun his ſon, purſued him; but Genghiſkhan ſurpriſed and defeated their troops, which obliged them to retire for protection to the princes of Tartary, who put them to death. Genghiſkhan then raiſed a great army, and for twenty years together obtained ſignal victories over the Moguls and Tartars, and at length ſubdued all their tribes. In ſhort, after having founded one of the greateſt empires in the world, he died in 1226, at the age of ſeventy-two. Octui, his ſon, ſucceeded him in the kingdom of the Moguls; Zagathai, in that of Tranſoxana; and Tullican, in Choraſan, Perſia, and a part of the Indies. Bathou, the ſon of Giougio, their elder brother, who died before his father, poſſeſſed the countries of Alan, Rous, and Bulgar. He imitated the bravery of his grand-father, and conquered many provinces. His deſcendants were very powerful kings, till the reign of Tamerlane, who ſubdued their dominions. Mungo Khan, and Koblai Khan the ſon of Tulli Khan, made war on the Chineſe, whom they conquered. Koblai Khan was acknowledged emperor of China, in 1280, and ſince that time his deſcendants have reigned over that great empire.

GENGOUX le Royal, a town of France in Burgundy, remarkable for its good wines. It is ſeated at the foot of a mountain, near the river Grone, twenty miles north-weſt of Macon, eighteen ſouth-weſt of Chalons, and one hundred and ſixty-five ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 33. E. Lat. 46. 40. N.

GENIAL Gods, among the pagans, certain deities who were ſuppoſed to preſide over generation. The genial gods, ſays Feſtus, were earth, air, fire, and water; ſometimes alſo the ſun and moon, with the twelve ſigns of the zodiac, were ranked in the number.

GENII, in the pagan worſhip, a kind of deities, or attendant ſpirits, of which each man was ſuppoſed to have two, one good and the other bad, who attended him from the cradle to the grave. Theſe were alſo named Preſtites, either from their ſuperintendance over human affairs, or becauſe they were ſuppoſed to carry the prayers of men to heaven, and intercede for them there. Among the Greeks, they were diſtinguiſhed by the name of Dæmons. The genii were repreſented under various figures, ſuch as thoſe of boys, girls, old men, and even ſerpents. Theſe images were crowned with plane-tree leaves, which was a tree conſecrated to the genii. The offerings preſented to them were wines and flowers, to which they joined incenſe, parched wheat, and ſalt.

GENIS, a town of Savoy, ſeated on the river Ghuler, twelve miles weſt of Chamberry, ſubject to the king of Sardinia. Long. 5. 30. E. Lat. 45. 40. N.

GENITAL Gods, Dii Genitales, in the Roman worſhip, the ſame with Indigetes. See Indigetes.

GENNADIUS, a famous prieſt of Marſeilles, in the fifth century, and not biſhop of that city, as ſome authors have repreſented him. He wrote, 1. a book on illuſtrious men, in which it is believed that ſome chapters have been added by a later hand. 2 A treatiſe, De Dogmatibus Eccleſiaſticis, which is to be found in the works of St. Auguſtin. Other works are alſo attributed to him. Gennadius was not of St. Auguſtin's ſentiments, with regard to grace and free will, for which reaſon many authors have repreſented him as a Semi-Pelagian.

GENOA, a city of Italy, and capital of a republic of that name. The ſituation is one of the moſt inconvenient, and yet one of the moſt beautiful of any city in Italy, and is ſeen to the greateſt advantage at the diſtance of a quarter of a league from the ſea; its ſtately buildings, which have gained it the name of Superb, forming a glorious amphitheatre, gradually riſing up the hill. This declivity, and the narrowneſs of the ſtreets, exclude the uſe of coaches in Genoa, every body contenting themſelves with going on foot, except the principal ladies, who are carried in chairs. To this narrowneſs of the ſtreets it is owing that this city takes up ſo little of the plain beneath it. Beſides, it is owing to this and the height of the houſes, that the ſun beams are not ſo exceſſive hot in ſummer, which contributes greatly to the healthfulneſs of the city.

The ſtreets are exceedingly well paved, and in ſome parts with free-ſtone. Their having no carriages contributes greatly to the cleanlineſs of the ſtreets; beſides, every thing that may ſerve for manure is carefully gathered up and taken away. In the ſuburbs of Pietro d'Arena, where the breadth of the ſtreets admits of all ſorts of wheel carriages, the poor people carefully pick up all the horſe and mule dung they meet with.

Moſt of the houſes are flat-roofed, or at leaſt have a gallery on the top. The roofs are moſtly covered with lavagna, a ſtone very much reſembling ſlate; and theſe areas, which are planted with orange trees, form a ſort of hanging gardens, which have a very pretty effect.

Out of the rocks projecting into the ſea, have been made ſeveral baſtions, in ſome places two or three behind each other, and the length of theſe fortifications, with the lower town, is not much leſs than three miles. The number of guns mounted on all the works, for the defence of the city, is little leſs than five hundred. Genoa on the land ſide is fortified with a double wall: the outermoſt of which is alſo the neweſt, and extends beyond the hill; it begins at the fanal, or light-houſe, and terminates at the river Biſagno. It is ten Italian miles in circumference, and ſuch is the inequality of the country, that it takes up three hours to ride round it. This wall is of too great an extent to be of any conſiderable ſervice, unleſs to keep out the banditti.

When travellers enter the city, they muſt deliver up their fire-arms, but for a piece of money they may have them again directly, for now they may walk about every where, and view what they pleaſe. The weſt ſide of the city is watered tered with the river Bonzevera, and on the oppoſite ſide runs the Biſagno, with a bridge over both.

The harbour of Genoa is large, but not very ſafe, and to fence it farther from the ſouth wind would make the entrance too narrow. By the late additions to the mole it is now nine hundred paces in length. On the right hand, near the light-houſe, is alſo a new mole, which projects ſeven hundred and ſeventy-four common paces into the ſea, and is defended by huge fragments of rock. It is incredible what ſums this mole muſt have coſt. In the middle of the harbour, at a place called the Royal Bridge, is a convenient watering-place for ſhips, to which the water is conveyed by pipes from the mountains. Within this harbour is the wet dock for the gallies of the republic, which formidable fleet as it was formerly, is now reduced to ſix gallies, which ſerve to fetch them wine and corn, and to give the ladies an airing. The complement of the largeſt gallies is from ſixty to an hundred ſoldiers, and three hundred and twenty rowers, five or ſix on a bench, which alſo ſerves them for a bed. The wet dock abounds with Turkiſh ſlaves, who are generally of a ſurly fierce aſpect, to which their long whiſkers do not a little contribute. Their garb is a long cloak with a cowl to it, like that of a capuchin. Here they are at liberty; but in the city they are chained in couples, crying cheeſe, cotton, cloth, &c. They alſo keep tippling-houſes and little ſhops, their officers giving them encouragement by advancing them ſmall ſums of money, with which, in their trips to Marſeilles, Corſica, and other places, they buy knick-knacks, and ſell them again for a good profit at Genoa. At night there are none of them to be abſent, for they are muſtered and locked up every evening. Their common employment is knitting woollen ſtockings and caps. The rowers are of three claſſes, 1. volunteers, who hire themſelves for a certain price; 2. criminals; and, 3. Barbary or Turkiſh ſlaves.

The faro, or light-houſe, is ſituated on a high fortified rock, on the weſt ſide of the harbour, near the ſuburbs of St. Pietro d'Arena, and is aſcended by one hundred and ſixty-ſix ſteps. On the top, towards the ſea, there is a lantern of thirty-ſix lamps. When a ſingle ſhip is deſcried from the light-houſe top, a ſingle ball is hung out; for two ſhips two balls, and ſo on till five; when there is a ſquadron, the ſignal is one ball and a flag.

The chief manufactures here are velvets and damaſks, beſides ſilk, ſtuffs, brocades, lace, gloves, ſweet-meats, fruits, oil, Parmeſan cheeſe, anchovies, and drugs from the Levant. The high price of commodities, and the incommodiouſneſs of the harbour, hinders their trade from flouriſhing ſo much as might otherwiſe be expected. The Engliſh have a conſul here, but no merchants are ſettled here as at Leghorn; but French proteſtants flock here, and are well received.

The Roman catholic inhabitants are computed at one hundred and fifty thouſand, and they are ſaid to be extremely cunning, induſtrious, and inured to hardſhip, above all the reſt of the Italians, which was likewiſe the character of the old Ligurians; and indeed it is no wonder, while the barrenneſs of the country continues, that the inhabitants ſhould not change, ſince there is nothing makes men ſharper, and ſets their hands and wits more at work than want. The Italian proverb ſays of the Genoeſe, that they have a ſea without fiſh, land without trees, men without faith, and women without modeſty. However, the police is here, in ſeveral points, on a much better footing than in many cities of Italy, and the ſtreets are ſo ſafe at night, that there is ſcarce a ſingle inſtance of a perſon being murdered by aſſaſſins or robbers. No perſon, except foreigners and the eight officers of ſtate, muſt be attended with above one footman, and ſhe muſt be a lady of conſiderable rank, who is allowed a page over and above, who muſt not exceed fourteen years of age. Every married lady is attended by a gentleman, who, in the ſtreets, walks before the chair, holds the holy water to her when ſhe comes into a church, and in all points acts like a lover. Some are not contented with one, but muſt have four or five, who are employed in different offices, her wit and beauty being rated in proportion to the number of theſe votaries. They all paſs under the denomination of Platonic lovers, and one would think, the huſband had nothing to fear from theſe familiarities; however, this cuſtom ſeems to be on the decline, ſince one of the Spinola family made it a part of the marriage-contract, that his wife ſhould have no Cizibeo, or Platonic gallant. The dreſs of the married ladies after the firſt year is black ſilk or velvet; for they have not the liberty of chooſing their own cloaths after the expiration of that term. While the ladies are young, they are generally ſhut up in a nunnery.

The nobility are divided in the old and new, and the former value themſelves infinitely above the latter; but with regard to public employments there is no difference, they being each entitled to enjoy the poſts of honour and profit. On the exchange the old have a walk to themſelves, neither the citizens nor the new nobility being allowed to mix with them.

The government of Genoa is ariſtocratical, and no affair of moment can be tranſacted without aſſembling the nobles. The doge lives in great outward ſplendor, but has nothing but the ſhadow of ſupremacy, and his office continues only two years; nor can he be elected again under five. A candidate for this high place muſt be always above fifty years of age. He reſides in a palace belonging to the republic, has eight ſenators appointed for his council, and has a guard of two hundred Germans. Their uniform is red, faced with blue. The bulk of the ſoldiery, which are compoſed of all nations, are cloathed in white, with blue facings. Their whole force conſiſts of five thouſand men. On the days when the doge goes in public proceſſion, he is dreſſed in crimſon velvet, and the ſenators, who follow him, in black. The ſtate palace where the doge reſides is an old mean building, and ſtands in the centre of the city. From the court a white marble ſtair-caſe leads to the great hall, where the doge is elected, and where foreign envoys have their audience. Here are ſix marble ſtatues of perſons, by whoſe liberality the public has been benefited; as alſo paintings of the republic's principal atchievements.

From the audience-room is a paſſage to the arſenal, over the door of which is the roſtrum of an ancient Roman ſhip. The arſenal contains twenty-five thouſand muſquets, the cuiraſſes of ſeveral Venetian ladies, who, in 1301, performed a cruſade to the Holy Land. In the Piazza Nuova, or the New Square, is a daily market for vegetables and other proviſions, Sundays not excepted. In January, there are here green peas, artichokes, melons, water-melons, and ſeveral ſorts of flowers.

The fineſt ſtreet is the Strada Nuova, which is twelve common paces in breadth. Among the palaces in this ſtreet, there are ten or twelve of remarkable beauty and magnificence. The firſt floor of theſe open into beautiful gardens and orangeries, which are ſtrongly ſupported by ſtone work, like the hanging gardens of the ancients. The Strada Nuova terminates at a ſquare, where the Negroni have a very handſome palace. The Strada Balbi is but little inferior to the former, and exceeds it in length and breadth. The principal ornaments of it are two palaces of the Balbi family, and the Jeſuits college, as alſo the palace of Durazzo, which is inconteſtably the fineſt private building of the whole city, and its furniture is anſwerable to its outward magnificence. Beſides the exquiſite paintings, there is in the third ſtory an open gallery, with beautiful urns for flowers, and here is a moſt charming garden, adorned with fountains and walks of orange and citron trees. The palace of prince Doria, near the light-houſe, has the ſame conveniencies, beſides fountains and images. From the ſecond ſtory, they paſs over a little bridge into another garden, laid out in a very agreeable variety along the acclivity of a hill, and on the top of it is a gigantic ſtatue of Jupiter, reſting his foot on a great dog. This laſt was a favourite one of the Dorias, and has a pompous epitaph to perpetuate his memory.

St. Pietro d'Arena, or the ſuburbs on the light-houſe ſide, is a moſt delightful place, full of gardens and ſummer-houſes. The Villa Imperiale has a ſucceſſive variety of the moſt elegant decorations, ſuch as beautiful hedges, eſpaliers, walks, and alleys of cypreſs trees, box, roſemary, vines, lemon, orange, and citron trees, as alſo fine ſtatues, canals, fountains, grottoes, an aviary, and a menagery.

The religious buildings are thirty-ſeven pariſh and twenty collegiate churches, ſeventeen convents, and two large hoſpitals. The church of Annonciada is one of the moſt beautiful and magnificent of the whole city. It abounds with fine ſculptures in marble, gilding, and painting; and, among the reſt, a moſt admirable communion-piece. The Jeſuits church is a good ſtructure, which, over the great altar, has an excellent painting of Reubens, repreſenting the circumciſion of Chriſt, where the emotions of tenderneſs in the woman ſtanding by are expreſſed to admiration. There are other paintings and ſtatues, which muſt give ſenſible pleaſure to connoiſſeurs. At the foot of the ſtairs of the Jeſuits college, are two large lions couchant in white marble. The court is ſurrounded with two lofty galleries, ſupported by a hundred pillars of marble, each of which coſt an hundred Genoeſe ſcudi.

Near the Jeſuits college is St. Anne's church, beautifully decorated with fine ſtucco, Florentine work, and marble ſculptures; but it is ſurpaſſed in all theſe things by the church of St. Cyr. In a chapel, on the left hand of the entrance into the cathedral, are pretended to be kept the bones of St. John Baptiſt, where thirty ſilver lamps are continually kept burning. The altar is ſupported by forty porphyry pillars, and over it is a painting by Vandyke. The greateſt curioſity of all is an emerald diſh, ſaid to be a preſent from the queen of Sheba to Solomon, and the ſame in which, they ſay, the paſchal lamb was laid, when our Saviour eat his laſt ſupper. It was given to this republic by Baldwin, king of Jeruſalem, in 1101. It is of a round figure, with an hexagonal rim, and is eight inches and a half in diameter, though but of one ſingle emerald.

St. Dominic's church is remarkable for its marble ornaments, and another of the ſame name, belonging to a nunnery, is well worth ſeeing. In coming from the Piazza Sarſano to St. Mary's church, one paſſes through a broad ſtreet, at the end of which is a ſtone bridge, which joins together two parts of the city formerly ſeparated by a deep valley. It conſiſts of one ſmall and three large arches, of ſuch a height as to be raiſed ten or twelve feet above ſeveral houſes of five or ſix ſtories, in ſuch a manner that it croſſes a large ſtreet. As the work above the key-ſtone of the bridge is at leaſt ten feet up to the pavement, the whole height muſt be equal to ten ſtories or ninety feet. The breadth of this bridge is forty feet, and the length about one hundred and ſeventy paces. The diameter of one of the arches beneath in the ſtreet is thirty common paces. It is a wonderful contrivance, built at the expence of one Sauli, who was alive not many years ago. The ſame family are founders of the church to which the bridge leads, in the frontiſpiece of which are the ſtatues of St. Peter and Paul. In the middle of this church are four ſtatues of a gigantic taſte, one of which repreſents St. Bartholomew as half flead. The high altar is ſplendidly adorned with bronze work, and the main cupola is of an extraordinary height, with three galleries of white marble on the outſide. The proſpect from the uppermoſt reaches to Corſica in clear weather.

The Benedictine nuns have an elegant church with fine paintings, a great deal of gilding, and a very exquiſite ſculpture in marble of the Aſſumption of the Virgin Mary, attended with a group of angels. In ſhort, moſt of the churches are remarkable for their fine ornaments of one kind or other. In the church of St. Philippo Nero, belonging to the fathers of the Oratory, they have a religious opera during the winter, every Sunday evening; and in the ſummer, theſe fathers permit gaming at cheſs, draughts, and billiards, in the garden, on the ſame day. After they have done, there is an oratorio, then an exhortation, and after all a ſolemn piece of muſic. In the church of St. Sebaſtian, belonging to the Auguſtine nuns, is a painting in freſco, wherein they fooliſhly pretend to repreſent God the Father in his glory, Jeſus Chriſt ſitting on his right hand, and the Virgin Mary on his left, and the Holy Ghoſt, in the ſhape of a dove, is hovering between the Father and the Son.

The chief hoſpital for the poor of the city of Genoa ſtands upon an eminence, and above two thouſand perſons, ſervants and officers included, are maintained in it. Here are ſeparate apartments, courts, galleries, bed-wards, and refectories, as alſo ſeparate ſeats in the church for the ſexes. This ſtands in the middle of the hoſpital. In the four ſleeping wards for the men, there are ſix hundred beds, each having a bed to himſelf. Boys likewiſe on this foundation are brought up to handicraft trades; and when they have a ſufficient knowledge of their buſineſs, they are allowed to go out in the world and ſeek their fortunes. They are employed in weaving, ſhoe-making, the woollen manufactory, and other trades requiſite for the ſupport of the hoſpital. In the evening, they are allowed time for diverſions. On the ſtair-caſe, and in the halls, are the ſtatues and buſtoes of thoſe who have given any conſiderable ſums to the hoſpital. It is obſervable, that no beggars are tolerated in this city.

It will not be improper to obſerve that the inns at Genoa afford but indifferent entertainment, and that it will be always beſt to make an agreement before hand. Their wine is none of the beſt, though they have it in ſealed bottles from the vaults of the republic. The landlord indeed cannot exact upon you with regard to the price; but then he will be ſure to exciſe you in other articles. There is no corn ſold in the markets, for which reaſon the bakers buy all they uſe from the public granaries.

GENSERIC, king of the Vandals in Spain, and a famous conqueror. He defeated Hermenric, king of the Swevians, and, in 428, croſſed into Africa, at the head of a powerful army, to the aſſiſtance of count Boniface; but this count becoming reconciled to the emperor, fought Genſeric, and was defeated. Genſeric afterwards defeated Aſpar, who had been ſent againſt him by the emperor Theodoſius the Younger. In 439, he took Carthage, obliged the emperor Valentinian III. to conclude a peace with him, and remained maſter of almoſt all Africa. Some time after, Valentinian being killed by Maximus, Eudoxia his widow, whom Maximus had obliged by force to marry him, called Genſeric into Italy, to revenge the death of her huſband. Genſeric immediately complied with this invitation, took Rome, plundered it for fourteen days together, and carried away immenſe treaſures, among which were the gold and ſilver veſſels, which the emperor Titus had taken from the temple of Jeruſalem. Eudoxia herſelf was carried captive into Africa, with her two daughters, Eudoxia the Younger and Placidia. Genſeric married the firſt to his ſon Huneric, and ſent the other, with her mother, to Conſtantinople. He afterwards perſecuted the Chriſtians, ravaged all the Weſt, invaded Illyrium, Peloponneſus, Greece, and many of the iſlands of the Archipelago, which he entirely ruined. The emperor Marcian not being ſtrong enough to reſiſt him, was obliged to diſſemble his reſentment. However, Leo, his ſucceſſor, in 468, raiſed an army of a hundred thouſand foot, and put to ſea in a fleet of one thouſand veſſels, under the conduct of Baſiliſcus; but that general being corrupted by Genſeric, the whole army periſhed. Genſeric died in 476.

GENTILESCHI (HORATIO) an eminent painter, born at Piſa, in Tuſcany, about the middle of the ſixteenth century. Having rendered himſelf famous at Florence, Rome, Genoa, and other parts of Italy, he went into Savoy, and from thence to France. At length, at the invitation of Charles I. he came to England, where that king appointed him lodgings in his court, allowed him a conſiderable ſalary, and employed him in his palace at Greenwich, and other public places. His moſt remarkable performances in England were the cielings of Greenwich and York-houſe; he alſo did a Lot with his two daughters, a Madona, and a Magdalen for king Charles all finely executed. His moſt admired piece abroad was the portico of cardinal Bentivoglio's palace at Rome. He made ſeveral attempts at portraits, but with little ſucceſs, his talent lying in hiſtory painting, with figures as big as the life. After twelve years ſtay in England, he died there at eighty-four years of age.

GENTILESCHI (ARTEMISIA) daughter of the former, was but little inferior to her father in hiſtory painting, and ſhe excelled him in portraits. She drew thoſe of ſome of the royal family, and many of the nobility of England, but ſpent the greateſt part of her life at Naples, where ſhe lived in great ſplendor, and was as famous all over Europe for her gallantry and love-intrigues, as for her ſkill in painting. She drew many hiſtory pieces as big as the life, the moſt celebrated of which was David holding the head of Goliah.

GENTILIS DE FOLIGNO, or GENTILIS DE GENTILIBUS, a learned phyſician, who wrote Commentaries on Avicenna, and other works which are eſteemed. He died at Foligno, the place of his birth, on the 12th of June, 1348.

GENTILIS (JOHN VALENTINE) a famous antitrinitarian, was born at Coſenza, in the kingdom of Naples, and left his country on account of religion, about the middle of the ſixteenth century, when he retired to Geneva, where ſeveral Italian families had already taken refuge. Among theſe there were ſome who objected to the terms Eſſence, Perſon, and Coeſſential, &c when applied to the Trinity. Gentilis engaged in theſe diſputes, and contributed not a little to the encouragement of theſe Arians. This occaſioned a confeſſion of faith's being drawn up by the Italian conſiſtory, on the 18th of May, 1558, to which Gentilis ſubſcribed, but nevertheleſs privately propagated his opinions, when the magiſtrates taking cognizance of the affair, threw him into priſon, and being convicted of having violated his ſubſcription, he preſented ſeveral wrirings in vindication of his ſentiments, and to appeaſe Calvin; but at length being forced to confeſs and abjure his opinions, he was condemned to make the amende honourable, to throw his writings into the fire with his own hands, and to engage not to ſtir out of the city without permiſſion, which being done, he was diſcharged from priſon a few days after; but notwithſtanding his oath not to leave the city without the permiſſion of the magiſtrates, he fled from Geneva, and travelled into Dauphiné and Savoy, and afterwards returned into the canton of Bern, where being known, he was again thrown into priſon, but made his eſcape, and fled to George Blandrata, a phyſician, and John Paul Alciatus, a Milaneſe, his friends and aſſociates, who were propagating their opinions in Poland; but the king publiſhing an edict, in 1566, againſt them, Gentilis retired into Moravia, and afterwards to Vienna, where hearing of the death of Calvin, he returned to the canton of Bern: but the bailiff who had formerly impriſoned him being ſtill in office, ſeized him on the 11th of June, 1666, and the cauſe being carried to the city of Bern, he was condemned to loſe his head, when he, it is ſaid, gloried in laying down his life for the honour of God the Father.

GENTILIS (ALBERICUS) a learned profeſſor of civil law, at Oxford. He left Italy with Matthew Gentilis, his father, who had embraced the proteſtant religion, and retired into England. He wrote three books, De Jure Belli, and other works, and died at London, on the 19th of June, 1608.

GENTILIS (SCIPIO) brother to the former, was alſo a celebrated civilian, and was born at Caſtello di Sangeneſio in Italy, in the year 1563. He was a child when his father forſook his wife and his native country, in order to enjoy the privilege of openly profeſſing the proteſtant religion, and was ſtolen from his mother, under the pretence of a walk, and carried to his father, who waited for him in a place of ſafety. He ſtudied at Tubingen, at Wirtemburg, and afterwards at Leyden, at length taught the civil law at Heidelburgh and at Altorf, and was counſellor at Nuremberg. His principal works are, 1. De Jure publico Populi Romani. 2. De Conjurationibus. 3. De Donationibus inter Virum & Uxorem. 4. De bonis Maternis & ſecundis Nuptiis. 5. De Juriſdictione. All theſe works are well written. He died in 1616.

and

GENTILLET (INNOCENT) an eminent civilian, born at Vienne, in Dauphiné, was preſident of the parliament at Grenoble, and was obliged to leave his country on account of religion. He publiſhed ſeveral works, among which are, The Trial of the Council of Trent, in which he proves that that council was contrary to the canons and the king's authority; and an Apology for the Proteſtant Religion, in Latin, the beſt edition of which is that of Geneva, in 1588, in octavo.

GEOFFROY (STEHEN FRANCIS) a celebrated phyſician, botaniſt, and chemiſt, born at Paris, on the 13th of February, 1672. After having finiſhed his ſtudies, he travelled into England, Holland, and Italy. In 1704, he received the degree of doctor of phyſic at Paris, and at length became profeſſor of chemiſtry, and phyſician of the Royal College. He was a member of the Royal Society of London, and of the Academy of Sciences. He wrote, 1. Several very curious Theſes in Latin, which were afterwards tranſlated into French. 2. An excellent Treatiſe, intitled Tractatus de Materia Medica, ſive de Medicamentorum ſimplicium, Hiſtoria, Virtute, Delectu, & Uſu, and died at Paris, on the 5th of January, 1731.

GEOFROI DE ST. OMER, in 1118, founded the order of Knights Templars, in conjunction with Hugh de Paganis and ſeven other perſons of his acquaintance.

GEORGE (St.) a famous martyr, who, it is ſaid, ſuffered for the Chriſtian faith under Carinus or Diocleſian, about the year 284, but no authentic account is to be found of the circumſtances of his life and martyrdom. See CHEDERLES.

GEORGE of Trebizond, a famous Greek, in the fifteenth century, born at Candia, of a family who came originally from Trebizond. He went to Rome in the time of Eugenius IV. where he taught rhetoric and Ariſtotle's philoſophy. He was ſecretary to pope Nicholas V. and died about the year 1480. He wrote ſeveral works, in which he diſcovers an extravagant zeal againſt Plato, and a ridiculous fondneſs for the opinions of Ariſtotle.

GEORGE AMIRA, a learned Maronite, went to Rome in the time of pope Clement VIII. and publiſhed a Syriac and Caldaic Grammar, which is eſteemed. At his return to his native country he was elected patriarch of the Maronites, and died about the year 1641.

GEORGE I. king of Great Britain, ſucceeded queen Anne, who dying on the firſt of Auguſt, 1714, the council gave orders that the elector of Hanover ſhould be proclaimed king; and he was crowned on the 11th of October following; his majeſty having firſt changed the miniſtry, and reſtored the duke of Marlborough to his former poſts. Mean while it ſoon appeared that James, the ſon of king James II. had a numerous party in Great Britain; for the earl of Mar, with ſeveral other noblemen and gentlemen, aſſembled at the Brae of Mar, and having on the 16th of September proclaimed the pretender king, their numbers ſoon encreaſed to twenty thouſand men. The earl of Derwentwater and Mr. Forſter alſo aſſembled their friends in Northumberland, and the latter proclaimed the pretender king at Warkworth. Mean while, the lord viſcount Kenmure headed ſome noblemen and others in the weſt of Scotland, and at the ſame time declared the pretender king at Moffat, in Annandale, and ſoon after joined Forſter on the borders of Scotland. At length Mackintoſh, Kenmure, and Forſter marched to Preſton in Lancaſhire; but the generals Wills and Carpenter, with nine regiments of dragoons, and one of foot, ſurrounded the place; when Forſter ſubmitting, delivered up all his men priſoners at diſcretion. In the mean time the pretender landed at Peterhead, and being conducted to Fetteroſe, was there proclaimed king. But the duke of Argyle having, in January 1716, obliged the rebels to abandon Perth, they retired to Montroſe, and the pretender privately eſcaped to France; upon which, Gordon, their general, conducted them into the mountains, where they diſperſed. Of the many who received ſentence of death on account of this rebellion, none were executed but the lords Derwentwater and Kenmure, with a ſmall number of the lower rank.

King George I. was thus ſettled on his throne, which he endeavoured to ſecure by the mildneſs of his government, and his ſtrict adherence to the laws. In 1718 war was declared againſt Spain, when ſir George Byng being ſent with twenty-one ſhips into the Mediterranean, defeated the Spaniſh fleet, on the 31ſt of July, and not only took ten men of war, and burnt four, but made the admiral and rear-admiral priſoners; and afterwards deſtroyed ſeven Spaniſh men of war, and a great quantity of naval ſtores on the coaſts of Sicily and Biſcay. In return, a Spaniſh ſquadron with ten thouſand regular troops was ſent in December, under the duke of Ormond, to invade England; but were diſperſed by a violent ſtorm. However, the marquiſs of Tullibardine, and the earls of Marſchal and Seaforth landed in Scotland, and were joined by two thouſand Highlanders; but were entirely defeated on the 10th of June, by general Wightman, with one thouſand two hundred men. The lord Cobham then made a deſcent on the coaſt of Spain, and took Vigo.

But in 1727, his majeſty going to viſit his German dominions, was taken ill in his coach on the road to Hanover, and died two days after, at his brother's palace at Oſnabrug, on the 11th of June, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign, and was interred at Hanover. He was ſucceeded by his only ſon George II.

GEORGE II. king of Great Britain. As George I. died abroad, the court did not hear of his death till the 14th of June, 1727, and the next morning George II. was proclaimed king, and on the 11th of October his majeſty, with Caroline his queen, were crowned at Weſtminſter. The nation was then at war with the Spaniards; but in 1729 a peace was concluded at Seville, between Great Britain, France, and Spain. This ſtate of tranquillity laſted till the year 1739, when war was again declared againſt Spain, on the 29th of October; and on the 22d of November, 1740, admiral Vernon, with only ſix ſhips, took Porto Bello: but being ſent the next year with twenty-nine ſhips of the line, and ten thouſand ſoldiers under the command of general Wentworth, to attack Carthagena, though he deſtroyed ſix Spaniſh ſhips of the line, and ſeven galleons, the attempt miſcarried, through a diſagreement which aroſe between the admiral and the general. In 1740 commodore Anſon ſailed from England, and after his men had ſuffered the moſt dreadful diſtreſſes, ſurpriſed and took Paita, on the coaſt of the South Sea, on the 12th of November, 1741, and having plundered and burnt the town, and taken many Spaniſh ſhips, he, in his return by the way of the Eaſt Indies, took the Manilla galleon loaded with treaſure; and having encompaſſed the globe, arrived in England in 1744, with the riches he had acquired from the Spaniards, amounting to about four hundred thouſand pounds.

His majeſty alſo powerfully ſupported the queen of Hungary's ſucceſſion to the hereditary dominions of her late father the emperor Charles VI. and at length both England and France under the name of auxiliaries to the contending powers, became principals in the war: when George II. not only furniſhed ſixteen thouſand Britiſh troops, but headed the allied army in perſon, accompanied by the duke of Cumberland, and a battle was fought at Dettingen, on the 16th of July, 1743, in which his Britannic majeſty had the honour of the field. The duke of Cumberland was wounded in the action. In 1744 war was declared againſt France, and the next year the people of New England, aſſiſted by ten men of war under commodore Warren, took Cape Breton, with the loſs of only an hundred men: but it was afterwards changed for Madraſs.

On the 27th of July, 1745, the young pretender came to Scoland, in a ſmall frigate, and ſoon obtaining a conſiderable force, had his father proclaimed king, while he himſelf aſſumed the title of prince-regent. He took ſeveral places, gained ſome advantages over the king's forces, and advanced into the heart of England; but at length the duke of Cumberland marching againſt him, he made a precipitate retreat, and the duke coming to an engagement near Culloden-houſe, obtained a complete victory, in which about one thouſand four hundred of the rebels were killed, wounded, and taken priſoners, though the royal army had only ſixty men killed, and two hundred and eighty wounded. Among the priſoners were the earl of Kilmarnock, lord Lovat, lord Balmerino, and Mr. Radcliffe, brother to the earl of Derwentwater, who were afterwards beheaded on Tower-hill.

At length a general peace was proclaimed in London, on the 2d of February, 1749, and ſoon after the Engliſh made a ſtrong ſettlement in Nova Scotia, where they built the town of Halifax; but the French, by immediately attempting to deſtroy that ſettlement, and by erecting forts on the back of the Britiſh colonies in North America, broke the peace, and obliging the Engliſh to defend themſelves, brought on ſeveral engagements that were attended with various ſucceſs. In the mean time the French landed ſixteen thouſand men in the iſland of Minorca, which was defended by general Blakeney. His majeſty declared war againſt France on the 17th of May, 1756, and ſent admiral Byng with a ſtrong fleet to the relief of Minorca; but he neglecting to fulfil his inſtructions, the place was loſt, and he was tried and ſhot at Portſmouth. During theſe tranſactions Mr. Clive, one of the Eaſt India company's clerks, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Eaſt Indies, obtaining the the rank of colonel, and had ſuch amazing ſucceſs, that all the towns and factories of the French on the coaſt of Coromandel, except Pondicherry, were in a few years taken by the Engliſh. On the other hand, in 1758, the duke of Marlborough landing near St. Maloes in France, burnt many ſhips, with a great quantity of naval ſtores. Lieutenant general Bligh and captain How took Cherburgh, and demoliſhed its fortifications. Soon after captain Marſh took Senegal, and commodore Keppel the iſland of Goree, on the coaſt of Africa. On the 26th of July, cape Breton was retaken by general Amherſt and admiral Boſcawen. Soon after fort Frontenac ſurrendered to lieutenant-general Bradſtreet, and fort du Queſne to general Forbes. On the firſt of May, 1759, the iſland of Guadeloupe ſurrendered to the Engliſh; in the ſame month Marigalante, Santos, and Deſeada became ſubject to Great Britain: the ſame year general Wolf, aſſiſted by the fleet, took Quebec; and on the 8th of September, Montreal and all Canada ſubmitted to the Engliſh. After theſe glorious conqueſts, his majeſty, to the inexpreſſible grief of his people, died at Kenſington, on the 25th of October, in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age, and the thirty-fourth of his reign, and the next day his grandſon George III. was proclaimed king.

GEORGE (FORT ST.) otherwiſe called Madraſs; and by the natives Chinapatam; is a town of Aſia, on the coaſt of Coromandel in India, on this ſide the Ganges. It is a colony belonging to the Engliſh Eaſt India company, ſeated in a very incommodious place. It fronts the ſea, which continually rolls impetuouſly on its ſhore, and its foundation is in a ſandy ſoil, with a ſalt-water river on the back of it, which hinders the rivulets of freſh water from coming near the town; ſo that they have no water fit to drink within a mile. The ſea often threatens deſtruction on one ſide, and the river, in the rainy ſeaſon, inundations on the other. The ſun from April to September is ſo intolerably hot, that if it were not for the ſea breezes, which refreſh it a little, there would be no living there. The ſoil about the town is ſo dry and ſandy, that it bears no corn, though by the help of manure there are fruits and garden ſtuff for the uſe of the factory.

The wars in 1689 between the Engliſh and the mogul's ſubjects, cauſed fort St. George to be better inhabited, for the peaceable Indian merchants came flocking hither as a place of ſafety, and to be near the diamond mines of Golconda! The black merchants reſorted hither to ſecure their fortunes, and to bring their goods to a ſafe market, which, in time, rendered it populous and rich, notwithſtanding its natural inconveniences.

The town is divided into two parts, that where the Europeans dwell is called the White Town, and is walled quite round, having ſeveral baſtions and bulwarks to defend its walls, which can only be attacked at the ends, the ſea and river fortifying the ſides. It is about four hundred paces long, and one hundred and fifty broad, and is divided into pretty regular ſtreets, and the fort ſtands near the centre. There are two churches, one for the Engliſh, and the other for the Romiſh ſervice, both which are ſuperintended by the governor. There is likewiſe a very good hoſpital, and neat ſtables for the company's horſes. But the old college, where a great many of the gentlemen factors are obliged to lodge, is not very elegant.

They have a town-hall, and underneath it are priſons for debtors. They are a corporation, and have a mayor and aldermen, which were choſen by the free-burghers of the town, but now they are put in by the governor and his council. They carry on the formality of a court, with maces and officers, but money will turn the ſcale of juſtice either way; for the governor has a great influence in the determination of cauſes. They could not formerly puniſh with death, unleſs in caſes of piracy; but there are inſtances of ſome former governors having ſtretched their power to a very ſhameful degree. The common way of treating criminals is by whipping and ſtarving, and by a late order they can now puniſh capitally.

The Black Town, which is the other part of Madraſs, is inhabited by Gentoos, Mahommedans, Portugueſe and Armenian Chriſtians, where each religion have their public places of worſhip, and every one follows his proper employment. The governor has the rule of both towns, and all affairs belonging to the company are managed by him and the council. One of the gates of the town looks towards the ſea, for which reaſon it is called the ſea-gate. The company hath a mint where bullion, which comes from England and other countries, is coined into rupees, and brings them in a good revenue. They are ſtamped with characters declaring the mogul's name, the year of his reign, and ſome of his epithets. The gold is coined into pagodas of ſeveral denominations and value.

The diamond mines are but a week's journey from Fort St. George, which renders them pretty plentiful there. However, there are but few great ſtones brought to market ſince that great diamond purchaſed by Mr. Pitt. They trade from hence to all parts to the eaſt of the Cape of Good Hope; but the greateſt ſhips go to Mocha in Arabia, Gombroon in Perſia, and Surat, on the weſtern ſide of the ſame peninſula, in India, on which Fort St. George is ſeated; to which they carry Bengal and Chineſe commodities, and touch by the way on the Malabar coaſt, to take in pepper, cocoa-nuts, and ſeveral other commodities. And as none of the ſalaries of the company's ſervants are large, and thoſe of the underlings very ſmall, they know how to get money by trading for themſelves, even not excepting the two clergymen; for they all become rich in a ſhort time, unleſs they are guilty of miſmanagement. Beſides, they all live in a very plentiful manner, and paſs their time very agreeably with variety of diverſions. As for the governor he lives in great ſtate and ſplendor, and has guards and attendants when ever he appears publicly abroad, with bands of the country muſic playing before him.

The European commodities which ſell beſt here are lead, wine, beer in caſks or bottles, ale, cyder, cheeſe, hats, ribbons, gold and ſilver lace, thread and worſted ſtockings, flint-glaſs ware, looking-glaſſes, wigs, ſtuffs for cloaths, trimming, caſes of ſpiritous liquors and cordials, tin ware, pipes, and all ſorts of haberdaſhery ware. In return for which they may purchaſe any of the commodities of China and the Indies, for they are all brought to this market.

The houſes of the White Town are built with brick, and have flat roofs covered with plaiſter, made with ſea-ſhells, which no rain can penetrate; and as they are ſurrounded with battlements, they ſerve to take the freſh air upon in the morning and evening. Before the doors there are a ſort of porticoes, and rows of trees planted. The ſoldiers lodge in a barrack, which ſtands over againſt the weſt gate of the fort; and at one end of this is the mint. In this part there are not above one hundred and twenty houſes.

The Black Town is much the largeſt, being above a mile and a half in circumference, and has brick walls ſeventeen feet thick on the land ſide, fortified with baſtions. The river is on the weſt, and the ſea on the eaſt, and on the north there is a channel cut from the river to the ſea; which would render it very ſtrong with a proportionable garriſon. At the mouth of the river there is a bar, which they are obliged to cut every year before the wet ſeaſon, to prevent the country from being laid under water. There are a few brick houſes in the Black Town, but the reſt are built with clay and thatched, and have no windows to the ſtreet, nor no furniture, but the mats and carpets which they lie on. However, they endeavour to imitate the Turkiſh houſes, by having a little ſquare or court in the middle, into which all the windows look. And before the door they have a portico, or rather a ſhed, ſuppo ted by pillars, where the owners ſit croſs-legged morning and evening to tranſact buſineſs. The rooms are ſmall, and ſix or ſeven people ſleep in one of them. Long. 80. 33. E. Lat. 13. 13. N.

GEORGE's (ST.) DEL MINA, the capital of the Dutch ſettlements on the Gold Coaſt of Guinea, in Africa. The Dutch took it from the Portugueſe, with ſeveral more, and expelled them from the coaſt in 1630. Long. 0. 15. W. Lat. 5. 20. N.

GEORGE's (ST.) the largeſt of the Bermudas, or Summer Iſlands, lying about five hundred miles eaſt of the continent of America. Long. 65. 10. W. Lat. 32. 30. N.

GEORGIA, a large country in Aſia, the Ancient Iberia, is bounded by Circaſſia and Degheſtan on the north, by the Caſpian Sea on the eaſt, by Armenia or Turcomania on the ſouth, and by Mingrelia on the weſt. The greateſt part, which is the eaſtern, was tributary to Perſia; but there has been ſo many revolutions in that country of late, that it is hard to ſay how affairs ſtand at preſent.

The climate of this country is ſoft, not differing much from that of Italy, and extends from forty-one to forty-four degrees of latitude. Teflis is near the centre of Lower Georgia, and the Upper Georgia ſtretches towards the Black Sea. It is almoſt ſurrounded with mountains, and abounds in woods. There are alſo ſome fertile plains. They till their lands with buffaloes and oxen, and as they plough deep, their crops are abundant. Their religion is a mixture of the Greek and Armenian, and contains abundance of abſurd ceremonies. When a Georgian dies without leaving much money behind him, they take two or three of his vaſſal's children, and ſell them to the Mahometans to pay the Greek biſhop, who has one hundred crowns for one maſs for the dead.

The men are remarkably tall, robuſt, and well made, oſtentacious, and fond of a ſplendid appearance. The women are celebrated for their beauty all over Aſia; but they have ſome cuſtoms which are naſty, and take off from their charms. However, they are much ſought after by the Turks and Perſians, who purchaſe them to fill their ſeraglios; inſomuch, that the moſt handſome among them are generally carried off while they are very young. In general they are all very civil to travellers, and provifions may be purchafed at a very low rate. Thefe people did not fubmit to Alexander the Great, but Pompey conquered them, and reduced them to a Roman province. Acropolis, then the capital, is fuppofed to be the fame as Teflis, which is a large and well built city, and the houfes are built with brick. The citadel is in the centre, built on an eminence very difficult of acceſs, and at the foot of it runs the river Kura, formerly the Cyrus.

GEORGIA, an Engliſh colony in North America, to the ſouth of Carolina, and ſeparated from it by the river Savannah. It is bounded by the Atlantic ocean on the eaſt, by the river of St. John on the ſouth, and on the weſt by Louiſiana. The river of St. John lies in thirty degrees twenty-one minutes north latitude. The land of Carolina is low near the ſea, and covered with wood, but begins to riſe into hills at twenty-five miles diſtance, terminating in mountains which run from north to ſouth through Georgia, ending in the bay of Apalachee, in the gulph of Mexico. But from theſe to the ſea the country is quite level and plain. The Savannah is navigable ſix hundred miles for canoes, and three hundred for boats, and the coaſt of Georgia is defended from the fury of the ocean by a range of iſlands which run parallel to it; and both the iſlands and the continent being well wooded, the channel between them is extremely pleaſant. There are ſand banks upwards of ſeventy miles from the coaſt of Georgia, and the water ſhoals gradually till within ſix miles of the land; where the ſand banks are ſo ſhallow, that they hinder any nearer approach, except in the channels which lie between the ſhallows. Theſe were thought a ſufficient defence againſt an enemy's ſhips, but the Spaniards found means to paſs them, and attack the iſland of St. Simon, in 1742; which had been loſt with the town of Frederica, if general Oglethorpe had not defeated their deſign. When ſhips have paſſed the bars they meet with a commodious and ſecure harbour, in the mouth of the river Savannah; as alſo in that to the ſouth of it, called Toky Sound, where there is room to anchor a large fleet, in ten to fourteen fathoms water. This harbour is land-locked, and there is a ſafe paſſage through the bar, where the tides, as on the reſt of the coaſt, generally flow ſeven feet. There are ſeveral towns built in Georgia by the truſtees of this colony, particularly that of Savannah, on the banks of the river ſo called, and Ebenezer on the ſame river. Frederica is in the iſland of St. Simon, at the mouth of the river Alatamaha; and there are ſeveral forts for the ſecurity of the iſland and the adjacent country.

GEPPING, an imperial city of Germany, in Suabia, and duchy of Wirtemburg, upon the river Wills. It is twenty-three miles eaſt of Stutgard, twelve ſouth-weſt of Germund, and twenty-three north-weſt of Ulm. Long. 9. 35. E. Lat. 48. 24. N.

GERA, a town of Germany in Miſnia, in Upper Saxony, and ſeated on the river Elſter, with a handſome college. It was ravaged by the Bohemians in 1449. Long. 13. 35. E. Lat. 51. 10. N.

GERARD THOM, or rather GERARD TENQUE, founder, and firſt grand maſter of the order of St. John of Jeruſalem, was born in the Iſle of Martigues, in Provence. He had the management of the hoſpital, for the ſupport of poor pilgrims in 1080, and in 1100 founded the above order. He died about the year 1121.

GERARD LE GRAND, or GROOT, a famous divine in the fourteenth century, founder of the order of Regular Clerks, was born at Deventer, and ſtudied at the Sorbonne. At his return to his native country he was made canon of Utrecht, and afterwards of Aix la Chapple; but quitted that benefice, and inſtituted a community of clerks to educate youth in piety and learning. He acquired great reputation by his writings and ſermons, and died on the 20th of Auguſt, 1384, aged forty-four. There are ſtill very famous communities of Regular Clerks at Cologne, Weſel, and other places, in which his rule is ſtrictly obſerved.

GERARD (JOHN) a famous Lutheran divine, born at Quedlimberg, in 1582, he taught divinity in Jena with reputation, and died in 1637. He wrote a great number of works, the principal of which are, 1. Common Places of Divinity. 2. The Catholic Confeſſion. 3. The Harmony of the Four Goſpels. 4. Commentaries on Geneſis, Deuteronomy, on the Epiſtles of St. Paul and the Revelations, &c.

He ought not to be confounded with John Gerard, another learned Lutheran, profeſſor of divinity, and rector of the academy of Jena, the place of his birth, who wrote, 1. The Harmony of the Eaſtern Languages. 2. A Treatiſe on the Coptic Church, and other works which are eſteemed, and died on the 24th of February, 1668, aged fifty-ſeven.

GERARD (CHARLES) earl of Macclesfield, gentleman of the bed-chamber to king Charles II. and captain of his majeſty's horſe-guards, was deſcended from the ancient family of Geraldine, or Fitzgerald in Ireland, and was created baron of Brandon, in the twenty-firſt year of Charles I. He raiſed a regiment of foot and a troop of horſe for that prince in the civil war, fought in many battles with the ardour of a volunteer, and at the ſame time diſplayed all the conduct of a veteran, and particularly ſignalized himſelf in Wales, where he took the fortreſſes of Cardigan, Emblin, Langhorne, and Roche, as alſo the ſtrong town of Haverfordweſt, with the caſtles of Picton and Carew. He had two brothers and ſeveral uncles, who had commands in the royal army. He was created earl of Macclesfield, by king Charles II. in 1679. and died on the 7th of January 1693-4.

GERARDE (JOHN) a ſurgeon in London, and the greateſt botaniſt of his time, was many years chief gardener to lord Burleigh, who was himſelf a great lover of plants, and had the beſt collection of any nobleman in the kingdom: among theſe were many exotics, introduced by Gerarde. In 1597 he publiſhed his Herbal, which was printed at the expence of J. Norton, who procured the figures from Frankfort. In 1633 Thomas Johnſon, an apothecary, publiſhed an improved edition of Gerarde's book, which met with ſuch approbation by the univerſity of Oxford, that they conferred on him the degree of doctor of phyſic, and it is ſtill much eſteemed. The deſcriptions in this Herbal are plain and familiar; and both theſe authors have laboured more to make their readers underſtand the characters of the plants, than to inform them, that they underſtood Greek and Latin.

GERAW, a town of Germany, in the electoral circle of the Rhine, and ſeated in the landgravate of Darmſtadt, between Darmſtadt and Mayence. Long 8. 16. E. Lat. 49. 50. N.

GERBAIS (JOHN) a famous doctor of the Sorbonne, and a learned civilian, was born at Rupois, a village in the dioceſe of Rheims, in 1626. He was made doctor in 1661, profeſſor of eloquence in the Royal College in 1662, and at length principal of the college of Rheims. He wrote ſeveral works in Latin and French, the principal of which are, 1. A Treatiſe De Cauſis Majoribus; 2. A Treatiſe on the Power of Kings over Marriage, &c. He died on the 14th of April, 1699, aged ſeventy.

GERBERON (GABRIEL) a famous Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, was born at St. Calez in Maine, in 1628. He taught divinity in his order, and defended Janſenius with ſuch ſpirit, that in 1682, the French king ordered him to be arreſted in the abbey of Corbie, of which he was ſuperior; but making his eſcape, he retired into Holland. Some time after, going into Flanders, he was ſeized there in 1703, and condemned by the archbiſhop of Malines. He was afterwards confined in the citadel of Amiens, and then in the caſtle of Vincennes, and in 1710, was put into the hands of the ſuperior of his convent, who ſent him to the abbey of St. Denis in France, where he died on the 29th of March, 1711, aged eighty-three. He publiſhed editions of Marius Mercator, St. Anſelm, Baius, and ſeveral other works, which have made a great noiſe.

GERBEROY, a ſmall town in France. It was taken by the Engliſh in 1437, and retaken by the French in 1449, by aſſault. It is ten miles from Beauvais, forty-three north of Paris. Long. 1. 47. E. Lat. 49. 35. N.

GERBEVILLIERS, a ſmall town in Lorrain, five miles from Luneville, with the title of marquis, and a handſome caſtle. The church of the Carmelites, in which are the tombs of the marquiſſes, is very handſome.

GERBI, or ZERBI, an iſland of Africa in the kingdom of Tunis, upon the coaſt of Barbary. It bears no corn but barley, but there are abundance of figs and grapes, which they trade with when dried. On the coaſt there is a tree called lotus by the ancients, which bears a fruit the ſize of a bean, and as yellow as ſaffron. It is of an exquiſite taſte, and was highly eſteemed by the Greeks. Gerbi is ſubject to the baſhaw of Tripoli, ſince the Turks drove the duke of Alba from thence. Long. 1. 30. E. Lat. 34. 10. N.

GERBIER (Sir BALTHAZAR) a painter of Antwerp, born in the year 1592. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by painting ſmall figures in diſtemper; and king Charles I. was ſo pleaſed with his performances, that he invited him to his court, where he obtained the eſteem of the duke of Buckingham, who recommended him ſo zealouſly to his majeſty, that he was not only knighted, but ſent to Bruſſels, where he long reſided as agent for the king of Great Britain.

GERENDODE, a ſmall town of Germany, in Upper Saxony, and the principality of Anhalt, with a nunnery for ladies.

GERGENTI, a town of Italy in Sicily, with a caſtle and a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated in the valley of Mazara, near the river St. Blaiſe, ſixty miles eaſt-by-ſouth of Mazara, and fifty ſouth of Palermo. Long. 13. 56. E. Lat. 37. 23.

GERING (ULRIC) a celebrated German printer, was invited with Martin Crantz, and Michael Friburger, by the doctors of the Sorbonne at Paris, to introduce the art of printing into that houſe. To this they agreed, and the firſt impreſſions of ſeveral works were printed there, about the year 1470. Ulric Gering, having amaſſed great wealth, gave conſiderable ſums for the ſupport of learning in the Sorbonne, and having founded the college of Montaign, died on the 23d of Auguſt, 1510.

GERMAIN (St.) biſhop of Auxerre, was born in that city of noble parents, about the year 380. He ſtudied in Gaul and at Rome, where he obtained ſuch proficiency in the civil law, that he was eſteemed the greateſt civilian of his time. He had afterwards the government of the city of Auxerre, and the command of the troops of the country. Theſe poſts he diſcharged with ſuch wiſdom and integrity, that after the death of St. Amateur he was thought worthy to ſucceed him; and, notwithſtanding, his oppoſition he was raiſed to the ſee of Auxerre, on the 7th of July 418. He then gave all his wealth to the church, and practiſed the moſt auſtere virtues. In 429, the biſhops of Gaul ſent him with St. Lupus, biſhop of Troyes, into England, to oppoſe the opinions of Pelagius and Celeſtius; and ſome time after he made a ſecond voyage thither, for the ſame purpoſe, when we are told, that his miſſion was diſtinguiſhed by God's giving him the power of working miracles. He died at Ravenna on the 31ſt of July, 448 or 449, at about ſeventy years of age.

GERMAIN (St.) biſhop of Paris, and one of the moſt celebrated prelates of the ſixth century, was born at Autun. He ſucceeded Euſebius in the ſee of Paris, in 555, and king Childebert I. made him his arch-chaplain, or grand almoner. He founded a monaſtery in the church of St. Vincent, erected at Paris by Childebert, which has taken the name of St. Germain des Prés, and died on the 28th of May, 576.

GERMAIN (THOMAS) a celebrated goldſmith, and learned artiſt, was born at Paris on the 19th of Auguſt 1674, and was the ſon of the king's gold-ſmith, who was one of the moſt able artiſts of his time. He went to Rome in 1688, to perfect himſelf in his art, and left in various cities of Italy goldſmith's work that raiſed the admiration of the curious. On his return to France, in 1704, he worked with the ſame applauſe, and was employed by the cathedral churches, and the ſeveral princes of Europe, for whom he performed many excellent works. He died at Paris on the 14th of Auguſt, 1748.

GERMAIN (LAVAL) a town of France in le Forez. It is ſeated in a place where there is plenty of good wines, two hundred and twenty-ſeven miles ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 57. E. Lat. 45. 50. N.

GERMAIN DE BOURGUIEL, a ſmall town of France, in Anjou, with an abbey of Benedictine monks, and a caſtle. Long. 0. 17. E. Lat. 47. 20. N.

GERMAINS EN LAYE, a town and royal palace in France, and one of the pleaſanteſt ſeats belonging to that monarch, as well for the beauty of the apartments, as the gardens, which join to a foreſt. This was the place of abode of king James, after the Revolution. Charles V. of France laid the foundation in 1370, and it was afterward taken by the Engliſh in the reign of Charles VI. It was rebuilt by Henry IV. who added that part which ſtands on the top of a hill, near the river. He extended the gardens as far as the river, and made the terrace walk, which is two miles and a half long. It was embelliſhed with variety of ornaments by Lewis XIII. as alſo by Lewis XIV. who added five large pavillions to the old palace, and made ſeveral viſtoes through the foreſt.

The town is ten miles from Paris, in the ſame ſituation as the palace, and is but ſmall, but very populous. The houſes are high and well built, and the ſtreets are large and open. There are likewiſe ſome noblemen's ſeats here. It is but a ſingle pariſh, and yet has a convent and a nunnery. That of the bare-legged Auguſtines is in the middle of the foreſt. The view of the palace from the ſide of the river was very beautiful, and the foreſt is full of deer, which renders it a delightful place for hunting. Long. 2. 5. E. Lat. 48. 52. N.

GERMANICUS (CÆSAR) was the ſon of Druſus and Antonia, niece to Auguſtus. He was adopted by Tiberius, his father's brother, and declared conſul in the year 12. Two years after, being informed of the death of Auguſtus in Germany, he refuſed the empire, which the army would have conferred on him, and calmed the minds of thoſe who were ready to revolt. He at length defeated the enemy, and entered Rome in triumph. In the year 18, Germanicus was ſent into the Eaſt to appeaſe the diſturbances there: he conquered the king of Armenia, and reduced Cappadocia into a province; but Tiberius being jealous of the glory of this young prince, who was beloved by the Roman people, cauſed him to be poiſoned at Antioch, by Piſo, governor of Syria, in the year 19, at the age of thirty-four. He married Agrippina, the daughter of Auguſtus, by whom he had nine children. Nero, Druſus, Caligula, Agrippina, Druſilla, and Livia, the three others died young. Germanicus compoſed ſeveral works, of which there are remaining a tranſlation in Latin verſe, of the Phænomena of Aratus, and ſome epigrams.

GERMANO (ST.) a town of Italy in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Terra-di-Lavoro, at the foot of Mount Caſſano. It belongs to the abbey of Caſſano. Long. 13. 53. E. Lat. 41. 33. N.

GERMANS (ST.) a town in Cornwal, which ſends two members to parliament, though now it is a decayed village. It has a very ſmall market on Fridays, and two fairs, on May 28, and Auguſt 1, for horſes, oxen, ſheep, and a few hops. The returning officer is choſen at a court-leet of the lord of the manor. It had once a biſhop's palace, ſome of the ruins of which are ſtill to be ſeen, a mile and a half from the town. The pariſh is the largeſt in Cornwal, including no leſs than ſeventeen villages. The members of parliament are choſen by the houſe-keepers, who have lived a year within the borough, which contains about ſixty houſes, built on a rock, and are very mean and poor. It is eight miles weſt of Plymouth, and twenty ſouth of Launceſton.

GERMANY, is a large country ſeated in the middle of Europe, having Hungary and Poland on the eaſt; the Baltic Sea and Denmark on the north; the Low Countries, France, and Switzerland on the weſt; and the Alps, Italy, and part of Switzerland on the ſouth. It lies in between five and nineteen degrees of eaſt longitude, and forty-ſix and fifty-five degrees of latitude, being about ſix hundred and forty miles in length, and five hundred and fifty in breadth. The air is ſalubrious and temperate, rather cold than hot, eſpecially along the ſea-ſhore. The ſoil is very fit for corn and paſture, and the parts near the Rhine produce plenty of wine. Beſides theſe there are oil, ſheep, black cattle, horſes fit for the coach or army, flax, hemp, and abundance of good timber; nor muſt we forget their bacon-hams, beer, and mum; nor yet their iron, copper, lead, ſilver, pit-coal, vitriol, quickſilver, nitre, oker, and ſulphur. They have the beſt medicinal ſprings and baths of Europe, as at Pyrmont, Baden, Aix-la-Chappelle, and other places. They have alſo deer, fiſh, and fowls, and their orchards are full of the beſt fruits. The people are excellent mechanics and chemiſts; and the invention of printing and gun-powder in theſe parts of the world is aſcribed to them. They have brought clocks, watches, fire-arms, and ſwords, to great perfection; and the making of tin plates is almoſt wholly engroſſed by them. They are excellent engineers. Their foreign trade is carried on by the rivers Rhine, Elbe, Oder, Weſer, and the Baltic Sea; particularly from the ports of Hamburgh, Lubeck, Stetin, &c. And by land with France, Holland, and Switzerland. They export a good deal of linen; and what we call Dutch toys come from thence. Proviſions and labour are cheap, which enable them to employ themſelves in ſome things, which otherwiſe would not turn to an account. The foreſts are very numerous, and contain ſtags, fallow deer, roe-bucks, wild boars, buffaloes, and other ſorts of game. The Black Foreſt is the largeſt in Europe.

Germany is an empire, which by the French is called Allemagne, from the Allemans, a people who in the third century inhabited that part of the country, which is now called Upper Germany; and the Lower was poſſeſſed by the Teutones, a people well known long before the birth of Jeſus Chriſt. The Franks, a people of Lower Germany, made themſelves maſters of the Low Countries and Gaul, which from them is called France, in about the fifth century. In the two following centuries they conquered the greateſt part of Germany. Charlemagne, in the eighth century, brought them under ſubjection, having ſubdued the Saxons after a war of thirty years. Thus Germany became ſubject to this prince and Lewis the Debonair. This laſt divided ſome part of his dominions among his three ſons, Lothair, Lewis, and Charles. Lewis, the ſecond of that name, governed Germany, under the title of a kingdom, and it continued in his family from the year 840, to 911; when Lewis III. dying without children, the empire of Germany became elective, and has continued ſo ever ſince.

The Germans are robuſt, well made, ingenius, ſincere, war-like, lovers of good chear and ſtrong liquors. The nobility are never debaſed by marrying into low families, which perhaps may in ſome meaſure be owing to intereſt, becauſe many abbeys and great benefices oblige them to prove their nobility; for the archbiſhopricks, biſhopricks, and abbeys are elective, and ſome of the princes poſſeſs ſeveral of theſe at once.

The government of Germany is very ſingular, it being a ſtate compoſed of a great number of cities, which are governed like ſo many republics, and of a great number of eccleſiaſtic and ſecular ſovereignties. This ſingularity in the conſtitution, is the natural conſequence of the condition tion in which it was left by Charlemagne. This prince was the moſt powerful emperor they ever had, and he had brought France, Italy, and Germany under his dominion. His deſcendants ſoon loſt their grandeur, which allowed room for ſeveral princes to become powerful, and afterwards independent ſovereigns, as they now actually are. Among the reſt there is one called a Landgrave, which deſerves explanation. At firſt it was only a commiſſion given by the emperor to one of the great lords, appointing him judge of a province, and to take the neceſſary meaſures to preſerve and eſtabliſh peace. They were called provincial judges, or counts of a province, becauſe they exerciſed juriſdiction therein in its full extent. At length the landgravates, which were at firſt but commiſſions, became hereditary fiefs of the empire; for, beſides the rights and privileges annexed to this dignity, they had fiefs united thereto. Some of theſe depended immediately on the emperor, and others on the biſhops of the province, or ſome other great men. Thus the landgraves became obliged to receive their inveſtitures of their office from the emperor, and of the fiefs which depended thereon. They did homage for the other fiefs to the ſovereign princes. The margraves were officers appointed to command on the frontiers; and the bargraves were only governors of forts. Theſe dignities at length became hereditary, and were turned into ſovereignties.

The emperor is elected at Frankfort on the Main, and is crowned in the ſame city, or at Ratiſbon. He was elected formerly by all the princes and prelates of Germany; but ſince the golden bull of Charles IV. in 1336, it is performed by the electors only, whoſe number was then ſeven, but now they are nine, viz. three eccleſiaſtics, and ſix ſeculars. At the peace of Munſter, in 1648, the eighth electorate was created in favour of the count Palatine of the Rhine, who had been deprived of his dominions, and his electorate given to the duke of Bavaria. The ninth has been created ſince. Thus the nine electors are the archbiſhop of Mentz, that of Cologne, and that of Treves; the king of Bohemia, the count Palatine, the duke of Saxony, the marquis of Brandenburg, the duke of Bavaria, and the elector of Hanover. The firſt of the eccleſiaſtic electors is chancelor of Germany, and director of the archives of the empire; the ſecond, chancellor of Italy; and the third is chancellor of the Gauls. Theſe titles ſhow the powers which the emperors formerly poſſeſſed. The duke of Bavaria is grand maſter of the empire, and carries the golden apple at the ceremony of the coronation. The elector of Saxony is grand eſquire, and carries the ſword. That of Brandenburg has the title of great chamberlain, and carries the ſceptre. The elector Palatine is grand treaſurer. The title of palatine was formerly given to all thoſe who had any office in the palace of the prince.

When the empire is vacant, and there is no king of the Romans, the elector of Saxony, and the count Palatine, are vicars of the empire; but the duke of Bavaria diſputes this poſt with him ſince the Palatine has been reſtored to his electorate. The emperor Leopold created the ninth electorate in favour of Erneſt Auguſtus duke of Hanover.

The emperor has no ſettled income, nor any city belonging to him as emperor, for which reaſon the Germans ſhould always chooſe a prince who is powerful enough to ſupport his dignity. He aſſumes the title of Cæſar, always auguſt, and of his ſacred majeſty. The moſt important affairs, ſuch as concern peace, war, and the ſettling of ſubſidies, are never treated of but in the general aſſemblies, which they call diets. But the emperor muſt give his conſent, that the reſults of their deliberations may have the form of a law. He alone has the power of convoking the diet, and he ſends commiſſaries to preſide in his room. Another of his rights conſiſts in the inveſtiture of fiefs, and in the diſpoſal of thoſe which devolve to the empire, which may happen either by confiſcation, or for want of heirs.

The diets of the empire conſiſt of three bodies, or colleges, namely, that of the electors, the princes, and the imperial cities. The electors and the other princes have an abſolute authority in their own dominions. However, there are caſes in which an appeal may lie againſt their determination; to hear which there are two tribunals, one of which is the imperial chamber at Treves, reſiding at Weſlar, in the circle of the Upper Rhine; and the other is the aulic council, which is to meet in the city where the emperor reſides. Theſe tribunals determine the diſputes which happen between the princes.

There are three principal religions in Germany; the Roman catholic, which prevails in Hungary, the eccleſiaſtical electorates, and that of Bavaria; the Lutheran, which predominates in the circles of Upper and Lower Saxony, in a great part of Weſtphalia, Franconia, Swabia, on the Upper Rhine, and moſt of the imperial cities. The Calviniſt, which is profeſſed in the dominions of the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, and of ſeveral other princes; not to mention leſſer ſects, which are now crept in among them, ſuch as Independents, Anabaptiſts, and Quakers, beſides a multitude of Jews in all the great towns. At the treaty of Munſter, the Proteſtants were put upon the ſame foot as the Papiſts in their reſpective territories; but before that they were always at war, and above one hundred thouſand fell in the quarrel. It was then that ſeveral of the great eccleſiaſtical dignities were ſecularized, and converted into duchies or lay-fees.

The emperor is the fountain of honour in Germany, and diſpoſes of places and honours belonging to the empire, except ſuch as are hereditary and belong to the electors. By the Golden Bull the emperor is obliged to ſign a capitulation, which the electors preſent him before he is inſtalled, by which he promiſes to maintain the rights and privileges of the electors, princes, and ſtates of the empire. The revenue ariſes from crown-lands, fines, forfeitures, and confiſcations, beſides which there is a tax called Roman months, to which all the princes and ſtates are to contribute a certain proportion, for the ſupport of the government. Were all the princes agreed, they might raiſe an army of five hundred thouſand men, but they are never unanimous.

There are ſix Hanſeatic towns, which maintain an union for the ſupport of trade. Theſe are Cologne, Hamburgh, Lubeck, Bremen, Roſtock, and Dantzick in Poland. The principal rivers in Germany are the Rhine, the Danube, the Elbe, the Weſer, and the Oder. The Rhine is one of the moſt famous rivers in Europe, and formerly ſeparated Germany from Gaul. It has two ſprings, which ariſe near mount Godard, in the country of the Griſons, in which they unite. It then proceeds to ſeparate Tirol and Suabia from Switzerland and Alſace; then it traverſes the electorates of the Palatinate, Mentz, Treves, and Cologne; and after that Cleves and Juliers. At length it arrives at fort Skenk, in Guelderland, where it divides into two branches; that which runs to the right is called the Wahah, and that to the left keeps the name of the Rhine, which running to Utrecht, divides again; that on the right falls in the Zuider-zee, while the other paſſes by Leyden, and then loſes itſelf in the ſands of Catwick.

Germany is divided into nine circles, which are as it were large provinces, that comprehend ſeveral ſtates and territories, whoſe princes, prelates, counts, and deputies, meet about their common affairs. The directors of theſe circles can appoint a meeting of the ſtates of the circle for the regulation of public affairs, and the colonel takes care of the ſoldiery, the artillery, and ammunition. Each circle is obliged to find its quota of men, and to pay ſo much money every month, in proportion to the tax ſettled by the regiſters of the empire. The nine circles are Auſtria, Bavaria, Suabia, Upper Saxony, Lower Saxony, Weſtphalia, Franconia, the Upper Rhine, and the Lower Rhine. Formerly there was a tenth, called the circle of Burgundy, but that no longer ſubſiſts.

GERMERSHEIM, a town of Germany, in the palatinate of the Rhine, the chief place of a bailliage of the ſame name. It is ſubject to the elector Palatine, and is near the Rhine, five miles weſt of Philipſburg, and ſeven ſouth-weſt of Landau. Long. 8. 27. E. Lat. 49. 10. N.

GERMOIN (ATHANASIUS) archbiſhop of Tarentaiſe, and a learned civilian, wrote a treatiſe De Juriſdictione Eccleſiaſtia, in folio, and died on the 4th of Auguſt, 1627.

GERNSHEIM, a town of Germany, ſeated on the Rhine, with a good caſtle. It is nine miles north-weſt of Worms, and as much ſouth-weſt of Darmſtadt. Long. 8. 31. E. Lat. 49. 44. N.

GERONTES, in Grecian antiquity, magiſtrates of ancient Sparta, anſwering to the Areopagites of Athens. See AREOPAGITES.

GERTRUDENBERG, a handſome, ancient, and ſtrong town of the United Netherlands, in Dutch Brabant. The confederates took it from Spain in 1572, and the prince of Parma retook it in 1589. But prince Maurice became maſter of it again in 1593, and it has belonged to Holland ever ſince. Here the conferences were held in 1710 between the French and Dutch, to ſettle the preliminary articles of peace, but they were broken off. It is ſeated at the eaſt end of a lake called Bieſboch, ten miles north of Breda, and twelve ſouth-eaſt of Dordrecht. Long. 4. 49. E. Lat. 51. 41. N. It belongs to the prince of Orange.

GERVAIS of Tilbury, a famous Engliſh writer, of the thirteenth century, thus named from his being born at Tilbury, on the Thames, was nephew to Henry II. king of England, and was in great credit with the emperor Otho IV. to whom he dedicated a Deſcription of the World and a Chronicle. He alſo compoſed a Hiſtory of England, that of the Holy Land, and other works.

GERVAIS (NICHOLAS) a native of Paris, and a learned miſſionary. Scarce was he twenty years of age when he was prevailed upon to embark for the kingdom of Siam, with ſome eccleſiaſtics, who were ſent upon a miſſion thither. The young abbé Gervais ſtaid four years at Siam, learned the language of the country, converſed with the learned there, and publiſhed, at his return, A Natural and Political Hiſtory of the Kingdom of Siam; and An hiſtorical Deſcription of the Kingdom of Macaſſer; theſe two works are curious. He at length became curate of Vannes, in Brittany, and, after other preferments, was conſecrated biſhop of Horren, and at length embarked to ſhew his zeal in the place of his miſſion, but on his arrival there, was maſſacred, together with the eccleſiaſtics who attended him, on the 20th of November, 1729. He compoſed many other works beſides the above.

GERVAIS (DOM ARMAND FRANCIS) brother of the former, and a famous writer, entered the monaſtery of the Barefooted Carmelites, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the regularity of his conduct; but not finding the rules of the houſe ſufficiently auſtere, he, in 1695, took the habit of la Trappe, of which he was made abbot the next year; but ſoon raiſing diviſions and diſturbances, he was expelled, and afterwards compoſed a great number of books, among which are, 1. The Life of St. Cyprian, with Diſſertations, quarto. 2. The Life of Abelard and Eloiſa, two volumes, duodecimo. 3. The Letters of Abelard to Eloiſa. 4. A Tranſlation of the Abbé Suger's Hiſtory, three volumes, duodecimo. 5. The Life of St. Irenæus, two volumes, duodecimo. 6. The Life of Rufinus, two volumes, duodecimo. 7. The Life of the Apoſtle St. Paul, three volumes, duodecimo. 8. The Life of St. Paulinus, with Diſſertations, quarto. 9. The Life of St. Epiphanius. 10. A Hiſtory of the Abbé Joachim, two volumes, duodecimo; in which he maintains that that abbot performed greater miracles than all the ſaints, except, perhaps, he adds, thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt and his apoſtles. This word perhaps has very juſtly given great offence. It is obſerved of this author, that he has in his books followed and copied good memoirs, but that he has often ſpoiled them by his own additions, and by his reflections, which are frequently miſplaced, and injudicious. He wrote ſeveral other works, and died in the year 1755.

GERYON, in fabulous hiſtory, a king of Spain who had three heads, and was the ſon of Chryſaoris and Calirrhoe. He had a breed of oxen of a purple colour, who devoured all the ſtrangers that were caſt to them, and were guarded by a dog with two heads, and a dragon with ſeven, beſides a very watchful keeper. Hercules however killed both the monarch and theſe guards, and afterwards took the oxen to Gadira or Cadiz, from whence he brought them to Eurytheus. Some mythologiſts explain this fable, by ſaying that Geryon was king of the three iſlands now called Majorca, Minorca, and Ivica, on which account he was ſaid to have three heads. Many other conjectures have been made on the origin of this fable.

GESNER (CONRAD) a celebrated phyſician and naturaliſt, and one of the moſt learned men of his time, was born at Zurich, in 1516, and finiſhed his ſtudies in France; after which he travelled into Italy, and taught medicine and philoſophy in his own country with extraordinary reputation. He was acquainted with the languages, and excelled ſo much in natural hiſtory, that he was ſurnamed the Pliny of Germany. He died on the 22d of December, 1565, aged forty-nine. His principal works are, 1. A Hiſtory of Animals: 2. His Bibliotheca Univerſalis; and 3. A Greek and Latin Lexicon.

GESTRICIA, a province of Sweden, bounded by the province of Helſingia on the north; the Bothnic gulph on the eaſt, by Upland on the ſouth, and by Dalecarlia on the weſt. Gaffle or Gevoli is the capital.

GESULA, a province of the kingdom of Morocco, in Africa. It produces barley, has plenty of ſheep, and contains mines of iron and copper. The greateſt part of the inhabitants are graziers and ſmiths.

GETA (SEPTIMUS) the ſon of the emperor Severus, and the brother of Caracalla, was declared Cæſar with his brother. He was beloved by the people on account of his mildneſs and excellent diſpoſition; but Caracalla, who hated him, aſſaſſinated him in the arms of Julia his mother, in the year 212, when twenty-three years of age.

GETHIN (lady GRACE) a lady of diſtinguiſhed merit, was the daughter of ſir George Norton of Abbots-Leigh, in Somerſetſhire, and was born in the year 1676. She had a liberal education, and was miſtreſs of great natural and acquired accompliſhments. She was married to ſir Richard Gethin, of Gethin Grott, in Ireland; but died on the 11th of October, 1697, in the 21ſt year of her age, and was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, where a beautiful monument is erected over her. To perpetuate her memory, proviſion was made for a ſermon to be annually preached on Aſh-Wedneſday for ever. Her papers were, after her death, publiſhed under the title of Reliquiæ Gethinianæ, or ſome Remains of the moſt ingenious and excellent lady Grace Gethin.

GEVALI, or GAFFLE, a town in Sweden, capital of Geſtricia, near the gulph of Bothnia, forty-four miles north-weſt of Upſal, ſixty-four north-by-weſt of Stockholm, and thirty-two eaſt of Copperberg. Long. 16. 15. E. Lat. 60. 32. N.

GEVAUDAN, a territory of France, in Languedoc, bounded on the north by Auvergne, on the weſt by Rouerge, on the ſouth by the Cevennes, and on the eaſt by Vivarez and Velay. It is a mountainous barren country, of which Mende is the capital.

GEVER, or GOAR (ST.) a town of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, and territory of Rhinefelden. It is ſubject to the prince of Heſſe Rhinefelden, and is defended by a ſtrong caſtle on the top of a hill. It is ſeated on the Rhine, fifteen miles ſouth of Coblentz. Long. 6. 16. E. Lat. 50. 15. N.

GEX, a town of France, capital of a bailiwick of the ſame name, at the foot of St. Claude, between mount Jura, the Rhone, the lake of Geneva, and Swiſſerland. It is eight miles north-weſt of Geneva, and two hundred and twenty ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 6. 9. E. Lat. 46. 20. N.

GEZIRA, a town of Aſia, in Diarbeck, in an iſland formed by the Tigris, ſeventy miles north-weſt of Moſul. It is governed by a bey. Long. 42. 10. E. Lat. 36. 50. N.

GHENT, a city of the Auſtrian Netherlands, capital of the province of Flanders. It is ſeated on four navigable rivers, the Scheld, the Lys, the Lieve, and the Moere, which run through it and divide it into canals. Theſe form twenty-ſix little iſles, over which there are three hundred bridges; among which there is one remarkable for a ſtatue of braſs of a young man who was obliged to cut off his father's head. As he was going to ſtrike, the blade flew into the air, and the hilt remained in his hand, upon which they were both pardoned. There is a picture of the whole tranſaction in the town-houſe. Ghent is ſurrounded with walls and other fortifications, and is tolerably ſtrong for a place of its circumference. But all the ground within the walls is not built upon. The ſtreets are large and well paved, the market places ſpacious, and the houſes built with brick. But the Friday's market place is the largeſt, and is remarkable for the ſtatue of Charles V. It ſtands upon a pedeſtal in the imperial habit. That of Cortere is remarkable for a fine walk under ſeveral rows of trees. In 1737 a fine opera houſe was built here, and a guard-houſe for the garriſon. Near the town is a very high tower, with a handſome clock and chimes. The great bell weighs eleven thouſand pounds. On the top of the tower is a dragon of gilt copper, which, it is ſaid, came from Conſtantinople.

The town-houſe is a double building having two fronts, one of which is Gothic, and the other modern. The citadel is a fine regular building, and looks very well on the outſide. There are two large canals, one of which goes to Bruges, and the other to Sas le Gand, where it falls into the ſea. The cathedral church of St. Bavon, is in the middle of the city, and is large, handſome, and finely embelliſhed, particularly the choir. Beſides this, there are ſix pariſh churches. Here are two famous abbeys, beſides monaſteries and nunneries in abundance. The city is governed by a burgo-maſter and ſchepins, who are like our mayor and aldermen. There is likewiſe a ſenate upon extraordinary occaſions.

This town is famous for the pacification ſigned here, in 1526, for ſettling the tranquillity of the Seventeen Provinces, which was afterwards confirmed by the king of Spain. It was taken by Lewis XIV. in 1678, who afterwards reſtored it. The French took poſſeſſion of it again after the death of Charles II. of Spain. In 1706, it was taken by the duke of Marlborough; and by the French in 1708; but it was retaken the ſame year. Laſt of all, the French took it by ſurpriſe after the battle of Fontenoy; but at the peace of Aix la Chapelle, it was rendered back. This is the birth-place of John of Gaunt. It is very well ſeated for trade, on account of its rivers and canals. It carries on a great commerce in corn, and has linen, woollen, and ſilk manufactures. It is twenty-two miles ſouth-weſt of Antwerp; twenty-ſeven weſt of Mechlin, twenty-ſix north-weſt of Bruſſels, twenty ſouth-weſt of Middleburgh, and one hundred and fifty-five north-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 0. E. Lat. 51. 24. N.

GHILAN, a province of Perſia, on the ſouth-weſt of the Caſpian Sea. It is covered on one ſide by a mountain in the form of a creſcent, and that which adds to its beauty is the abundance of timber and other wood, and the ſeveral romantic ſcenes which the various face of the earth affords. At the foot of the mountain, eaſtward, near the bay, is a hot bath much eſteemed for its medicinal qualities. The ſeveral paſſes into Ghilan are all very difficult. The mountains are very lofty, and their tops are generally covered with ſnow throughout the year. This province produces great plenty of rice and raw ſilk; but the ſudden changes of the air render it aguiſh. However, the marſhes, which are often overflowed by the Caſpian Sea, render it very fit for rice; but they breed frogs, gnats, and ſpiders innumerable, beſides rendering the air ſo moiſt, that iron work will ruſt in one's pocket.

pocket. Women, mules, and poultry enjoy health, while all other animals pine away with ſickneſs; but that of the women is owing to their confinement. June, July, and Auguſt, are their moſt healthy months; and in October, November, and December, they have continual rains. Sometimes they have ſo much ſnow, that it hinders all communication at Richt, the chief city, but from the houſe-tops. The ſpring is long, at which time the lawns and meadows are ſtrewed with flowers, and the buſhes with honeyſuckles, ſweet-brier, and roſes. Hemp, flax, hops, and fruit trees, grow without culture. They have oranges, lemons, peaches, pomegranates, and vines in abundances, which ſupport themſelves on trees, and grow wild on the mountains. There are great quantities of box-trees, which the camels are fond of, though it poiſons them, on which account they keep none here, but make up their caravans with horſes, mules, and cows, which laſt carry burthens. The peaches and figs are very unwholeſome to foreigners. The rivers and inlets abound with fiſh, two of which are peculiar to theſe parts.

GHILIAN, a town of the French Netherlands, in the province of Hainault, ſeated on the river Hain, five miles weſt of Mons. Long. 3. 45. E. Lat. 50. 30. N.

GHIRLANDAIO (Domenico) a Florentine painter, born in 1549. He was at firſt intended for a goldſmith, but followed his more prevailing inclination to painting with ſuch ſucceſs, that he is ranked among the principal maſters of his time; yet his manner is dry and Gothic. However, he is particularly famous for his having Michael Angelo for his diſciple. He died at forty-four years of age, and left three ſons, David, Benedict, and Randolph, all of whom were painters.

GIANTS, in fabulous hiſtory, ſeveral monſters produced from the blood which flowed from the wound of Saturn, when caſtrated by his ſon Jupiter; they diſtinguiſhed themſelves by making war againſt heaven, when they piled rocks on rocks in order to dethrone Jupiter, but were ſlain, and from their blood were produced ſerpents and all kinds of venemous creatures. Some mythologiſts have imagined, that the ſtory of the giants took its riſe from the Moſaic hiſtory, which repreſents the earth as afflicted with men of uncommon ſtature and great wickedneſs, who engaged in the impious attempt of building a tower that was to reach to the ſkies, and defeat the deſigns of God himſelf.

GIBBES (James Alban) in Latin Ghibbeſius, a celebrated phyſician and poet, was the ſon of William Gibbes, phyſician to queen Henrietta Maria, and was born in France, where he received the greateſt part of his education, and afterwards ſtudied phyſic at Padua. In 1644, he ſettled at Rome, where he was made phyſician to the biſhop of Freſcati, lecturer of rhetoric in the Sapienza, and canon of St. Celſus. In 1667, the emperor Leopold created him poet-laureat, and at the ſame time ſent him a gold chain and medal, which he ſoon after preſented to the univerſity of Oxford, together with his poems, and in return was created doctor of phyſic by diploma. He died in 1677, and was buried in the Pantheon. He wrote and publiſhed an Epithalamium upon the duke of York, and the ducheſs of Inſpruck, though the marriage was never concluded. It conſiſted of ſome thouſands of verſes together with an ample comment. Mr. Wharton ranks him with Camillo Querno, the arch-poet.

GIBBONS (Grinling) a juſtly celebrated carver, was, according to ſome, born in Holland of Engliſh parents, and brought into England at nineteen years of age, while others have aſſerted that his father was a Dutchman, and that he was born in Spur-alley in the Strand: The honourable Mr. Walpole obſerves, that he was an original genius, a citizen, and conſequently it is indifferent where was he produced; for when a man ſtrikes out novelty from himſelf, the place of his birth has little claim on his merit. An inventor is equally a maſter, whether born in Italy or Lapland. There is no inſtance of a man before Gibbons, who gave to wood the looſe and airy lightneſs of flowers, and chained together the various productions of the elements with a free diſorder natural to each ſpecies. King Charles II. gave him a place in the board of works, and employed his hand on the ornaments of moſt taſte in his palaces, particularly at Windſor, where in the chapel, the ſimplicity of the carver's foliage at once ſets off and atones for the glare of Verrio's paintings. At Windſor too, Gibbons, whoſe art extended to all materials, carved the beautiful marble pedeſtal for the equeſtrian ſtatue of the king in the principal court: where the fruit, fiſh, and implements of fiſhing are all exquiſite. The baſe of the figure at Charing-Croſs was alſo the work of this artiſt. The foliage in the choir of St. Paul's is of his hand. At Burleigh is a noble profuſion of his carving in picture frames, chimney-pieces, and door-caſes, and the laſt ſupper in alto relievo, finely executed. At Chatſworth are many ornaments by Gibbons, and at Houghton are two chimney pieces adorned with his foliage. But the moſt ſuperb monument of his ſkill is a large chamber at Petworth, enriched from the ceiling, between the pictures, with feſtoons of flowers and dead game, &c. all in the higheſt perfection and preſervation. Appendant to one is an antique vaſe, with a baſs relief of the pureſt taſte, and worthy the Grecian age of Cameos. Gibbons died at his houſe in Bow-ſtreet, Covent-Garden, on the third of Auguſt, 1721. After which his fine collection of pictures, models, &c. were ſold by auction. Among other things were two chimney pieces of his own work, one valued at 100l. and the other at 120l.

GIBBS (James) a celebrated architect, was the ſon of Peter Gibbs, of Footdeeſmire, merchant in Aberdeen, and was born about the year 1674. He was educated in the grammar-ſchool and the Mariſchal college of Aberdeen, where he took his degree of maſter of arts. Mr. Gibbs having at length loſt his father, reſolved to ſeek his fortune abroad, and, in 1694, left Aberdeen, and ſpent ſome years in the ſervice of an architect and maſter-builder, in Holland, and the earl of Mar happening to be there in the year 1709, Mr. Gibbs was introduced to him. His lordſhip being a great architect, and finding his countryman, Mr. Gibbs, to be a man of genius, he not only favoured him with his countenance and advice, but generouſly aſſiſted him with money and recommendatory letters, in order, by travelling, to complete himſelf as an architect. Thus furniſhed, Mr. Gibbs went from Holland to Italy, and there applied himſelf aſſiduouſly to the ſtudy of architecture, under the beſt maſters.

About the year 1710, he came to England; where he found his noble patron in the miniſtry, and highly in favour with the queen. The lord Mar being now fully convinced that Mr Gibbs was worthy of the great favours he had conferred on him, introduced him to his friends as a gentleman of great knowledge in his profeſſion; and an act of parliament having been paſſed about this time for building fifty new churches, Mr. Gibbs was employed by the truſtees named in the act, and gave a ſpecimen of his abilities, in planning and executing St. Martin's church in the Fields, St Mary's in the Strand, and ſeveral others. Being now entered on buſineſs, he ſoon became diſtinguiſhed, and was employed by perſons of the beſt taſte and greateſt eminence. The Radcliffe library at Oxford, begun June 16, 1737, and finiſhed in the year 1747; the King's college, Royal library, and Senate houſe, at Cambridge, are laſting evidences of his ſuperior abilities as an architect. He lived to a great age, and, though a Roman Catholic, was juſtly eſteemed by good men of all perſuaſions; he being courteous in his behaviour, moderate with regard to thoſe who differed from him, humane and charitable. He died on the 5th of Auguſt, 1754.

GIBERT (John Peter) doctor in divinity, and a learned canoniſt, was born at Aix in 1660. He taught divinity in the ſeminary of Toulon, and afterwards at Aix, and in 1703 ſettled at Paris. He conſtantly refuſed all the benefices that were offered him, and ſpent his life in deciding caſes of conſcience. He died at Paris, on the 2d of December, 1736, aged ſeventy-ſix. He was the author of a great number of books, the principal of which are, 1. Eccleſiaſtical Inſtitutions, in two volumes, quarto. 2. Cuſtoms concerning Cenſures and Irregularities. 3. The Traditions, &c. of the Church on the Sacrament of Marriage, three volumes, quarto. The above are in French. 4. Corpus Juris Canonici per Regulas naturali Ordine Diſpoſitas, &c. three volumes, folio.

He ought not to be confounded with Balthazar Gibert, his relation, rector of the univerſity, and profeſſor of rhetoric in the Mazarine college at Paris, who died on the 28th of October, 1741, aged ſeventy-nine. The principal work of this laſt is intitled Opinions of the Learned on the Authors who have treated of Rhetoric, in three volumes, duodecimo.

GIBERTI (John Matthew) biſhop of Verona, and one of the moſt pious and learned men in the ſixteenth century, was born at Palermo. He loved and protected the learned, and had in his houſe a printing-office, for printing the Greek Fathers, and in 1529 publiſhed a fine edition in Greek of the Homilies of St. John Chryſoſtom on St. Paul's Epiſtles. He died on the 30th of December, 1543.

GIBRALTAR, a town of Spain, in Andaluſia. It had its name from a Moor, named Tarik, who ſettled here in ſpite of the Goths, and from him it was called Gebel-Tarik, or the Mountain of Tarik; for Gebel, in the Mooriſh language, ſignifies a mountain. This is properly a rock, which is very ſteep and craggy; but it is flat on the top, from whence there is an extenſive view of the Mediterranean Sea, Barbary, Fez, and Morocco, in Africa, and the kingdoms of Seville and Granada, in Spain. It was formerly called Calpe, and is ſuppoſed to be one of the Pillars of Hercules. The town is at the foot of this mountain to the weſt, and was ſo well fortified while in the hands of the Spaniards, that it was ſuppoſed to be impregnable, till it was taken by ſir George Rook, in 1704, and it has remained in the hands of the Engliſh ever ſince. They attempted to take it three times ſince, but without effect. The firſt time four hundred French and Spaniards crept up the rock in the night, but were driven headlong down the next morning. In 1727, they endeavoured to blow up the rock, but found it impracticable. The garriſon have all their proviſions from England and the Barbary ſhore. It is made a free port, but cannot obtain any trade, and it is now freed from a military government which was very oppreſſive. It is twenty-four miles north of Ceuta, forty ſouth eaſt of Cadiz, and eighty-four ſouth of Seville. Long. 4. 15. W. Lat. 36. 0. N.

Gibraltar was in the hands of the Moors till the thirteenth century, when the Chriſtians became maſters of it and the reſt of Andaluſia.

GIBSON, (RICHARD) an Engliſh painter, commonly called the Dwarf, was originally page to a lady at Mortlake, who obſerving that his genius led him to painting, had the generoſity to get him inſtructed in the rudiments of that art. He devoted himſelf to Sir Peter Lely's manner, and copied his pictures to admiration, eſpecially his portraits: his paintings in water-colours were alſo eſteemed. He was in great favour with Charles I. who made him his page of the back ſtairs, and he had the honour to inſtruct in drawing queen Mary and queen Anne, when they were princeſſes. He married one Mrs. Anne Shepherd, who was alſo a dwarf, on which occaſion king Charles I. honoured their marriage with his preſence, and gave away the bride. Mr. Waller wrote a poem on this occaſion, intitled The Marriage of the Dwarfs; in which are theſe lines:

"Deſign or chance makes others wive,
"But nature did this match contrive;
"Eve might as well have Adam fled,
"As ſhe deny'd her little bed
"To him, for whom heav'n ſeem'd to frame
"And meaſure out this only dame."

Mr. Fenton, in his notes on this poem, obſerves that he had ſeen this couple painted by Sir Peter Lely; and that they were of an equal ſtature, each being three feet ten inches high. However, they had nine children, five of which arrived at maturity; theſe were well proportioned, and of the uſual ſtandard of mankind. But what nature denied this couple in ſtature, ſhe gave them in length of days; for Mr. Gibſon died in the ſeventy-fifth year of his age, and his wife having ſurvived him almoſt twenty years, died in 1709, aged eighty-nine.

GIBSON, (EDMUND) biſhop of London, was born at Knipe, in Weſtmoreland, in the year 1669, and in 1686 became a ſervitor of Queen's college, Oxford. The ſtudy of the northern languages being then much cultivated in the univerſity, he applied himſelf with great induſtry to that branch of literature, in which he made ſuch proficiency that in 1691 he publiſhed in quarto a new edition of Drummond's Polemo Middiana, and James V. of Scotland's Cantilena Ruſtica, with notes. Soon after he publiſhed the Chronicon Saxonicum, with a Latin tranſlation, and notes, in quarto. After which appeared his Reliquiæ Spelmannianæ, the poſthumous works of Sir Henry Spelman, relating to the laws and antiquities of England. About this time he became domeſtic chaplain to Dr. Teniſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who rewarded his learned labours with ſeveral preferments in the church, ſo that we ſoon find him rector of Lambeth, and archdeacon of Surry. Becoming thus a member of the convocation, he engaged in a controverſy, which was carried on with great warmth by the members of both houſes, and defended his patron's rights, as preſident, in eleven pamphlets; he then formed and completed his more comprehenſive ſcheme of the legal duties and rights of the Engliſh clergy, which was at length publiſhed under the title of Codex Juris Eccleſiaſtici Anglicani, in folio.

In ſhort, archbiſhop Teniſon dying in 1715, and Dr. Wake, biſhop of Lincoln, being made archbiſhop of Canterbury, Dr. Gibſon ſucceeded the latter in the ſee of Lincoln; and in 1720 was promoted to the biſhoprick of London. He now not only governed his dioceſe with the moſt exact regularity, but by his great care promoted the ſpiritual affairs of the church of England colonies in the Weſt Indies. He was extremely jealous of the leaſt of the privileges belonging to the church; and therefore, though he approved of the toleration of the Proteſtant Diſſenters, he continually guarded againſt all the attempts made to procure a repeal of the Corporation and Teſt Acts: and with equal ardour oppoſed the quakers in their attempts to deprive the clergy of their legal tithes. The zeal he ſhewed on theſe and other occaſions raiſed him enemies; and a paſſage in the introduction to his Codex, which repreſents the ſpiritual court as independent of every temporal one, was ſeverely laſhed by the direction of the lord Hardwicke, chief juſtice of the King's bench. Alſo great numbers joined in a general cry of perſecution, on our prelate's hindering the promotion of Dr. Rundle, the friend of the lord chancellor Talbot, to an Engliſh biſhoprick, on ſuſpiſion of Deiſm. He alſo offended his late majeſty, by procuring an addreſs from ſeveral of his brethren the biſhops, for putting down the maſquerades. Thus he had the misfortune to offend, by a conduct worthy of praiſe. He had ſuch generoſity, that he freely gave two thouſand five hundred pounds, left him by Dr. Crow, who was once his chaplain, to Dr. Crow's own relations, who were very poor. He ſpent the latter part of his life in writing and printing paſtoral letters, viſitation charges, occaſional ſermons, and tracts againſt the prevailing immoralities of the age, and died on the 6th of September, 1748. Beſides the above works, he publiſhed, 1. An edition of Quintilian de Arte Oratoria, with notes. 2. An Engliſh tranſlation of Camden's Britannia, with additions, two volumes folio: and, 3. A number of ſmall pieces that have been collected together, and printed in three volumes folio.

GIDEON, the ſon of Joaſh, and the fifth judge of Iſrael, about the 1245th year before the Chriſtian æra, was ſent by an angel to deliver the Iſraelites. He firſt overturned the altar of Baal, and burnt his grove; and then, with only three hundred men, entered their camp in the night, ſpread terror through their army, and put them to flight. He then paſſed the river Jordan, defeated the remainder of the Medianitiſh army, and ſlew Zeba and Zalumna, two kings of the Moabites; after which victories the Iſraelites offered to ſettle the kingdom upon him and his poſterity, but he nobly refuſed the crown. He governed the people with wiſdom, and died in an advanced age, about the 1236th year before the Chriſtian æra.

GIEN, a ſmall town of France in the Gatinois, ſeated on the Loire, eighty-two miles ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 2. 43. E. Lat. 47. 4. N.

GIENGEN, a ſmall imperial town of Germany, in Suabia, upon the river Brentz, between Ulm and Nordlingen. Long. 10. 27. E. Lat. 48. 38. N.

GIERACE, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, in the Farther Calabria, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a mountain near the ſea, thirty miles north-eaſt of Reggio, and twenty-ſeven ſouth-eaſt of Niotera. A mile from hence are the ruins of the ancient Locri. Long. 16. 43. E. Lat. 38. 15. N.

GIESSEN, a ſtrong town of Germany, in the landgravate of Heſſe Caſſel, with a univerſity, a good caſtle, and a fine arſenal. It is ſeated in a fertile territory, on the Lohn, and belongs to the houſe of Darmſtadt. It is four leagues ſouth-weſt of Marpurg, and thirty-ſeven north of Frankfort. Long. 8. 51. E. Lat. 50. 30. N.

GIFANIUS, or GIFFEN (OBERTUS) a learned critic, and great civilian. He was born at Buren, in Guelderland, in 1534, and was the firſt who erected the library of the German nation at Orleans. He taught the civil law at Straſburgh, at Altdorf, and at Ingolſtadt; but, embracing the popiſh religion, he was invited to the imperial court, and honoured with the office of counſellor to the emperor Rodolphus. He wrote ſeveral works, and died at Prague on the 26th of July, 1609, at above ſeventy years of age. He had a great literary quarrel with Lambin and Scioppius.

GIGERRY, a village one hundred and twenty-five miles eaſt of Algiers, where is a fortreſs which commands a large diſtrict. It was formerly a province depending on the kingdom of Bugia. It is built on a ſlip of land which advances into the ſea, and forms, with the rocks, two commodious havens; the one to the eaſt, and the other to the weſt. There is no town in the diſtrict; for the Moors live in tents of hair-cloth. In this territory is a high mountain, ſeventy miles in length, called Mount Aurax, which is very difficult of acceſs. It is inhabited by the Arabs, called Cabeylezen; who are a rugged people, and jealous of their liberty. They cannot be brought entirely under ſubjection, on account of ſome inacceſſible places in the mountains, to which they retire when they are purſued. Their houſes are poor, mean huts; and they ſpeak a language quite different from the Turks and Moors. When theſe people are backward to pay their tribute, the bey ſends ſoldiers among them, who burn their houſes, ſeize their cattle, lie with their wives and daughters, and carry off their children. And, on the other hand, theſe people make ſlaves of all foreigners who come upon their coaſt, whether they are in amity with the Algerines or not.

GIGLIO, a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of Tuſcany, with a caſtle. It is in the territory of Sienna. Long. 11. 0. E. Lat. 42. 24. N.

GIGNAC, a town of France in Languedoc, and dioceſe of Montpellier, ſeated near the river Eraud. Long. 3. 40. E. Lat. 43. 45. N.

GIHON, or AMO, a river of Aſia, which runs firſt weſtward by Termed, Zam, and Kirki; then turning north at Azariſt, it paſſes by Charpar, and falls into the lake Aral. This is not the Oxus of the ancients, as ſome have ſuppoſed.

GILBERD (WILLIAM) an eminent philoſopher and phyſician in the ſixteenth century, was born at Colcheſter in Eſſex, and educated in both the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge, after which he travelled into foreign countries, where he is ſuppoſed to have obtained the degree of doctor of phyſic, and at his return, being famed for his learning and profound ſkill in philoſophy and chemiſtry, he became a fellow of the College of Phyſicians, and phyſician in ordinary to queen Elizabeth. He wrote a work entitled De Magnete magneticſque Corporibus et de magno Magnete Tellure, Phyſiologia nova, in folio, which has met with the higheſt applauſe; and a treatiſe De Mundo noſtro ſublunari Philoſophia nova. He died in 1603, and by his laſt will gave all his library, globes, inſtruments, and cabinet of minerals to the College of Phyſicians. Sir Kenelm Digby compares this gentleman to Dr. Harvey; and Dr. Barrow places him in the ſame rank with Galileo, Gaſſendus, Merſennus, and Des Cartes.

GILBERT (GABRIEL) a French poet, who wrote ſeveral operas, tragedies, a poem, entitled the Art of Pleaſing, ſonnets, madrigals, and other pieces of poetry, by which he acquired a great reputation. He was ſecretary of ſtate to queen Chriſtina of Sweden, and her reſident in France. He died at Paris about the year 1680.

GILDON (CHARLES) an Engliſh poet and critic, was born at Gillingham, in Dorſetſhire, about the year 1666. His father was a member of Gray's Inn, London, and had ſuffered by his adherence to king Charles I. and his relations being Roman catholics, ſent him to the Engliſh college of Doway, with the deſign of making him a prieſt; but after ten years ſtudy, he, at nineteen years of age, returned to London, where, giving a looſe to gaiety and pleaſure, he ſpent the greateſt part of his paternal eſtate; and, as he himſelf ſays, entirely got rid of the prejudices of education. Neceſſity at length induced him to write three plays; but none of them had, however, any ſucceſs. He alſo wrote, 1. Letters, eſſays, poems, &c. 2. The complete Art of Poetry. 3. The Laws of Poetry, as laid down by the duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Roſcommon, and Lord Lanſdown, illuſtrated and explained. 4. The Deiſt's Manual: and, 5. An Engliſh Grammar. He alſo publiſhed the Miſcellaneous Works of Charles Blount, Eſq. to which he prefixed the life of that gentleman. He offended Mr. Pope, who therefore gave him a place in his Dunciad, and died on the 12th of January, 1723.

GILLES (SAINT) a French poet in the ſeventeenth century, was ſub-brigadier of the firſt company of muſquetiers; but to the ſurprize of every one, quitted the ſervice in 1706, and entered into a convent of Capuchins. He wrote tales, ſongs, ballads, and other pieces of poetry, which are full of ſpirit, and very agreeable; but many of them are too licentious. Moſt of them are printed in a volume, entitled La Muſe Mouſquetrire.

GILLES (JOHN) an able French muſician, was born at Taraſcon, in 1669. He learned muſic with the celebrated Campra, in the cathedral of Aix, under William Poitevin, prieſt of that church, and became maſter of muſic to the church of St. Stephen at Toulouſe. He died in the laſt mentioned city, in 1705, after having publiſhed a great number of excellent motets; but his Maſs for the Dead is eſteemed his maſter-piece.

GILLIBRAND (HENRY) a very able mathematician, and profeſſor of Aſtronomy in Greſham college, in the ſeventeenth century, was born in the pariſh of St. Botolph, Alderſgate, in London, November 17, 1597. At the age of eighteen he was admitted a commoner of Trinity college in Oxford, where he proſecuted his ſtudies with equal diligence and ſucceſs. He afterwards became curate of Chidringſtone in Kent; and, on the ſecond of January, 1626, was elected aſtronomy profeſſor in Greſham college. Here he continued till the day of his death, which happened on the 9th of February, 1636. He wrote a book entitled Britiſh Trigonometry, as alſo a treatiſe on the longitude, and another on the variation of the needle.

GILIMER, one of the deſcendants of Genſeric dethroned his couſin Hunneric, king of the Vandals in Africa, and uſurped his throne in 1531. The emperor Juſtinian wrote to him in favour of Hunneric; but Gilimer ridiculing his entreaties and threatnings, the emperor ſent Beliſarius againſt him; when that general took Carthage, ſubdued all Africa, and made Gilimer attend his triumph into Conſtantinople. It is ſaid that this prince ſeeing Juſtinian ſeated on his throne in the Circus, and conſidering the viciſſitude of human affairs, cried as Solomon had before done, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." Juſtinian aſſigned him ſome lands in Galatia, for the ſubſiſtence of his family. By his defeat Africa was again reduced into a Roman province, as it had been before it was conquered by the Vandals.

GILLENGEN, a town of Germany in the circle of Suabia, and duchy of Wirtemberg, ſeated near the river Neckar, eleven miles ſouth-weſt of Hailbron. Long. 9. 0. E. Lat. 49. 0. N.

GILLOT (GERMAIN) a celebrated doctor of the Sorbonne, born of a noble family in Paris, employed his wealth and abilities in the education of young men for the ſervice of the church and ſtate, and expended above a hundred thouſand crowns in that good work. His pupils took the name of Gilotins, and became diſtinguiſhed at the bar, in phyſic, and divinity. He died at Paris on the 20th of October, 1685, aged ſixty ſix.

GILLOT (LOUISA GENEVIEVE) a lady celebrated for her poetic talents, and her fine genius, was born at Paris, in 1650. Her poetic works conſiſt of epiſtles, eclogues, madrigals, ſongs, comedies, an opera, &c. She alſo wrote a romance, entitled The ſecret Hiſtory of Don Antonio, King of Portugal, duodecimo. She died at Paris, in 1718.

GILOLO, A town of France in Lower Languedoc. It is one of the two grand priories of Malta, with a principal, who has the title of abbot. It is twelve miles weſt of Arles, and twenty-ſeven north-eaſt of Montpellier.

GILOLO, an iſland of the Pacific Ocean, having the Philippine iſlands on the north, the ocean on the eaſt, Ceram, Banda, and Amboyna iſlands on the ſouth, and the Moluccas, and the iſland of Celebes on the weſt. Though it is very near the ſpice iſlands it produces no fine ſpices. Gilolo is the capital, in the poſſeſſion of the native Indians; for as yet the Dutch have not thought it worth their while to conquer it. It produces rice, and the inhabitants are wild and ſavage. It lies under the equinoctial, in one hundred and twenty-ſeven degrees of longitude.

GILOT (JAMES) canon of the holy chapel, and dean of Langres, was deſcended from a noble family in Burgundy. He had a very fine and curious library, and his houſe was the rendezvous of all the learned. He died in 1619. He wrote inſtructions and miſſive letters relating to the council of Trent.

GILPIN, (BERNARD) rector of Houghton, diſtinguiſhed by his extraordinary piety and hoſpitality, was born at Kentmire, in 1517, and ſtudied at Queen's college, Oxford, where he made himſelf maſter of Eraſmus's Works, which were then much read, and at the ſame time became a diſtinguiſhed diſputant in the ſchools. To this was ſoon added ſingular knowledge of the Greek and Hebrew tongues. With theſe qualifications he was choſen one of the firſt maſters of Chriſt-church college, after its foundation was completed by Henry VIII. As he had been bred in the Romiſh religion, he yet adhered to that church, and held a diſputation againſt Hooper, afterwards biſhop of Worceſter, and martyr for the Proteſtant faith. But in the reign of Edward VI. holding a diſputation with Peter Martyr, he was ſtaggered, and therefore began more carefully to ſtudy the ſcriptures and the writings of the fathers, thinking to confirm himſelf in his received opinions by ſtronger arguments: but his enquiries ſoon cooled his zeal for popery, and he at length began to be ſenſible, that there were many enormous abuſes in that religion, and to think a reformation neceſſary. In 1552, by the perſuaſion of his friends, he was induced, againſt his will, to accept of the vicarage of Norton, in the dioceſe of Durham; and this being a grant from king Edward VI. he was appointed to preach before his majeſty, who was then at Greenwich. His ſermon was highly approved by many perſons of the firſt rank, particularly by ſir Francis Ruſſel, and ſir Robert Dudley, afterwards earls of Bedford and Leiceſter, and by ſecretary Cecil, afterwards lord treaſurer Burleigh, who procured for him the king's licence for a general preacher during his majeſty's life. Thus honoured, he repaired to his pariſh, entered upon the duties of it, and, as occaſion required, made uſe of the king's licence in other parts of the country. But here he ſoon grew uneaſy; and being ſcarcely ſettled in ſome of his religious opinions, found the country overſpread with popiſh doctrine, the errors of which he was unable to oppoſe, he therefore reſigned his living, though he might have ſupplied his abſence with a curate, and went abroad to converſe with the moſt eminent profeſſors on both ſides of the queſtion. After three years abſence, which he chiefly paſſed at Louvain, where the moſt important topics of religion were diſcuſſed with great freedom, he returned to England, and was kindly received by his uncle Dr. Tonſtall, biſhop of Durham, who ſoon after gave him the archdeaconry of Durham, to which the rectory of Eſſington was annexed. When repairing to his pariſh, though the perſecution was then at its height, he boldly preached againſt the vices, errors, and corruptions of the times, eſpecially in the clergy, on which a charge conſiſting of thirteen articles was drawn up againſt him, and preſented in form to the biſhop. But Dr. Tonſtall found a method of diſmiſſing the cauſe in ſuch a manner as to protect his nephew, without endangering himſelf, and ſoon after preſented him to the rich living of Houghton le Spring. He was a ſecond time accuſed to the biſhop, and again protected: when his enemies, enraged at this ſecond defeat, laid their complaint before Dr. Bonner, biſhop of London, who immediately gave orders to apprehend him. Upon which Mr. Gilpin bravely prepared for martyrdom, and ordering his houſe-ſteward to provide him a long garment, that he might might make a decent appearance at the ſtake, ſet out for London. It is ſaid that in the journey he happened to break his leg, which cauſed ſome delay; however, it is certain that the news of queen Mary's death met him on the road, and he was ſet at liberty.

His pariſhioners, on his return to Houghton, received him with the ſincereſt joy. The living was worth about four hundred pounds per annum, which at that time was a great revenue; but the duty was proportionably laborious; the pariſh containing no leſs than fourteen villages. This however he conſidered as an ample field for exerciſing all his faculties in the duties of a pariſh prieſt. The parſonage-houſe being run to decay, he fitted it up, improved and enlarged it, till it became ſuitable to the hoſpitality he reſolved to keep in it, which ſoon became the admiration of the whole county. Every fortnight he ſpent in his family forty buſhels of corn, twenty buſhels of malt, and a whole ox, beſides a proportionable quantity of other proviſions. Every Thurſday a large quantity of meat was dreſſed for the poor, and every day they had as much broth as they pleaſed. Twenty-four of the pooreſt were his conſtant penſioners. Four times in the year a dinner was provided for them, when they received from his ſteward a quantity of corn, and a ſum of money; and at Chriſtmas an ox was always divided among them. Every Sunday from Michaelmas till Eaſter was a public day, on which he expected to ſee all his pariſhioners and their families, for whoſe entertainment he had three tables, well covered; the firſt for gentlemen, the ſecond for the huſbandmen, and the third for the day-labourers, and this hoſpitality he never omitted, even when he was abſent. Strangers and travellers found a cheerful reception; all that came were welcome gueſts, and even their beaſts had ſuch care taken of them, that it was humorouſly ſaid, If a horſe was turned looſe in any part of the country, it would immediately make its way to the rector of Houghton.

To thoſe who know, that before the Reformation, hoſpitality was the boaſt of the Romiſh clergy, the prudence of this part of his conduct will appear in its proper light; and the reſt was agreeable to it. His behaviour was free, without levity; obliging, without meanneſs; inſinuating, without art; and to his humanity and affability he added an unwearied application to the immediate duties of his function. Not ſatisfied with preaching in public, he brought his pariſhioners to come to him with their doubts and difficulties; he endeavoured to form the youth to virtue; interpoſed in all acts of oppreſſion; was aſſiduous in preventing law ſuits, and reconciling thoſe who quarrelled, and ſhewed ſuch a ſincere concern for all under affliction, that they conſidered him as a good angel.

But even this was not all, notwithſtanding the extent of his pariſh, obſerving the ignorance and ſuperſtition that prevailed around it, he thought the ſphere of his benevolence too confined, and every year not only viſited and preached in the moſt neglected pariſhes in Northumberland, Yorkſhire, Cheſhire, Weſtmoreland, and Cumberland, but in a tract of country on the borders of Northumberland called Tine-dale, the moſt barbarous place in the North; it was formerly called the debateable land, from its being by turns ſubject to England and Scotland, and was inhabited by a kind of deſperate banditti. Wherever he came he uſed to viſit the jails, few of which had then an appointed miniſter, and by his labours and affectionate manner of behaviour, he is ſaid to have reformed many abandoned wretches. He would likewiſe employ his intereſt for ſuch criminals whoſe caſes he thought attended with any hard circumſtances, and often procured their pardon. In ſhort, he built and engaged his friends to aſſiſt in endowing a grammar-ſchool, in order to ſupply the great deficiency of able miniſters, and taking particular notice of the moſt forward boys, he would ſometimes ſend for them into his ſtudy, and inſtruct them himſelf. The endowing of this ſchool was the laſt buſineſs of a public nature in which he engaged. A few hours before his death, he ordered his friends, acquaintance, and dependants to be called, and being raiſed in his bed, made ſeveral moſt pathetic diſcourſes; firſt to the poor, next to his ſcholars, and then to his ſervants; after which, ſending for ſeveral perſons who had yet diſregarded his advice, he preſſed it again, with the hopes that his dying words would prove more effectual. This worthy and excellent divine, who merited and obtained the glorious titles of the father of the poor, and the apoſtle of the North, died on the 4th of March, 1583, in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age.

GIMONT, a town of France, in Gaſcony, with an abbey. It is ſeated on the river Gimont. Long. 1. 5. E. Lat. 43. 40. N.

GINGEN, a town of Germany, in the circle of Suabia, twenty miles north of Ulm. It is an imperial city. Long. 10. 12. E. Lat. 48. 36. N.

GINGI, a town of Aſia, in the Hither India, capital of a territory of the ſame name, in the kingdom of Tanjour, and on the coaſt of Coromandel. It is a large place, and one of the moſt populous of all the Peninſula. It is ſeated on a mountain which has three points, on each of which there is a fort, and it is very ſtrong with other works. It was beſieged by Aurengzebe in 1690, for three years together, but he could not take it. It is thirty-two miles weſt of Pondicherry. Long. 79. 55. E. Lat. 11. 58. N.

GIODDAH, GEDDAH, or JUDDAH, is a ſmall but well fortified town in Arabia, on the Red Sea. It ſtands cloſe to the ſea, and is governed by a Turkiſh baſha, who has a gariſon and four or five gallies to cruiſe on the Red Sea, to prevent other ſhips from paſſing without calling firſt at this place. The inland country about it belongs to a ſheik, who pretends to be a deſcendant of Mahomet, and has the title of ſheriff to diſtinguiſh him from the reſt. It is ſaid he ſqueezes great ſums from the pilgrims which come to Mecca. It is the port of this place, and carries on a great trade. Long. 40. 25. E. Lat. 22. 0. N.

GIOJA (FLAVIO) a celebrated Neopolitan, and native of Paſitano, a caſtle in the neighbourhood of Amalfy. To this perſon is attributed the invention and uſe of the mariner's compaſs. He lived about the year 1300.

GIORDANI (VITALI) an able mathematician, was born at Bitonto, on the 13th of December, 1633. He ſpent his youth in idleneſs and debauchery, and married a girl who had no fortune. At length, having killed one of his brothers-in-law, who had reproached him for his indolence, he entered in quality of a ſoldier in the fleet ſent by the pope againſt the Turks. The admiral finding that he had ſome genius, made him his ſecretary, when being obliged to learn arithmetic, he became extremely fond of the mathematics. At his return to Rome in 1659, he became keeper of the caſtle of St. Angelo, and having much leiſure, made ſuch progreſs in the mathematics, that queen Chriſtina of Sweden, during her ſtay at Rome, choſe him her mathematician, and Lewis XIV. nominated him to teach mathematics in the academy of painting and ſculpture he founded at Rome, in 1666. Pope Clement X. gave him the poſt of engineer to the caſtle of St. Angelo. In 1685 he was profeſſor of mathematics at the college da Sapienza, and in 1691 he was made a member of the academy of the Arcadi. He died on the 3d of November, 1711, at ſeventy-eight years of age. His principal works are, 1. Euclide reſtituto. 2. De componendis gravium momentis 3. Fundamentum Doctrinæ motus gravium. 4. Ad Hyacinthum Chriſtophorum Epiſtola.

GIORDANO. See LUCA GIORDANO.

GIORGIONE, an illuſtrious painter, born at Caſtel Franco in Treviſano, a province in the ſtate of Venice, in 1478. He firſt applied himſelf to muſic, and became famous for playing and ſinging on the lute. Afterwards he applied to painting, receiving his firſt inſtructions from Giovanni Bellino, and then ſtudying the works of Leonardo da Vinci, he arrived at a manner of painting ſuperior to them both. He deſigned with great freedom, coloured with more ſtrength and beauty, gave a better relievo, more life, and a nobler ſpirit to his figres; and was the firſt among the Lombards, who diſcovered the admirable effects of ſtrong lights and ſhades. He excelled both in hiſtory and portraits; his moſt valuable piece in oil is that of our Saviour carrying his croſs, now in the church of San Rovo at Venice, in which city he died in 1511, at thirty-three years of age.

GIOSEPPINO, an eminent painter, thus named by contraction, from Gioſeppe d'Arpino, a town of Naples, in which he was born in the year 1560. His father, who was a common houſe-painter, ſending him when very young to Rome, he was employed by ſome painters at work in the Vatican to grind their colours, where ſoon making himſelf maſter of the elements of deſign, he by degrees became very famous, and having much wit and genius, was the favourite of the popes and cardinals, who found him ſufficient employment, and the French king Lewis XIII. made him a knight of the order of St. Michael. He diſcovered a florid invention, a ready hand, and a good ſpirit in all his works; but yet being deficient in the ſtudy of nature, and the rules of art, he has committed a multitude of errors. The moſt eſteemed of all his pieces are the battles in the Capitol at Rome, in which city he died, in 1640, aged eighty.

GIOTTO, a celebrated painter, born in a village near Florence, in 1276. Cimabue, ſeeing him in a field keeping ſheep, and at the ſame time amuſing himſelf with drawing them on the ſand, conceived ſo good an opinion of the boy, that he aſked to let him take him to Florence, and bring him up as one of his ſcholars: the father conſented, and Giotto had not applied himſelf long to deſigning, before he began to ſhake off the ſtiffneſs that then prevailed among the maſters, and to give a finer air to the heads, more of nature to his colouring, and proper actions to his figures. He likewiſe attempted to draw after the life, and to expreſs the different paſſions of the mind; but could neither come up to the livelineſs of the eyes, the tenderneſs of the fleſh, nor the the ſtrength of the muſcles: he however excelled in theſe particulars all that had been done for two hundred years before, and was the moſt celebrated painter of his time. The popes Benedict XI. and Clement V. had a particular eſteem for him, and he was the intimate friend of Dante the poet, whoſe portrait he drew. He painted in many cities of Italy, particularly at Rome, Naples, and Florence, and the number of his works is very great. There is a picture of his in one of the churches of Florence, repreſenting the death of the bleſſed Virgin, with the apoſtles about her; the attitudes of whom, Michael Angelo uſed to ſay, could not be better deſigned.

Giotto did not confine his genius to painting alone, he was alſo a ſculptor and architect. In 1327, he formed the deſign of a magnificent and beauteous monument for Guido Tarlati, biſhop of Arezzo, and in 1334, undertook the famous tower of Santa Maria del Fiore, for which work, though it was not finiſhed, Giotto was made a citizen of Florence, and allowed a conſiderable penſion. He died at Florence in 1336, and in honour to his memory, that city erected his ſtatue in marble over his tomb.

GIOTTINO, a celebrated painter, whoſe true name was Tomaſo, but he received the other from his imitating Giotto's manner. He was born at Florence, in the year 1324. He began to add ſtrength to his figures, and to improve the art of perſpective; but died in 1356, at thirty two years of age.

GIOVENAZZO, a town of Italy in the kingdom of Naples, and territory of Barri. It is ſeated on a mountain near the ſea, and is a biſhop's ſee. It is ten miles north-weſt of Barri, and twelve eaſt of Trani. Long. 16. 50. E. Lat 41. 33. N.

GIRAC (Paul Thomas, Sieur de) well known by his critique on Voiture, and by his writing againſt Coſtar, was born at Angouleme, and died on the 2d of January, 1663.

GIRALD (Silvester) in Latin Giraldus, one of the moſt learned and eloquent men of his time, was born of noble parents, in 1145, at Mainarpir, near Pembroke, in South Wales, and having ſtudied theology at Paris, he read lectures on the belle lettres, and rhetoric in the Engliſh college there. Afterwards he returned to England, and was employed by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the pope's legate, in reforming ſome abuſes in the principality of Wales. In 1176 he returned to Paris, in order to ſtudy the civil law, and having perfected himſelf in that ſtudy, was offered the profeſſorſhip of law in the univerſity, which he refuſed to accept. On his return to England he became known to Henry II. who ſent him as ſecretary with his ſon John into Ireland, where he employed himſelf chiefly in ſearching for antiquities, and writing a deſcription of that iſland, for which purpoſe he travelled all over it, and then returned to Wales. He lived till he was about ſeventy years of age, and wrote many works, the principal of which are, 1. Topographia Hiberniæ. 2. Expugnatio Hiberniæ. 3. Itinerarium Cambriæ. 4. Deſcriptio Cambriæ; which are all found in a collection publiſhed by Camden, in folio, in 1602, intitled, Anglica, Normannica, & Cambrica, a vetæribus ſcripta; and his three books De rebus a ſe geſtis, together with other pieces are publiſhed by Wharton in his ſecond volume of Anglia Sacra.

GIRALDI (Lilio Gregorio) in Latin Gyraldus, an able critic, and one of the moſt learned men Italy has produced, was born on the 4th of June, 1478. He loſt all his fortune and his library, at the plundering of Rome, by Charles the Fifth's army, in 1529, and he ſoon after had the misfortune to loſe his patron Rangoni, with whom he had lived ſome time. He had then the happineſs to live with the prince of Mirandola; but in 1533 he loſt this friend and patron, who was aſſaſſinated by a cabal headed by his nephew. Giraldi himſelf, who was ill of the gout, had great difficulty to ſave himſelf from the hands of the conſpirators, after having loſt all he had gained ſince the ſacking of Rome. He then returned to Ferrara, where he was afflicted ſeven years with the gout, which rendered him a cripple, and at the ſame time he ſuffered extreme poverty, yet in his intervals of eaſe he wrote many books. He died of the gout in February 1552. All his works were printed at Leyden, in 1696, in two volumes folio. The moſt eſteemed of them are, 1. The Hiſtory of the Gods of the Gentiles. 2. That of the Greek and Latin poets: and, 3. That of the poets of his time. He invented the thirty numbers of the Epact, and alſo compoſed a treatiſe for reforming the Calendar, which was followed by Gregory XIII.

GIRALDI (John Baptist Cintio) a learned Italian poet of the ſame family with the former, was born at Ferrara, in November, 1504, and made ſuch an uncommon progreſs in the ſtudy of the languages, polite literature, and phyſic, that at twenty-one years of age he read public lectures at Ferrara upon phyſic and polite literature. In 1542 he became ſecretary to the duke of Ferrara, which office he held till that prince's death, in 1558; and was continued in it by his ſucceſſor; till envy having done him ſome ill offices with his maſter, he removed with his family to Mondovi, in Piedmont, where he taught the belle lettres for three years, and ſoon after obtained the profeſſorſhip of rhetoric at Pavia, and afterwards a place in the academy of that city. But being at length afflicted with the gout, he returned to Ferrara, where he died ſoon after, on the 30th of December, 1573. All his works are written in Italian, except ſome orations ſpoken upon extraordinary occaſions, which are in Latin. They chiefly conſiſt of tragedies, a collection of which his ſon Celſo Giraldi publiſhed at Venice in 1583, in octavo.

GIRARDON (Francis) a very famous ſculptor, born at Troyes, in 1627. He was the diſciple of Laurence Maxiere, and Francies Anguier. Lewis XIV. being informed of his great talents, ſent him to Rome with a penſion of one thouſand crowns. At his return into France, he laboured for the royal palaces, and the gardens of Verſailles, and Trianon, where there are many of his works executed in bronze and in marble, from the deſigns of Charles le Brun. The mauſoleum of cardinal de Richlieu, in the Sorbonne, and the equeſtrian ſtatue of Lewis XIV. at the Place de Vendome, where the ſtatue and horſe are caſt in one piece, paſs for his moſt excellent performances. Girardon was profeſſor, rector, and chancellor of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and had the poſt of inſpector general of all the works done in ſculpture. He married Catharine du Chemin, who rendered herſelf famous in the art of painting flowers. He erected a very fine tomb for her in the church of St. Landry; and died at Paris on the firſt of September, 1715, aged eighty-eight.

GIRGE, a town of Africa in Upper Egypt, on the bank of the river Nile. Its principal commerce conſiſts in corn, lentils, beans, linen cloth, and wool. It is a large place, and is the reſidence of a bey. The Turks have ſeven large moſques here, and it is the ſee of a Copti biſhop. The fathers de Propaganda Fide have an hoſpital, in which they maintain themſelves by the practice of phyſic, which renders them very neceſſary to the Turks; but this does not ſecure them, for they are expoſed to continual oppreſſions, and ſometimes to real perſecutions. This town is in ſome ſenſe the bounds of the Turkiſh dominion; for if you go higher up you will find their power is on a weak foundation; for the Arabs there do not fear to give openly their protection to thoſe who have offended the Turkiſh government. They ſell their merchandizes in eight covered bazars. Every thing is exceeding cheap here, inſomuch that a ſtranger may ſubſiſt for a trifle. The number of inhabitants are ſuppoſed to be about twenty-five thouſand, of whom one thouſand five hundred are Chriſtian Copti. There are alſo ſome Jews. Theſe people are poor, and very mean in their clothes. The have good grapes, but the wine is indifferent, for want of good management. They make a kind of brandy of dates. Long. 2. 57. E. Lat. 25. 5 N.

GIRONNE, a city of Spain, in Catalonia, known formerly by the name of Gerunda. It is moderately large, and is of a triangular form, with one large ſtreet that runs the whole length. It is ſeated on a hill, on the ſide of the little river Onhar, which falls into the Ter. Theſe two rivers fill the ditches near the walls; for it is a fortified town. The cathedral church is handſome and richly adorned, and the grand altar is very brilliant with gold and precious ſtones; beſides the image of the Virgin Mary is of maſſy ſilver. This town contains a great number of merchants and mechanics, and carries on a great trade. It is the capital of a viguerie of great extent, which is the moſt fertile part of Catalonia, and comprehends ſeveral good towns; the principal of which are Ampunas and Roſes. It was taken by the French in 1694, and reſtored at the peace of Ryſwick. The Miquelets took it 1705, and marſhal Noailles in 1711. It is ſeventeen miles from the ſea, twelve north-weſt from Palamos, and twenty-four north-weſt from Barcelona. Long. 2. 50. E. Lat. 41. 56. N.

GIRONS, a town of France, in Conſerans, upon the river Salat. There are fairs kept here, where they diſpoſe of a great number of horſes and mules. Long. 1. 10. E. Lat. 42. 58. N.

GIRY (Lewis) advocate in the parliament of Paris, and member of the French academy, was the author of ſeveral tranſlations, which are eſteemed. Theſe are, 1. The Dialogue of the Orators, quarto. 2. The Apology of Socrates. 3. Sulpicius Severus's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. 4. Tertullian's Apology. 5. Auguſtin's City of God, two volumes quarto. 6. Select Epiſtles of St. Auguſtin. He died at at Paris, the place of his birth, in the year 1665, at ſeventy years of age.

GISBURN, or Gisborn, a town in the weſt riding of Yorkſhire, with a market on Mondays. The fairs are on Eaſter Monday, Monday fortnight after Eaſter, Monday month after Eaſter; Saturday after Monday month from Eaſter, for horned cattle; Monday five weeks after Eaſter for pedlars' ware; ware; and, on September 18 and 19, for horned cattle and pedlars ware. It is twenty miles east-north-east of Preston, and two hundred and nineteen north-west of London. Long. 2. 12. W. Lat. 53. 55. N.

GISBOROUGH, a town in the north riding of Yorkshire, with a market on Mondays. Here was formerly a rich abbey, and here alum was first made in England. The fairs are on the third Monday and Tuesday after April 11, for linen cloth and horned cattle; on Tuesday in Whitsun week, for horned cattle and linen; August 26, for linen and cattle; August 27, September 19 and 20, and the first Monday after November 11, for horned cattle. It is two hundred and forty-six miles north from London, and thirty-four south-east-by-east from Durham. Long. 0. 45. W. Lat. 54. 35. N.

GISORS, a city of France in Normandy, capital of Vexin Normand. It is seated on the river Epte, in a territory fertile in corn. It is twelve miles from Gornai, thirty-four from Rouen, and forty from Paris. Long. 1. 33. E. Lat. 49. 15. N.

GIVET, a town in the Low Countries, subject to France, and is divided into two parts by the river Meuse. It was fortified by Vauban, and is near Charlemont. It is twenty-two miles west of Namur, and twenty north-east of Rocroi. Long. 3. 47. E. Lat. 50. 5. N.

GIULA, a strong town of Hungary, on the frontiers of Transylvania. It was taken by the Turks in 1566, and retaken by the Imperialists, in 1695. It is seated on the river Heresblan, thirty miles north-west of Arad, and thirty miles south-west of Waradin. Long. 21. 1. E. Lat. 46. 25. N.

GIULIO CLOVIO, a celebrated painter, born in Sclavonia, in the year 1498. At eighteen years of age he went to Italy, and applied himself to miniature with the most admirable success. He excelled both in portraits and histories, and as Vasari his cotemporary observes, was another Titian in the one, and a second Michael Angelo in the other. He was for some time entertained in the service of the king of Hungary, after whose decease he returned to Italy, and being taken prisoner at the sacking of Rome by the Spaniards, made a vow to retire into a convent as soon as ever he should recover his liberty, which he accordingly performed soon after at Mantua; but cardinal Grimani obtaining a dispensation for him from the pope, he soon laid aside the religious habit, and was received into the family of that prince. His works were highly valued by several popes, by the emperors Charles V. and Maximilian II. Philip, king of Spain, and many other illustrious personages; and were so much admired at Rome, that those pieces which he performed for the cardinal Farnese, in whose palace he spent the latter part of his life, were, by all the lovers of the art, reckoned in the number of the rarities of that city. He died in the year 1578.

GIULIO CESARE PROCACCINI, a celebrated sculptor and painter, was the son and disciple of Ercole Procaccini, and flourished at the end of the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth centuries, and became famous in Rome, Modena, Venice, Genoa, Bologna, and Milan, for several admirable things of his hand. He was the best of all the Procaccini, and surpassed his brother Camillo in the truth and purity of his outlines, and in the strength and boldness of his figures. He died at seventy-eight years of age.

GIULIO ROMANO PROCACCINI, a celebrated painter. See ROMANO.

GIUSTANDIL, a strong town of Turky in Europe, in Macedonia, with an archbishop's see of the Greek church, and a sangiachate. It is near the lake Ochrida, seventy miles south-east of Durazo, and fifty east of Nissa. Long. 20. 50. E. Lat. 41. 10. N.

GLADIATORS, in Roman antiquity, persons who generally fought for the entertainment of the people. From the earliest ages of antiquity, it was customary to sacrifice prisoners of war at the funerals of great men, and afterwards to sacrifice slaves on the same occasion; but as it would have appeared barbarous to cut their throats like beasts, they contrived to throw a veil over this inhumanity, by appointing them to fight with each other. At length, when it was found that the people were greatly pleased with these public spectacles, it was resolved to exhibit them as often as possible, when, instead of being practised only at funerals, they were removed to the circus and amphitheatres, and the principal magistrates took occasion to ingratiate themselves with the people, by presenting them with these savage shows. Upon the day appointed, the gladiators were brought out all together, and obliged to take a circuit round the arena, after which they were matched by pairs. The first sort of weapons they made use of were staves, or wooden files, called rudes; and the second, swords, poniards, &c. Having skirmished with the first, which was only the prelude to the battle, they, when sufficiently warmed, advanced to the second, with which they fought naked. If the vanquished surrendered his arms, it was not in the victor's power to grant him life, the people only were empowered to do this during the time of the republic, and the prince or people during the time of the empire, and it was usual with the people or emperor to grant them life when they shewed no signs of fear. After the engagement, several marks of favour were conferred on the victor, particularly a branch of palm-tree, and very frequently a sum of money. From slaves and freedmen this wanton sport passed to persons of rank, and Domitian exhibited even combats of women. We also read that dwarfs encountered with each other. These combats were first prohibited in the East by Constantine the Great, but the practice was not entirely abolished in the West till the year 500.

GLAMORGANSHIRE, in Welsh, Glath Morgan, is a maritime county of South Wales, having Brecknockshire to the north, the Severn sea to the south, Monmouthshire to the east, and Carmarthenshire to the west. It is plentifully stored with fish, flesh, and fowls, has many coal-pits, and sends good butter to Bristol. It is well watered with rivers, the chief of which are the Tavy, Taff, Ogmore, Rumney, Ewenny, Elay, Nid, Cunnon, Avon, Dulish, Cledaugh, and Hoghon.

The air is sharp near the mountains, which are covered with snow, but is mild and temperate near the coast of the Severn sea. The north part is full of high barren hills, and many woods. The south is more level, rich, and fertile, feeding multitudes of cattle and sheep with excellent grass. It is in length from east to west upwards of forty miles, and in breadth from south to north about thirty. It contains about five hundred and forty thousand acres of land, nine thousand six hundred and forty houses, fifty-seven thousand eight hundred and forty people, and eighteen thousand men fit to bear arms. It has ten hundreds, nine market-towns, and one hundred and eighteen parishes. It had twenty-five castles and three monasteries, which are now mostly demolished. It sends two members to parliament, one for the county, and one for Cardiff.

GLANDIVES, was formerly a town of France in Provence, with a bishop's see But it has been destroyed by the inundation of the river Var, and there is only the bishop's house remaining. It is twenty-five miles north-west of Nice, and four hundred and fourteen south-by-east from Paris. Long. 7. 3. E. Lat. 43. 59. N.

GLANDORP (MATTHIAS) a famous physician, was born at Cologne in 1595, and practised physic and surgery at Bremen with reputation. He was physician to the archbishop and republic of that city, and died about the year 1640. His works were printed together at London in 1729, in quarto, with his life prefixed.

GLANVIL (JOSEPH) a learned and ingenious writer in the seventeenth century, was born at Plymouth in 1636, and was educated at Oxford. After the Restoration he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and taking orders in the church of England, was presented to the rectory of Wimbush, in Essex, to the vicarage of Frome Selwood, in Somersetshire, and in 1666 was inducted into the rectory of the church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Bath. He was afterwards appointed one of the chaplains in ordinary to king Charles II. and in 1678 was installed one of the prebendaries of Worcester. He died at Bath, on the 4th of October, 1680. His principal works are, 1. The Vanity of Dogmatizing. 2. Lux Orientalis. 3. Scepsis Scientifica. 4. Philosophical Considerations concerning the Being of Witches and Witchcraft. 5. Plus ultra, or the Progress and Advancement of Knowledge since the Days of Aristotle. 6. Philosophia Pia, or a Discourse on the religious Temper and Tendencies of the experimental Philosophy professed by the Royal Society. 7. Essays on several important Subjects in Philosophy and Religion. 8. An Essay concerning Preaching, &c.

GLAPHYRA, the wife of Archelaus, high priest of Bellona, at Comana in Cappadocia, became famous on account of her beauty, and her commerce with Marc Anthony. She obtained of that general the kingdom of Cappadocia for her two sons, Sisinna and Archelaus, to the exclusion of Ariarathes.

GLAPHYRA, grand-daughter of the former, and the daughter of Archelaus, married Alexander, the son of Herod and Mariamne. She created divisions in the family, and by her haughtiness occasioned her husband's death. Herod having put his son Alexander to death, sent back Glaphyra to her father Archelaus, keeping the two sons whom the deceased had by this lady. Josephus affirms that she was married again to Juba, king of Lybia; but this is not certain: however Archelaus, the son of Herod, became so deeply in love with her, that he divorced his wife in order to marry her, but it is said that she did not live long after her return to Judea, with this last husband. The two sons she had by Alexander her first husband, abandoned the Jewish religion, and retired to Archelaus: one of them was called Alexander, and the other Tigranes.

GLARIS, one of the cantons of Swifferland, is bounded on the eaſt partly by the Griſons, and partly by the territory of Sargans; on the north by the bailiwick of Gaſter, and by the lake Wahleſtatt; on the eaſt by the canton of Schwits; and on the ſouth by part of the canton of Uri, and part of the league of the Griſons. It is a mountainous country, being entirely within the Alps. Near the village Ober-Urnen there is a famous mineral ſpring, which is ſometimes hot, and ſometimes cold. The lake Wahleſtatt is bounded by high rocks and mountains, through one of which a road is cut. Towards the top of one of theſe there is a large hole, through which the ſky may be ſeen. At Neder-Urnen, where there was formerly a caſtle, there was an inundation, which ſo ſwelled the brook near it, that it overflowed the whole village, carried away the hedges, and roſe ſo high, that the inhabitants could ſcarce ſave themſelves on the tops of their houſes. It filled the houſes and fields with ſand, gravel, and ſtones. It ruined ſeveral bridges, overthrew trees, tearing up ſome by the roots.

GLARIS, a town of Swifferland, capital of the canton of the ſame name. It is ſeated in a plain, at the foot of high craggy mountains. The ſtreets are large, and the houſes kept in good repair. It has ſome public buildings, among which are two churches, one in the middle of the town, and the other without, upon an eminence. On this eminence there is a cavern, with groteſque figures formed by the water that drops therein. The general aſſemblies of the country are held here on the firſt Sundays in May, where all the males above the age of ſixteen are obliged to appear. Both the Calviniſts and the Roman Catholics are tolerated here, and they have divine ſervice by turns in the ſame church. It is ſeated on the river Lint, twenty-five miles eaſt of Schwits, ſeventeen north-weſt of Coine, and thirty-two eaſt of Zurich. Long. 9. 13. E. Lat. 47. 6. N.

GLASGOW, a city of Scotland, in the ſhire of Clydeſdale. It is ſeated on the river Clyde, over which there is a handſome ſtone bridge of eight arches. It is the chief town in the kingdom except Edinburgh, and carries on a very extenſive foreign trade. The four principal ſtreets meet in the centre of the city, where there is a tolbooth or exchange, lately built. The principal houſes are all built of hewn ſtone, and make a very handſome appearance. At the end of the ſtreets without the town ſtands the cathedral, dedicated to St. Mungo, which is a handſome large Gothic ſtructure, and is now divided into two churches, the upper and the lower, one being above the other. Here likewiſe the preſbytery have apartments to meet in. Near the cathedral is a ruinous caſtle, formerly the ſeat of the archbiſhop. The univerſity is only one college, but the beſt in the kingdom. It was founded in 1453, by James II. The ſcholars wear red gowns, and lodge in the college, which at Edinburgh they do not. The linen manufacture is carried on here; but they are particularly remarkable for their baking of ſugars. It is forty miles weſt of Edinburgh. Long. 4. 10. W. Lat. 55. 52. N.

GLASSIUS (SOLOMON) a famous Lutheran divine, doctor and profeſſor of divinity at Jena, and general ſuperintendant of the church and ſchool of Saxe Gotha, acquired great reputation among the Proteſtants, and died at Gotha, in 1656, aged ſixty-three. He wrote ſeveral works in Latin, the principal of which is his Philologia Sacra.

GLASTENBURY, a town in Somerſetſhire, with a market on Tueſdays, and a fair on September 8, for all ſorts of cattle. It is large and well built, and contains two pariſh churches, the upper of which is a handſome fabrick, with a well deſigned tower, adorned with figures in the niches. The George Inn is an old ſtone building, called the Abbot Inn, where the pilgrims uſed to lodge. Over the gate is a coat of arms of the kings of England, ſupported by a lion and a bull, and many croſſes. The deſtroying of ſome of the remains of the abbey was in a great meaſure the ruin of the town, which was frequented by ſtrangers, out of curioſity. This was done by the inhabitants, for the ſake of building a ſorry market houſe.

This town had a famous monaſtery, which, in the times of popery, was in high eſteem for its ſanctity. Its antiquity is very high, but not ſo high as is pretended. Nor is it now believed, that Joſeph of Arimathea planted the goſpel here, as tradition aſſerts. The abbot lived in great ſplendor, equal to forty thouſand pounds a year. The abbey was walled round, was a mile in compaſs, and was embattled like a town. The abbot's houſe was a fine ſtone building, of which nothing is entire but the kitchen. It is an octagon, included in a ſquare, with four fire places at the four angles, having chimnies over them. In the flat part of the roof is an arched octagonal pyramid, crowned with a double lanthorn, one within another. There are eight curved ribs, which ſupport this vault, and eight funnels for letting out the ſteam through the windows; within which, in a leſſer pyramid, hung the bell to call the poor people to the adjacent almonry. The church was large and magnificent, and the walls of the choir are ſtill ſtanding. Here king Edgar was buried, and other Saxon kings, and, as ſome believe, the Britiſh king Arthur. St. Mary's chapel is on the north ſide, and Edgar's is oppoſite to it; but there is not much left beſides the foundations. There is ſo much remaining of the chapel of Joſeph of Arimathea, the pretended founder, that the whole fabric might be completed from it. They have taken up ſeveral leaden coffins, and melted them into ciſterns. The ſides of the walls are full of fine pillars of Suſſex marble, as alſo the whole church. Between them the walls were painted with the pictures of ſaints, as may ſtill be ſeen. In ſhort, all the ruins afford a moſt melancholy but venerable aſpect. Over the town hangs a hill, called the Tor, where the abbots built St. Michael's church of good ſquare ſtone, the tower of which is left, though ruinous, and is an excellent ſea-mark. They ſay there is a paſſage under ground from hence to the abbey. The miraculous thorn, that was ſaid to bloſſom only on Chriſtmas day, has been long cut down, though ſome of the ſame ſort may be in other places; however, the fact was never ſtrictly true. The laſt abbot was hanged by king Henry VIII. for not acknowledging his ſupremacy. It is twenty-five miles ſouth-weſt of Briſtol, and one hundred and twenty-ſix weſt-by-ſouth from London. Long. 2. 46. W. Lat. 51. 15. N.

GLATZ, a city of Bohemia, ſeated on the river Wiſſe, at the foot of the mountains which divide Bohemia from Sileſia. It is the capital of the territory of Glatz, which contains nine towns and one hundred villages, and abounds with pit-coal, good quarries of ſtone, mines of ſilver and iron, plenty of game and cattle, as alſo ſprings of mineral waters. The annual revenue is one hundred and fifty thouſand franks, and it ſupplies the neighbouring countries with twelve thouſand cords of wood yearly. Since the peace in 1742, it is united to Lower Sileſia, and is under the government of the king of Pruſſia. The city is pretty well fortified, and has a good caſtle ſeated on a mountain. It is forty miles ſouth of Breſlaw, eighty-four eaſt-by-north of Prague, and one hundred and thirty north of Vienna. Long. 16. 57. E. Lat. 50. 25. N.

GLAUBER (JOHN RHODOLPHUS) a German born in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century, applied himſelf ſolely to chemiſtry, on which he wrote a great number of different treatiſes, ſome of which have been tranſlated into Latin and French. All his works have been collected into one volume, intitled Glauberus concentratus, which has been tranſlated into Engliſh, and was printed at London, in folio, in 1689.

GLAUCUS, in fabulous hiſtory, a fiſherman, who having one day taken a large draught in his nets, obſerved with ſurprize, that the fiſhes on taking a certain herb, jumped again into the ſea, upon which taſting it himſelf, he followed his guides, and became a ſea-god.

GLEICHEN, a German count, who was taken in a battle againſt the Turks, and carried into Turky, where he ſuffered a ſevere and long captivity, in which he was obliged to till the earth, &c. but one day the ſultan his maſter's daughter happening to ſee him, aſked him many queſtions, and was ſo pleaſed with him, that ſhe promiſed to procure his liberty, and follow him, if he would marry her. He objected his having a wife and children; but upon her obſerving that it was the cuſtom in Turky for a man to have ſeveral wives, the count conſented, and the princeſs exerting herſelf they were ſoon ready to embark, and arrived ſafely at Venice, and immediately went to Rome, where having made an ingenuous repreſentation of the whole affair, he obtained a ſolemn licence from the pope to keep both his wives. The truth of this ſtory is however queſtioned even by proteſtant writers.

GLICAS, or GLYCAS, (MICHAEL) a Greek hiſtorian about the middle of the fifteenth century, lived in Sicily, and wrote annals of what paſſed from the creation of the world to the death of Alexis Comnenes, in 1118. Leunclavius added to it a fifth part, which carries it down to the taking of Conſtantinople. Glicas was alſo the author of ſeveral uſeful and curious letters.

GLISSON (FRANCIS) a famous Engliſh phyſician in the ſeventeenth century, was educated at Cambridge, and was made regius profeſſor of that univerſity. In 1634, he was admitted a fellow of the college of phyſicians in London. During the civil wars, he practiſed phyſic at Colcheſter, and afterwards ſettled in London. In the ſtudy of phyſic, he always ſet before him the immortal Harvey as a pattern, and treading in his ſteps, improved phyſic by anatomical diſſections and obſervations, and made ſeveral new diſcoveries of ſingular uſe towards eſtabliſhing a rational practice. He wrote, 1. De Kachitide, &c. 2 Lymphæductis nuper repertis, with the Anatomica Prolegomena & Anatomia Hepatis. 3. De Naturæ Subſtantia energetica, ſeu de Vita Naturæ ejuſque tribus primis Facultatibus, &c quarto. 4. Tractatus de Ventriculo & Inteſtinis, &c. The world is obliged to him for the diſcovery of the capſula communis, or vagina portæ. He died in London, in 1677.

to

GLOCESTER, the capital of the county of that name, is the Glevum of Antoninus, and was called Caer-Glowi by the ancient Britons. Camden thinks it was built by the Romans on purpoſe to curb the Silures, and that a colony was placed there called Colonia Glevum. This city lies extended along the Severn, and on that ſide where it is not waſhed by the river, it had a ſtrong wall, which was demoliſhed after the Reſtoration, becauſe the citizens had ſhut the gates againſt Charles I. in 1643. The caſtle, which was once an handſome ſtructure, after having been in part demoliſhed, was converted into a common priſon for debtors and felons. Ceaulin, king of the Weſt Saxons, took this town from the Britons, in 570. After this, it came under the juriſdiction of the Mercians, and flouriſhed for ſome time. Here Oſrick, king of the Northumbrians, founded a great and ſtately monaſtery, which being ruined and decayed, was repaired by Bernulph, king of the Mercians, in the year 821, who changed the former inſtitution to that of ſeculars, and they continued till Wulſtan, biſhop of Worceſter, placed regulars there, of the order of St. Benedict, in 1022 This is the preſent cathedral, which received great additions and ornaments from ſeveral benefactors; particularly Ralph Willington built Our Lady's chapel, and gave lands to ſupport two prieſts for ever. Nicolas Morwent built the weſtern front from the ground. Horton the abbot added the northern croſs iſle. Trowceſt conſtructed the curious cloiſters; and abbot Seabrook the great and ſtately tower, which is ſo neat and curious, that ſeveral travellers have affirmed, that it is one of the beſt pieces of architecture in England. The ſouth iſle was rebuilt by the offerings made by devout people at the ſhrine of Edward II. who lies interred here in an alabaſter tomb; but if they had all been expended on the church, they might have built a new one from the foundation, Beyond the choir, in an arch of the church, there is a place in the form of a ſemi-circle, with corners, that if any one whiſper never ſo low at on end, it may be heard diſtinctly at the other; but this is owing rather to chance than deſign, as any one may ſee, becauſe two parts of it were tacked on only as paſſages into the chapel erected there.

In the reign of William the Conqueror, and before, the chief trade of this city was forging iron. After the coming in of the Normans, it underwent calamities in the baron's wars, being plundered by Edward, the ſon of Henry III. and afterwards almoſt laid in aſhes by a caſual fire. It was made a borough by king John, to be governed by two bailiffs, and Henry III. who was crowned here, made it a corporation. On the ſouth ſide of the abbey Edward I. erected a noble free-ſtone gate, which is ſtill called Edward's Gate. It was repaired by the laſt abbot, but almoſt demoliſhed by the civil wars. Richard II. gave it his ſword and cap of maintenance. It was erected into a biſhop's ſee by Henry VIII. and had eleven pariſh churches, but five of them were demoliſhed at the ſiege in 1643. It was formerly the ſeat of a Britiſh king, as appears from an inſcription in the biſhop's palace. Here is an hoſpital for the maintenance of fifty-four poor men and women, with a miniſter, phyſician, and ſurgeon. Sir Thomas Rich, bart. a native of this place, gave ſix thouſand pounds by will for a blue-coat hoſpital, wherein are twenty boys, ten poor men, and as many women; and they have lately erected an infirmary. The preſent government of this city is by twelve aldermen, who are juſtices of the peace, out of which number the mayor is annually choſen There are a recorder, a town-clerk, and ſo many common-council-men as, with the aldermen, are not to exceed forty, nor be leſs than thirty. Two out of theſe are yearly choſen ſheriffs. It has two markets, which are on Wedneſdays and Saturdays. Its fairs are on April 5, for cheeſe, July 5, September 28, and November 28, for cattle. It is thirty-ſix miles north-north-eaſt of Briſtol, twenty-ſix ſouth of Worceſter, forty ſeven weſt of Oxford, and one hundred and four weſt-by-north from London. Long. 2. 16. W. Lat. 51. 50. N.

GLOCESTERSHIRE is a large inland county, having Monmouthſhire and Herefordſhire on the weſt, Worceſterſhire on the north, Warwickſhire and Oxfordſhire on the eaſt, and Wiltſhire and Somerſetſhire on the ſouth. It abounds in grain of all ſorts, cattle, ſheep, fine wool, butter, cheeſe, veniſon, fowls, and game. Here are woods, parks, iron mines, and orchards which afford good cyder and perry. The ancient inhabitants were the Dobuni, and it was part of the kingdom of Mercia. The principal rivers are the Severn and the Wye, which laſt divides it from Monmouthſhire. It has likewiſe the Iſis, the Churn, the Leche, the Coln, the Windruſh, the Everlode, the Leden, the Avon, the Swiliate, the Caron, and the Stour. It is in length, from north-eaſt to ſouth-weſt, fifty miles, and in breadth about twenty-ſix. It contains above eight hundred thouſand acres of land, thirty hundreds, two hundred and eighty pariſhes, twenty-ſeven market towns, twenty-ſix thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty houſes, and upwards of one hundred and ſixty-two thouſand five hundred and ſixty inhabitants, whereof about forty thouſand are able to bear arms. It ſends ſix members to parliament, four for the boroughs, and two for the county. The air is generally very good, and the ſoil fruitful. Cotſwold hills on the eaſt part, feed many flocks of ſheep, and weſtward, beyond the Severn, is the foreſt of Dean. Between them are the rich vales of Gloceſter, and towards the north thoſe of Eveſham.

The foreſt of Dean was full of trees; but the civil wars and the iron mines have conſumed the greateſt part. From this part of the county king Athelſtan drove the Welſh beyond the Wye. The Severn, called in Welſh Haffren, is a large river, up which the tide runs as far as Tewkſbury, famous for its abbey before the diſſolution of the monaſteries. Here the Lancaſtrians were defeated, and here Edward, the ſon of Henry VI. was killed. The river divides into two ſtreams, and forms the iſle of Alney, near Gloceſter, the capital of the county. The paſſage over the Severn, in the road from Briſtol to Wales, is at Auſt, where there is a ferry. To the eaſt of this is Thornbury, where the foundation of a magnificent caſtle was laid by the duke of Buckingham, who was beheaded by Richard III. It is now a mayor town, and has a market. A little to the north-eaſt of Briſtel, is Puckle-church, where Edward, the king of the Weſt Saxons, was killed by Leof, a great robber. At Durham, near Mansfield, was a bloody battle, where three Welſh princes were killed. Chipping-Sodbury is a mayor-town, with a great market for cheeſe. Wooton under-Edge, is famous for clothing, as well as Durſley, near which laſt ſtood Kingſwood abbey. On the hills is Beverton caſtle. A little to the eaſt of this is Tetbury, with a famous market for yarn.

In the north part of the county is Camden, famous for ſtockings, where the Saxon kings had a congreſs in 689. At Hales there was a flouriſhing abbey, and at Wichcomb another. Stow on the Would, near the borders of Oxfordſhire, is a poor town, where the army of Charles I. was routby that of the parliament, and near it is a Roman ſoſs way leading to Warwickſhire. Cirenceſter is an ancient town and Roman ſtation. It was taken from the Welſh by Ceaulin, a Saxon king. The church of Fairford is remarkable for its beautiful painted windows The medicinal waters at Cheltenham have been much frequented. At Woodcheſter, nine miles ſouth of Gloceſter, was diſcovered, in 1722, a curious Roman pavement of Moſaic work.

GLOGAW, a city of Sileſia, capital of a duchy of the ſame name. Some call it Great Glogaw, to diſtinguiſh it from another in the duchy of Oppeln, which is not large, but is well fortified, and is five miles ſouth-eaſt of this. Glogaw is ſeated on the river Oder, and has a handſome caſtle, in the tower of which ſeveral counſellors were ſtarved to death in 1498, by order of duke John. There are a great number of Jews, and the proteſtants have a church near the city. The Pruſſians took it by aſſault, in 1740, and made the garriſon priſoners, ſince which the king of Pruſſia has ſtrengthened the fortifications, and ſettled a principal court of juſtice, a conſiſtory, a board of domains, and of war. It is the beſt town in the province, next to Breſlaw, and is the granary of the neighbouring provinces. It is fifty miles north-weſt of Breſlaw, fifty north-eaſt of Gorlitz, and one hundred and twelve north-by-eaſt of Prague. Long. 15. 13. E. Lat. 51. 40. N.

GLUCKSTADT, a ſtrong and conſiderable town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and duchy of Holſtein. It has a good fort, and is ſubject to the king of Denmark. It is ſeated on the river Elbe, near its mouth, and is thirty miles north-weſt of Hamburgh. Long. 9. 15. E. Lat. 53. 52. N.

GNESNA, a large ſtrong city of Lower Poland, in the palatinate of Kaliſh, with an archbiſhop's ſee. The archbiſhop is primate of Poland, and viceroy during an interregnum. It is ſaid to be the moſt ancient city of Poland, and was formerly much more conſiderable than it is at preſent. It is one hundred miles north-by-eaſt of Breſlaw, one hundred and thirty ſouth by-eaſt of Dantzick, and one hundred and twenty weſt of Warſaw. Long. 18. 20. E. Lat. 52. 28. N.

GOA, a city of Aſia, in the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges, is the principal place now in the poſſeſſion of the Portugueſe in the Eaſt Indies. It is ſeated on an iſland twelve miles in length and ſix broad, and ſtands on the north ſide of it, on level ground, being two miles in length and half a mile in breadth, and is very well fortified. It has the conveniency of a ſalt-water river capable of receiving ſhips of the largeſt ſize; but the air is unwholeſome, eſpecially after the rainy ſeaſon, which continues from June till September or October. It is greatly decayed to what it was formerly, though it it may now contain near twenty thouſand inhabitants of ſeveral nations, habits, and religions. There are but few real Portugeſe, for moſt are deſcendants of Portugueſe men and Indian women, and about the fourth part of the people are mulattoes. The original natives are very black, have long black hair, and agreeable faces. Theſe have good capacities, and are of all profeſſions, but continue their original cuſtoms, eſpecially if they are well deſcended; but the meaner ſort go quite naked, except a cloth round the waiſt. Theſe are all put to mean employments, and are great thieves. They ſleep on the bare ground, and live on little elſe but rice. When they have got as much of this as will keep them a week, they will not work till it is gone. Moſt of the inhabitants and merchants are Gentoos and Mohammedans, and live by themſelves. The Portugueſe keep a great number of black ſlaves, who are often ſold by their parents at a very ſmall price, through want.

The banks of the river are beautified with noble ſtructures of churches, caſtles, and gentlemen's houſes. The viceroy's palace is a noble edifice, and is within a piſtol-ſhot of the river. There are great numbers of churches, convents, and cloiſters, eighty of which may be ſeen at once from a little hill near the city. In the market may be had European, Chineſe, and Bengal goods. Every church has a ſet of bells, inſomuch that there is ringing all day and all night long. The converts called Canarians, retain ſo much of their old ſuperſtition, that they will not eat beef. The clergy are very numerous and illiterate, and a great burthen to the ſtate. Their houſes look very well on the outſide, but are poorly furniſhed within. Their diet is bread, rice, fruits, and roots. They have plenty of hogs and fowls, but they uſe them very ſparingly, and the eccleſiaſtics feed moſtly on fiſh. The Portugueſe, or at leaſt the inhabitants ſo called, are zealous to the higheſt degree of ſuperſtition, amorous to a degree of madneſs, and jealous beyond all reaſon; and yet the ladies find means to deceive their keepers, and it is dangerous for any man to refuſe them the favour they want, for they are the moſt revengeful creatures in the world. In Goa, there is an inquiſitor, a viceroy, and an archbiſhop, who is the primate of all the Indies. The ſee of this laſt was erected in 1552. The court of the inquiſition ſtands in a great ſquare oppoſite the cathedral church, and its very name makes thouſands tremble in theſe parts. The Jeſuits have three fine churches, in one of which the body of St. Francis Xavier, called the Apoſtle of the Indies, is depoſited; beſides which they have three moſt magnificent houſes, each of them being fit for the reception of a king; but they have no glaſs in any of the windows, except in one church, inſtead of which they uſe oyſter-ſhells, worked ſo thin as to become almoſt tranſparent. The country about Goa is ſterile in corn, but produces excellent fruits, particularly mangoes, which are very large and of a moſt delicious taſte. It is about two hundred and fifty miles from Cochin. Long. 74. 0. E. Lat. 15. 31. N.

GOAD (JOHN) an eminent ſchool-maſter and writer in the ſeventeenth century, was educated at St. John's college, in Oxford, and was near twenty years chief maſter of Merchant-Taylors ſchool, in London, but, in 1681, loſt his employment, on account of ſome paſſages, which ſavoured ſtrongly of popery, in his Comment on the Church Catechiſm, compoſed for the uſe of his ſcholars. He afterwards taught ſchool in Weſtminſter, and was eſteemed for his probity and learning, and particularly for his abilities as a ſchool-maſter. He died on the 28th of October, 1708-9, having a few years before declared himſelf a Roman Catholic. He was the author of ſeveral Sermons and one or two Vocabularies, &c. but his great work, which employed him for a conſiderable part of his life, was his Aſtro-Meteorologica, or Aphoriſms and Diſcourſes of the Bodies celeſtial, their Natures and Influences, diſcovered from the Variety of the Alterations of the Air, temperate or intemperate, as to Heat or Cold, Froſt, Snow, Hail, Fog, Rain, Wind, Storm, Lightnings, Thunder, Blaſt, Hurricane, &c. London, 1686, folio, and afterwards, in quarto. This work gained the author a great reputation. The ſubject, ſays Mr. Granger, is a kind of aſtrology, founded for the moſt part on reaſon and experiment, as will appear by comparing it with Mr. Boyle's Hiſtory of the Air, and Dr. Mead's book De Imperio Solis & Lunæ.

GOAR (JAMES) a learned Dominican, born at Paris, was ſent, as a miſſionary, into the Levant, where he fully informed himſelf of the belief and cuſtoms of the Greeks, and, upon his return, publiſhed the Euchologion, in Greek and Latin, with learned remarks. He alſo publiſhed ſeveral other works, and died in 1653, aged fifty-two.

GOBELIN (GILES) a famous French dyer, who, under the reign of Francis I. it is ſaid, diſcovered the ſecret of dying a beautiful ſcarlet, to which the French have ever ſince given the name of the ſcarlet of the Gobelins. He lived in the ſuburb of St. Marcel at Paris, where his houſe and the little river that paſſes near it ſtill retain the name of Gobelins.

GOBELINS, a houſe in the ſuburbs of Paris, formerly famous for dying ſcarlet, and is now the place where they weave the fineſt tapeſtry in Europe.

GOBINET (CHARLES) a pious and learned doctor of the Sorbonne, was born at St. Quintin, and publiſhed ſeveral works which are much eſteemed, among which are, 1. Inſtructions for Youth. 2. Inſtructions for Penitents. 3. Inſtructions concerning the Manner of Studying, &c. He died on the 9th of December, 1690, aged ſeventy-ſeven.

GOBRIAS, one of the ſeven Perſian lords, who, after the death of Cambyſes, united to drive away the Magi, who had uſurped the throne in the five hundred and twenty-firſt year before the Chriſtian æra. He was the father-in-law of Darius, and accompanied that prince in his expedition againſt the Scythians. Thoſe people having ſent to Darius a bird, a rat, a frog, and five arrows, Gobrias conjectured the ſignification of this preſent. "O Perſians, ſaid he, if "you don't fly like the birds, or if you don't caſt yourſelf "into the marſhes like the frogs, or hide yourſelves in the "holes of the earth like rats, you are to be piercing by "theſe arrows." Mardonius, the ſon-in-law of Darius, and one of his generals, was the ſon of Gobrias.

GOCH, a town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia and duchy of Cleves, ſeated on the river Niers, between Gueldres and Nimeguen. It is ſeven miles ſouth of Cleves, and is ſubject to the king of Pruſſia. Long. 6. 2. E. Lat. 51. 40. N.

GOCIANO, a ſmall town, in the iſland of Sardinia, ſeated on the river Thirſo, and gives title to a count.

GOCLENIUS (RODOLPHUS) a laborious German writer, born in the county of Waldeck, on the 1ſt of March, 1547. He was about fifty years profeſſor of logic at Marpurg, and wrote a great number of books, the principal of which are, 1. Miſcellania Theologica & Philoſophica. 2. Inſtitutiones Logicæ. 3. Praxis Logica. 4. Problemata Logica 5. Conciliator Philoſophicus. 6. Theſes apologeticæ contra Goſparem Finckium. 7. Philoſophia practica Mauritiana. 8. Idea Philoſophiæ Platonicæ. 9. Analyſis in Exercitationes Scaligeri. 10. Lexicon Philoſophicum. 11. Phyſiognomica & Chiromanticæ Specialia, &c. He died at Marpurg, on the 8th of June, 1628.

He ought not to be confounded with Rodolphus Goclenius, doctor of phyſic, who was born at Wittemburg, in 1572, and died on the 2d of March, 1621, after being profeſſor of phyſic, and then of mathematics at Marpurg. He wrote, 1. Uranoſcopia, Chiroſcopia, & Metopoſcopia, and other works.

GODAH, a conſiderable town in Aſia, in Indoſtan. It is a very agreeable place, but is not ſo very flouriſhing as it was formerly.

GODALMIN, a town in Surry, with a market on Saturdays, and a fair, on February 13, for horſes, cattle, ſheep, and hops, and on July 10, for horſes, cattle, ſheep, and ſtore pigs. It is ſeated on the river Wye, where it divides it into ſeveral ſtreams; and on account of the hills and mountains near it, ſome have likened its ſituation to that of Jeruſalem. It is four miles ſouth of Guildford, thirty four miles ſouth of London, and thirty-four north-eaſt of Portſmouth. Long. 0. 40. W. Lat. 51. 52. N.

GODDARD (JONATHAN) a celebrated phyſician and chemiſt, was born at Greenwich, about the year 1617, and having ſtudied phyſic four years at Magdalen-hall, Oxford, travelled abroad, as was then the cuſtom, to obtain farther improvement. After his return to England, he obtained his doctor's degree at Cambridge, and was admitted a member of the college of phyſicians at London. He was at the ſame time a fellow of the ſociety for improving and cultivating experimental philoſophy, and our author being a ſkilful chemiſt, uſually prepared his own chemical medicines. In 1647, he was appointed reader of the anatomical lectures in the college, which he performed with great applauſe, and ſoon after was appointed principal phyſician to the army under general Cromwell, who, in 1651, appointed him warden of Merton college, Oxon. In ſhort, a ſeries of favours beſtowed on him by Oliver brought him under the diſpleaſure of king Charles II. who, on his return to his kingdoms, removed him from his wardenſhip, when, leaving Oxford, he was choſen profeſſor of phyſic in Greſham college.

He then continued to frequent thoſe meetings that gave birth to the Royal Society, and upon their eſtabliſhment by royal charter, in 1663, was nominated one their firſt council. He ſtill continued to prepare his own medicines, and ſome time after publiſhed a treatiſe, recommending it to general uſe, the greateſt part of the apothecaries being at that time, he ſays, not poſſeſſed of the knowledge neceſſary to fit them for the due execution of their own employment. This treatiſe was received with applauſe; but finding that the propoſal was attended with difficulties that were likely to defeat it, he publiſhed a Diſcourſe, ſetting forth the un-condition of the practice of physic in London. He used to meet a select number of friends at the Crown tavern, in Bloomsbury, where they discoursed on philosophic subjects, and in his return from thence, in the evening of the 24th of March, 1674, he was seized with an apoplectic fit in Cheapside, and dropped down dead. His memory was preserved many years by the drops he invented, and which bore his name; but he more particularly deserves a place in this work, for being, as Dr. Seth Ward, bishop of Salisbury, asserts, the first Englishman who made that noble astronomical instrument the telescope.

GODEAU (ANTHONY) bishop of Grasse and Vence, in France, was born at Dreux, in 1605. He contributed to the establishment of the French Academy, and acquired great reputation by his piety and works, which are very numerous. The principal of them are, 1. An Ecclesiastical History. 2. The Translation, in verse, of the Psalms of David. 3. The Life of St. Paul. 4. The Life of St. Augustine, &c. He died at Vence, on the 21st of April, 1672, aged sixty-seven.

GODFREY of Boulogne, duke of Lorraine, the son of Eustachius II. count of Boulogne, and one of the greatest commanders of his time. Having given proofs of an invincible courage in Germany and Italy, under the emperor Henry IV. he was declared general of the army of the crusaders, and, in 1097, put himself at their head. He obliged the emperor Alexis Comnenes to grant his army a passage through his dominions; unjustly took Nice, Antioch, and several other places from that emperor, and made himself master of Jerusalem, on the 19th of July, 1099. The princes engaged in the crusade then chose him king of Jerusalem; but he would not suffer a crown of gold to be put on his head in the place where our Lord had been crowned with thorns. A short time after, the sultan of Egypt sent a considerable army against him, which was entirely defeated, and Godfrey rendered himself master of all the Holy Land, except two or three places. Still greater exploits were expected from him, when he died in the month of July, 1100, after a reign of only one year. He was succeeded by his brother Baldwin I.

GODFREY (sir EDMUNDBURY) a justice of peace, famous for distinguishing himself against the papists in 1678, and his murder. This gentleman having administered an oath to Dr. Oates and Dr. Tongue, the two principal evidences in what was called the popish plot, was soon after found dead in a ditch, by Primrose-hill, near Hamstead, with his sword thrust through his body; but no blood had followed from the wound. His gloves lay by him; there was money in his pocket, and a broad livid mark appeared round his neck; his breast had some appearance of bruises, and on his breeches were found several drops of wax-lights, which he never used in his own family. Rapin observes, that though it was possible the papists might not have been the authors of this murder, they were so readily and publicly accused, that it was unsafe to deny it; but whether they had or had not a hand in his death, three men were convicted and executed, upon the evidence of one Miles Prance, a goldsmith, who was apprehended on suspicion of being an accomplice. He swore that two Irish priests, named Gerald and Kelly, and one Robert Green, a cushion-keeper of the queen's chapel, with Lawrence Hill, footman to Dr. Godden, treasurer of the chapel, and Henry Berry, porter of Somerset-house, had, in consequence of a consultation with him, resolved to dispatch sir Edmundbury Godfrey, as a violent persecutor of the Roman catholics. On the 12th of October, in the evening, as sir Edmundbury was passing by Somerset-house, he was prevailed upon by Hill to enter the water-gate, in order to appease a sham quarrel between Kelly and Berry, when Green throwing a twisted handkerchief over his head, fixed it round his neck, and the rest falling upon him at the same time, he was strangled. They beat his breast with their knees, and twisted his neck till it was dislocated; and having shifted the body from one apartment in the palace to another, for four days and as many nights, conveyed it in a sedan-chair, at midnight, to Soho, where Hill waited for them with a horse, upon which it was placed before him, and they proceeded to Primrose-hill, where they left it in a ditch, after Gerald had thrust the sword into it. To oppose this, the centinels who were upon duty the night in which they were said to have removed the body, deposed, that no sedan was brought out of the palace; and the people who lived in the apartments declared upon oath, that no dead body could be brought thither without their knowledge, and that they were every day in the rooms Prance described, without seeing any thing of that nature. Green and Hill died protesting their innocence; and Berry, who was a protestant, and might have saved his life by making a confession, denied his being in any manner privy to the murder of this unfortunate gentleman. His corpse being embalmed, was kept till the 21st of October, when it was carried, in a very solemn manner, from Bridewell hospital, of which he was one of the governors, to St. Martin's in the Fields, where he was interred. It is remarkable, that the pall was supported by eight knights, all justices of the peace; all the aldermen of the city attended the funeral; seventy-two London ministers marched before the body; and a thousand persons, most of whom were of rank and eminence, closed the procession; and, in short, an excellent sermon, suitable to the occasion, was preached from 2. Sam. iii. 34. by Dr. Lloyd, dean of Bangor, and vicar of St. Martin's.

GODIN, a town of Germany, in Moravia, on the confines of Hungary, seated in the midst of several rivers and marshes.

GODOLPHIN (JOHN) an eminent English civilian, was born in the island of Scilly, on the 29th of November, 1617, and educated at Oxford. In 1642-3, he was created doctor of civil law; in 1653, was appointed one of the judges of the admiralty; and, at the Restoration, was made one of his majesty's advocates. He published the following works: 1. The holy Limbeck. 2. The holy Arbour. 3. A View of the Admiral's Jurisdiction. 4. The Orphan's Legacy; and, 5. Repertorium canonicum, &c. He died on the 4th of April, 1678.

GODMANCHESTER, formerly a considerable town in Huntingdonshire, and near the county town, on the river Ouse. It has now no market, but has a fair on Easter-Tuesday for all sorts of cattle. It was formerly called Durosiponte, where many Roman coins have been often dug up. Some say it was a bishop's see in the time of the Saxons, and had a castle built by one Gorman. It is a large village, and has been famous for the many ploughs it employed. It is fifty-seven miles north-by-west of London, and is nearly in the same longitude and latitude as Huntingdon.

GODWIN (THOMAS) bishop of Bath and Wells, was born at Ockingham, in Berkshire, in the year 1517, and was put to the grammar-school there, where discovering great abilities, and his parents being too poor to improve them, Dr. Richard Layton, archdeacon of Bucks, took him to his house, instructed him in classical learning till he was fit for the university, and then sent him to Magdalen college, Oxford, of which he became a fellow in 1545. His patron, the archdeacon, who had been some years dead, had been a zealous reformer, and Mr. Godwin had embraced his principles, which bringing him under the displeasure of some of the fellows of his college, he resigned his fellowship, and became master of the free-school at Brackley, in Northamptonshire; but upon the accession of queen Mary, his religion exposed him to fresh persecutions, which obliged him to leave his school, and in this exigency he applied himself to the study of physic, and being admitted to a bachelor's degree in that faculty in 1555, practised it for his support till the accession of queen Elizabeth. Now entering into the church, he became chaplain to Dr. Bullingham, bishop of Lincoln, who introduced him to the queen, who was so pleased with the grave turn of his oratory, that she appointed him one of her lent preachers; and, in 1565, he obtained the deanery of Christ-church, Oxford, and the same year, the prebend of Milton Ecclesia. In the beginning of 1566, he was promoted to the deanery of Canterbury; and queen Elizabeth making a visit to Oxford in the beginning of September, he attended her majesty, and, among others, kept an exercise in divinity against Dr. Humphries the professor, in which Dr. Jewel, bishop of Salisbury, was moderator. At the conclusion, the queen herself made an extempore speech in Latin, signifying her own great satisfaction, as well as that of the Spanish ambassador, the earl of Leicester, chancellor of the university, and sir William Cecil, chancellor of Cambridge, who had requested it of her majesty. In 1584, he was raised to the see of Bath and Wells; but soon after, notwithstanding his great age, he being near seventy, he imprudently entered a second, if not a third time into matrimony, though so broken down with the gout and other infirmities, that he was scarce able to stand; but though the lady was a widow of suitable years to his own, it gave the queen and courtiers great offence. He died on the 9th of November, 1590.

GODWIN (FRANCIS) bishop of Hereford, was son of the former, and was born at Haunington, or Havington, in Northamptonshire, in 1567, and studied at Christ-church college, Oxford, after which he became rector of Samford Orcais, in Somersetshire, prebendary of St. Decuman in the church of Wells, canon-residentiary there, and vicar of Weston in Zoyland, in the same county, and, in 1587, was collated to the subdeanery of Exeter. In the mean time, turning his studies to the antiquities of his own country, he, in 1590, accompanied Mr. Camden in his travels into Wales, in search of such curiosities, and for several years spent his leisure hours in these enquiries. In 1593, he commenced doctor of divinity, and, after several other preferments, he was, in 1607, consecrated bishop of Landaff, and, in 1617, was translated to the bishoprick of Hereford. He wrote, 1. Nuncius inanimatus Utopiæ. 2. Rerum Anglicarum Henrico

Henrico VIII. Edwardo VI. & Maria regnantibus Annales; which was tranſlated into Engliſh by Morgan Goodwin his ſon 3. A Catalogue of the Biſhops of England, ſince the firſt planting of the Chriſtian religion in this Iſland, with a brief Hiſtory of their Lives, &c. 4. The Man in the Moon; and, 5. A Computation of the value of the Roman Siſterce and Attic Talent. He died in April, 1633.

GODWIN (Dr. THOMAS) a learned Engliſh writer, was born in Somerſetſhire, in 1587, and educated at Oxford; he was afterwards choſen maſter of a free-ſchool at Abingdon, in Berkſhire, and obtained the rectory of Brightwell, near Wallingford, in Berkſhire, and afterwards received the degree of doctor of divinity. He wrote, 1. An Engliſh Expoſition of the Roman Antiquities. . Synopſis Antiquitatum Hebraicarum, ad Explicationem utriuſque Teſtamenti, &c. in quarto. 3. Moſes and Aaron, or Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Rights uſed by the ancient Hebrews; and other works. He died on the 20th of March, 1642-3.

GOEREE (WILLIAM) a celebrated and learned bookſeller, born at Middleburg, in 1635. He had the misfortune to loſe his father when very young, and to fall into the hands of an illiterate father-in-law, of a booriſh diſpoſition, who not permitting him to ſtudy, obliged him to chuſe a trade, on which he made choice of that of a bookſeller, as a profeſſion that would enable him to enjoy the converſation of the learned, and opportunities for ſtudy. He compoſed a great number of good books in Flemiſh, on architecture, ſculpture, painting, engraving, botany, medicine, and antiquities. His principal works are, 1. Jewiſh Antiquities, two volumes, folio. 2. The Hiſtory of the Jewiſh Church, four volumes, folio. 3. Sacred and Profane Hiſtory, in quarto. 4. Introduction to the Practice of Painting, octavo. 5. Univerſal Architecture, &c. He died at Amſterdam, on the 3d of May, 1711.

GOES, a ſtrong and conſiderable town of the United Provinces. It communicates with the ſea by a canal, and is ten miles eaſt of Middleburgh, twelve weſt of Bergen-op-Zoom, and thirty north of Ghent. Long. 3. 50. E. Lat. 51. 30. N.

GOETZE (GEORGE HENRY) a learned and zealous Lutheran, born at Leipſick, was ſuperintendant of the churches at Lubec. He wrote a conſiderable number of books in Latin and Greek, and died at Lubec, on the 25th of March, 1729, aged ſixty-one.

GOEZ (DAMIEN DE) a celebrated and learned Portugueſe gentleman, born at Alenquer, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the 16th century, by his abilities and his writings. He defended Louvain with great bravery, in 1542, againſt the French, and was recalled into Portugal to write the hiſtory of that kingdom; but he did not live to finiſh it; for falling into the fire, he was found dead, and half burnt. He wrote a number of works in Latin and Portugueſe, among which are, 1. Fidei, Religio, Moreſque Æthiopum. 2. De Imperio & Rebus Luſitanorum. 3. Urbis Oliſſiponenſis Deſcriptio. 4. Chronica do Rey Dom Emanuel. 5. Hiſtoria do. Principe Dom Juan, &c. and ſome others, which are eſteemed.

GOFF (THOMAS) an Engliſh writer, born in Eſſex, in the year 1592, he was educated in Weſtminſter-ſchool, from whence he removed to Chriſt-church college, Oxford. He writ ſeveral pieces on different ſubjects, among which are five plays, none of which were publiſhed till after his death. Theſe were, 1. The Careleſs Shepherdeſs, a tragicomedy. 2. The Courageous Turk, a tragedy. 3. Oreſtes, a tragedy. 4. The Raging Turk, a tragedy. 5. Selinus, Emperor of the Turks, a tragedy. Philips and Winſtanley have aſcribed a comedy to him, called Cupid's Whirligig. In the latter part of his life, forſaking the ſtage for the pulpit, he obtained the living of Eaſt Clendon in Surry, and inſtead of plays, wrote ſermons, ſome of which he publiſhed, as he alſo did two funeral orations, in Latin. He died in July, 1627.

GOGMAGOG HILLS, three miles ſouth-eaſt of Cambridge, remarkable for the intrenchments and other works caſt up there, which ſhews that it was a Roman camp or ſtation; but ſome ſay, they are owing to the Danes; but be that as it will, it was an advantageous camp, which commands the country, and has a fine dry turf, like that of Newmarket; and here the Cantabrigians generally take the air in winter.

GOITO, a city of Italy, in the duchy of Mantua, ſeated on the river Mincio, ten miles north-weſt of Mantua, between the Lake of Mantua, and that called the Garda. Long. 10. 0. E. Lat. 45. 16. N.

GOJAM, a country in Africa, in the kingdom of Abyſſinia, at the ſouth end of the lake Gambia. It is almoſt ſurrounded on all ſides by the Nile, and is pretty well known ſince the ſources of that river have been found out.

GOLCONDA, a kingdom of Aſia, in the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges. It is bounded by the province of Orixa on the north, by the bay of Bengal on the eaſt, by Biſnagar on the ſouth, and by Decan on the weſt, being about three hundred miles in length, and two hundred in breadth. It was once an independent kingdom, and one of the richeſt in India; the famous diamond mines being here, which produce the largeſt ſtones in the world. Upon which account the great mogul, Aurenzebe, made a conqueſt of it about ninety years ago. It is now ſubject to the great mogul.

GOLCONDA, a city in the peninſula of India, on this ſide the Ganges, and capital of the kingdom of that name. It is ſeated at the foot of a mountain, ninety miles eaſt from Dorabat, and two hundred north-weſt of Fort St. George. It was divided into three parts, when the king of this country reſided here, whereof the palace was one, the citadel the ſecond, and the town the third. The Engliſh and other European nations, have ſettlements on this coaſt, from whence they import the fineſt callicoes and chintz, as well as diamonds. Theſe laſt are uſually purchaſed of the black merchants, who buy pieces of ground among the mines at a venture, and ſometimes they ſucceed extremely well, and at others beggar their families. Long. 79. 10. E. Lat. 16. 0. N.

GOLDAST (MELCHIOR HAIMINSFELD) a famous civilian and hiſtorian, in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Biſhofs-Zell, in Swiſſerland, in 1576, and publiſhed ſeveral works, the principal of which are, a collection of ſeveral treatiſes on civil and eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, entitled, 1. Monarchia Sancti Romani Imperii, &c. three volumes folio. 2. Alamaniæ Scriptores, three volumes, folio. 3. Scriptores aliquot rerum Suevicarum, quarto. 4. Commentarius de Bohemiæ regno, quarto. 5. Informatio de Statu Bohemiæ quoad jus, quarto. 6. Sybilla Francica, quarto. This is a collection of pieces relating to the Maid of Orleans. Theſe are all eſteemed uſeful, curious, and important works. Goldaſt died on the 11th of Auguſt, 1635.

GOLDBERG, a of town Sileſia, which took its name from a gold-mine, found here many centuries ago. It is ſeated on the river Katſbach, in the duchy of Lignitz, thirty-ſix miles weſt of Breſlau, and is at preſent in the poſſeſſion of the king of Pruſſia. Long. 17. 10. E. Lat. 51. 3. N.

GOLD-COAST, a part of Guinea, is about ſixty miles in length, beginning at the Gold River, twelve miles weſt of Aſſinee, and ending with the village of Ponni, ſeven or eight miles eaſt of Acra. The countries it contains are eleven in number, namely, Axim, Ante, Adom, Jabi, Commani, Fetu, Saboe, Fantin, Acron, Agonna, and Aquamboe. Theſe do not contain above two or three towns and a village, lying upon the ſea-ſhore, as well under as between the forts of the Europeans; the greateſt and moſt populous towns being generally farther within land. They have moſt of them governors, which the ſeamen have dignified by the name of kings. Axim was ſaid formerly to have been a potent ſtate, but it is now divided by the Europeans, and we do not find it is above ſix miles in length. The negro traders are generally pretty rich, becauſe they bring a conſiderable quantity of gold to purchaſe European merchandizes. The Brandenburghers have a fort here; but the commanders and ſervants are generally Dutch. The river Ankaber is a very pleaſant river, and is very wide at the mouth. Its ſource is a conſiderable way in the country, but how far is not certain. The banks are adorned with fine lofty trees, which afford the moſt agreeable ſhade in the world, defending the traveller from the ſcorching beams of the ſun; and to add to the pleaſure, there are a great number of beautiful birds, and diverting monkeys. Ante begins at the village Boweſway, two miles eaſt of Acoday, now belonging thereto. In 1691, the Engliſh built a ſmall fort on this coaſt, but the negroes are ſo villanous and crafty there is no dealing with them to any advantage; for they have got a trick of counterfeiting the gold duſt. There are ſeveral other ſmall forts here belonging to other nations, which turn to no great account. This diſtrict, as well as all the Gold Coaſt abounds with hills, on which are extraordinary high and beautiful trees, between which are wide and extenſive vallies. The earth produces plenty of good rice, Indian corn, yams, potatoes, and ſeveral kinds of good fruit. The ſugar canes here are larger and better than any where elſe. Likewiſe palm wine and oil, may be had here in great abundance. There are abundance of villages, about which there is plenty of cattle. There are great numbers of oyſters here, which ſtick to the branches, or roots of mangrove trees, which grow by the river ſide. Adom is a wretched territory, whoſe negroes are very theiviſh and villainous. However it contains ſeveral ſmall iſlands, in the middle of the river, on which are ſeveral towns and villages Jabi begins at the Dutch fort, and runs a few miles into the inland parts, being but a very ſmall diſtrict. Commani is extended about five miles along the ſea-ſide, from the river Chama, to the town Mina, and is about as broad as it is long, and here the Engliſh have a very large fort, which is a ſquare building, ſtrengthened with good batteries. The town or village is near the Dutch fort, called Elmina, cloſe to which runs a ſmall river, the water of which is generally very ſalt, unleſs in the rainy ſeaſon. It ſeparates Commani from Fetu country, which was formerly forty miles in length, and as much in breadth. This was once a powerful nation, and had a good many towns and villages, but is now almoſt ruined by its continual wars. It had likewiſe vaſt quantities of corn and cattle, as well as palm-wine and oil, which are got from the palm-tree. Cape Coaſt Caſtle is ſeated on the ſhore in this diſtrict, and is the moſt conſiderable poſſeſſed by the Engliſh on the coaſt of Guinea. The diſtrict of Saboe is but ſmall, and the inhabitants of a very bad character. Fort Naſſau was the chief place belonging to the Dutch, before they took Elmina from the Portugueſe. The village Mouree lying under it, is pretty populous, and the inhabitants in general are fiſhermen, who carry out every morning four or five hundred canoes to fiſh, and the fifth part of what they catch is claimed by the Dutch commander. Fantin is bounded by Saboe on the eaſt, the Iron Mount half a mile below Mouree, being its extremity, in which diſtrict the Engliſh have a fort, as they likewiſe have at Anamaboe, which is ſmall, but very neat and compact. The inland inhabitants of this country are employed in tillage and drawing palm-wine. The next diſtrict to Fantin is Acra, which lies in a good place for trade. The next territory is Agonna, wherein is a very high mountain, called by the ſailors the Devil's Mount. It ſurpaſſes Acra in largeneſs, power, and richeſs. The laſt country on the Gold Coaſt is Aquamboe, which lies chiefly within land. Here the Engliſh, Danes, and Dutch have forts of the ſame name as the adjacent villages. There is ſometimes more gold to be had here, than on all the coaſt beſides. The negroes who inhabit this coaſt are ſaid to be of the beſt diſpoſition in all Guinea. The town at Cape Coaſt Caſtle, is a little without the gate, where the women keep a market, with canky, papais, ſoap, and fiſh, which are here in tolerable plenty; for about one hundred canoes are employed in fine weather in catching of fiſh. They are very ſuperſtitious, and are very fond of a ſort of charms which they call fetiches, which they firmly believe will protect them from all dangers. All the inhabitants on this coaſt, as well as in the reſt of Guinea, go almoſt naked, but the better ſort of women have ſeveral yards of narrow linen or ſtuff, which they wrap round their middles. They are in general a ſtrong, well limbed people; with flat noſes and thick lips, and generally without any deformity.

ſtrength-

GOLDAW, a town of Germany, in Pomerania, ſubject to the king of Pruſſia. It is ſeated on the river Ilna, near the Oder, twenty miles north-eaſt of Stetin. Long. 15. 20. E. Lat. 53. 44. N.

GOLDEN-AGE, in fabulous hiſtory, the firſt age of the world, when it was under the government of Saturn, at which time it is ſaid, that peace and innocence dwelt upon the earth, and ſweetened all the bleſſings of untroubled life. The fields and trees enjoyed a perpetual verdure, and the ſkies were undiſturbed by ſtorms and tempeſts. The deſcription of this ſtate of the world, given by Plato, Pythagoras, Ovid, &c. reſembles nothing ſo much as that ſtate of innocence and happineſs, which ended with the fall.

GOLDEN-ISLAND, lies at the mouth or gulph of Darien, in the province of Terra Firma, in South America. It was here that the Scots attempted to make a ſettlement, in the reign of king William, but finding it a barren ſpot of ground, they poſſeſſed themſelves of an iſthmus, on the oppoſite ſhore upon the continent, in a good ſoil, and naturally ſo ſtrong, that the Spaniards could not have diſpoſſeſſed them, if the Engliſh had not denied them aſſiſtance. Long. 82. 37. W. Lat. 9. 0. N.

GOLDINGEN, a city of Poland, in the duchy of Courland, with a good caſtle, ſeated on the river Wela, and ſubject to the king of Poland. Long. 22. 31. E. Lat. 56. 48. N.

GOLIUS (JAMES) a celebrated profeſſor of Arabic and the Mathematics at Leyden, was deſcended from a very honourable family, and born at the Hague, in the year 1596. He was put to the univerſity of Leyden, where he ſtudied under Erpenius; and having made himſelf maſter of all the learned languages, applied himſelf to the mathematics, phyſic, and divinity. He afterwards travelled into Africa and Aſia, and became greatly eſteemed by the king of Morocco, and the ſultan of the Turks. He at length returned to Leyden, loaden with manuſcripts, and in 1624 ſucceeded Erpenius in the Arabic chair. As he had been an eye-witneſs of the wretched ſtate of Chriſtianity in the Mahometan countries, he was filled with the compaſſion of a fellow-chriſtian; and none ever ſolicited for a place of honour and profit with greater eagerneſs, than he for procuring a new edition of the New Teſtament, in the original language, with a tranſlation into the vulgar Greek, by an Archimandrite; and as there are ſome of theſe Chriſtians, who uſe the Arabic tongue in divine ſervice, he alſo took care to have diſperſed among them an Arabic tranſlation of the confeſſion of the Proteſtants, together with the Catechiſm and Liturgy. In 1626 he was alſo choſen profeſſor of mathematics, and diſcharged the functions of both profeſſorſhips, with the greateſt applauſe, during forty years. He was likewiſe appointed interpreter in ordinary to the States for the Arabic, Turkiſh, Perſian, and other eaſtern languages, for which he had an annual penſion, and a preſent of a gold chain, with a very beautiful medal, which he wore as a badge of his office. He publiſhed the Life of Tamerlane, written in Arabic. 2. The Hiſtory of the Saracens, written by Elmacin. 3. Alferganus's Elements of Aſtronomy, with a new Verſion and learned Commentaries. 4. An excellent Arabic Lexicon. 5. A Perſian Dictionary. He died on the 24th of September, 1667.

GOLIUS (THEOPHILUS) profeſſor of ethics at Straſburg, was born in that city, in 1528. He wrote, in Latin, 1. A ſhort Scheme of Morality, extracted from the ten books of Ariſtotle, ad Nichomachum. 2. A ſhort Scheme of Politics, taken from the ſame author: and, 3. A Greek Grammar. He died in 1600.

GOLDSMITH (FRANCIS) a poet in the laſt century, was the ſon of Francis Goldſmith, of St. Giles's in the Fields, Middleſex, eſq. and was educated at Merchant Taylors ſchool. In 1629, he became a gentleman-commoner in Pembroke college, Oxford, and was ſoon after removed to St. John's college, where having taken a degree in arts, he removed to Gray's-Inn, London, where he ſtudied the common law. He obliged the world with a tranſlation from the Latin, of the celebrated Grotius; a play, called Sophompanes, or the Hiſtory of Joſeph, a tragedy. He alſo tranſlated Grotius's conſolatory Oration to his Father, with epitaphs, and likewiſe his Catechiſm, into Engliſh verſe. Mr. Goldſmith died at Aſhton, in Northamptonſhire, in September 1655.

GOLTZIUS, or GOLTS (HENRY) a celebrated engraver and painter, was born at Mulbracht, in the duchy of Juliers, and died in 1617, aged fifty-nine. His engravings are greatly eſteemed by all good judges.

GOLTZIUS (HUBERT) an excellent antiquary, born at Venlo, on the 30th of October, 1526. He travelled into France, Germany, and Italy, where his merit opened to him all the cabinets of the curious, and he became well-ſkilled in hiſtory from the inſcriptions, pictures, medals, and other monuments of antiquity, and his fame grew ſo great, that in 1567 he was honoured with the freedom of the city of Rome. He was the author of ſeveral excellent works, as 1. De Origine & Statu Populi Romani. 2. Vitæ & Res geſtæ J. Cæſaris. 3. Imperatorum fere omnium Vivæ Imagines a J. Cæſare ad Carolum V. ex veteribus Numiſmatibus. 4. Faſti Magiſtratuum, & Triumphorum Romanorum ab U. C. uſque ad Auguſti Obitum, and ſeveral other treatiſes, in all which he applies medals to the clearing up of ancient hiſtory. He was ſo nice and accurate, that he had them printed in his own houſe, corrected them himſelf, and engraved the plates for the medals with his own hands. Hence his books were admired all over Europe, and the learned gave them the higheſt praiſes: but though they abound with erudition, they muſt be read with ſome caution, as there are many falſe medals in them, which Goltzius miſtook for real antiques. He died at Bruges, on the 14th of March, 1583, aged fifty-ſeven.

GOMARUS (FRANCIS) profeſſor of divinity, was born at Bruges, on the 30th of January, 1563. He ſtudied under John Sturmius, and coming to England about the year 1582, he heard at Oxford the divinity lectures of Dr. John Rainholds, and at Cambridge thoſe of Dr. William Whittaker. In 1594 he became profeſſor of divinity at Leyden, where he had a great quarrel with James Arminius, his colleague, on the ſubject of predeſtination and grace, and not being able to prevent Vorſtius being put in Arminius's place, he left Leyden, and retired to Middleburgh, where he was miniſter and profeſſor. Gomarus afterwards taught at Saumur and at Groningen, at which laſt place he died, on the 11th of January, 1641, aged ſeventy-eight. He had a great ſhare in the deciſions of the ſynod of Dort, and on many occaſions diſcovered a great deal of outrageous zeal. His works were printed at Amſterdam in 1645, in folio.

GOMBAULD (JOHN OGIER DE) one of the beſt French poets in the ſeventeenth century, and one of the firſt members of the French Academy, was born at St. Juſt de Luſſac. He acquired the eſteem of Mary de Medicis, and of the wits of his time. He was a proteſtant, and died in a very advanced age. He wrote many works in verſe and proſe. His epigrams, and ſome of his ſonnets, are particularly eſteemed.

GOMBERVILLE (MARIN LE ROY DE) a member of the French Academy, was born at Chevreuſe, in the dioceſe of Paris, and was the author of three romances: Polexander, Cytharæa, and the Young Alcidian, and many other works in in verſe and proſe. He died at Paris, on the 14th of June, 1674, aged ſeventy-four.

GOMBROON, called by the natives Bander Abaſſi, or the ſea port of Abaſſi. This city ſtands on a bay, about twelve miles northward of the eaſt end of the iſland Kiſmiſh, and nine from the famous iſland of Ormus, where the Portugueſe formerly had a ſettlement. The beſt houſes are built with bricks dried in the ſun, made with a compoſition of clay, ſand, chopped ſtraw, and horſe-dung. They ſtand cloſe to each other, are flat on the top, and have each a ſquare turret, which riſes conſiderably higher than the reſt of the ſtructure, having holes on each ſide for the free paſſage of the wind and air. Thoſe that ſtay in this town in the ſummer ſeaſon, ſleep every night on the tops of their houſes. The meaner ſort live in miſerable huts, made with boughs of date or palm-trees, and covered with their leaves. The ſtreets are both narrow and ſhort, with many turnings, and the houſes almoſt meet together at the top; notwithſtanding which, when the weather is hot, people, as they paſs along, can hardly breathe, the air is ſo ſultry. The better ſort of people are clothed in the Perſian manner; but the poorer ſort, either out of neceſſity or choice, as well women as men, go quite naked, except a clout to cover what decency requires them to hide. Beſides the native Perſians, it is inhabited by Engliſh, Dutch, Portugueſe, Arabs, Jews, Armenians, Indians, and Banians. Theſe laſt are pretty numerous, and have ſo much influence over the chamacheen, or governor, by dint of preſents, that no cows are allowed to be publicly killed here; for theſe animals are had in the higheſt veneration by the Gentoos all over India. The Engliſh and Dutch have their factories here, which is a great advantage to the trade of the place. It is in ſuch a bad ſituation, that they have no neceſſaries here but mutton and fiſh. However, all other proviſions are brought to this place in ſufficient plenty, and are tolerably cheap. They have no water here which is fit to drink but rain water, kept in ciſterns, which are dry one half of the year; but the richer ſort have theirs brought from a village three miles off. The hills hereabouts are extremely barren, and the very rocks are almoſt covered with particles of ſalt, inſomuch, that when it rains, which is very ſeldom, the waters which run down the hills in rivulets are cruſted with a fine white ſalt on each ſide; but it is bitteriſh and not fit for uſe. Thoſe who can afford it, keep camels, which are daily employed in fetching water from Aſſeen, which is fifteen miles off, and is better than that abovementioned. The weather is ſo hot in June, July, and Auguſt, that it renders Gombroon very unhealthy, and has ſuch an effect on the water in the ſea, that it emits an intolerable ſtench; however, ſome imagine the putrefaction proceeds from a great quantity of ſhell fiſh, which are then thrown on the ſhore. At this time the air tarniſhes gold and ſilver in a ſtrange manner. In theſe months the better ſort of the inhabitants, as well as thoſe belonging to the Engliſh factory, retire to Aſſeen, where there are gardens with plenty of Seville oranges, and other fruit, as well as roots and herbage. But though it is ſo hot in ſummer, it is ſo cold in winter, that the Europeans are obliged to wear cloth coats lined with fur. The grapes, melons, and mangoes which are brought to Gombroon, are produced in the vallies beyond a very high mountain near it. The reflection of the ſun beams on this mountain is one reaſon of the exceſſive heat in the ſummer months, and the ſnow with which it is covered from November till March, is the principal cauſe of the change of the air to the other extreme. The gain made by the Engliſh Eaſt India company in carrying the merchandize of the Armenians, Moors, Banians, &c. from Gombroon to Surat, is one great branch of the company's profit. Long. 57. 35. E. Lat. 27. 0. N.

GOMERA, one of the Canary Iſlands, ſeated in the Atlantic ocean, between the iſlands of Ferro and Teneriff, and two hundred miles weſt of cape Bajadore, in Africa, ſubject to Spain. It is about fifty-five miles in circumference, and has a ſmall town of the ſame name. Here the Spaniſh fleet often take in refreſhments for their voyage, there being a fine large freſh water river, about nine miles ſouthward of the town. It produces grain and fruit ſufficient for the ſupport of its inhabitants; with great plenty of wine, and fruits common to theſe iſlands. The only commodity it produces is orchel. Long. 17. 10. W. Lat. 28. 0. N.

GOMEZ DE CIUDAD REAL (ALVAREZ) a Latin poet, in the ſixteenth century, was born at Guadalaxara, and was educated with Charles V. He acquired great reputation by his poem on the Golden Fleece; his Chriſtian Thalia, and his Muſe Paulina. Theſe three poems are in Latin. Gomez died on the 14th of July, 1538, aged fifty.

GOMEZ DE CASTRO (ALVAREZ) a learned writer of the ſixteenth century, born at St. Eulalia, near Toledo, was the author of ſeveral works in verſe and proſe. The moſt eſteemed of which is his Hiſtory of Cardinal Ximenes. He died in 1580, aged ſixty-five.

GOMEZ PEREIRA (GEORGE) a Spaniſh phyſician, born at Medina del Campo, is thought to have been the firſt perſon who taught that beaſts are mere machines, void of knowledge and ſenſation. He advanced this opinion in 1554, in his book intitled Antoniana Margarita, and was ſmartly attacked by Michael de Palacio, a divine of Salamanca, to whom he wrote a reply. Some authors have imagined that Deſcartes borrowed that opinion from this Spaniſh phyſician. Pereira wrote ſome other works.

GONDAR, the chief city of Abyſſinia, which ſome have fooliſhly pretended, is nothing but a camp. It is about ten miles in circumference, but is not populous in proportion to the quantity of ground it ſtands upon; for the houſes are only one ſtory high, built in the form of a tunnel, with the ſmall end upwards. They have no ſhops, and yet have a conſiderable trade, the merchants all meeting in a wide ſpacious ſquare, to treat of their affairs, and there they expoſe their merchandiſe to ſale. The market laſts from morning till night, and every one knows his own place, where he expoſes what he has to ſell. Their money is gold and ſalt, but the gold is not coined, as in Europe, but is in wedges, from which, as they have occaſion, they cut off from an ounce to a dram. For ſmall money they make uſe of rock ſalt, which is as white as ſnow, and as hard as a ſtone. It is dug out of the mountain Lafta, and carried to the king's magazines, where it is formed into bars, a foot in length, and twelve inches in circumference. Theſe they break, according to the ſum they have to pay, and they make uſe of it, not only for money, but for their domeſtic occaſions. There are about a hundred churches in this city, and the patriarch, who dwells in a palace near the principal church, is the head of their religion. He depends on the patriarch of Alexandria, by whom he is conſecrated. All the prieſts are a kind of monks, and there are two other biſhops beſides the patriarch. Long. 38. 25. E. Lat. 13. 10. N.

GONDEBAULD III. king of Burgundy, and the ſon of Gondicaire, conquered his brother Chilperic, put him to death, and took poſſeſſion of his kingdom in 491. He afterwards marched into Italy, plundered and ravaged Emilia and Liguria, and took Turin. At his return from this expedition he gave Clotilda his neice in marriage to Clovis, in 493. Seven years after Clovis defeated him, and purſued him to Avignon, where Gondebauld ſhut himſelf up, and was obliged to accept of peace on the conditions impoſed by the conqueror. Scarce was he at liberty when he beſieged and took Vienne, and cauſed his brother Godegiſile to be murdered in a church belonging to the Arians. After which, Gondebauld remained in the peaceable poſſeſſion of his kingdom till his death, which happened in 516. He gave the Burgundians a code of very uſeful laws, and was ſucceeded by his two ſons Sigiſmund and Godomar.

GONDRECOURT, a town of France, in the duchy of Barr, ſeated on the river Orney, in which there are excellent trouts. It is twenty miles ſouth of St. Michael, and ſeven from Barleduc. Long. 5. 37. E. Lat. 48. 30. N.

GONDREVILLE, a town of Lorrain, ſeated on the river Moſelle. It was formerly famous for a beautiful palace, and has now a caſtle, and a magnificent hoſpital with a conſiderable revenue; as alſo a very fine chapel. It is very agreeably ſeated upon a hill, three miles from Toul, and three from Nancy. Long. 6. 3. E. Lat. 48. 40. N.

GONDY, or GONDI (JOHN FRANCIS PAUL DE) better known by the name of Cardinal de Retz, was the ſon of Philip Emanuel de Gondi, count of Joigny, lieutenant general, &c. and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his abilities; but taking part againſt the king in the troubles of Paris, he was, in 1652, confined at Vincennes. He ſucceeded his uncle in the archbiſhoprick of Paris, in 1654, and though a priſoner, did not ceaſe diſturbing the court, as he ſtill governed by his grand-vicars. He afterwards eſcaped to Rome, and was reconciled to the king in 1661, when he reſigned the archbiſhoprick of Paris, and obtained the abbey of St. Dennis. He died at Paris, on the 24th of Auguſt, 1679, aged ſixty-ſix. The cardinal de Retz was intriguing, vain, and turbulent; he had a ſubtle, extenſive, and ſomething of a romantic turn of mind; but towards the cloſe of his life he became mild, peaceable, and lived like a private perſon, in order to pay his debts, which amounted to above four millions of livres. His Memoirs are very entertaining: the beſt edition of them is that of Amſterdam, in four volumes, duodecimo, publiſhed in 1719.

GONET (JOHN BAPTIST) a Dominican friar, born at Beziers, was doctor of the univerſity of Bourdeaux, where he taught divinity with reputation. He afterwards became provincial of his order, and died at Beziers, on the 24th of January, 1681, aged ſixty-five. His principal work is a courſe of ſchool divinity, intitled Clypeus Theologiæ Thomiſticæ.

miſticæ. The beſt edition of which is that of Lyons, in 1681, in five volumes, folio.

GONESSE, a town in the Iſle of France, ten miles from Paris, ſeated on the river Orou. It is remarkable for its excellent bread, which is brought twice a week to Paris. Long. 2. 32. E. Lat. 48. 59. N.

GONGA, a town of Turky in Europe, in Romania, near the ſea called Marmora, thirteen miles from Rudiſto, and thirty-ſix north-eaſt of Gallipoli. Long. 37. 31. E. Lat. 40. 53. N.

GONGORA Y ARGORE (LEWIS) a celebrated Spaniſh poet, born at Cordoua, of a diſtinguiſhed family, on the 11th of July, 1561. He acquired ſuch reputation by his lyric verſes, and other poems, that he was ſurnamed The prince of the Spaniſh poets. He embraced the ſtate of an eccleſiaſtic, was chaplain to the king, and prebendary in the church of Cordoua, in which ſtation he died, on the 23d of March, 1627, aged ſixty-ſix. His works are publiſhed in quarto.

GONNELLI (JOHN) a famous ſculptor, or rather modeller, ſurnamed The Blind Man of Cambaſſi, loſt his ſight at twenty years of age, which did not prevent his modelling with ſucceſs. He made his figures in clay, which was afterwards baked, and rendered them perfect, though guided only by the touch. It is ſaid that he made buſts of perſons, that exactly reſembled them in the ſame manner; and among the reſt, the buſt of M. Heiſſelin, comptroller of the treaſury at Paris. He died at Rome, under the pontificate of Urban VIII.

GONSALVE, FERNANDEZ DE CORDOUA. See CORDOUA.

GONTAULT. See BIRON.

GONTRAN, king of Orleans and Burgundy, was the ſon of Clotaire I. and aſcended the throne in 562. The Lombards entering his dominions, at firſt obtained great advantages over Amat his general; but at length were entirely defeated by another of his generals, named Mummol. This prince made war on two of his brothers, Rechared, king of the Goths, and Waroe, duke of Brittany, with various ſucceſs; at length Mummol revolting againſt him, proclaimed Gondebauld, the pretended ſon of Clotaire, king, on which Gontran ſent one of his generals againſt them, who defeated and put them both to death. Chilperic being aſſaſſinated in 584, Gontran immediately entered Paris, and took his nephew Clotaire II. who was the ſon of Chilperic, under his protection. He held ſeveral councils, loved juſtice, and the public welfare, and having adopted his nephew Childebert, whom he choſe for his ſucceſſor, died on the 28th of March, 593, aged ſixty.

GONZAGA (JULIA) ducheſs of Trajetto, and counteſs of Fondi, was the wife of Veſpaſian Colonna, after whoſe death ſhe took for her device an amaranthus, which the herbaliſts call love-flower, with this motto, Non moritura, ſignifying by this, that her love for her huſband ſhould be immortal. She was in the prime of her age, and ſo celebrated for her beauty, that Solyman II. emperor of the Turks, ſent Barbaroſſa with a powerful army to carry her off; that general arrived in the night before Fondi, where Julia commonly reſided, and took the city by ſtorm, but that virtuous lady leaped out of the window in her ſmock, and eſcaped into the mountains, where, to preſerve her honour, ſhe expoſed herſelf to a thouſand dangers. M. de Thou, and other writers, praiſe her for her learning. She was addreſſed by the greateſt lords in Italy; but they could not prevail upon her to marry again. She was ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm

GONZAGA (LUCRETIA) one of the moſt illuſtrious ladies in the ſixteenth century, was celebrated by the wits of her time for her learning, and the delicacy of her ſtyle. She was unhappy with her huſband, John Paul Manfrone, whom ſhe married with reluctance, when but fourteen years of age, and who was not worthy of her with reſpect to fortune. He was brave, but at the ſame time of a haughty diſpoſition, and behaved ſo ill, that the duke of Ferrara threw him into priſon, and thought him worthy of death. He however ſpared his life, on account of Lucretia his wife. That illuſtrious lady made uſe of all poſſible means to procure his liberty; but though ſhe wrote a very moving letter to the duke of Ferrara, and implored the interceſſion of the popes and princes of Chriſtendom, ſhe could neither procure his liberty, nor obtain the permiſſion of ſeeing him, and could only correſpond with him by means of her pen. Her huſband dying in priſon, ſhe refuſed engaging in a ſecond marriage. People had ſuch an eſteem for her Letters, that they not only took the utmoſt care to preſerve them, but collected even the ſhort pieces ſhe wrote to her domeſtics, which were printed with her Letters at Venice, in 1552.

GONZALEZ DE CASTIGLIO (JOHN) a Spaniſh Auguſtine monk, celebrated for his piety and his ſermons, died at Salamanca, on the 11th of June, 1479, aged forty-nine, being poiſoned at the altar by a conſecrated hoſt, which a widow lady had cauſed to be given him, for having converted a knight whom ſhe was in love with.

GOODWIN SANDS, near the Iſle of Thanet, were lands that formerly belonged to Goodwin, earl of Kent, father of king Harold, and being low ground, were defended from the ſea by a great wall, which required conſtant care to keep in order. This tract was afterwards given to St. Auſtin's monaſtery near Canterbury, whoſe abbot neglecting the wall, while he was buſy in building Tenterden ſteeple, the ſea broke in and drowned the ſaid lands, which have proved dangerous to ſailors ever ſince. They lie between the North and South Forelands, and run parallel with the ſhore for nine miles together, about three or four miles diſtant from it, and are dry at low water. They break the ſea on the ſouth-eaſt and ſouth-weſt, and thereby make the Downs a tolerable road; but when the wind blows very hard from other points, ſhips are often driven from their anchors, and are forced on the ſands, or into Sandwich bay, or Ramſgate pier.

GOR, a town in India, capital of a province of the ſame name, which belongs to the great mogul, and is ſeated near Great Tibet. Long. 88. 25. E. Lat. 31. 15. N.

GORANTO, a mountain of Natolia. It is the beginning of Mount Taurus, and there was formerly flames and ſmoke ſeen on the top, which cauſed the ancient poets to give it the name of Chimæra, which they called a monſter with a lion's head and breaſt, the body of a goat, and the tail of a dragon.

GORCUM, a city of the United Provinces, in South Holland, ſeated on the river Waal, twenty-two miles eaſt of Rotterdam. It is a fortified town, and has a ſtrong caſtle, and is noted for cheeſe, freſh-water fiſh, and wild ducks. Long. 4. 55. E. Lat. 51. 49. N.

GORDIAN the Elder, was the ſon of Metius Marcellus, and deſcended, on his mother's ſide, from the emperor Trajan. His magnanimity, eloquence, probity, moderation, and other excellent qualities obtained him ſo many friends, that, when proconſul in Africa, he was, in 237, ſaluted emperor, notwithſtanding his old age and his own reſiſtance, by the troops raiſed againſt Maximinus. He aſſociated his ſon Gordian to the empire; but, a ſhort time after, Capellianus, governor of Mauritania, marched againſt him, and, after a bloody battle, in which his ſon Gordian loſt his life, at forty-ſix years of age, he killed himſelf, at above eighty, for fear of falling into the hands of Maximinus. He had gained the affections of the Roman people while he was quæſtor, by giving public games and feaſts, and had compoſed in his youth a poem on the lives of the Antoninuſes. His ſon was alſo a man of learning.

GORDIAN the Younger, the ſon or nephew of the ſecond Gordian, was elected emperor of Rome, in 238, when about ſixteen years of age. Though young, he wanted neither prudence nor conduct. He quelled the ſedition of Sabinianus, married the daughter of Miſithæus, an excellent philoſopher, changed the face of affairs of the empire, retook Antioch, but was aſſaſſinated by the intrigues of Philip, præfect of that province, in 244, while he was driving the Perſians out of Syria, after his having conquered Sapor.

GORDIUS, king of Phrygia, and the father of Midas, was raiſed to the kingdom, after having no other fortune but two yokes of oxen, one of which ſerved to draw the plough, and the other his cart. It is ſaid that the knot which faſtened the harneſs to the pole, was tied ſo dextrouſly, that the ends could not be diſcovered, and that it was currently reported, that he who ſhould untie it, would poſſeſs the empire of Aſia. This knot Alexander being unable otherwiſe to untie, cut with his ſword, and in this manner accompliſhed the prediction, whence aroſe the proverb of cutting the Gordian knot.

GORDON (THOMAS) a ſpirited, but ſevere writer, was born at Kircudbright, in the ſhire of Galloway, in Scotland, and had a univerſity education, but whether at St. Andrew's or Aberdeen is uncertain. He came when a young man to London, where he ſupported himſelf by teaching the languages, and firſt diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the Bangorian controverſy by writing two pamphlets in defence of the biſhop, on which Mr. Trenchard took him into his houſe firſt as an amanuenſis, and afterwards into partnerſhip as an author; and in the year 1720, they began to publiſh in conjunction an ingenious work, entitled Cato's Letters. About the ſame time, they publiſhed another periodical paper, under the title of the Independent Whig, which, after Mr. Trenchard's death, was continued by Mr. Gordon, who at length obtained the poſt of commiſſioner of the wine licences, which he enjoyed many years, and died on the 28th of July, 1750. Mr. Gordon alſo publiſhed an excellent Tranſlation of Tacitus, and another of Salluſt, with many tracts, of which two collections have been made ſince his death, the firſt entitled, A Cordial for low Spirits, three volumes; and the ſecond, which contains many of his other other pamphlets, entitled The Pillars of Prieſtcraft and Orthodoxy ſhaken, two volumes.

GOREE, capital of an iſland of the ſame name, in the United Provinces, ſeated eight miles ſouth of Briel. Long. 3. 50. Lat. 51. 55. N.

GOREE, an iſland on the coaſt of Africa, ſurrounded with rocks, except in one place. It was ceded to the Dutch in 1617, and they built two forts there. The Engliſh became maſters of it in 1663; but admiral Ruyter retook it in 1664 The French became maſters of it in 1667. The Engliſh took it again in 1758; however, it was given up by the peace in 1763. The ſoil of it is barren, but it is of great importance, on account of the goodneſs of its road. Long. 12. 25. E. Lat. 14 30. N.

GORGONA, a ſmall iſland of Italy in the Tuſcan Sea, near the iſland of Corſica, towards the north. It is about eight miles in compaſs, and belongs to the great duke of Tuſcany. Long. 10. 0. E. Lat. 43 24. N.

GORGONA, a ſmall iſland in the Pacific Ocean, twelve miles weſt of the Peruvian coaſt, in South America. Its a high woody iſland, with a good harbour and good water. Hither the buccaneers and other adventurers uſually reſorted to wait for prizes, and for wood and water. The Spaniards have not thought it worth while to ſettle a colony here, tho' they come hither ſometimes after the rains, to ſearch the rivulets for gold. Long. 79. 3. W. Lat. 3. 30. S.

GORGONS, in fabulous hiſtory, were three ſiſters, the daughters of Phorcus and Ceta. They were named Meduſa, Euryole, and Sthenio, and are repreſented as having ſnakes inſtead of hair, brazen hands, and golden wings. Heſiod ſays they had but one eye between all the three, and that they made uſe of it by turns. They lived near the garden of the Heſperides, and transformed into ſtone all who looked at them. Perſeus, with the aſſiſtance of Minerva, killed Meduſa, when her ſiſters purſued him, and he eſcaped by putting on an helmet, lent him by Pluto, which rendered him inviſible.

GORGOPHONE, the daughter of Perſeus and Andromeda, and the wife of Petieres, king of Meſſina, after the death of her huſband married Æbalus. This is the firſt woman mentioned in profane hiſtory, as having engaged in a ſecond marriage.

GORITIA, or GORITZ, a ſmall but ſtrong town of Germany, with a caſtle, and the capital of a territory of the ſame name, in the duchy of Carniola, and circle of Auſtria, ſeated near the confines of Venice, on the river Lizonzo, twenty miles north-eaſt of Aquila, and ſixty-four north-eaſt of Venice. Long. 13. 43. E. Lat. 46. 20. N.

GORLÆUS (ABRAHAM) a learned antiquary, was born at Antwerp, in 1549, and acquired great reputation by collecting a great number of medals, rings, ſeals, and other monuments of antiquity. He died at Delft, on the 15th of April, 1609, aged ſixty. He wrote a ſmall but curious and excellent treatiſe on the ſeal-rings of the ancients, entitled Dactyliotheca, the beſt edition of which is that of Leyden, in 1695; and other works.

GORLITZ, a city of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, and marquiſate of Luſatia. It is ſeated in a marſh, upon the river Neiſſe, and has ſeveral handſome churches and good houſes. It is ſtrong both by nature and art, and carries on a trade in linen cloth and beer. It is the ſeat of juſtice, and the reſidence of a governor. It is fifty miles eaſt of Dreſden, and ſeventy north-by-eaſt of Prague. Long. 15. 15. E. Lat. 51. 10. N.

GOSELINI (JULIAN) born at Rome, was ſecretary to Gonzago, viceroy of Sicily, and continued in the ſame poſt when this viceroy was made governor of Milan, he alſo enjoyed that office under ſeveral other governors, and notwithſtanding he was employed in the buſineſs of his office for near forty years, publiſhed ſeveral works, the principal of which are, 1. The Life of Ferdinand de Gonzaga. 2. The Conſpiracy of John Lewis de Fieſchi, &c.

GOSLAR, a city of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and duchy of Brunſwick. It is conſiderable for its ſilver and lead mines, which render moſt of the inhabitants miners, they being all in general employed in digging, ſmelting, cleanſing, tempering, or vending thoſe metals. It is an imperial city, governed by its own magiſtrates, though ſurrounded by the territories of Brunſwick. It was here that the monk Berthold Schwartz found out the art of making gunpowder. It is ſeated on the river Goes, twenty-two miles ſouth of Hildeſheim, thirty-ſix ſouth-weſt of Alberſtat, and twenty-five ſouth of Brunſwick. Lon. 3. 37. E. Lat. 51. 55. N.

GOSPORT, a town in Hampſhire, has a ferry over the mouth of the harbour to Portſmouth, and is chiefly inhabited by ſailors and their wives, and the warrant officers. It is a large town, and has ſome trade, but it is in the moſt flouriſhing condition in time of war. Some travellers chooſe to lodge here, becauſe every thing is cheaper and more commodious than at Portſmouth. The mouth of the harbour is not ſo broad here as the Thames at Weſtminſter, and it is ſecured on this ſide by four forts and a platform of above twenty cannon, level with the water. Here is a noble hoſpital for the cure of ſick and wounded ſailors, in the ſervice of the navy, beſides a free-ſchool. It has a market on Saturdays, and two fairs, on May 4. and October 10, for toys. It is ſeventy-eight miles from London.

GOSTAVIN, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Rava, ſeated forty miles north of Rava. Long. 20. 10. E. Lat. 52. 25. N.

GOTESCALC, alſo named FULGENTIUS, a famous Benedictine monk, was a native of Germany, and embraced the monaſtic life at Orbais, in the dioceſe of Soiſſons, where he became prieſt. He there applied himſelf to reading the works of St. Auguſtin, and at length quitted his monaſtery to go to Rome, in order to viſit the tombs of the apoſtles. When he was on his return, he had a converſation with Northingus, biſhop of Verona, on predeſtination; and that biſhop being ſtartled at Goteſcalc's opinion, accuſed him to Raban, archbiſhop of Mentz. Goteſcalc went to that city in 848, and preſented Raban with his confeſſion of faith, but he was condemned by a council which Raban aſſembled on that ſubject, and ſent to Hincmar, archbiſhop of Rheims, his ſuperior, who accuſed him to the council of Querci, where he was condemned, degraded from prieſt's orders, obliged to caſt his writings into the fire, to be whipped, and ſhut up in cloſe priſon in the monaſtery of Hautvillers, in the dioceſe of Rheims, where he died about the year 868. The monks, by Hincmar's order, refuſed him the ſacraments and Chriſtian burial. Upon this occaſion, there aroſe a great diſpute between the biſhops of France, on predeſtination and grace.

GOTHA, a city of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, and capital of the duchy of Saxe-Gotha, ſubject to the brother of the late princeſs dowager of Wales, who keeps a very elegant court here. It is ſeated in a fine plain on the river Leina, and is well built and ſtrongly fortified. The inhabitants carry on a good trade in woad. The caſtle of the duke is ſeated on an eminence, and contains a great many curioſities. It is fifteen miles ſouth of Erford, and fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Mulhauſen. Long. 11. 0 E. Lat. 51 2 N.

GOTHARD, a mountain ſo called, is one of the higheſt in Swiſſerland, and is about eight miles from Altdorf. On the top, there is a houſe belonging to the capuchins, from whence there is the fineſt proſpect in the world. Over this mountain, is a very important paſs to Italy. This road is pleaſant and diverting, at the ſame time that it is rugged and dangerous; for on the lower part of the mountain you may ſee trees riſing one above another, through which you may juſt diſcern the river Ruſs, whoſe foaming ſtream ſalutes your ears with a roaring noiſe. Several ſmaller rivers run into this, ſome of which run gently down the declivity with an agreeable murmur, while others hurry down the precipices with a thundering noiſe, and part of them meeting with the rocks are reſolved into a miſt, which refracting the ſun-beams ſhow a variety of rainbows, that charm the eye of the wondering traveller; but ſoon after, the dreadful rocks which hang over the road fill his mind with horror, from an apprehenſion of their falling and cruſhing him to atoms; for they are ſo worn out underneath, that they ſeem ready to tumble down every moment. When he is in a more ſecure place, and looks around him, he muſt needs be full of aſtoniſhment, when he ſees ſome mountains of ſtupendous height quite naked and bare, while others are covered with foreſts of trees, and a prodigious variety of medicinal herbs. It is hard to conceive what toil, labour, hazard, and expence, the inhabitants are at to keep the road in the condition we find it in both ſummer and winter. In ſome places, one rock is joined to another by an arched bridge; in others, a paſſage is cut through ſolid ſtone; and where the road is ready to ſink, it is ſupported by ſtrong walls and buttreſſes, conſiſting of ſtrong poſts drove deep into the earth, and ſtones, which are faſtened together with iron hooks.

About five leagues within the mount, there is a bridge of one arch of ſuch a wonderful contrivance, and ſo ſurpriſing a height, that the inhabitants will not believe it was in the power of man to build it, and therefore they conclude that it muſt be the work of the devil.

GOTHLAND, the moſt ſouthern province of Sweden, being a peninſula, encompaſſed on three ſides by the Baltic Sea, or the channel at the entrance of it. It is divided into ſeveral parts, which are Eaſt Gothland, Weſt Gothland, Smaland, Halland, Bleaking, and Schonen. It was a long time in the poſſeſſion of the kings of Denmark, but was ceded to Sweden, in 1654. The principal towns of Gothland are Calmar, Landſcroon, Chriſtianople, Daleburg, Gothenburg, Helmſtat, Lunden, Malmone, and Vexio.

GOTHLAND, an iſland in the Baltic Sea, forty-five miles from the ſhore of Eaſt-Gothland, on which it depends. It is about about forty-eight miles in length from north to south, and fifteen in breadth, and feeds a great number of horned cattle and horses.

GOTHOFRED, or GODFREY, (DENNIS) an eminent civilian, of the proteſtant religion, was born at Paris, on the 17th of October, 1549. He ſtudied the civil law at the univerſities of Lorrain, Cologn, and Heidelberg, and ſucceſſively filled the profeſſor's chair at Geneva, Straſburg, and Heidelberg: at length died at Straſburg, on the 7th of September, 1622, aged ſeventy-three. He wrote a great number of books, but his principal work is the Corpus Juris Civilis, the notes of which are greatly admired, on account of the perſpicuity of the ſtyle and the profound erudition with which they abound. This work had gone through no leſs than twenty-two editions in folio and quarto, to the year 1719, among which that of Anthony Vitre, in 1628, in two volumes folio, and that of Amſterdam, on an Elzivir type, in 1663, are not only the beſt on account of their being finely and magnificently printed; but as there are ſeveral things in them omitted in the other editions.

GOTHOFRED (THEODORE) ſon of the former, was born at Geneva, on the 17th of July, 1580, and finiſhed his ſtudies at Straſburg, after which he quitted his parents, and going to Paris, embraced the Romiſh religion. He now applied himſelf with indefatigable induſtry to the ſtudy of hiſtory, and more particularly to that of France, by which he acquired a great reputation; and, in 1613, publiſhing Memoirs on the Precedency of the Kings of France to thoſe of Spain, in folio, the French king was ſo pleaſed with it, that he gave him a penſion of ſix hundred livres; on his afterwards publiſhing other works, his penſion was increaſed to twelve hundred, and, in 1632, he was honoured with the title of one of the king's hiſtoriographers, with a ſalary of three thouſand livres per annum. He was afterwards appointed to labour with the plenipotentiaries for a general peace at the treaty of Munſter, in 1643; on which occaſion the king honoured him with the dignity of counſellor in the council of ſtate, and made him a privy counſellor. He died at Munſter, on the 5th of October, 1649, at the age of ſixty-nine. His Ceremonials of the Kings of France is eſteemed his maſter-piece.

GOTHOFRED (JAMES) brother to the preceding, was born at Geneva on the 13th of September, 1587, and ſtudying the law, gained ſuch reputation, that, in 1619, he obtained a profeſſor's chair at Geneva, and ten years after was made counſellor for that city. He was employed ſeveral times in France, Germany, Piedmont, and Swiſſerland, in negociating affairs in the name of the republic, and wrote ſeveral works, the chief of which is his Codex Theodoſianus cum perpetuis Commentariis, in four volumes folio. He died on the 24th of June, 1652, in the ſixty-fifth year of his age.

GOTO, a province of Japan, conſiſting of five ſmall iſlands, the principal of which is very fruitful. Ocura is the capital, where there is a great trade carried on in fiſh.

GOTTENBURG is a rich ſtrong town of Sweden, in the province of Weſtrogothia, with a commodious harbour, the beſt ſituated for a foreign trade of any port in Sweden, becauſe it lies without the Sound. It is ten miles ſouth of Bahus, one hundred and five north-by-weſt of Copenhagen. and an hundred and eighty-two ſouth-weſt of Stockholm. Long. 11. 50. E. Lat. 57. 44. N.

GOTTINGEN, a conſiderable town of Germany, in the duchy of Brunſwick, formerly imperial, but now ſubject to the duke of Brunſwick. Here his late majeſty king George II. erected a univerſity. It is ſeated on the river Liene, twenty five miles north-eaſt of Caſſel, and thirty ſouth-weſt of Goſlar. Long. 10. 5. E. Lat. 51. 32. N.

GOTTORP, a town of Denmark, in the duchy of Sleſwick, and capital of the duke of Holſtein Gottorp's territories, where he has a fine palace. Long. 9. 0. E. Lat. 54. 40. N.

GOTZOZ, an iſland of Africa, on the coaſt of Barbary, to the north-weſt of the iſland of Malta, from which it is five miles diſtant, and to the ſouth of Sicily, it belongs to the knights of Malta, to whom the emperor Charles V. gave it in 1530. It was taken by the Turks in 1531; but ſince that time the knights have put it in a good ſtate of defence. It breeds no venemous animals.

GOUDA, or TERGOW, is a city of the province of Holland, built on the banks of the rivers Gow and Iſſel, whoſe waters are very clear, and abound with fiſh. It is the ſixth and laſt of the great towns of Holland, and is ſurrounded by gardens, between which there are pleaſant walks planted with trees, which render the avenues extremely delightful. The town is populous, the air mild, and the water good. The market-place is nearly in the form of a triangle, in the middle of which is the ſtadthouſe. It is accounted a place of ſtrength, becauſe it ſtands low, and the inhabitants can lay the country under water. The great church is a handſome ſtructure, and one of the largeſt of the province, but it is particularly remarkable for its painted glaſs windows, the fineſt in Europe. It is a place of no great trade; but the mints help to maintain it. However, they carry on a commerce in flax, and employ a great number of hands in making ropes; beſides they make here the neateſt and beſt tobacco-pipes in the whole world. It is eight miles from Rotterdam, and twelve from Leyden. Long 4. 37. E. Lat. 52. 2. N.

GOUDELIN, or GOUDOULI, (PETER) a famous Gaſcon poet, born at Toulouſe, was the ſon a ſurgeon. He gave himſelf up entirely to poetry, and compoſed in the Gaſcon language, verſes that have procured him immortal reputation. The duke de Montmorency, Adrian de Montluc, Bertier the firſt preſident, and other perſons of rank had a particular eſteem for him, nevertheleſs he would have died for want in his old age, if his fellow-citizens had not provided for him. He died at Toulouſe, on the 10th of September, 1649, aged ſeventy. His works have had many editions.

GOUDHURST, a town in Kent, with a market on Wedneſdays, and a fair on Auguſt 26, for cattle. Once it had a very high ſteeple, which was fired by lightning, and was forced to be pulled down. It has been rebuilt, but is nothing like the former. It is fourteen miles ſouth of Maidſtone, eighteen north-weſt of Rye, and forty three ſouth-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 25. E. Lat 51. 8. N.

GOUDIMEL (CLAUIUS) an excellent muſician born at Franche Comté, and was aſſaſſinated at Lyons, in 1572, for being of the proteſtant religion. They made a crime of his ſetting to muſic the Pſalms of Marot and Beza.

GOVERNOLO, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Mantua. It was taken by the Imperialiſts in 1702, and by the French in 1703. It is ſeated on the river Mincio, near the Po, eleven miles ſouth-eaſt of Mantua, and eleven north-weſt of Mirandola. Long. 11. 55. E. Lat. 45. 10. N.

GOUJON, a celebrated ſculptor and architect, born at Paris, flouriſhed under the reigns of Francis I. and Henry II. He is ſaid to have deſigned the fronts of the old Louvre. Nobody ever ſurpaſſed him in figures in demi-relievo, and nothing of this kind can be more beautiful than that of the fountain of the Innocents, in the ſtreet of St. Denis at Paris. There are many other of his works in the ſame city, that are the admiration of the connoiſſieurs, in which we may trace the ſimple and ſublime beauties of antiquity; whence he has been called Correggio of ſculpture.

GOULART (SIMON) a famous miniſter of Geneva, was born at Senlis, and was one of the moſt indefatigable writers of his time. He made conſiderable additions to the Catalogue of Witneſſes of the Truth, compoſed by Illyricus, and acquired a great reputation by his works, the principal of which are, 1. A Tranſlation of Seneca. 2. A Collection of memorable Hiſtories. 3. A Tranſlation of St. Cyprian de Lapſis. 4. Several devotional and moral treatiſes. He died at Geneva, in 1628, at eighty-five years of age.

GOULETTA, a conſiderable fort on the coaſt of Barbary, in the kingdom of Tunis. It is ſeated in the gulph of Tunis, in the narroweſt place, and is deſigned to defend the entrance, and as a rampart to the city of Tunis, which is at the bottom of this gulph. It was taken by Barbaroſſa in 1535. Charles V. carried it by aſſault in 1536, and it was alſo taken by Selim II. emperor of the Turks, in 1574. It is three hundred and ſeventy-five miles eaſt of Algiers, and twenty-five north of Tunis. Long. 10. 50. E. Lat. 37. 10. N.

GOULSTON, or GOULSON (THEODORE) an eminent Engliſh phyſician in the ſeventeenth century, was born in Northamptonſhire, and educated at Oxford. In 1610 he took the degree of doctor of phyſic, and the next year was made a fellow of the College of Phyſicians at London, where he had ſoon a very large practice, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſkill in the Latin and Greek languages, and by his writings, which are, 1. Verſio Latina & Paraphraſis in Ariſtotelis Rhetoricam. 2. Ariſtotelis de Poetica Liber Latinè converſus & analytica Methodo illuſtratus, quarto. 3. Verſio variæ Lectiones & Annotationes criticæ in Opuſcula varia Galeni. He died on the 4th of May, 1632, and left by his will two hundred pounds to purchaſe a rent-charge for the maintenance of an annual lecture within the College of Phyſicians, London.

GOURA, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Majovia, belonging to the biſhop of Poſnania, who has filled it full of monks. It is ſeated on the Viſtula, twelve miles from Warſaw. Long. 21. 50. E. Lat. 52. 1. N.

GOURDON, a town of France, in Querci, near the confines of Perigord, ſeated on the river Sor, fifteen miles north of Cahors. Long. 1. 31. E. Lat. 45. 53. N.

GOURGUES (DOMINIC DE) a gentleman diſtinguiſhed by his bravery, was born at Mont de Marſan, in Gaſcony. Reſolving to be revenged on the Spaniards, who had uſed him ill during the war, and had maſſacred a colony of French ſettled on the coaſt of Florida, he fitted out three veſſels at his own expence, and ſet ſail in 1567. He landed in in Florida, took three forts, and hanged, or otherwiſe deſtroyed, above eight hundred Spaniards. At his return to France, inſtead of being praiſed for thus revenging his country, he was, at the ſollicitation of the Spaniſh ambaſſador, in danger of being put to death, but was ſaved by the admiral de Chattillon. Queen Elizabeth afterwards ſent for him to command the Engliſh fleet; but he died at Tours, in 1593, as he was coming to take upon himſelf that command.

GOURNAY, a town of France, in Normandy, and territory of Bray, celebrated for its butter-market. It is ſeated on the river Ept, twelve miles from Giſors, fifteen from Rouen, twenty-five from Beauvais, and fifty-three north-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 33. E. Lat. 49. 25. N.

GOURNAY (MARY DE JARS DE) a lady celebrated for her learning, was the daughter of William de Jars, lord of Neufvi and Gournay. After the death of her father, ſhe called herſelf the daughter of Michael de Montaigne, for whom ſhe ſhewed the ſame reſpect as for her real father; and, on the other hand, Montaigne eſteemed this lady, and acknowledged her kind of adoption. She dedicated her Noſegay of Pindus to his daughter, and compoſed ſeveral other works, the moſt conſiderable of which is intitled Les Avis. The moſt learned men gloried in writing to her, and receiving her letters in return. She died at Paris, on the 13th of July, 1645, aged eighty, without having ever been married.

GOURVILLE, valet de chamber to the duke of Rochefoucault, became his friend, and even that of the great Conde; yet was hanged in effigy at Paris, while he was envoy in Germany to the French king; and was afterwards propoſed as a proper perſon to ſucceed the great Colbert in his miniſtry. He wrote Memoirs of his Life, wherein he mentions his birth and fortune without the leaſt concern. Voltaire has made great uſe of this work in his Age of Lewis XIV.

GOUTHIER, or GUTHIERIES, (JAMES) in Latin Guthierius, a learned and judicious antiquary and civilian, was born at Chaumont. He became an advocate in the parliament of Paris, and having ſpent forty years at the bar, retired into the country, where he applied himſelf ſolely to ſtudy. He died in 1638. His principal works are, 1. De vetere Jure pontificio Urbis Romæ, in quarto, a work which was ſo well received at Rome, that the ſenate of that city gave the title of Citizen of Rome to him and his poſterity. 2. De Officiis Domus Auguſtæ publicæ & privatæ, in quarto. 3. De Jure Manium, in quarto, &c. Theſe works are eſteemed.

GOUX (FRANCIS LE) a traveller in the ſeventeenth century, was the ſon of a gentleman of Beaujé, in Anjou. He went to almoſt all parts of the world, and publiſhed, in 1603, an account of his travels. He was ſent, in 1668, in quality of ambaſſador to the Turks and great mogul, but died in Perſia.

GOWER (JOHN) an Engliſh poet in the fourteenth century, cotemporary with the famous Chaucer, was born of a noble family ſettled at Stitenham, in Yorkſhire. He ſtudied and practiſed the law, but his inclination led him principally to polite literature. He was a great maſter of the Latin tongue, and an eminent refiner of the Engliſh language. He was the author of the Confeſſio Amantis, in Engliſh; the Speculum Meditantis, in French; and the Vox Clamantis, in Latin. He died at London, in 1402, in about the eightieth year of his age.

GOWER (ST.) or GOAR, a town of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, and in the dominions of the houſe of Heſſe Rhinfels. It is defended by a caſtle on the top of a mountain, which is reckoned almoſt impregnable. Since the treaty of Utrecht, it belongs to the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel. It is ſeated on the Rhine, fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Coblentz, ſeventeen north-eaſt of Mayence, and forty-ſeven north-eaſt of Treves. Long. 8. 4. E. Lat. 52. 2. N.

GOZZADINA (BETTISIA) a learned Italian lady, was of a noble family of Bologna, and made ſuch progreſs in her ſtudies, that, in the year 1232, when ſhe was but twenty-three years of age, ſhe pronounced a very elegant funeral oration in Latin, of her own compoſition, in the great church of Bologna. She particularly applied herſelf to the ſtudy of the law, and received the bonnet of doctor in the univerſity of that city. She became daily more and more diſtinguiſhed by her merit, and, in 1239, obtained the chair of profeſſor of law, and gave public lectures, which received the applauſe of all the civilians. She even compoſed ſeveral works on the civil law, and died in 1249, eſteemed by all Europe, without ever being married.

GRAAF, or GRAEF, (REGNIER DE) an eminent phyſician, was born at Schoonhaven, in Holland, on the 30th of July, 1641. He ſtudied at Leyden, and in France, and at length removed to Delft, where he practiſed phyſic with reputation, and died on the 17th of Auguſt, 1673, aged thirty-two. His principal works are, 1. A Treatiſe on the Nature and Uſe of the Pancreatic Juice. 2. Several Treatiſes on the Organs of Generation of the two Sexes, in which he maintains, that all animals, and even trees, ſpring from eggs. All the works of this phyſician are much eſteemed.

GRABE (JOHN ERNEST) a learned writer, born at Coningſberg, in Pruſſia, on the 10th of July, 1666. Having ſome doubts with reſpect to the Lutheran religion, in which he was educated, he came into England, and embraced the opinions of that church. King William granted him a penſion of one hundred pounds a year, which was continued by queen Anne. Mr. Grabe was at length ordained prieſt of the church of England, and honoured with the degree of doctor of divinity, by the univerſity of Oxford. He died at London, on the 13th of November, 1711, aged forty-five. He publiſhed, 1. Spicelegium SS. Patrum, ut et Hereticorum ſæculi poſt Chriſtum natum, 8vo. 2. An edition of the Septuagint, from the Alexandrian manuſcript in St. James's library. 3. Notes on Juſtin, on Bullus, and other works, which are eſteemed by the learned.

GRABO, a town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony and duchy of Mecklenburg, twenty miles from Schwerin. Long. 11. 36. E. Lat. 53. 32. N.

GRACCHUS (TITUS SEMPRONIUS) the grandſon of the conſul Gracchus, who was killed in an ambuſcade by the troops of Hannibal, was twice conſul and once cenſor. He twice merited the honour of a triumph, and took and ruined a great number of the cities belonging to the Celtiberians, in Spain, in about the 193d year before the Chriſtian æra. Some time after he ſubdued Sardinia, and took ſuch a number of ſlaves, that the long continuance of their ſale gave occaſion to the proverb Sardi venales. Gracchus married Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, a lady of diſtinguiſhed virtue, by whom he had, among other children, Tiberius, and Caius Gracchus, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their eloquence and excellent abilities; but they both periſhed in too zealouſly defending the intereſts of the people. Several other celebrated Romans ſprung from this illuſtrious family.

GRACES, in fabulous hiſtory, attendants of the Muſes, and ſometimes placed in the train of Venus. They were the daughters of Jupiter and Eurynome, or, according to others, of Bacchus and Venus; and their names were Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphroſyne. They were painted like young and beautiful women, and generally repreſented naked, to ſhew, perhaps, that whatever is truly graceful, is ſo in itſelf, without the aid of exterior ornaments. The Lacedemonians and Athenians knew but two, the firſt calling them Clito and Phæno; the laſt, Auro and Hegemo. Eteocles, king of the Orchomenians, was the firſt who erected a temple to them.

GRACIAN (BALTHAZAR) a Spaniſh Jeſuit, who taught polite literature and divinity in his ſociety, and was rector of the college of Tarragona, where he died, on the 6th of December, 1658. He wrote many works, the principle of which are, 1. The Hero. 2. Political Reflections on the greateſt Princes, and particularly on Ferdinand the Catholic. 3. The Man deceived. 4. The Courtier, &c.

GRADENIGO (PETER) doge of Venice, in the year 1290. He diſcovered, by his prudence, the conſpiracy of Bajamont Tiepolo, and prevented its execution. It was he who changed the government of Venice into an ariſtocracy, though ever ſince the year 1173 it was almoſt entirely popular; and he reduced the republic to nearly the ſame form it has at preſent. He governed the republic with wiſdom, and died in 1303.

He ought not to be confounded with Bartholomew Gradenigo, who was elected doge of Venice in 1339, ſubdued the inhabitants of Candia, who had revolted, and died in 1342; nor with John Gradenigo, who was elected doge of Venice in 1352.

GRADISCA, a little ſtrong town of Italy, in the county of Goritz, ſeated on the river Lizonſo, on the confines of Friula. It was beſieged by the Venetians, in 1616 and 1617; but to no purpoſe. It now belongs to the houſe of Auſtria, and is fifteen miles from Udina. Long. 13. 37. E. Lat. 46. 6. N.

GRADISCA, a ſtrong town of Hungary, in Sclavonia, on the frontier of Croatia, upon the river Save. It was taken from the Turks by the Imperialiſts, in 1691. It is twenty miles ſouth-weſt of Poſega. Long. 17. 55 E. Lat. 45. 52. N.

GRAEF. See GRAAF.

GRÆÆ, in fabulous hiſtory, three old women who lived in Scythia, and had but one eye and one tooth among them, which they uſed as they had occaſion, and afterwards laid them by in a coffer.

GRÆVIUS (JOHN GEORGE). See GREVIUS.

GRAHAM (JAMES) marquis of Montroſe, was the ſon of the earl of Montroſe, and was born in the year 1613. Diſcovering an early thirſt for glory, he was ſent to the court of France, and before he was twenty years of age Lewis XIII. gave him a command in the Scots guards. Some time after returning to Scotland, he applied to the marquis of Hamiſton to introduce him at court, and recommend him to the king; but the marquis, filled with jealouſy, took ſuch meaſures, that on his waiting on his majeſty, he met with coldneſs and neglect. On which Montroſe was ſo diſguſted, that he returned to Scotland, and ſome time after ſiding with the covenanters, raiſed a regiment of five hundred horſe, at the head of which he was the firſt man that entered England, on the firſt expedition of the Scots; but being advanced as far as Newcaſtle, he ſent a letter to king Charles, who was at York, to teſtify his obedience.

In the year 1644, the duke of Hamilton being diſgraced and impriſoned, the king appointed Montroſe governor-general of Scotland, and at the ſame time created him a marquis. With a handful of men he then undertook the king's cauſe, and in a few months gained three remarkable battles, one at Perth, another at Aberdeen, and the third at Inverlochy; and in ſhort, made himſelf maſter of that whole kingdom. The marquis's good fortune did not, however, continue long; for through the neglect or treachery of the earls of Roxburgh and Traquair, he was ſurprized by Leſley, and obliged with great loſs to retire into the Highlands. But while he was there raiſing forces, and forming deſigns to retrieve his loſs, the king having thrown himſelf into the hands of the Scots army in England, ſent him orders to lay down his arms, and retire into France. He with reluctance obeyed; but no ſooner heard of the death of the king, than he was filled with grief and indignation, and in one of his tranſports of ſorrow, is ſaid to have written theſe lines with the point of his ſword on the ſand.

Great, good, and juſt! could I but rate
My grief, and thy too rigid fate,
I'd weep the world to ſuch a ſtrain,
That it ſhould deluge once again:
But ſince thy loud-tongu'd wounds demand ſupplies
More from Briareus' hands than Argus' eyes,
I'll ſing thy elogy in trumpet's ſounds,
And write thy epitaph in blood and wounds.

Prince Charles now made him knight of the garter, and employed him in ſeveral courts, to ſollicit aid for his recovering the crown; but in vain. At length, the marquis hearing he was in treaty with the Scots, wrote to adviſe him to come to an agreement with them, that he might be honourably reſtored to his father's throne, and rather than break off with them, to conſent to his being baniſhed. The prince would by no means yield to this generous propoſal; but authorizing him to treat with the Scots, he embarked for Scotland, and landed in the iſle of Orkney, in April 1650, with five hundred German ſoldiers and one thouſand five hundred arms. The government had, however, immediate news of Montroſe's landing, and Leſley was ſent againſt him with the main body of his forces, when the country being prevented from joining him, his ſmall army was ſoon diſperſed, and he himſelf was delivered into the hands of his enemies, by a pretended friend, to whom he fled for protection, and being in a kind of diſgraceful triumph carried to Edinburgh, was tried by the parliament, and ſentence being pronounced againſt him, he was beheaded the ſame day, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. After the Reſtoration, his funeral obſequies were performed at the public expence, with a magnificence equal to that of a crowned head.

GRAHAM (Sir RICHARD) lord viſcount Preſton, the eldeſt ſon of Sir George Graham, of Netherby, in Cumberland, was born in 1648, and received his education at Weſtminſter ſchool, and at Chriſt-church college, Oxford. He afterwards repreſented the borough of Cockermouth in ſeveral parliaments, and enjoyed the favour and eſteem of two ſucceeding kings. King Charles II. ſent him ambaſſador to Lewis XIV. king of France, and by James II. he was made maſter of the wardrobe, lord-lieutenant of the counties of Cumberland and Weſtmoreland, ſecretary of ſtate, and chancellor to the queen-dowager. He ſeems to have been no enemy to the declared deſigns of the prince of Orange; for he was introduced to him at Whitehall, by lord Clarendon, and very graciouſly received: but the Revolution no ſooner took place, than he ſhewed his reſolution to adhere to the intereſt of the king his maſter. Therefore, when king James was in Ireland, and the French fleet hovering on the Engliſh coaſt, he, with ſeveral others of the nobility, was committed priſoner to the Tower; and ſoon after his releaſe from thence, being accuſed with promoting the reſtoration of that prince, he was again impriſoned in the ſame place, tried, and condemned: but we are told, that his daughter, then a little girl, was the cauſe of his life being ſpared. She was carried by a lady to court, and was taken notice of by the queen, when, as they were looking at the pictures of the royal family, and among others that of the abdicated prince, the child innocently ſaid, "Madam, is it not hard that my father ſhould ſuffer death for loving your father?" which had ſuch an effect on that amiable princeſs, that ſhe inſtantly went to the king, and did not leave him till ſhe had obtained his pardon. He ſpent the remainder of his days at Nottingham, in a religious and philoſophical retirement, and died in 1695, in the forty-ſeventh year of his age. He wrote an elegant tranſlation of Boetius on the Conſolations of Philoſophy, in five books, of which there is a ſecond edition, printed in 1712, corrected, with a preface.

GRAHAM (GEORGE) an ingenious clock and watch-maker, was born at Gratwick, an obſcure village in Cumberland, in 1675, and in 1688 came to London to be put apprentice, when, after being ſome time with another maſter, the ingenious Mr. Tompion received him into his family, merely on account of his merit, and treated him as long as he lived with a kind of parental affection. Mr. Graham at length became not only without competition the moſt eminent of his profeſſion, but the beſt mechanic of his time, and was completely ſkilled in practical aſtronomy; whence he not only gave to various movements for the menſuration of time, a degree of perfection that never before had been known, but invented ſeveral aſtronomical inſtruments, which have greatly advanced that ſcience. He alſo made conſiderable improvements, in thoſe that had been before in uſe, and by his amazing dexterity of hand, conſtructed them with greater preciſion and accuracy than any other perſon upon earth. The great mural arch in the obſervatory of Greenwich was made under his immediate inſpection for Dr. Halley, and divided by his own hand, and from this incomparable original the beſt inſtruments of the kind in France, Spain, Italy, and the Weſt-Indies, have been made by Engliſh artiſts. The ſector, by which Dr. Bradley firſt diſcovered two new motions in the fixed ſtars, was invented and made by him. He comprized the whole planetary ſyſtem within the compaſs of a ſmall cabinet, from which, as a model, all the modern orreries have been conſtructed; and when the French academicians were ſent to the North, to make obſervations in order to aſcertain the figure of the earth, they juſtly thought Mr. Graham the fitteſt perſon in Europe to furniſh them with inſtruments, they accordingly ſucceeded, performing their work in one year, ſo that by a ſubſequent obſervation in France, Sir Iſaac Newton's theory of the earth being flattened at the poles was confirmed. But the academicians who went to the South, not taking Mr. Graham's inſtruments were much embarraſſed and retarded.

Mr. Graham was many years a member of the Royal Society, to which he communicated ſeveral ingenious and important diſcoveries, particularly a kind of horary alteration of the magnetic needle; a quickſilver pendulum, and many curious particulars relating to the true length of the ſimple pendulum, upon which he continued to make experiments till a few days before his death. His mind was as communicative as it was penetrating; for his principal view was neither the accumulation of wealth, nor the diffuſion of fame, but the advancement of ſcience and the benefit of mankind. He was perfectly ſincere, candid, generous, and free from ſuſpicion. He frequently lent money, but never could be prevailed upon to take intereſt, and therefore never placed out money upon government ſecurities, and his whole property, except his ſtock in trade, was at his death found in a ſtrong box, in which were bank notes thirty years old. His death happened on the 24th of November, 1751, at ſeventy one years of age. He was carried in a hearſe preceded by three mourning coaches, with the gentlemen who were to ſupport the pall, among whom were four members of the Royal Society, and it was followed by nine to Weſtminſter-abbey, and there interred in the ſame grave with the remains of Mr. Tompion his predeceſſor.

GRAILLY (JOHN DE) one of the greateſt captains of his time. He commanded the troops of Philip of Navarre, againſt Charles V. king of France, at the battle of Cochcherel in Normandy, in which he was taken priſoner, in 1364, by Bertrand Gueſcland, and was not releaſed till a treaty of peace was concluded between thoſe two princes. He afterwards entered into the ſervice of the Engliſh againſt the French, and after having ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral occaſions, was made priſoner before Soubize in 1377, and confined in the tower of the temple at Paris. The king of England made uſe of all his endeavours to get him releaſed, and at laſt obtained the French king's conſent to his being diſcharged, on condition that he would ſwear never to take arms againſt the French, but he choſe rather to die in priſon than take that oath.

GRAIN (JOAN BAPTIST LE) maſter of requeſts to queen Mary de Medicis, wrote, among other works, the hiſtory of Henry IV. and that of Lewis XIII. till the death of marſhal D'Ancre. This hiſtory is eſteemed. He died at Mongeron, near Paris, on the 2d of July, 1642.

GRAINDORGE (ANDREW) an ingenious artiſt, was born at Caen in Normandy, in the ſeventeenth century, and found out the invention of making figures on linen. He, however, did not carry that invention to its perfection; for he made only ſquares and flowers; but Richard Graindorge his ſon, who lived till he was eighty-two years of age, had leiſure to perfect his father's invention. He diſcovered the means of repreſenting upon it all ſorts of animals and other figures. This is now called Damaſk Linen, on account of its reſemblance to white ſilk damaſk. This able workman firſt introduced damaſk table-cloths and napkins; and Michael his ſon, by erecting ſeveral manufactures in different parts of France, rendered damaſk table-linen very common.

dorge

GRAINDORGE (ANDREW) a learned French phyſician and philoſopher, was of the ſame family with the former. He followed the principles of Epicurus and Gaſſendi, and wrote ſeveral works, which were eſteemed, particularly, a Treatiſe on the Nature of Fire, Light, and Colours. 4to.

GRAM (JOHN) a celebrated and learned Daniſh writer, was born in Jutland in 1685, and after being for ſome time profeſſor of Greek at Copenhagen, was made counſellor of juſtice, keeper of the archives, hiſtoriographer, and librarian to his Daniſh majeſty; and in 1745 was made counſellor of ſtate. He founded the Academy of Copenhagen, and wrote diſſertations and other works, which are eſteemed; and alſo a work intitled Corpus diplomatum ad Res Danicas facientium, which he undertook by order of king Chriſtian VI. He died in 1748.

GRAMAYE (JOHN BAPTIST) a native of Antwerp, apoſtolical prothonotary, provoſt of Arnheim and hiſtoriographer of the Netherlands. Endeavouring to ſail to Spain, he was taken by ſome Algerine corſairs and carried into Africa. On his return to the Netherlands, he made ſeveral voyages, and died at Lubec in 1635. His principal works are, 1. Africa illuſtrata: 2. Diarium Algerienſe: 3. The Hiſtory and Antiquities of Brabant, in Latin: 4. The Antiquities of Flanders, &c.

GRAMMONT, a town in the Auſtrian Netherlands, and in the province of Flanders, ſeated on the river Dender, ſeventeen miles ſouth-eaſt of Ghent, and eighteen weſt of Bruſſels. It is remarkable for a fine abbey, which ſtands on an eminence, and affords a delightful proſpect into the neighbouring country. Long. 3. 56. E. L. 50. 46. N.

GRAMMONT, a ſmall town in France, in the marche of Limouſin, remarkable for its abbey. It is fifteen miles north-eaſt of Limoges. Long. 1. 33. E. Lat. 50. 46. N.

GRAMMONT, (the count de) ſerved as a volunteer under the prince of Condé and Turenne; but having the temerity to make his addreſſes to a lady, to whom Lewis XIV. was known to have a tender attachment, he was under the neceſſity of leaving France, and therefore came to England, about two years after the Reſtoration. He poſſeſſed in a high degree, every qualification that could render him agreeable to the Engliſh court. He was gay, gallant, and perfectly well bred; had an inexhauſtible fund of ready wit, and told a ſtory with inimitable grace and humour. Such was his vivacity, that it infuſed life wherever he came; and what rarely happens, it was ſo inoffenſive, that every one of the company appeared to be as happy as himſelf. He had great ſkill and ſucceſs at play, and ſeems to have been chiefly indebted to it for his ſupport. Several of the ladies engaged his attention upon his firſt coming over, but the amiable Mrs. Hamilton, whom he afterwards married, ſeems to have been the only woman who had the entire poſſeſſion of his heart. His elegant Memoirs were written from his own information, by count Hamilton, his brother-in-law, and probably in much the ſame language as that in which they were related.

GRAMPOUND, a town of Cornwall, with a market on Saturdays, and three fairs, on Jan. 18th, March 25th, and June 11th, all for horſes, oxen, ſheep, cloth, and a few hops. It is a corporation, governed by a mayor, recorder, town-clerk, and eight magiſtrates, and ſends two members to parliament. It contains about one thouſand one hundred houſes, and is in the pariſh of Creed, and its only manufacture is gloves. Long. 5. 25. W. Lat. 50. 20. N. It is thirty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Launceſton, ſeventy-two weſt-by-ſouth of Exeter, and two hundred and forty-four weſt-by-ſouth from London.

GRAN, a handſome large and ſtrong town in Lower Hungary, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It was taken by Sultan Solyman in 1543, and re-taken by prince Charles of Mansfield in 1594. The Turks got poſſeſſion of it again in 1604; but were driven away by the Imperialiſts in 1693. It is defended with ramparts, and has a fortified caſtle, on the mountain of St. Thomas. It is ſeated on the left bank of the river Danube, twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Comora, twenty-five north-weſt of Buda, thirty-two eaſt of Raab, and eighty-ſeven eaſt-by-ſouth of Vienna. Long. 19. 0. E. Lat. 48. 0. N.

GRANADA, a kingdom in Spain, bounded on the weſt by Andaluſia; on the north by Caſtile; on the eaſt by Murcia; and on the ſouth by the Mediterranean Sea. It is about two hundred and twenty miles in length, and ſixty in breadth. It is pretty well watered by brooks and rivers. The principal river is Xenel, which has its riſe a little above the capital, whoſe walls it waſhes, and paſſes on to Loxa, and ſome miles beyond it runs into Andaluſia. The Guadalantin has its ſource in the neighbourhood of Guadix, running from weſt to eaſt, and then entering Murcia. The Rio Frio, is ſo called on account of the coldneſs of its water, and proceeds from the mountains near Alhama, almoſt in the heart of the kingdom, and falls into the Mediterranean near Puerto de Torres. This kingdom is pretty well peopled on account of the fertility of the earth, and mildneſs of the air; but a great deal leſs than it was in the time of the Moors. It contains ten cities, Granada, Malaga, Antiquera, Guadix, Baza, Ronda, Loxa, Santa Fe, Marbella and Almeria, beſides ſeveral other towns leſs conſiderable. It is generally allowed to be a very agreeable country, though it is the moſt ſouthern province of all Spain. It is very mountainous, but the ſoil is very fertile, and produces abundance of corn, excellent grapes, oranges, and the like exquiſite fruits. It likewiſe produces a great deal of fine ſilk, which is in great eſteem, and which they export into other countries, as well as figs, raiſins of the ſun, ſyrups, and ſweetmeats. They have alſo flax, hemp, melons, ſalt, honey and wax. In the ſea there is good fiſh, particularly ſardins and mackrel. There were formerly very rich mines, which are now exhauſted, but they ſtill have precious ſtones, of three or four kinds. This province was ſeven hundred and eighty years under the dominion of the Moors, for it was not looked upon as a kingdom till the thirteenth century, when Abenhud, a Moor, was the firſt king, and it continued for two hundred and fifty-ſix years under eighteen kings. While it was in poſſeſſion of the Moors, it had thirty-three great cities, and was extremely full of people, yielding the government a vaſt revenue. The inhabitants generally ſpeaking are laborious and induſtrious, polite, affable, and good ſoldiers. They do not allow the uſe of wine to young people.

GRANADA, a city of Spain, capital of the kingdom of that name, built by the Moors in the tenth century. It is accounted one of the largeſt cities in Spain; it being twelve miles in circumference, with a wall flanked with above one hundred towers. It has twelve gates, which, on the weſt ſide, lead into very fine and agreeable fields, but on the eaſt the country is rough and mountainous. This city is divided into four quarters, or wards; the firſt of which retains the name of Granada; this is the principal part of the city, and is ſeated in vallies between the mountains. Here the nobility, clergy, merchants, and rich citizens reſide, and keep their markets. It is adorned with handſome ſtructures, both public and private, and with ſeveral ſquares and fountains. The principal houſes are very handſome, neat, well built, and commodious, with agreeable gardens and fountains. The principal ſtreets are vaulted over, on account of the canals, that convey the water into private houſes, which are all ſupplied by this means; for this reaſon there are no coaches allowed in the city. The cathedral church is in this quarter, and the houſe where the general aſſembly of the kingdom is held. The cathedral church is not large, but is very handſome, with a beautiful dome, ſupported by twelve large pillars of curious workmanſhip. Over the arches there are two rows of iron balconies gilded; the inſide of the dome is all painted and gilt; and, againſt the pillars, there are the ſtatues of the twelve apoſtles, in gilt bronze, of the natural ſize. Over the great altar is a fine pix of ſilver gilt. Here are the tombs of ſeveral kings and queens; and under the chapel there is a vault full of leaden coffins. The ſacriſty is richly furniſhed; and they ſhew among other things, the ſword and crown of Ferdinand V. and various church ornaments, which are very rich. Near this is an old building, which was formerly a Mooriſh moſque, and is ſurrounded with porticoes, ſupported by marble pillars. It ſtill remains quite entire, and is turned into a pariſh church. The court of juſtice ſtands in a large and magnificent ſquare, and is four hundred feet long, and two hundred broad, with a fine fountain of jaſper. The houſe or hall is adorned with a handſome frontiſpiece, enriched with alabaſter columns. Over the porches there is a fine row of windows, and gilt balconies. Beſides this ſquare, there is another called Plaza Major, wherein they have the diverſion of the bull-feaſt. It is in the middle of the city, and is very large and handſome. The ſecond quarter of Granada is built on the mountain called Sierra del Sol, becauſe it faces the riſing ſun. Here are two palaces, the one built by the Moors, and the other by Charles V. and are both very ſuperb ſtructures. The way into this quarter is through a long, level alley, bounded on each ſide with large elms, in the middle of which is a very handſome fountain of jaſper, embelliſhed with pretty little ſtatues, which throw out the water to the tops of the trees; this alley leads to the palaces; and before that of the Moors is a large well-built ſquare, with handſome lodgings, whoſe window frames are of black marble. All round the ſtructure, above the windows, are a great number of eagles heads, and lions muzzles, all in bronze. The portico is of jaſper, ſet off with trophies, and a great many ſmall figures; and the pedeſtals of the columns have the repreſentation of a great number of battles engraved thereon. The inſide of this palace anſwers in every reſpect to the outſide, and all the rooms are richly furniſhed; but the whole through neglect is now going to ruin. It would be endleſs to relate all the particulars of theſe beautiful ſtructures, which take up a great deal of time, when travellers examine them minutely. The third quarter is called Albaycin, and was formerly a ſuburb, ſeparated from the reſt of the city by a wall, and was inhabited only by the Moors, who were diſtinguiſhed from the other inhabitants by their language, manners, and dreſs. They clothed their wives in ſilk, while they themſelves wore ſackcloth, and always ſtood ready to be employed, in carrying burdens for thoſe that wanted them. When Granada was taken by Ferdinand, a ſedition was fomented among the inhabitants, who were all declared guilty of high treaſon; and it was put to their choice, either to ſuffer death or be baptized; and there was not one that did not chuſe the latter, being in all about fifty thouſand. The laſt quarter, called Antiqueruela, is in a plain, inhabited by people who came from Antechera. The inhabitants are for the moſt part ſilk weavers and dyers, who are employed in making all ſorts of rich ſtuffs. The city of Granada is a populous, trading place, but not ſo conſiderable as in the time of the Moors, when there were ſixty thouſand houſes, and two hundred thouſand inhabitants. It is a very agreeable place, eſpecially in ſummer, on account of the fountains, which are one thouſand in number, with a great many ice-houſes, for cooling the wine. It has a ſmall univerſity, and an archbiſhop's ſee. The parts without the city are very delightful, eſpecially to the ſouth and weſt, where there is a large handſome plain, eighteen miles in length, and twelve in breadth, ſurrounded with hills, and covered with a great number of villages. It has ſeveral churches and monaſteries well adorned, beſides a large hoſpital. In ſhort, Granada is ſo charming a place, that the Moors imagined that paradiſe was in that part of heaven over Granada. The chief trade is in ſilks; and in order to feed the ſilk-worms, there are a vaſt number of mulberry trees all round the city. It is ſeated on the river Oro, one hundred and twenty-five miles ſouth-weſt of Murcia, ſixty-two north eaſt of Malaga, one hundred and twelve eaſt of Seville, and two hundred and twenty-five ſouth of Madrid. Long 2. 49. W. Lat. 36. 56. N.

are

GRANADA, a province of Terra Firma, in South America, bounded on the weſt by Popayan, on the north by St Martha, on the eaſt by Venezuela, and by Paria, and on the eaſt by Peru. It is three hundred and ninety miles in length, and eighty in breadth, and extends from the firſt to the ninth degree of ſouth latitude. In general it is a champaign country, except on the frontiers, where it is mountainous. There are abundance of foreſts, which contain excellent timber; and large meadows, which feed prodigious numbers of black-cattle and horſes. The climate is very temperate, and all the days and nights are nearly equal; and yet they have two ſummers and two winters. The firſt ſummer begins in December, and ends with February. The firſt winter is in the month of March, April, and Auguſt, and conſequently the ſecond winter muſt be in September, October, and November. But it muſt be remembered, that the only difference between the ſummer and winter, is occaſioned by the rainy ſeaſons; for in fair weather it is always accounted ſummer in this country, eſpecially as the winter months are as warm as thoſe in the ſummer. This province contains very rich mines of gold and emeralds, which laſt are of great value, being worth from ten ſhillings to thirty pounds each. Santa Fe, the capital, is the ſeat of the royal audience, and is an archbiſhop's ſee. It belongs to the Spaniards.

GRANADA, a city of North America, in the audience of Guatimala, to the ſouth of a lake of the ſame name, otherwiſe called Nicaragua, ſixty-two miles eaſt of Leon. It is a large city, well built and populous. The inhabitants carry on a great trade, by means of the lake, which has a communication with the North Sea. It was pillaged by the French buccaneers, in 1665, and 1675. Long. 85. 10. W. Lat. 11. 8. N.

GRANADA, an iſland, the moſt ſoutherly of the Carribees, about twenty-five miles in length, and twelve in breadth. It is very fruitful, and has been in the poſſeſſion of the French, ſince 1650, but was ceded to Great Britain, by the peace in 1763. Lat. 11. 50.

GRAND (JOACHIM LE) an able critic, and judicious hiſtorian, was born at St. Lo in Normandy, on the 6th of February, 1653. He ſtudied philoſophy at Caen, and was entruſted with the education of the marquis de Vins, and afterwards with that of the duke d'Eſtres. He wrote ſeveral very curious works, ſome of which were compoſed by order of the miniſters of ſtate. He died at Paris, on the firſt of May, 1733, aged eighty.

GRAND (MARK ANTHONYLE) a French actor and poet, was born at Paris, in 1672, and excelled in the parts of kings and heroes, and likewiſe in thoſe of peaſants. He compoſed thirty-four pieces for the French theatre, and the Italian comedies; the moſt eſteemed of which are, Le Roi de Cocagne, Plutus, Le Triomphe du Tems, L'Amour Diable, La Foire S. Laurent, La Famille extravagante, La Metamorphoſe amoureuſe, L'Uſurier gentilhomme, L'Aveugle clairvoyant, L'Ami de tout le Monde; and, La Nouveauté. He died at Paris in 1728, at fifty-ſix years of age. His works have been collected and printed together, in four volumes.

GRANDE, a river of Brazil, in the province of Del Rei, in South America, which diſcharges itſelf into the Atlantic Ocean, in thirty-two degrees of ſouth latitude.

GRANDEPRE, a town of France in Champaigne, thirty miles eaſt of Rheims, ſeated on the river Ayr, near fine meadows. Long. 4. 50. E. Lat. 49. 18. N.

GRANDIER (URBAN) a famous curate and canon of Loudun, burnt alive for a magician, was the ſon of a notary royal of Sable. He was a good preacher; and being a handſome man, of an agreeable converſation, and very neat in his dreſs, was ſuſpected of being fond of the fair ſex; and, in 1629, was accuſed of having had a criminal converſation with ſome women in the very church of which he was prieſt. When being brought to his trial, he was condemned by the official of the biſhop of Poitiers, to reſign all his benefices; but he appealed from this ſentence, and was declared innocent by his metrapolitan, and the preſidial of Poitiers. Three years after, ſome Urſuline nuns of Loudun, who were thought to be poſſeſſed by the devil, accuſed Grandier of magic, when the Capuchins of Loudon, his moſt bitter enemies, thought, that in order to make their charge ſucceed, according to their wiſhes, it was proper to ſtrengthen themſelves with the cardinal Richlieu's authority; for which purpoſe the cardinal was informed, that Grandier was the author of a libel, publiſhed againſt him, entitled, The Female Shoe-maker of Loudun. On which Richlieu gave orders to have him proſecuted with the utmoſt rigour, and informed ſome of his judges, that he deſired to have Grandier deſtroyed. Monſieur Loubardemont, counſellor of ſtate, and twelve judges, choſen out of the courts in the neighbourhood of Loudun, were ordered to try him, and upon the diſpoſition of Aſloroth, Aſmodeus, Eudon, &c. that is, the nuns poſſeſſed by thoſe demons, Grandier was, on the 18th of Auguſt, 1634, declared duly attainted and convicted of the crime of magic, and poſſeſſion, which by his means happened on the bodies of the Urſuline nuns of Loudun, &c. and condemned to make the amend honourable, and to be burnt alive, which was executed. However the doctors of the Sorbonne, being conſulted on the depoſition of the nuns of Loudun, who pretended to be poſſeſſed, replied, that though their poſſeſſion ſhould be ever ſo certain, no regard ought, in juſtice, to be paid to their depoſition, ſince the devil was a lyer from the beginning, and that if ſuch depoſitions were once admitted, the moſt virtuous perſons could not be ſafe, ſince they might be accuſed, by demons, of being guilty of witchcraft and poſſeſſions. The whole affair relating to Grandier may be found in a book, entitled The Hiſtory of of the Devils of Loudun, and the refutation of that hiſtory.

GRANET (FRANCIS) a critic in the eighth century, born at Brignole, took orders and ſettled at Paris, and publiſhed ſeveral works, the principal of which are, 1. An edition of the works of M. de Launoi. 2. Several volumes of a journal, entitled Bibliotheque François, &c. He died on the ſecond of April, 1741, aged forty-nine.

GRANICUS, a little river near the Helleſpont, which has its ſource in Mount Ida, near the ruins of ancient Troy. It was near this river that Alexander the Great gained the firſt victory over the Perſians, who then loſt, as it is ſaid, one hundred thouſand men.

GRANSON, a town of Switzerland, in the territory of Vaud, capital of a bailiwick of the ſame name, with a caſtle. It is ſeated on a hill, upon the lake of Neuf-Chattel, five miles from Iverdun. It is remarkable for a victory gained by the Swiſs in this place. Long. 6. 35. E. Lat. 44. 48. N.

GRANT (FRANCIS) lord Cullen, an eminent judge in Scotland, was deſcended from a younger branch of the noble family of the Grants of Grant, in that kingdom, and was born about the year 1660. He was educated at the univerſities of Aberdeen and Leyden, and on his return to Scotland, became an advocate, and ſoon got into full employ by the diſtinguiſhed figure he made at the Revolution, when he publiſhed a treatiſe, in which he undertook to prove by the principles of law, that a king might forfeit his his crown for himſelf and his deſcendants, and that in ſuch a caſe the ſtates had a power to diſpoſe of it, and to eſtabliſh and limit a legal ſucceſſion. In 1705, queen Anne created him a baronet, and about a year after he was appointed one of the judges, or as they are ſtyled in Scotland, one of the ſenators of the college of juſtice, and from this time, according to the cuſtom of Scotland, he was ſtyled from the name of his eſtate, lord Cullen. He held it equally criminal to neglect any honeſt means of coming at juſtice, or to make uſe of any arts to elude it, being ſenſible, that the next fault to denying was delaying juſtice, by which families are too often ruined; he was always very ſolicitous to bring the cauſes that came before him to a ſpeedy deciſion; and though one of the ableſt and deepeſt lawyers of his time, he found time to write various treatiſes on very different and important ſubjects; ſome political, which were remarkably well timed, and highly ſerviceable to the government; and Eſſays on Law, Religion, and Education, which were dedicated to his late majeſty when prince of Wales. This great man died, after an illneſs which laſted only three days, on the 16th of March, 1726, in the ſixty-ſixth year of his age.

GRANTHAM, a town in Lincolnſhire, with a market on Saturdays, and five fairs, on 5th Monday in Lent, for horned cattle, horſes, and ſheep; on Holy Thurſday, for ſheep and horſes; on July 10, October 26, and December 17, for horned cattle and horſes. It is ſeated in a bottom, on the banks of the river Wytham. It is governed by an alderman, twelve common burgeſſes, a coroner, an eſcheator, a town-clerk, and twelve ſecond-twelve men, who are of the common-council, and twelve conſtables to attend upon the court; which alderman and common burgeſſes, have all power to act as juſtices of the peace for the corporation and ſoake of Grantham. It ſends two members to parliament, who are elected by the freemen of the corporation. It was a Roman town, as appears from the Roman antiquities and coins, which have been dug up here. The ſtreet that runs on the eaſt of the church, is called Caſtle-ſtreet, between which and the river the foundations of a caſtle have been found. Here is a fine large church, with a lofty ſpire being three hundred feet high, and one of the moſt remarkable in England, but ſome pretend when you look at it which way you will, it ſeems to ſtands awry. Here is a good free-ſchool, built by Richard Fox biſhop of Wincheſter; and at this place, the famous Sir Iſaac Newton, received the firſt rudiments of learning. It is two miles north-by-weſt of Stamford, eighty-one ſouth-by-eaſt of York, and one hundred and nine north-by-weſt of London. Long. 0. 40. W. Lat. 52. 50. N.

GRANVILLE, a ſea-port town of France, in Lower Normandy. It ſtands partly on a rock, and partly on a plain, fifteen miles from Coutances, and one hundred and ſeventy weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 33. W. Lat. 48. 58. N.

GRANVILLE, a younger ſon of Sir Bevil Granville, of Kilhampton in Cornwall, knight, was educated at Exeter college, and after ſeveral eccleſiaſtical preferments, was, in 1662, made archdeacon of Durham, and prebendary of that church. In 1670 he was created doctor of divinity, being then one of the chaplains in ordinary to king Charles II. and in 1684, was inſtalled dean of Durham. However, on the firſt of February 1690, he was deprived of all his preferments, upon his refuſing to comply with the new oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy to the prince of Orange, when retiring into France, he died at Paris on the 7th of April, 1703, N. S. This divine, who was remarkable for his examplary piety, wrote The complete Conformiſt; and ſeveral other tracts.

GRANVILLE, (GEORGE) lord Lanſdowne, and an eminent Engliſh poet, was of an ancient and noble family, deſcended from Rollo the firſt duke of Normandy, and was the ſecond ſon of Bernard Granville, and younger brother of Sir George Granville, who was a chief inſtrument in the Reſtoration; and afterwards was created earl of Bath, and viſcount Lanſdowne. Mr. Granville received the firſt tincture of letters in France, and at eleven years of age was ſent to Trinity college in Cambridge; at the age of thirteen he was admitted to the degree of maſter of arts, having, before he was twelve years old, ſpoken a poem of his own compoſition to the ducheſs of York, when her royal highneſs paid a viſit at his college. In 1696, his comedy called the She Gallants, was acted at the theatre-royal in Lincoln's Inn Fields. He afterwards wrote a tragedy entitled, Heroic Love; and a dramatic poem, entitled, The Britiſh Enchanters, or, no Muſic like Love. He altered Shakeſpeare's Merchant of Venice, under the title of the Jew of Venice; and in 1702, tranſlated into Engliſh the ſecond Olynthian of Demoſthenes. He was returned member for the county of Cornwall, in the parliament which met in November 1710, and ſoon after made ſecretary of war; he was next made comptroller of the houſhold, and then treaſurer, and ſworn one of the privy council. The year following he was created baron Lanſdowne of Biddeford, in Devonſhire. On the acceſſion of king George I in 1714, he was removed by that prince from his treaſurer's place, and the next year entered his proteſt againſt the bills for attainting lord Bolingbroke and the duke of Ormond: and entered deeply into the ſcheme for raiſing an inſurrection in the weſt of England, of which, lord Bolingbroke ſays, he was at the head; and repreſents him as poſſeſſed of the ſame political fire and phrenzy for the pretender, as he had ſhewn in his youth for the father. Accordingly he was ſeized as a ſuſpected perſon, and on the 26th of September, 1715, was committed priſoner to the Tower, where he continued a long time. Being confined in the ſame room in which Sir Robert Walpole had been priſoner, and had left his name on the window, he wrote theſe lines under it.

Good unexpected, evil unforeſeen,
Appear by turns, as fortune ſhifts the ſcene:
Some rais'd aloft, come tumbling down amain,
And fall ſo hard, they bound, and riſe again.

He was ſet free from his impriſonment on the 8th of February, 1717, and in 1719, made a ſpeech in the houſe of lords againſt the bill to prevent occaſional conformity. In 1722, his lordſhip withdrew to France, and continued abroad almoſt ten years. At his return in 1732, he publiſhed a fine edition of his works in 2 vols 4to. The remaining years of his life were paſſed in privacy and retirement. His lordſhip died on the 30th of Janury, 1735, leaving no male iſſue.

GRAPALDUS (FRANCIS MARIUS) a learned man in the ſixteenth century, was born at Parma, and when his country was delivered from the yoke of the French, ſubmitted again to pope Julius II. and was choſen to be at the head of an embaſſy ſent to that pope, when he made a very fine oration, and publiſhed ſome verſes, for which the pope with his own hand placed the poetical crown upon his head, after a very ſolemn manner in the Vatican. This honour made him exert his talents, in writing many poems. The work in which he ſhewed his learning moſt, is that in which he deſcribes all the parts of a houſe, of which there have been ſeveral editions, printed at ſeveral places. He died at above fifty years of age.

GRASSE, a pretty town of France, in Provence, ſeated upon an eminence, fifteen miles weſt of Nice, twelve north-weſt of Antibes, ſixty-five north-eaſt of Aix, and three hundred ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 6. 10. E. Lat 43. 39. N.

GRASSIS (PARIS DE) the brother of cardinal Achilles de Graſſis, and maſter of the ceremonies to pope Leo X. and his ſucceſſors, and afterwards biſhop of Pezaro, cauſed himſelf to be much talked of at the beginning of the ſixteenth century, by his impoſition upon the Antiquaries. He compoſed an Epitaph on a Mule, and cauſed it to be engraved on a piece of marble, which he afterwards hid under ground in his vineyard. Some time after he ordered trees to be planted in the place where the marble was buried, when the piece of marble being found, he gave out that it was wrote by one Publius Graſſius, who raiſed this monument to his mule, and made it paſs as a valuable antique. He compoſed a ceremonial which is eſteemed.

GRASSWINCKEL (THEODORE) a learned civilian in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Delft, and was not only well ſkilled in matters relating to law, but in polite literature and Latin poetry. His principal works are, 1. De jure Majeſtatis; 2. Libertas Veneta, ſeu Venetorum in ſe ac ſuos imperandi jus; 3. Maris Liberi Vindiciæ adverſus Petrum Baptiſtam Burgum; 4. Liguſtici Maritimi Dominii Aſſertorem; 5. De Præludiis Juſtitiæ & Juris; De fide Hæreticis & Rebellibus ſervanda, &c. He died at Mechlin on the 12th of October, 1666, aged ſixty-ſix.

GRATAROLUS (WILLIAM) a learned phyſician in the ſixteenth century, was born at Bergamo, in Italy, and taught phyſic with reputation at Padua, but having embraced the Proteſtant religion, he retired to Swiſſerland, where he was made profeſſor of phyſic. He died at Baſil on the 16th of April, 1568, aged fifty-two. He wrote ſeveral curious works in Latin, among which are, 1. The Manner of Preſerving and improving the Memory; 2. Of Preſerving in Health, Travellers, Men of Lettres, Magiſtrates, and Studious perſons, &c.

GRATIANI (ANTHONY MARIA) a learned biſhop of Amelia, was born at the ſmall town of Del Borgo San Sepulchro, in Tuſcany; and wrote, 1. the Life of Cardinal Commendon. 2. De Bello Cyprio. 3. De Caſibus adverſis illuſtrium Virorum ſui Ævi, &c. He died in 1611, aged ſeventy-five.

GRATIAN, emperor of Rome, was the ſon of Valentinian I. by his firſt wife Severa, and was born at Sirmich, on the 18th of April, 359. He was declared Auguſtus by his father, at Amiens; on the 24th of Auguſt, 367, and ſucceeded him on the 17th of November, 375. Gratian was diſtin-

diſtinguiſhed by his eloquence, modeſty, and chaſtity. He aſſociated Theodoſius with him in the empire; advanced Cenſorius to the conſulſhip, and conquered the Germans near Straſburg. He was the firſt of the emperors that refuſed the title of pontifex maximus, or high-prieſt, from its being a Pagan dignity. However, the concluſion of this prince's reign was unhappy; for Maximus being declared emperor, corrupted a part of the legions, and, by the treachery of Merobaudus, defeated Gratian, at Paris. After this defeat the emperor fled, and was aſſaſſinated at Lyons, by Andragatticus, on the 25th of Auguſt, 383, at twenty-four years of age.

GRATIAN, a private ſoldier, was raiſed to the empire by the Roman legions, which had revolted in Britain, in order to oppoſe Honorius, about the year 407; but was put to death four months after, by thoſe who had raiſed him to the throne.

GRATIAN, a famous Benedictine monk, in the twelfth century, was born at Chiuſi, and employed near twenty-four years in compoſing a work, intitled Decretum, or Concordantia Diſcordantium Canonum, becauſe he there endeavoured to reconcile the canons, which ſeemed contradictory to each other. This work he publiſhed in 1151. As he is frequently miſtaken, in taking one canon of one council, or one paſſage of one father, for another, and has often cited falſe decretals, ſeveral authors have endeavoured to correct his faults, and chiefly Anthony Auguſtine, in his excellent work, intitled, De Emendatione Gratiani. To the decretals of Gratian, the popes principally owed the great authority they exerciſed in the thirteenth and following centuries.

GRATIAS A DIOS, a ſmall town in North America, about one hundred and twenty miles from Valladolid. There is likewiſe a cape of the ſame name, in the ſame province of Mexico.

GRATIOSA, an iſland in the Atlantic ocean, one of the Azores, ſo called on account of the beauty of the country, and plenty of fruits. It is twenty miles from Tercera. Long. 29. 12. W. Lat. 39. 12. N.

GRATIUS, a Latin poet, cotemporary with Ovid, the author of a poem intitled Cynegeticon, or the Manner of Hunting with Dogs; the beſt edition of which is that of Leyden, in duodecimo, with the learned notes of Janus Ulitius.

GRATZ, a town of Germany, capital of the duchy of Stiria, and circle of Auſtria. It is a neat ſtrong city, ſeated on the river Muer, in a pleaſant fruitful country. There is a caſtle here built on a high hill, which commands the neighbouring parts, and in the ducal palace there are a great many inſcriptions; as alſo about the town. There is likewiſe a good library, and a gallery full of rarities. The Jeſuits have a very handſome college, well endowed, and much frequented by ſtudents. There are a great number of fine houſes, and a fine arſenal built by Charles VI. as alſo a large magazine, from which, in caſes of neceſſity, all ſorts of proviſions, and warlike ſtores may be carried from hence by water into Hungary. There is a governor who reſides here by appointment of the court of Vienna. It is ſixty-five miles ſouth of Vienna. Long. 16. 10. E. Lat. 47. 20. N.

GRAVE, a ſtrong city of the Netherlands, in the province of Dutch Brabant; ſeated on the river Maeſe. It lies in a flat marſhy country, is very ſtrong, both by nature and art, it being extremely well fortified. It is a neat and pleaſant town, and capital of the earldom of Cuyck, which is about four miles in length, and one in breadth, belonging to the houſe of Orange. The Hollanders got poſſeſſion of this place in concert with the inhabitants, in 1577. The prince of Parma retook it in 1586, and it was retaken by prince Maurice in 1602. The French took it in 1672, and the prince of Orange retook it in 1675. It is eight miles from Nimeguen, fifteen from Bolduc, and ſixty-five north-eaſt of Bruſſels. Long. 5. 56. E. Lat. 51. 46. N.

GRAVELINES, a ſtrong city, and ſea-port town of the Netherlands, in the province of French Flanders. It is ſeated at the mouth of the river Aa, near the Engliſh channel, and is a well fortified town, having a good harbour, but not proper for large veſſels. The fortifications conſiſt of ſix baſtions, four half moons, and a horn work, all conſtructed by marſhal Vauban. The pariſh church is dedicated to St. Willebrod, which, with a caſtle built by Charles V. and the town-houſe, are pretty good buildings. There are ſeveral convents, both for men and women, and among the reſt an Engliſh nunnery, of the order of St. Clare. It has no trade, and is ſo poorly peopled, that the graſs grows in the market-place. It was taken by the Engliſh in 1383, by the French in 1644, by archduke Leopold in 1652, and by marſhal de la Ferte in 1658. It was ceded to the French by the treaty of the Pyrenees. It is eight miles eaſt of Calais, fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Dunkirk, ſixty-five weſt of Ghent, and one hundred and fifty north of Paris. Long. 5. 56. E. Lat. 51. 56. N.

GRAVESANDE (WILLIAM JAMES) L.L.D. an eminent philoſopher, was born at Delft, in Holland, in 1688, and educated at the univerſity of Leyden. Before he was nineteen he compoſed his Treatiſe on Perſpective. Having taken his doctor's degrees in 1707, he quitted the college, ſettled at the Hague, and practiſed at the bar, when he cultivated an acquaintance with the learned, and was one of the members of the ſociety that compoſed a periodical review, intitled Le Journal Litteraire. In 1715, the States General ſending embaſſadors to England to congratulate king George I. he was appointed ſecretary to the embaſſy; and during his ſtay in England, was admitted a member of the Royal Society, and became intimately acquainted with ſir Iſaac Newton. On his return to Holland, being choſen profeſſor of mathematics and aſtronomy at Leyden, he had the honour of firſt teaching there the Newtonian philoſophy, which was then in its infancy. He was amiable both in his private and public character. The miniſters of the republic conſulted him on many occaſions, and he was of great ſervice as a decypherer, in detecting the ſecret correſpondence of their enemies. The moſt conſiderable of his works is, 1. An Introduction to the Newtonian Philoſophy, which has gone through many editions, with conſiderable improvements. 2. A ſmall treatiſe on the Elements of Algebra, for the Uſe of young Students. 3. A Courſe of Logic and Metaphyſics, publiſhed in 1734; and he had a deſign of preſenting the public with a Syſtem of Morality, but death prevented his putting it in execution. He alſo publiſhed ſeveral correct editions of the valuable works of others.

GRAVESEND, a port-town in the county of Kent, ſeated on the ſouth ſhore of the river Thames, with two markets on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, and two fairs, on April 23, and October 24, for horſes and all other goods, cloaths, and toys. This town was incorporated with Milton, by queen Elizabeth, by the name of the port-reeve, and inhabitants of the towns of Graveſend and Milton; but at preſent it is governed by a mayor, twelve jurats, and twenty-four common-councilmen. In the year 1380, in the reign of Richard II. it was burnt by the French and Spaniſh gallies, and moſt of the inhabitants carried away priſoners. The manor of Graveſend and Milton coming by the gift of Edward III. to the abbot of Grace, on Towerhill, and he willing to promote the intereſt of theſe towns, deſired king Richard II. to let the inhabitants of Graveſend and Milton have the ſole trade of carrying paſſengers from and to London, and that they ſhould provide boats on purpoſe, and carry all perſons at two-pence a head, with his bundle, which that king conſented to, and ſome of his ſucceſſors confirmed it. Henry VIII. being ſenſible how expoſed the river Thames lay to inſults, raiſed a platform of guns here, and another on the oppoſite ſhore at Tilbury, which latter has been ſince erected into a fort. Queen Elizabeth ordered that the lord mayor of London, with the aldermen and companies of that city, ſhould receive all eminent ſtrangers, and foreign ambaſſadors here, in their formalities, and ſo attend them to London in their barges, if they came by water. In the year 1727, the greateſt part of the town and the church were burnt down, both which have ſince been built, in a far more beautiful and commodious manner. There is a church which belongs to that part of the corporation, called Milton, at a little diſtance to the eaſt of the town. It is twenty-two miles eaſt of London.

GRAVESON (IGNATIUS HYACINTH AMAT DE) a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, of the order of St. Dominic. He was born at the village of Graveſon, near Avignon; and having taken the habit of a religious at ſixteen years of age, continued his ſtudies at Paris, where he took the degree of doctor of divinity. At length the general of his order ſent him to Rome, where he taught theology with extraordinary reputation. He refuſed the divinity chair which the king of Sardinia offered him in the univerſity of Turin, was one of the divines of the council of Rome held in 1725, and had a great ſhare in the negociation between the holy ſee and cardinal de Noailles. At length going to Arles for the ſake of breathing his native air, which was thought neceſſary to reſtore his health, he died there, in 1733, at ſixty-three years of age. His works were printed at Venice, in 1740, in ſeven volumes, quarto. They contain the Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament, the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory till the year 1730, a Treatiſe on the Life and Myſteries of Jeſus Chriſt, the Life of Crillus, and opuſcula on the Efficacy of Grace, Predeſtination, &c.

GRAVINA, a town of Italy, and kingdom of Naples, in the territory of Bari, with a biſhop's ſee. It belongs to the houſe of Urſina, and is twenty-five miles eaſt of Cirenza, and thirty-two ſouth-weſt of Bari. Long. 17. 12. E. Lat. 41. 20. N.

GRAVINA (PETER) an excellent Italian poet, was born at Palermo, in Sicily, but his family was of Gravina, in the kingdom of Naples. He became canon of the laſt mentioned city, and died at Rome in 1528, at ſeventy-four years of age. Thoſe of his poems that remain have been printed in quarto. Sannazarius beſtows great praiſes on them. Gravina had for his patrons, general Gonſalvo, and Proſpero Colonna.

GRAVINA (JANUS VINCENTIUS) an eminent civilian, born at Roggiano, in Calabria, on the 18th of February, 1664; acquired the eſteem of pope Innocent XII. who made him profeſſor of law at Rome, where he died, on the 6th of January, 1718, aged fifty-ſix. The beſt edition of his works is that of Leipſic, in 1737, in quarto, with the notes of Maſcovius. His Origin of Law is particularly eſteemed, and is the moſt excellent work that has hitherto appeared on that ſubject.

GRAVIUS (HENRY) a learned printer, born at Louvain, taught divinity during twenty years, and was invited to Rome by pope Sextus V. who conferred upon him the care of his library and printing-houſe in the Vatican. He died on the 2d of April, 1591, aged fifty-five.

GRAUNT, or GRANT (EDWARD) D. D. a perſon of eminent learning, in the ſixteenth century, was educated in grammar learning at Weſtminſter, and completed his ſtudies at Oxford. About the year 1572 he was appointed maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool. In 1577 he was made prebendary of Weſtminſter, and afterwards took the degree of doctor of divinity. He wrote Græcæ Linguæ Spicilegium, and collected and publiſhed the letters and poems of Roger Aſcham, to which he ſubjoined a piece of his own, intitled Oratio de Vita & Obitu Rogeri Aſchami. He died in 1601.

GRAUNT (JOHN) author of a celebrated book intitled Natural and political Obſervations made upon the Bills of Mortality; was born at London, on the 24th of April, 1620. He was originally a haberdaſher of ſmall wares; but having left off trade, he became one of the managers of the New River Company. He was likewiſe a major of the city trained bands, and a member of the Royal Society. He died April the 18th, 1674. Sir William Petty, ſir Peter Pett, Mr. Daniel King, Dr. Davenant, and all the other writers of political arithmetic are indebted to him for ſome of their moſt valuable obſervations. Beſides the above treatiſe, he wrote Obſervations on the Advance of Exciſe, and a Tract upon Religion; but theſe were never printed.

GRAWERUS (ALBERTUS) a Lutheran divine, born at Meſecow, in the marquiſate of Brandenburgh, in the year 1575. He acquired great reputation by his zeal and writings againſt the Calviniſts, and was raiſed to ſeveral important poſts, ſo that at length he obtained the office of ſuperintendant of the churches of the country of Weimar. He wrote with more heat than any other of the Lutherans againſt the Calviniſts. He alſo publiſhed ſome pieces againſt the Socinians and the church of Rome. He died on the 30th of November, 1617.

GRAY, a town of France, in the Franche Comté. It is a trading place, and was one of the ſtrongeſt towns in the province, but Louis XIV. took it in 1668, and demoliſhed the fortifications. It is ſeated on the river Sone, twenty-five miles north-eaſt of Dijon, and one hundred and eighty ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 41. E. Lat. 47. 30. N.

GRAYS, a town in Eſſex, with a market on Thurſdays, and two fairs, held on the 23d of May and the 20th of October, for cattle and hard-ware. Its market is ſaid to be very good for corn and cattle It is ſeated on the north ſide of the Thames, twenty-five miles from London.

GREATRAKES (VALENTINE) famous in the laſt century for curing many diſeaſes, by ſtroaking the part affected with his hands, was the ſon of William Greatrakes, eſq. and born at Affane, in the county of Waterford, in Ireland, on St. Valentine's day, 1628. He was bred a proteſtant, in the free-ſchool of Liſmore; but on the breaking out of the rebellion, fled with his mother into England, where he was kindly entertained by his great uncle Edmund Harris, brother to ſir Edward Harris, knight; and after his uncle's death, he completed his education under Geſtius, a German miniſter of Stoke Gabriel, in Devonſhire, with whom he ſtudied humanity and divinity. After an abſence of five or ſix years ſpent in theſe improvements, he returned to his native country, which he found in a deſolate ſituation, and therefore retired to the caſtle of Caperquin, where he ſpent a year's time in contemplation, and grew extremely diſſatisfied with the world. However, about the year 1649, he entered into the parliament's ſervice, and became a lieutenant in lord Broghill's regiment, and continued in the army till the year 1656, when he retired to Affane, and was made clerk of the peace for the county of Cork, regiſter for tranſplantation, and juſtice of the peace.

After the Reſtoration, being removed from his places, he again gave way to melancholy, and about the year 1662, felt a ſtrange perſuaſion in his mind that he was endowed with the gift of curing the king's evil; yet being ſenſible of the ridicule to which he ſhould probably expoſe himſelf by making it known, he thought fit to conceal this opinion for ſome time; but at length mentioned it to his wife, who conſidered it as no better than an idle fancy. In a few days, one William Maker, of Salterbridge, in the pariſh of Liſmore, having a ſon afflicted with the king's evil, both in his eyes, cheek, and throat, brought him to the houſe, deſiring his wife, who was always ready to afford her charity to her neighbours, according to the little ſkill ſhe had in ſurgery, to do ſomething for him. She acquainted her huſband with it, and he told her that ſhe ſhould now ſee whether this was a mere fancy, or the dictates of the Spirit of God in his heart; and laying his hands on the places affected, he prayed to God, for Jeſus' ſake, to heal him, and bid the parent bring the child again in two or three days. When he returned, the eye was almoſt quite healed, the node, which was nearly as big as a pullet's egg, being ſuppurate, and the throat ſtrangely amended; ſo that in a month's time he was perfectly cured. There then came to him one Margaret Macſhane, of Ballinetly, in the pariſh of Liſmore, who had the evil upwards of ſeven years, far worſe than the former, whom he cured, to the amazement of all, and his fame now encreaſing, he cured the ſame diſeaſe in many others, all by ſtroaking with his hands; and ſome troubled with agues he cured in the ſame manner.

Afterwards he had the like impulſe that he could heal all kinds of diſeaſes; and a few days after, going to one Mr. Dean's, at Liſmore, there came into the houſe a poor man who had a pain in his loins and flank, went almoſt double, and had five ulcers in his leg, who begging his aſſiſtance, he put his hands on the man's loins and flank, and immediately ſtroaked the pain out of him, ſo that he could ſtand upright. He then put his hands on the ulcerous leg, which inſtantly changed colour from black, and became red; three of the five ulcers cloſed up, and the reſt within a few hours after; ſo that he went out well, and in two days afterwards fell to work at his trade, which was that of a maſon. After this Mr. Greatrakes cured many diſeaſes of all kinds by ſtroaking

In the mean time, as he pretended to have ſome extraordinary aſſiſtance from the Holy Ghoſt in performing theſe cures, he was cited before the biſhop's court, and forbid to proceed any farther; upon which he came to England, where Edward lord Conway, took him to his ſeat at Ragley, in Warwickſhire, to try the force of his ſtroaking faculty upon his lady, who had for many years laboured under a moſt violent head-ach; but here the obſtinacy of the diſorder baffled his utmoſt endeavours, yet continuing there three weeks, he cured innumerable people, when Dr. Henry Stubbe, who practiſed phyſic at Stratford upon Avon, and was daily at Ragley, and an eye-witneſs of the cures, publiſhed a piece, intitled The Miraculous Conformiſt, or an Account of ſeveral marvellous Cures performed by the ſtroaking of the Hands of Mr. Valentine Greatrakes. This gentleman ſoon after received the royal commands to wait upon his majeſty at Whitehall, where he performed ſeveral cures, as he did alſo in and about London. But he was not always ſucceſsful; for being employed by one Mr. Creſſet, in Charter-houſe-ſquare, his ſtroaking had a very bad effect, upon which was publiſhed Wonders no Miracles, or Mr. Valentine Greatrake's Gift of Healing examined, which was ſoon followed by another pamphlet, intitled A brief Account of Mr. Valentine Greatrakes, and divers ſtrange Cures by him lately performed, &c. to which was annexed the teſtimonies of ſeveral eminent and worthy perſons of the chief matters of fact therein related; and the whole was drawn up in the form of a letter, to the honourable Robert Boyle, eſq. who was a patron of our ſtroaker, as was alſo Dr. Henry More, and ſeveral other members of the Royal Society, before whom Mr. Greatrakes was examined. Dr. More aſcribed the cures to an extraordinary refined and purified ſtate of the blood in Greatrakes, whence he thought might iſſue a ſanative, as well as there did a malignant contagion in a contrary ſtate; others ſuppoſed they were wrought by the force of imagination in his patients, and ſome imagined them mere fictions. However, it is certain that the great Mr. Boyle believed him to be an extraordinary perſon, and atteſted many of his cures. He had the character of being a gentleman of great piety and humanity; however, he was a kind of prodigy that ſurpriſed and puzzled not only the ignorant, but the learned.

GREAVES (JOHN) a learned mathematician in the ſeventeenth century, was the eldeſt ſon of Mr. John Greaves, rector of Colemore, near Ailresford, in Hampſhire, and was born at Colemore, in 1602. He was educated at Oxford, and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy, mathematics, and the oriental languages, and in 1630 was choſen profeſſor of geometry in Greſham college, London. He ſoon after formed the reſolution of travelling, and having paſſed through Italy, went to Conſtantinople, and then to Egypt, where he meaſured the pyramids; and having made a curious collection of Greek, Arabic, and Perſian manumanuſcripts, and alſo collected a great number of gems, coins, and other valuable antiquities, he returned to Leghorn; again viſited ſeveral cities of Italy, and embarked for England, where he arrived in 1640. He was ſoon after choſen Savilian profeſſor of aſtronomy at Oxford, and ſuperior reader of Linarchre's lecture in Merton college. In 1645 he propoſed a method for reforming the calendar, by omitting the intercalary days of the leap year for forty years to come. In 1646 he publiſhed his Pyramidographia, or a Deſcription of the Pyramids of Egypt, and the next year his Diſcourſe on the Roman Foot and Denarius. On the 9th of November, 1648, he was ejected by the parliament viſitors from the profeſſorſhip of aſtronomy and fellowſhip of Merton college, and obliged to quit the univerſity. He had even his cheſts broke open by the ſoldiers, and his papers and manuſcripts taken from him, part of which were loſt, and the reſt recovered by means of his friend Mr. Selden. He then retired to London, where he married, and proſecuted his ſtudies with great vigour, as appears from the writings which he publiſhed, and left in manuſcript. He died at London, on the 8th of October, 1652, in the fiftieth year of his age.

GRECOURT (JOHN BAPTIST JOSEPH VILLART DE) a French poet, and one of the greateſt wits of his time, was born at Tours, about the year 1683. He took orders when young, and in 1697 was preſented to the canonry of St. Martin de Tours. He diſcovered from his infancy a fondneſs for polite literature, and after having finiſhed his ſtudies at Paris, preached with applauſe; but the love of pleaſure, and fondneſs for gaiety, made him diſlike his profeſſion. He was admitted into families of diſtinction, and contracted an intimacy with the marſhal D'Etrees. He ſpent a great part of his life in making verſes, and in diverting himſelf at the caſtle de Verdt. His age did not change either his diſpoſition or his conduct. He died at Tours, on the 2d of April, 1743, aged fifty-nine. His works, which were printed in 1748, contain tales, fables, epigrams, ſongs, madrigals, and a poem, intitled, Philotanus.

GREECE, called at preſent Rumelia, by the Turks, is bounded on the north by Bulgaria, Servia, and Dalmatia, and ſurrounded by the ſea on every other ſide, that is, on the weſt by the Gulph of Venice and the Ionian Sea; on the ſouth by the Mediterranean; on the eaſt by the Archipelago, the Sea of Marmora, the Black Sea, and the Streights of the Dardanelles and of Conſtantinople. It contains ſeveral large provinces, as Romania, formerly called Thrace, Macedonia, Albania, Epirus, Achaia, or Livadia, Theſſaly, the Morea, formerly Peloponneſus, the iſland of Negropont, and all thoſe of the Archipelago which lie towards the eaſt, as alſo Candia. It is divided into two parts, over each of which there is a baſhaw; that of Rumelia has twenty-five ſanjacks under him, and a captain baſhaw, who is admiral of the Archipelago, and has thirteen ſanjacks under him. This country has a very mild air and a fertile ſoil, and was anciently very populous; but ſince it has groaned under the Turkiſh government, it is but the ſhadow of what it once was, and though it was formerly the ſeat of learning and politeneſs, it is now over-run with barbariſm and ignorance.

GREEKS were one of the moſt famous people of all antiquity, celebrated for their laws, their ſciences, and their feats of war. The Romans had all their learning from thence. They reſiſted the formidable power of the Perſians for a conſiderable time, and at length ruined their empire. Under Alexander the Great, they governed a great part of Aſia. They were conquered by the Romans, and afterwards were ſubjected by the Turks, under whoſe dominion they ſtill continue. They are Chriſtians, but extremely ignorant; and the head of their church is the patriarch of Conſtantinople.

GREEN (ROBERT) a poet in the ſixteenth century, is repreſented by Winſtanley, as a merry droll, who drank deeper draughts of ſack than of the Heliconian ſtream. He had the infamy to favour the cauſe of vice, which he himſelf practiſed, leaving a very fine and deſerving lady, with a child ſhe had by him, for the company of proſtitutes, to whom he applied the wages of iniquity, while his wife ſtarved. After ſome years indulgence in vice, he fell into abject poverty, and then lamented the vices which had brought him to it. He wrote, 1. The honourable Hiſtory of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungy, played by the prince Palatine's ſervants. 2. The comedies of Friar Bacon, and The fair Enome. 3. Quip for an upſtart Courtier. 4. Doraſtus and Fawnia. 5. Tully's Loves. 6. Philomela, the Lady Fitzwater's Nightingale: 7. News too late. 8. Arcadia. 9. Farewell to Folly, &c. and joined with Lodge in a play called A Looking-Glaſs for London. He died in the year 1592, of a ſurfeit taken by eating pickled herrings, and drinking with them Rheniſh wine.

GREENHILL (JOHN) an excellent Engliſh painter, was deſcended from a good family in Saliſbury, where he was born. It is ſaid, that ſir Peter Lely was ſo jealous of him, that he would never ſuffer him to ſee him paint; but he being extremely deſirous of obſerving how he managed his pencil, prevailed on him to draw his wife's picture. Mr. Greenhill was finely qualified by nature for both the ſiſter arts of poetry and painting; but living too freely, he died when he had juſt given ſuch proofs of the fineneſs of his genius, as to make his country regret his loſs. Mrs Behn endeavoured to perpetuate his memory by an elegy to be found among her works.

GREENLAND, according to our maps, extends from the meridian of London to 50 degrees of weſt longitude, and from 60 to 80 degrees of north latitude, Cape Farewell being the moſt ſoutherly point of land. The country is moſtly all highland and mountains, covered with ſnow all the year. It has little or no wood, except ſome few buſhes, and not many plants or herbs; and conſequently, there can be but few quadrupeds nouriſhed here, the chief ſubſiſtence of the inhabitants being on fiſhing. There are ſeveral mountains, which ſeem to promiſe rich mines, but it has not yet been thought worth while to ſearch much after them. The inhabitants know nothing of ſowing nor planting, though the valleys between the mountains ſeem fit for the purpoſe. The northern parts are yet undiſcovered, on account of the ice and cold. The firſt diſcoverers have pretended there were great quantities of cows and ſheep; but thoſe who have viſited this country ſince, ſay, there are nothing but bears, foxes, rein-deer, and dogs. There are a multitude of fiſhes on the coaſt, particularly whales, ſea-unicorns, ſeals, and dog-fiſh. Of the ſea-unicorn's horn they make ſwords and heads for their darts and arrows. The fiſh itſelf is as large as an ox, ſtrong, ſwift, and hard to be caught. They have likewiſe a great number of birds, which the natives are very dextrous in catching, with ſnares and ſprings, and they make great uſe of the ſkins and feathers. The inhabitants are generally of a low ſtature, with black hair, flat noſes, broad faces, and lips turned up. Their complexion is of the colour of a ripe olive, or a dark brown. The women ſtain their faces with blue and black ſtreaks, let into the ſkin by pricking it with a ſharp bone. They reſemble the Samoieds and Laplanders, and are very active and ſtrong. They are ſometimes ſo deſperate, that rather than be taken they will throw themſelves down the rocks and mountains. In the winter they retire from the ſea-ſide to the warm valleys, where they have houſes and villages, dug in the earth, and round, like an oven. In the fiſhing time they remove from place to place, in their large boats. Theſe conſiſt of four poles, covered with ſkins, which ſerve them well enough in the ſummer. The things they value moſt are knives, ſmall pieces of iron, looking-glaſs, &c. for which they exchange their bows and arrows, their boats, and even their very cloaths off their backs. Their cloaths are made of bird-ſkins, ſeal-ſkins, and the like, with the feathers and hair upon them. They wear the hair ſide outwards in the ſummer, and inwards in the winter, at which time they have two or three ſuits, one upon another. They dreſs their ſkins very well, making them very ſoft and ſupple, ſowing them very ſtrong with the ſinews of beaſts, and needles made of fiſh-bones. Their canoes are made of whale fins, which we call whalebone, of about an inch thick and broad, and reach from one end of the canoe to the other, and are ſowed faſt together with ſtrong ſinews, and covered on the outſide with ſeal ſkins. They are from ten to twenty feet long, and about two broad, in the ſhape of a weaver's ſhuttle, ſharp at both ends. In the middle of it are the ribs, to keep the ſides aſunder. They have a deck made of the ſame materials, in the midſt whereof is a round hole, as big as the middle of a man. When he rows, he ſits in the hole, and cloſes it with his frock, in ſuch a manner that no water can poſſibly enter. They have but one oar, about ſix feet long, with a paddle, ſix inches broad at both ends: with this he balances his boat, and rows it forward with ſuch incredible ſwiftneſs, that a ten-oared barge cannot keep him company. Beſides theſe, they have large boats, thirty or forty feet long, in which they put their fiſh, and theſe have twenty ſeats, at leaſt, for the rowers.

GREENVILE, or GREENVILLE (Sir RICHARD) a fortunate diſcoverer, and vice admiral, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was the ſon of Sir George Greenville, bart. and was born about the year 1540. Being naturally of an active and public ſpirit, he entered into the ſervice of the emperor, againſt the Turks, and gave high proofs of his courage in Hungary. In 1571 he was choſen to repreſent the county of Cornwall in parliament, received the honour of knighthood, and afterwards commanded a ſquadron of ſeven ſmall ſhips, which ſailed from Plymouth, on the 9th of April, 1595, in order to make diſcoveries in America, when entering the bay of Moſquito, in the iſland of St. John de Porto Rico, they landed, built a fort, and took two ſhips, that were pretty good prizes. On the 20th of June, they fell in with the coaſt of Florida, in the part afterwards called Virginia, where where he left a colony of an hundred men, under the direction of Sir Ralph Lane, who was the firſt Engliſhman that had the title of governor in that country; and having ſettled every thing to the ſatisfaction of thoſe who were to remain behind, weighed anchor in the Tyger, which was of the burthen of one hundred and twenty tons, and ſet ſail for England.

In his paſſage home, he chaſed a Spaniſh ſhip of three hundred tons burthen, which he found it impoſſible to take any other way than by boarding, and that appeared to his own people impracticable, as they had at that time no boat; but carried away by his eager courage, he cauſed ſomething like a boat to be clapped up with the boards of broken cheſts, in which he went in perſon, with as many men as it would hold, and boarded the Spaniſh ſhip; which he had no ſooner done, than the half-wrought boat, which carried them, fell to pieces. In the veſſel he had thus taken, and which was richly laden, Sir Richard was ſeparated from the Tyger, which he did not ſee again during the whole voyage, that veſſel coming to an anchor at Falmouth, on the 6th of October, whereas Sir Richard Greenville did not arrive in his prize, at Plymouth, till the 18th of the ſame month, when he was met, and welcomed on ſhore, by a great concourſe of people, who came to congratulate his good fortune.

Sir Richard, ſoon after his return, reſolved to make another voyage to his new colony; but not being able to get every thing ready as ſoon as he expected, he prevailed on his couſin, Sir Walter Raleigh, to ſend a ſhip with proviſions. That ſhip arrived at Virginia, and Sir Richard landed there fourteen days after, with a ſmall ſquadron of three ſail; but neither the firſt ſhip, nor Sir Richard's ſquadron, could ſee any ſigns of the colony left there the year before, the men having been, at their own requeſt, taken away a few days before, by Sir Francis Drake, who touched there, in his return from the Weſt Indies to England. Sir Richard then left, with their own conſent, fifteen of his men in the iſland of Roanoak, with proviſions for two years. He then took ſeveral prizes, landed on the Azores, and plundered ſeveral villages, after which he returned to England.

Queen Elizabeth having received intelligence of the deſign of the Spaniards to invade England, a ſtanding council of war was formed, compoſed of nine members, of which Sir Richard was one.

In 1591, the queen's miniſtry being informed, that a rich Spaniſh fleet was ſoon to return home from America, it was reſolved, that a ſtrong ſquadron ſhould be ſent to intercept them at the Weſtern iſlands. This fleet conſiſted of ſeven ſail of her majeſty's ſhips, under the command of admiral lord Thomas Howard, and Sir Richard Greenvile, vice-admiral, who was in the Revenge. The Spaniſh armada ſailed at a time when great part of the crews were on ſhore, and a conſiderable number of men ſick of the ſcurvy in the ſhips. In this ſituation, they were far from being in a condition to attack the enemy; but Sir Richard, refuſing to fly, and reſolving rather to die than leave ſuch a mark of diſhonour on himſelf and his country, was attacked by the Spaniſh admiral, and four other ſhips, who boarded the Revenge; but were all beaten off. Sir Richard, with the greateſt intrepidity, repulſed the enemy fifteen times, notwithſtanding which they continually ſhifted their veſſels, and boarded with freſh men. He was himſelf wounded in the beginning of the action, but continued upon deck till about eleven at night, when receiving a ſhot in the body, he was carried down to be dreſſed, which while the ſurgeon was doing, Sir Richard received a dangerous wound in the head, and the poor man was killed by his ſide. By this time the Engliſh began to want powder, all their ſmall arms were broke, forty of their beſt men, which were but one hundred and three at the beginning, killed, and almoſt all the reſt wounded, their maſts beat overboard, and nothing left but a hulk, unable to move, but as the ſea directed, with the enemy in a ring round them. In this ſituation, Sir Richard Greenvile invited the ſhip's crew to yield themſelves to the mercy of God, rather than of the Spaniards; but the Spaniſh admiral, promiſing that all their lives ſhould be ſpared, and the whole ſhip's crew ſent home to England, they accepted theſe conditions. Sir Richard Greenvile died on the third day after his being carried on board the Spaniſh veſſel. The Spaniards had no great cauſe to rejoice at this victory, which coſt them very dear; for the admiral of the fly-boats, and the Aſcenſion of Seville ſunk by the ſide of the Revenge; a third veſſel, returning to the road of St. Michael, to refit, ſunk there; and a fourth was voluntarily run on ſhore by the crew, in order to ſave themſelves; beſides, in their ſeveral attacks, the Spaniards loſt at leaſt a thouſand men.

GREENVILE (Sir BEVIL) the grandſon of the former, was born in Cornwall, in 1596, and educated at Exeter college, Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts. He diſcovered, by a multitude of experiments, the method of uſing coal, inſtead of wood, in melting of tin, and alſo contrived ſeveral methods to hinder the waſting of that metal in the blaſt, which, from a principle of public ſpirit, he communicated to his countrymen. He ſerved as knight of the ſhire for the county of Cornwall, and afterwards as burgeſs for Launceſton, and about the year 1640 received the honour of knighthood. He had, in 1638, raiſed a troop at his own expence, in which he attended king Charles I in his firſt northern expedition. He adhered to what he took to be his duty to his king and country, but would not plunge himſelf into the depth of party. He, however, upon many occaſions, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in defence of his ſovereign, and particularly, with Sir Ralph Hopton, defeated the earl of Stamford, who was intrenched on a plain, on the top of a hill of difficult acceſs, near Stratton, on the 16th of May, 1643, which was conſidered as one of the greateſt actions in the courſe of thoſe unhappy wars; but was afterwards killed, on the 5th of July, 1643, in an engagement with Sir William Waller, near Marſfield, by a blow on the head with a pole-ax.

GREENVILE (Sir RICHARD) bart. brother to Sir Bevil, and general of the forces of king Charles I. in the Weſt, was born in the year 1600, and was educated at Exeter college, Oxford. His temper and genius leading him to a military life, he, in the eighteenth year of his age, ſerved in the Low Countries, under Horace lord Vere, of Tilbury, and afterwards went into Germany, where he ſerved in the war of the Palatinate. Returning to England, in the beginning of the reign of Charles I. he was employed in the war with Spain, and commanded a company of foot in the body of land-forces employed in the expedition againſt Cadiz, and had afterwards a company of foot in the duke of Buckingham's diſaſtrous expedition for the ſupport of Rochelle, where he maintained his credit unimpeached, and by ſucceſſive deaths came to the command of a regiment. In 1630 he was raiſed to the rank of a baronet. He had married, before, a lady of great fortune, which unhappily engaging him in a law-ſuit with the earl of Suffolk, it was proſecuted with ſuch earneſtneſs and acrimony on both ſides, that it ended in his being deprived of his wife, his being ſtripped both of her fortune and his own, and his being confined in the priſon of the Fleet, in May, 1632; but on the 17th of October, the next year, he made his eſcape from the priſon, but found himſelf in a manner without hopes of returning again to his native country. However, on the firſt news of the king's intentions to march with an army againſt the Scots, ſir Richard Greenvile came over at all hazards, offered his ſervice to his ſovereign, and obtained a troop of horſe, with which he attended the king in 1639. When the long parliament was called, and enquiries were made in relation to the heavy cenſures paſſed by the court of ſtar-chamber, ſir Richard Greenvile made his complaint; but while it was under conſideration, the rebellion broke out in Ireland, and in 1642 he was appointed major of the earl of Leiceſter's own regiment. He there raiſed the ſiege of Athlone, and defeated the rebels at Raconell. On his leaving Ireland, where he had treated the people with great cruelty, he had conſiderable arrears due to him for his ſervice in that kingdom, for which the parliament was reſponſible; he therefore came to London, and behaved in ſuch a manner as induced the parliament to wiſh he might enter into their ſervice. He did not raiſe many difficulties; but having obtained a conſiderable ſum of money, the rank of a major-general, and orders to raiſe a regiment, with power to name his own officers, he went about it with great alacrity, and completed it in a very ſhort time. He appointed the rendezvous of his horſe at Bagſhot, and having there informed his officers and ſoldiers with his intentions, they fell into them, and filed off directly towards Reading, from whence he went to Oxford, where he was extremely well received by the king, and inſtantly informed his majeſty of a piece of treachery, by which, in a few days, he muſt have loſt the important garriſon of Baſing-houſe, which by this intelligence was prevented. Immediately upon his withdrawing, he wrote a free letter to William Lenthall, eſq. the ſpeaker, to juſtify his conduct; but the parliament cauſed him to be inſtantly proclaimed a traitor. After a ſhort ſtay with the king, ſir Richard went with a commiſſion to raiſe two regiments in Cornwall, and ſoon after ſucceeded colonel Digby in blocking up Plymouth, before which he continued till the middle of July, 1644, when the earl of Eſſex marched towards that town, and ſir Richard being in no condition to oppoſe him, retired into Cornwall. Sir Richard had afterwards a great ſhare in the defeat of the earl of Eſſex near Leſtwithiel, when the king commanded the army in perſon, and all the foot of the parliament forces were made priſoners. On the 8th of October he took Saltaſh by ſtorm, with great ſlaughter, and made a regiment of foot, a troop of horſe, and the remains of ſome other corps, priſoners; who, as they were taken without quarter, he intended to have hanged; but the king ſent him expreſs orders to deſiſt from that reſolution. It was about this time that one Mr. Greenvile, a relation of his, being ſeized in Plymouth, for endeavouring to betray that town, ſir Richard offered the governor either a ranſom or exchange, but he was ſo far from gratifying him, that he cauſed him to be immediately hanged up.

The king having a great ſenſe of ſir Richard's ſervices, made him ſheriff of the county of Devon, and granted him the eſtates of ſeveral perſons of great diſtinction, who were in arms againſt him, in ſequeſtration; which enabled him to keep up a great body of troops. to pay them regularly, and to maintain a very rigorous diſcipline. He, however, at length, fell into diſgrace, and was committed priſoner by the prince of Wales, to Launceſton, in 1645; and on his obtaining his liberty, retired to France, from whence he made a tour to Italy, and then returned to Flanders, where he attended king Charles II. At length ſir Richard Greenvile is ſaid to have died of grief, at the vexations and diſappointments he met with at the court of Charles II. but neither the time nor place is mentioned, only that he was interred in a church at Ghent.

The lord Clarendon, in his Hiſtory, repreſents ſir Richard as being of a moſt cruel diſpoſition, and among ſeveral other inſtances, gives the following. One day, paying a viſit to colonel Digby, and dining with him, the colonel civilly ſent half a dozen troopers to wait on him home, leſt any of the garriſon, in their uſual excurſions, might meet with him. In his return he ſaw four or five fellows coming out of a neighbouring wood, with burdens of wood upon their back, which they had ſtolen. He bid the troopers fetch them to him, and finding that they were ſoldiers of the parliament garriſon, he made one of them hang all the reſt, which, to ſave his own life, he was contented to do. "So "ſtrong," ſays the noble hiſtorian, "was his appetite to "thoſe executions he had been accuſtomed to in Ireland, "without any kind of commiſſion or pretence of autho-"rity."

GREENWICH, a town in the county of Kent, ſeated on the ſouth-ſide of the river Thames. It is famous for having been in the reign of king Etheldred, the ſtation of the Daniſh Fleet, while their army lay encamped on Blackheath, during which time they committed great barbarities on the inhabitants, and cruelly put to death Elphege archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the year 1012, to whoſe memory the church, which is lately rebuilt, was dedicated. Humphrey duke of Glouceſter, brother to Henry V. built here a royal palace, encloſed the park, and began to build a tower or caſtle on the hill, in the middle of the park. This palace was much improved by ſeveral of the ſucceeding kings, and the tower begun by duke Humphrey was finiſhed by Henry VII. The queen of James I. laid the foundation of that houſe, which is now ſtanding next the park; but in the civil wars the palace was deſtroyed. However, Charles II. began to build a houſe on the ſame foundation, laid by his grandmother queen Anne, which was never finiſhed. The caſtle or tower on the mount, in the middle of the park, is now quite demoliſhed, and a royal obſervatory built in its place by the ſaid king, furniſhed with all ſorts of mathematical inſtruments, for aſtronomical obſervations. That king alſo began to erect the royal hoſpital for aged and diſabled ſeamen. The noble hall of this hoſpital is finely painted by the late Sir James Thornhill; at the upper end of which, in an alcove, are the late princeſs Sophia, king George I. the queen dowager of Pruſſia, the late queen Caroline, king George II. the late prince of Wales, the duke and his five royal ſiſters. On the cieling are king William III. and queen Mary, beſides ſeveral emblematical and curious paintings. In the area near the Thames is a fine ſtatue of king George II. on a pedeſtal. In the year 1705, a hundred diſabled ſeamen were firſt admitted, and it now contains near two thouſand men, and one hundred boys, with nurſes, who are ſeamen's widows. The penſioners, beſides their commons, are allowed a ſhilling a week to ſpend, and the common warrant officers eighteen-pence. Here is likewiſe a handſome college at the end of the town, fronting the Thames, for the maintenance of twenty decayed houſekeepers, twelve out of Greenwich, and eight from two towns in Suffolk. It is ſix miles eaſt from London.

GREGORY (THEODORUS) ſurnamed Thaumaturgus, on account of his miracles, was the ſcholar of Origen, and was elected biſhop of Neocæſarea, the place of his birth, about the year 240, during his abſence. He aſſiſted at the council of Antioch in 265, againſt Paulus Samoſatenus, and died on the 17th of November, 270. He had the ſatisfaction of leaving only ſeventeen idolaters in his dioceſe, where there were but ſeventeen chriſtians when he was ordained. There is ſtill extant of his, a Gratulatory Oration to Origen; A Canonical Epiſtle; and ſome other works.

GREGORY NAZIANZEN, one of the moſt celebrated fathers of the Greek church, was the ſon of Gregory, biſhop of Nazianzen, and was born at Arianzum, near the town of Nazianzen, in Cappadocia, about the year 328. He finiſhed his ſtudies at Athens with St. Baſil, who was his moſt intimate friend, and with whom he lived for a long time in ſolitude. St. Baſil becoming biſhop of Cæſaria, ordained St. Gregory, againſt his inclinations, biſhop of Seſima, which occaſioned a coolneſs between them for ſome time. St. Gregory was afterwards coadjutor with his father in the biſhoprick of Nazianzen, which he would not accept but upon condition of his not ſucceeding him. After his father's death he went to Seleucia, and from thence to Conſtantinople, where he arrived about the year 378. He put himſelf at the head of the followers of Athanaſius, whom he inſtructed in the church of Anaſtaſia, which was the only one that then belonged to them. In the mean time Maximus the philoſopher, cauſed himſelf to be ordained biſhop of that church by Peter of Alexandria, in 379, but the people would not acknowledge him. St. Gregory Nazianzen was made biſhop of Conſtantinpole by the emperor Theodoſius in 380, and was acknowledged by the firſt aſſembly of the biſhops at the general council of Conſtantinople; but Meleſius biſhop of Antioch. who was his chief ſupport dying, and the Egyptians declaring againſt him, he voluntarily reſigned the biſhoprick of Conſtantinople, and retired to Arianzum, where he died on the ninth of May, 391. His works, which conſiſt of fifty-five diſcourſes or ſermons, of ſeveral pieces of poetry, and a great number of letters, were printed in Greek and Latin at Paris in 1609, in 2 vols. folio.

GREGORY, biſhop of Nyſſa, one of the fathers of the church, was born in Cappadocia about the year 331. He was choſen biſhop of Nyſſa in the year 372, and baniſhed by the emperor Valens for adhering to the council of Nice. He was nevertheleſs afterwards employed by the biſhops in ſeveral important affairs, and died on the ninth of March, 396. He wrote, Commentaries on the Scriptures; Sermons on the Myſteries; Moral Diſcourſes; Dogmatical Treatiſes; Panegyrics on the Saints; Some Letters on Church Diſcipline; and other works. His ſtyle is very allegorical and affected.

GREGORY of TOURS, or GEORGIUS FLORENTIUS GREGORIUS, one of the moſt illuſtrious biſhops and celebrated writers of the ſixth century; was deſcended from a noble family in Auvergne. He was educated by his uncle Gallus, biſhop of Clermont, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much by his learning and virtue, that in 573, he was choſen biſhop of Tours. He afterwards went to Rome to viſit the tomb of the apoſtles, where he contracted a friendſhip with Gregory the Great, and died on the 27th of November. This author was extremely credulous with reſpect to the belief of miracles. He wrote, 1. The Hiſtory of France; 2. The Lives of the Saints, &c. The beſt edition of his works, is that publiſhed by father Ruinart in 1699.

GREGORY I. ſurnamed the Great, was born at Rome, of a patrician family, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo much in the capacity of ſenator, that the emperor Juſtin the Younger made him prefect of Rome; but he reſigned that dignity, and ſhut himſelf up in the monaſtery of St. Andrew. He was, however, ſoon drawn from thence by Benedict I. and was ſome time after ſent by Pelagius II. to Conſtantinople, to demand aſſiſtance againſt the Lombards. At his return to Rome, he was made ſecretary to pope Pelagius, and at length obtained leave to retire into his own monaſtery, of which he had been choſen abbot; but when he thought of enjoying a ſolitary and unruffled life there, he was elected pope by the clergy, ſenate, and people of Rome, to whom he had endeared himſelf by his charity to the poor, and after employing all the methods poſſible to avoid this dignity, he was forced to accept of it, on the third of September, 590. It appeared by his conduct, that they could not have elected a perſon more worthy of his exalted ſtation; for, beſides his great learning, and the pains he took to inſtruct the church, by preaching and writing, he had a very happy talent at winning over princes in favour of the temporal and ſpiritual intereſts of religion. In 596, he ſent St. Auguſtine into England to preach the goſpel there; he maintained with firmneſs what was claimed as the rights of the holy ſee, and puniſhed the incontinence of the clergy. He oppoſed the patriarch of Conſtantinople, who took the title of oecumenical, or univerſal biſhop, which he himſelf diſclaimed, as having no right to reduce the other biſhops to be his ſubſtitutes. In 599 he wrote a letter to Seranus, biſhop of Marſeilles, commending his zeal in breaking in pieces ſome images, which the people had been obſerved to worſhip, and throwing them out of the church. Yet this pope firſt introduced the doctrine of purgatory. To him we owe the invention ſtill uſed, of expreſſing muſical ſounds, by the ſeven firſt letters of the alphabet. But it is ſaid, that he had the weakneſs to deſtroy the fine monuments of the ancient magnificence of the Romans, in order to hinder thoſe who came to Rome from paying a greater attention to triumphal arches and pagan antiquities, than to holy things, and that he buried an infinite number of pagan books, and in particular Titus Livy. He died on the 12th of March, 604. The beſt edition of his works is that of father St Marthe, a Benedectine, who alſo wrote his Life. His Paſtoral, and Twelve Books of Letters, written during his pontificate, are principally eſteemed. His Dialogues are filled with fabulous miracles and incredible ſtories. He was ſucceeded by Sabinianus.

in

GREGORY II. a Roman, ſucceeded pope Conſtantine in 714, he ſent St. Boniface into Germany to convert the infidels: died on the 11th of February, 731, and was ſucceeded by Gregory III.

GREGORY III. a native of Syria, was elected pope after the death of Gregory II. on the 16th of February, 731. He wrote to the emperor Leo in favour of the worſhip of images, excommunicated the Iconoclaſtes, and dyed on the 10th of November, 741. He was the firſt pope who governed the exarchate of Ravenna with ſovereign authority. He was ſucceeded by Zachary.

GREGORY IV. a Roman, ſucceeded pope Valentine on the 24th of September 827. He inſtituted the feaſt of All Saints, which he cauſed to be celebrated throughout the whole Romiſh church, and died on the 25th of January 845. He was ſucceeded by Sergius.

GREGORY V. before called Bruno, was related to the emperor Otho III. He ſucceeded pope John XV. on the 11th of June, 996, and drove the antipope, John, biſhop of Placentia, from Rome. He died on the 18th of February, 999, and was ſucceeded by Sylveſter II.

GREGORY VI. a Roman, and archprieſt of the church of Rome, before called John Gratian, was put in poſſeſſion of the ſee of Rome by the ceſſion of Benedict IX. with whom Sylveſter III. diſputed the pontificate. Thus there were three pretenders to the holy ſee; but the emperor Henry oppoſed them all for being guilty of ſimony, and, in 1046, cauſed Suidger, biſhop of Bamberg, to be elected in their room, who took the name of Clement II. and was acknowledged by all Europe as lawful pope.

GREGORY VII. named Hildebrand before he was raiſed to the ſee of Rome, was the ſon of a carpenter, and was born at Soana, in Tuſcany. He ſucceeded Alexander II. in 1073, and cauſed his election to be confirmed by the emperor Henry IV. Father Pagi remarks, that this was the laſt pope whoſe inveſtiture was ſent to be confirmed by the emperor. Gregory VII. immediately held a council at Rome againſt thoſe who were guilty of ſimony, and ſuch eccleſiaſtics as kept concubines, and declared excommunicated both him who ſhould receive the inveſtiture of any benefice from a layman, and the perſon who ſhould beſtow it. He did not except any perſon on this occaſion, and his legates declared to the emperor, who went as far as Nuremberg to meet them, that they had expreſs orders to treat him as an excommunicated perſon till he was abſolved from his ſimony. On which the emperor received abſolution from them, and aſſured Gregory by letter, that he would for ever pay him the moſt profound ſubmiſſion; but, notwithſtanding this, he would not ſuffer the legates to call a council, and kept at his court the miniſters whom the pope had expreſly excommunicated. Gregory cited him to appear at the approaching ſynod of Rome, and threatened, in caſe of diſobedience to excommunicate him again; but the emperor laughed at his menaces, and, in 1076, called a council at Worms, where the cardinal le Blanc accuſed the pope. This aſſembly declared the election of Gregory void; on which he, on his ſide, held a ſynod at Rome, and excommunicated the emperor with his accomplices, and what no pope had ever before done, deprived that prince of the imperial dignity, and of his kingdoms of Germany and Italy, declaring all his ſubjects abſolved from their oath of allegiance. Upon this, the German and Lombard prelates immediately aſſembled at Pavia, and excommunicated the pope. Gregory foreſeeing that his conduct upon this occaſion would draw upon him very powerful enemies, ſet every engine at work in order to ſtrengthen his party, and brought over to his intereſt Agnes the emperor's mother, the ducheſs Beatrix his aunt, and the counteſs Matilda, his couſin-german, the latter of whom adhered to him in ſuch a manner as furniſhed a great handle for diſcourſe. He farther prompted the Saxons to rebel, made a league with the duke of Suabia, the duke of Bavaria, and ſeveral other German princes, and ſent a great number of circular letters, by which he declared all thoſe to be excommunicate who ſhould correſpond with the emperor. The above league at length became ſo powerful, that the German lords aſſembled at Tribur, near Mentz, and reſolved to depoſe the emperor, declaring that if he did not obtain abſolution from the pope within a year and a day after his excommunication, he ſhould be deprived of his dominions. Henry was obliged to ſubmit to this condition. He ſet out, with his wife and ſon, who was ſtill an infant, in the beginning of winter, and with a very ſmall train, croſſed the Alps in the moſt ſevere ſeaſon of the year, when expoſed to ſuch great inconveniencies as might have excited compaſſion even for a private traveller, and much more for ſo great a prince, reduced to ſo miſerable a condition. Gregory was a long time before he would abſolve him; and before the emperor could obtain his abſolution, he was obliged to be three days at the gate of the caſtle, without any mark of dignity, bare-footed, in the ſevereſt weather in winter, and cloathed only in a woollen tunic or jacket, which was next his ſkin, without eating any thing till night. His partizans who were excommunicated were treated with almoſt equal rigour, which greatly cooled the affection of the Lombards; but to recover their ſpirits, the emperor immediately broke his new treaty with the pope, and ſhewed an eager deſire of revenge. Upon this, the German princes aſſembled at Forcheim, elected Rodolphus, duke of Suabia, king, on the 17th of March, 1077, and this prevented his marching againſt the pope, who confirmed this election in a council held in 1080, giving to Rodolphus the kingdom of Germany, granting to thoſe who ſhould be faithful to him the pardon of all their ſins, and repeating the excommunication againſt Henry. This laſt thunder-clap carried things to the utmoſt extremity. The emperor ſummoned an aſſembly of biſhops, firſt at Mentz, and afterwards at Brixen, where Gregory was declared to have forfeited the pontificate, and they elected in his ſtead Guibert of Parma, archbiſhop of Ravenna, who aſſumed the name of Clement III. In ſhort, the emperor, notwithſtanding the pope's prophecies having won two battles, the one in Germany againſt Rodolphus, who died of his wounds, the other near Mantua, againſt the army of the counteſs Matilda, he reſolved to go and ſettle his antipope at Rome. This, after ſtruggling with many difficulties, he effected, and obliged Gregory to fly from Rome and retire to Salerno, where he died on the 24th of May, 1085. He was ſucceeded by Victor III.

GREGORY VIII. called before his election Albert de Mora, was born at Benevento. He ſucceeded pope Alexander III. on the 20th of October 1187, and died on the 17th of December following. He was ſucceeded by Clement III.

GREGORY IX. was born at Anagnia. He was of the family of the counts of Segni, and the nephew of Innocent III. He was elected pope after Honorious III. on the 19th of March, 1227. He cauſed a collection of the Decretals to be made by Raymond de Pennafort, excommunicated and depoſed Frederic II. with whom he had a bloody war, and died with vexation at Rome, on the 21ſt of Auguſt, 1241, in a very advanced age.

GREGORY X. before called Thibalt, was a native of Placentia, and archdeacon of Liege. He was elected pope after Clement IV. by compromiſe, and at the perſuaſion of Bonevento, on the 1ſt of September, 1271, being then in the Holy Land with prince Edward, afterwards Edward I. king of England. He arrived at Rome the year following, when he endeavoured to unite the Guelphs and Gibbelines. In 1274, he aſſembled the ſecond general council at Lyons, in which he preſided in perſon, and died at Arezzo, on the 10th of January, 1276. He was the firſt who ordained that after the death of a pope, the cardinals ſhould be ſhut up in a conclave, and not ſuffered to go out till a pope was elected. He was ſucceeded by Innocent V.

GREGORY XI. before called Peter Roger, was the nephew of pope Clement VI. and was elected after Urban V. on the 30th of December, 1370. This pope condemned the opinions of Wickliffe; tranſlated the pontifical ſee from Avignon to Rome, after its being ſeventy-two years held at Avignon, and died on the 27th of March, 1378. He was ſucceeded by Urban VI.

GREGORY XII. before called Angelo Corario, was a Venetian, and was elected on the 30th of November 1406, in a time of ſchiſm. At his leaving the conclave, he ratified an act he had made with the cardinals, by which he bound himſelf by an oath to renounce the pontificate, in order to reunite the church, and wrote to the antipope Benedict XIII. his competitor, to propoſe his concurrence in the extinction of the ſchiſm; but he ſoon ſhewed, by his conduct, that he was not in earneſt; on which the cardinals, in 1409, held a general council at Piſa, in which they depoſed the two competitors, and elected pope Alexander V. Thus there became three who contended for the papacy. Gregory, who retired to Venice, fearing the Venetians would ſeize him, fled in diſguiſe to the kingdom of Naples, where he was for ſome time protected by king Staniſlaus; but at length finding himſelf deſerted, he, in 1415, ſent his reſignation to the council of Conſtance, when that council as a teſtimony of their ſatisfaction, ordered that he ſhould have during his life the office of legate in the marquiſate of Ancona. He died at Recanati, on the 18th of October, 1417, aged ninety-two.

GREGORY

GREGORY XIII. a native of Bologna, before named Hugh Buoncompagno, ſucceeded pope Pius V. on the 13th of May, 1572. He was an able civilian, and had before taught the law with reputation. He founded a great number of colleges, approved or reformed many congregations of religious, and received ſeveral embaſſies from the Chriſtians of the Eaſt, and particularly from Japan. It was this pope, who, in 1582, undertook the reformation of the Roman calendar; for this purpoſe he aſſembled the moſt able mathematicians, and adopted the ſyſtem of Lewis Letio, a Roman phyſician. He died on the 10th of April, 1585, aged eighty-three, and was ſucceeded by Sixtus V.

GREGORY XIV. a native of Cremona, before called Nicholas Sfondrate, and the Cardinal of Cremona, was elected pope after Urban VII. on the 5th of December, 1590. He was a great enemy to the Proteſtants, and died on the 15th of October, 1591. He was ſucceeded by Innocent IX.

GREGORY XV. was of an illuſtrious family, at Bologna. He was before called Alexander Ludovico, and ſucceeded pope Paul V. on the 9th of February, 1621, when he was ſixty-ſeven years of age. He canonized St Ignatius de Loyola, St. Francis Xavier, &c. erected the biſhoprick of Paris into a metropolitan ſee, and died on the eighth of July, 1623. He was ſucceeded by Urban VIII.

GREGORY (PETER) a learned civilian, born at Toulouſe, taught the civil law with reputation at Cahors, Toulouſe, and at Pont à Mouſon, where he died in 1597. He wrote, 1. Syntagma Juris univerſi. 2. De Republica; and other works, filled with vaſt eruditon.

GREGORY of St. Vincent, a learned mathematician, born at Bruges, in 1584. He became a Jeſuit at Rome, at twenty years of age, and applied himſelf to mathematics, under the care of the learned Clavius. He at length profeſſed the mathematics with ſuch reputation, that ſeveral princes were deſirous of having him at their courts. He went to Prague at the deſire of the emperor Ferdinand II. and Philip IV. king of Spain, ſent for him to teach the mathematics to the young prince his ſon. He was no leſs worthy of praiſe for his probity and virtue than for his learning. He followed the army during one campaign, and there he received ſeveral wounds, while confeſſing the ſoldiers who were wounded and dying. He himſelf died on the 27th of January, 1667, at eighty-three years of age, leaving three learned works on the mathematics, the principal and moſt known of which is intitled Opus Geometricum Quadraturæ Circuli, & Sectionum Coni, decem Libris comprehenſum, two volumes folio. Though he does not ſhow in this work, as he pretends, the ſquaring of the circle, it contains a great number of important diſcoveries.

GREGORY (JOHN) a very learned writer in the 17th century, was born at Agmondeſham, or Amerſham, in Buckinghamſhire, on the 10th of November, 1607, and was educated at Oxford, where he received the degree of maſter of arts. About the year 1631, he was made petty-canon of Chriſt-church, in that city, and afterwards prebendary of Chicheſter and Saliſbury. In 1634, he publiſhed a ſecond edition of ſir Thomas Ridley's View of the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Law, with very learned notes; and, in 1646, publiſhed Notes and Obſervations upon ſome Paſſages of Scripture, which has had ſeveral editions. He died at Hidlington, near Oxford, on the 13th of March, 1646. After his death were publiſhed ſome of his poſthumous works.

GREGORY (JAMES) an eminent mathematician, was born at Aberdeen, in 1639, and educated in that univerſity. He ſpent ſome part of his life in foreign countries, eſpecially in Italy, and was afterwards appointed profeſſor of the mathematics, at St. Andrew's, in Scotland. He invented the reflecting teleſcope, the burning concave mirror, &c. and publiſhed, 1. Optica promota. 2. Vera Circuli & Hyperbolæ Quadratura. 3. Exercitationes geometricæ; and ſeveral pieces in the Philoſophical Tranſactions and Journal des Sçavans. He died in 1675.

GREGORY (DAVID) nephew of the preceding, was born at Aberdeen, and educated there and at Edinburgh, where he was profeſſor of mathematics. In 1684, he publiſhed at Edinburgh, in quarto, Exercitatio Geometrica de Dimenſione Figurarum; afterwards coming to England, he was choſen Savilian profeſſor of aſtronomy at Oxford, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage by his Aſtronomiæ, Phyſicæ, & Geometricæ Elementa, printed there in 1702, in folio; by his Catoptricæ, Dioptricæ, & Sphericæ Elementa, and other writings. He died at Maidenhead, in the county of Bucks, on the 12th of October, 1708.

GRENADA (LEWIS DE) a Dominican, born at Grenada, in 1504, acquired the eſteem of the kings of Portugal and Caſtile, who would have preferred him to the higheſt dignities in the church; but theſe he conſtantly refuſed to accept. His works, which conſiſt of divine ſubjects, have been tranſlated into French, and printed in two volumes in folio, and ten in octavo. He died on the 31ſt of December, 1588, aged eighty four.

GRENAN (BENIGNUS) profeſſor of rhetoric in the college of Harcourt, in Paris, was born at Noyers, in Burgundy. He taught during twenty years with extraordinary reputation, and died at Paris, on the 13th of May, 1723, aged forty-two. He publiſhed ſeveral lectures and poetical pieces in Latin, written with great judgment and delicacy.

GRENOBLE is a handſome, large, populous, ancient town in France, the capital of Dauphiny, with a biſhop's ſee and a parliament, a board of accounts, a court of aids, a generality, and a mint. It is in great reputation for fine ſkins and gloves. It is ſeated on the Iſer, twenty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Chamberry, ninety-three weſt-by-north of Turin, and three hundred ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 35. E. Lat. 45. 26. N.

GRESHAM (ſir THOMAS) founder of the Royal Exchange, and of Greſham-college, till lately in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, London, was the ſon of ſir Richard Greſham, a wealthy merchant, and was born at London, in 1519. While very young, he was bound apprentice to a merchant, after which he was ſent to Caius college, then Glonvill-hall, in Cambridge, where he made ſuch improvements in learning, that Dr. Caius, the founder of the college, ſtyles him Doctiſſimus Mercator, or the very Learned Merchant. He then engaged in trade, and, in 1543, became a member of the mercer's company. He ſoon after married, and his father dying, ſucceeded him in the office of agent to king Edward for taking up money of the merchants of Antwerp, and, in 1551, removed with his family to that city, where, by his management and advice, he increaſed the trade of England, diſcharged his majeſty's debts, and, by the advantageous turn he gave to the exchange in favour of England, the price of all foreign commodities was ſunk, and the gold and ſilver which had before been exported in large quantities, were moſt plentifully brought back again. Yet upon the acceſſion of queen Mary, he was removed from his agency; but preſenting to the miniſtry a memorial of his ſervices to the late king, he was ſoon after reinſtated in his former poſts, and on queen Mary's deceaſe, he was immediately employed by queen Elizabeth to buy up arms. Her majeſty, in 1559, conferred upon him the honour of knighthood, and appointed him her agent in foreign parts. He now built his large and ſpacious houſe in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, in which he lived with great ſplendor, but amidſt his flow of proſperity, he had the misfortune to loſe his only ſon.

At this time, the merchants of London met in Lombard-ſtreet, expoſed to the open air and all the injuries of the weather. Sir Thomas's father, while ſheriff of London had applied to king Henry VIII. to enable him to purchaſe houſes, in order to build a bourſe for their reception; but without effect. Sir Thomas now reſumed his father's deſign; the citizens purchaſed eighty houſes in Cornhill, and cleared the ground, after which ſir Thomas, at his own expence, built on that ſpot the bourſe, as it was then called, on the ſame plan as that of Antwerp. It was fully completed in 1569; and, on the 29th of January following, queen Elizabeth, attended by the nobility, came from Somerſet-houſe to ſir Thomas's in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, where having dined with him, ſhe went to view the bourſe, and having examined every part of it, cauſed it to be proclaimed by a trumpet and herald, the Royal Exchange. Upon this day, it is ſaid, ſir Thomas reduced to powder a pearl he had purchaſed of a foreigner, which on account of the price, ſeveral perſons of the firſt quality had refuſed to buy, and drank it up in a glaſs of wine. This ſtory is founded on the following paſſage in a play: "Here fifteen hundred "pounds at one clap goes. Inſtead of ſugar, Greſham "drinks this pearl unto his queen and miniſters. Pledge "it, lords." On no better evidence than this, the ſtory has been handed down by tradition as a real fact, though it is far from being agreeable to the character of ſir Thomas, who was generous and magnificent, but yet knew how to make the beſt uſe of his money, Sir Thomas was ſent to Antwerp, to borrow money for her majeſty, and to prolong the time of payment for ſums that were due from the queen. Theſe affairs he managed with the utmoſt addreſs, and ſoon after he put the queen into a method of taking up money of her own ſubjects inſtead of foreigners, which he had often recommended; and, upon trial, it was found to be of mutual benefit to the prince and people. In 1572, her majeſty ſhewed her regard to him, by appointing him, together with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhop of London, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, aſſiſtants to the lord mayor, during her majeſty's progreſs that ſummer. This method was afterwards continued on the like occaſions.

Sir Thomas had purchaſed large eſtates in ſeveral counties, and being at length deſirous of having a country ſeat near London, he bought Oſterly Park, near Brentford, in Middleſex, within which he built a large and magnificent ſeat.

ſeat. Here queen Elizabeth being once lodged and entertained with great ſplendor, found fault with the court before it, as being too large, obſerving, that it would appear better, if divided by a wall in the middle, when taking the hint, he, in order to ſhew his reſpect to her majeſty, immediately ſent for workmen from London, who built up the wall with ſuch privacy and expedition, that the next morning the queen, to her great ſurpriſe, found the court divided in the manner ſhe had propoſed the day before.

Before this ſeat was completed, he formed and executed the deſign of coverting his manſion-houſe, in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, into a ſeat for the Muſes. For this purpoſe, he gave one moiety of the Royal Exchange to the mayor and commonalty of London, and the other to the Mercer's companies for the ſalaries of ſeven lecturers in divinity, law, phyſic, aſtronomy, geometry, muſic, and rhetoric, at fifty pounds per annum for each, with his houſe in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, for the reſidence of the lecturers, and the reading of the lectures. He likewiſe left 53l. 6s. 8d. yearly, for the proviſion of eight alms-folks, reſiding in the alms-houſes behind his houſe, with 10l. to each of the priſons, and the like ſum to each of the hoſpitals, and 100l. per annum to provide a dinner on every quarter-day for the Mercer's company. Having thus ſettled his affairs, ſo much to his own honour and the intereſt of the public, he was at leiſure to reap the fruits of his induſtry and ſucceſs; but his enjoyment of this felicity was of ſhort duration; for, on the evening of the 21ſt of November, he ſuddenly fell down in his own houſe, and being taken up ſpeechleſs, ſoon expired. By his death, ſeveral eſtates, to the clear yearly value of 2300l. fell to his lady, who ſurvived him many years.

GRETSER (James) in Latin Gretſerus, a learned Jeſuit, born at Marckdorf, in Germany, about the year 1561, was for a long time profeſſor in the univerſity of Ingoldſtadt, and rendered himſelf famous by his ſkill in the languages, in divinity, and eccleſiaſtical and profane antiquity. He died at Ingolſtadt, on the 29th of January, 1625, aged ſixty-three. He was a very voluminous author, and ſpent his whole time in writing againſt the proteſtants. All his works were printed at Ratiſbon, in 1739, in ſeventeen volumes, folio.

GREVILE (ſir Fulk, or Foulk) lord Brooke, was the ſon of ſir Fulke Grevile, of Beauchamp-court, in Warwickſhire, where he was born in the year 1554. He was educated at both the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge, after which he travelled, and, upon his return, was introduced to the court by his uncle, Robert Grevile, a ſervant to queen Elizabeth; and from that time, he continued to make daily advances in her majeſty's favour. The early part of his life he ſpent in military enterprizes; but being diverted from them by the remonſtrances, and even expreſs injunctions, of the queen, he devoted himſelf wholly to civil employments. The firſt place he poſſeſſed under the government, was an office in the court of the marches of Wales; and he was ſoon after appointed ſecretary to that principality. In 1591, he received the honour of knighthood, and, about the year 1600, was made treaſurer of marine cauſes for life. He was made knight of the Bath at the coronation of king James I. and, in the twelfth year of that king's reign, being conſtituted under-treaſurer and chancellor of the exchequer, was appointed one of his majeſty's privy council, and having diſcharged theſe places with great fidelity, he was, in 1620, advanced to the dignity of a baron, by the title of Lord Brooke, of Beauchamp's-court, and the next year was made one of the gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber, upon which he reſigned his chancellorſhip of the exchequer. He wrote ſeveral works, both in verſe and proſe, among which are, 1. Two tragedies, Alaham and Muſtapha. 2. A Treatiſe of human Learning, &c. in verſe, in folio. 3. The Life of Sir Philip Sidney. 4. An Inquiſition upon Fame and Honour, in eighty-ſix ſtanzas. 5. A Treatiſe of Wars, in ſixty-eight ſtanzas. 6. Cælica, a collection of one hundred and nine ſongs. 7. His Remains, conſiſting of political and philoſophical poems. At length, neglecting to reward one Haywood, who had ſpent the greateſt part of his time in his ſervice, for which he expoſtulated with his maſter, but was ſharply rebuked; this prompted him to revenge, and being alone with him, in his bed-chamber, at Brooke-houſe in Holborn, he gave his lordſhip a mortal ſtab in the back, of which he died in September, 1628, aged ſeventy-four. The aſſaſſin immediately locked himſelf into another room, where he ſtabbed himſelf. His lordſhip was interred on the 27th of October following, in the collegiate church of Warwick, where he had in his life erected a monument, with an epitaph. As his lordſhip was never married, he was ſucceeded in honour by his kinſman Robert Grevile. It is ſaid, that his lordſhip deſired to be known to poſterity under no other character than that of Shakeſpeare's and Ben Jonſon's maſter, lord chancellor Egerton's and biſhop Overall's patron, and ſir Philip Sidney's friend.

Mr. Walpole obſerves of ſir Fulke Grevile, that he was one of thoſe admired wits who have loſt much of their reputation in the eyes of poſterity; for a thouſand accidents of birth, court favour, or popularity, concur to gild a ſlender proportion of merit, and after ages, who look when thoſe beams are withdrawn, wonder what attracted the eyes of the multitude.

GREVILE (Robert) lord Brooke, kinſman to the former, was born about the year 1607, and educated at Cambridge. He adhered to the parliament during the civil wars, and was appointed by them lieutenant of Warwickſhire, and a colonel and commander in their army, but was killed by a ſhot in the left eye, in attacking the Church-cloſe, at Litchfield, on the 2d of March, 1642-3. He wrote, 1. The Nature of Truth, its Union and Unity with the Soul, duodecimo. 2. A Diſcourſe on the Nature of the Epiſcopacy exerciſed in England, quarto; and publiſhed ſeveral of his ſpeeches in parliament, at Guildhall, &c.

GREVENBROECK, a celebrated Flemiſh painter, excelled in ſea-pieces; in drawing ſmall figures in perſpective; in expreſſing the different times of the day by ſhadows, and in the variety of his objects.

GREVIN (James) a phyſician, poet, and one of the greateſt wits of the ſixteenth century, was born at Clermont, a town of the Iſle of France, in 1538. At thirteen years of age, he publiſhed a tragedy intitled Cæſar, and two French comedies, which, when the author was known, were the aſtoniſhment of all Paris. Theſe were ſoon followed by paſtorals, hymns on the marriage of the princes of his time, ſonnets, ſongs, odes, and other pieces of poetry, in Latin. He alſo applied himſelf to the ſtudy of medicine, and ſucceeded with the ſame facility. He was a Calviniſt, and joined with Rochechandieu and Florent Chretien, in writing an ingenious piece, intitled The Temple, againſt Ronſard, who had uſed the Calviniſts ill, in his Diſcourſe on the Miſeries of the Times. Margaret of France, ducheſs of Savoy, took him with her into Piedmont, and made him her phyſician and counſellor; but he died at Turin, on the 5th of November, 1570, when only thirty-two years of age. A great part of his poems are printed in a volume intitled Olympus, printed by Robert Stevens, in 1560, octavo. Moſt of the others are in a collection intitled Gelodacrye. He alſo tranſlated into French verſe the works of Nicander, and this tranſlation, in the opinion of M. de Thou, who beſtows great praiſes on Grevin and his works, is not inferior to the original Greek. Beſides theſe, he wrote a poem on the hiſtory of France, and the illuſtrious perſons of the houſe of Medicis.

GREVIUS (John) an Arminian miniſter, born in the duchy of Cleves. He was admitted to the miniſterial functions on the 10th of May, 1605, when he preached his firſt ſermon in the church of Arnheim, but was afterwards depoſed and baniſhed, for refuſing to ſubſcribe the canons of the ſynod of Dort. He, however, went back into Holland, where he had private aſſemblies for the inſtruction of his flock, but was ſeized and ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment; however, after he had continued a year and a half in priſon, he found means to make his eſcape. He wrote a work in Latin, intitled Tribunal reformatum, &c. in which he condemns the cuſtom of putting perſons accuſed of crimes to the torture.

GREVIUS (John George) one of the moſt celebrated critics in the laſt century, was born at Naumbourg in Saxony, on the 29th of January, 1632, and ſtudied at the univerſity of Leipſic. As his father deſigned him for the law, he for a while applied himſelf to that ſtudy; but being moſt fond of polite literature, applied a conſiderable ſhare of his time to it, and at length made it the ſole object of his application. With this view he removed to Deventer in Holland, where he attended the lectures of the celebrated Gronovius, and ſpending two years in the proſecution of theſe ſtudies, under his direction, improved ſo much, that he afterwards aſcribed all his knowledge to the aſſiſtance of that maſter. However, being willing to neglect no advantages, he went to Leyden to hear the famous Daniel Heinſius, and from thence to Amſterdam, where he attended the lectures of Alexander Morus and Blundel, the laſt of whom perſuaded him to renounce the Lutheran religion, in which he had been bred, and to embrace Calviniſm. His reputation now encreaſing daily, though he was but twenty-four years of age, the elector of Brandenburg nominated him to the profeſſorſhip of Duiſburg; but after he had ſtudied there two years, he cloſed with an offer of the profeſſorſhip of Deventer, where he had the pleaſure of ſucceeding Gronovius, his beloved maſter, on his removal to Leyden; and, in 1661, the ſtates of Utrecht made him profeſſor of eloquence in that univerſity. Here he fixed his ambition, and reſolving to move no more, rejected the ſolicitations both of Amſterdam and Leyden; the elector palatine likewiſe attempted in vain to draw him to Heidleberg, and the republic of Venice to Padua: while the ſtates of Utrecht laid freſh obligations upon him, and in 1673 added the profeſſorſhip of politics and hiſtory to that of eloquence. All theſe poſts he filled with the greateſt reputation, above thirty years, and at length died of an apoplexy on the 11th of January, 1703, in the ſeventy-firſt year of his age. Grevius was of ſingular ſervice to the republic of letters, by producing good editions of a great number of authors, which he enriched with notes, and excellent prefaces: but his maſter-piece is his Theſaurus antiquitat. Romanarum in twelve volumes, folio; to which he afterwards added Theſaurus antiq. & Hiſt. Italiæ, which was printed after his death, in three volumes, folio.

GREW (Obadiah) D. D. was born at Atherſton, in Warwickſhire, in November, 1607, and completed his ſtudies in Ballol college, Oxford, and in the twenty-eighth year of his age obtained a curacy. In the beginning of the civil wars he ſided with the parliament party, took the covenant, and, at the requeſt of the corporation of Coventry, became miniſter of the great pariſh church of St. Michael's in that city, when the prudence and ſanctity of his converſation, the vigilance and tenderneſs of his care were of that conſtant tenour, that he ſeemed to do all which the beſt writers upon the paſtoral office recommended. In 1648, when Cromwell, who was then lieutenant-general, was at Coventry, upon his march towards London, Mr. Grew ſo earneſtly importuned him to uſe his endeavours to prevent his majeſty's being taken off, that he obtained his promiſe for it; and afterwards addreſſed a letter to him to the ſame purpoſe, reminding him of his promiſe, and took care to have it delivered into Cromwell's own hands. In 1651 he accumulated the degrees in divinity; but at the Reſtoration reſigned his benefice in purſuance of the Act of Conformity. He publiſhed A Sinner's Juſtification by Chriſt, in ſeveral ſermons; and Meditations upon our Saviour's Parable of the Prodigal Son. He died on the 22d of October, 1689.

Grew (Dr. Nehemiah) a learned Engliſh writer and phyſician in the ſeventeenth century, was the ſon of the former, and was born at Coventry. He took the degree of doctor of phyſic, in one of the foreign univerſities. Returning to his native country in 1672, he was choſen fellow of the Royal Society, and ſhewed, by the works which he afterwards produced, that he well deſerved the honour which that learned body had done him. In the courſe of the ſame year, in which he became a member, he was appointed curator of the Royal Society, for the anatomy of plants; and being elected ſecretary in 1677, he publiſhed the Philoſophical Tranſactions for a year and upwards. He was alſo an honorary fellow of the College of Phyſicians. He had a very conſiderable practice in this city; was ſecretary to the Royal Society, and continued the publication of the Philoſophical Tranſactions from N° 137 to 142 inclufive. He died ſuddenly in London, on the 25th of March, 1711 He wrote the following works, which are greatly eſteemed, 1. Muſæum Regalis Societatis, folio. 2. The Comparative Anatomy of the Stomach and Guts, folio. 3. The Anatomy of Plants, folio. 4. Tractatus de Salis Cathartici amari in Agries Ebaſhamenſibus & hujuſmodi aliis contenti Naturâ & Uſu. 5. Coſmologia Sacra, or a Diſcourſe of the Univerſe, as it is the Creature and Kingdom of God, folio, and ſeveral pieces in the Philoſophical Tranſactions.

GREY (Lady Jane) an illuſtrious perſonage, diſtinguiſhed as much by her learning and amiable qualities, as by her unhappy death. She was of royal blood by both parents; her grandmother on the ſide of her father Henry Grey, duke of Suffolk, being queen conſort to Edward VI. and her grandmother, on the ſide of lady Francis Brandon, her mother, being daughter to Henry VII. queen dowager of France, and the mother of Mary queen of Scots. Lady Jane was born at Broadgate, her father's ſeat in Leiceſterſhire, in 1537, and gave early proofs of the moſt aſtoniſhing abilities. Her genius firſt appeared in the works of her needle, and then in the fine hand ſhe wrote: ſhe played admirably on ſeveral muſical inſtruments, and accompanied them with her voice, which nature had rendered exquiſitely ſweet, and which was aſſiſted by all the graces art could beſtow. Her father had two chaplains, Harding and Aylmer, both men of diſtinguiſhed learning, whom he employed as her tutors; and ſhe made ſuch proficiency under their inſtructions as amazed them both. She not only ſpoke and wrote her own language with extraordinary accuracy, but the French, Italian, Latin, and eſpecially Greek, were as natural to her as her own; ſhe was alſo verſed in Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic. She had likewiſe a ſedateneſs of temper, and quickneſs of apprehenſion, and a ſolidity of judgment, that not only enabled her to become a miſtreſs of languages, but of ſciences; and yet was poſſeſſed of the greateſt mildneſs, humility, and modeſty. Her natural fondneſs of literature was very much heightened by the ſeverity of her parents, and the gentleneſs of Aylmer her tutor; for when mortified by the unmerited chidings, pinches, and blows of the former, ſhe returned with double pleaſure to the leſſons of the latter, and ſought in her favourite authors, Demoſthenes and Plato, the delight that was denied her in all the other ſcenes of life, in which ſhe mingled but little, and ſeldom with any ſatisfaction. However, ſhe was ſometimes obliged to appear at court, when ſhe received many marks of Edward's attention.

Upon the decline of the king's health, in 1553, the dukes of Suffolk and Northumberland, who by the fall of Somerſet were grown to the height of power, began to think of preventing the reverſe of fortune, which they foreſaw would take place on Edward's death, by changing the ſucceſſion of the crown, and transferring it into their own families. Here the excellent and amiable qualities of the lady Jane, joined to her near affinity to the king, ſubjected her to be the chief tool of their ambition. On this account, ſhe was married to the lord Guilford Dudley, the duke of Northumberland's fourth ſon, without acquainting her with the real deſign of the match, which was celebrated with great pomp, in the latter end of May. In a few days after this king Edward grew ſo weak, that Northumberland thinking it high time to carry his project into execution, broke the affair to the young monarch, and having made the moſt plauſible objections to his majeſty's two ſiſters, perſuaded him to ſet aſide all partialities of blood in favour of the lady Jane; and a deed of ſettlement being drawn up by the judges, was with great ſecrecy ſigned by his majeſty, and all the lords of the council. Northumberland then directed letters to the lady Mary, in her brother's name, requiring her attendance at court; but when ſhe was within half a day's journey of Greenwich, the king died there, on the 6th of July, 1553, and having timely notice of it, ſhe eſcaped the ſnare that had been laid for her.

At length every previous ſtep being taken, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk repaired to Durham-houſe, where the lady Jane reſided with her huſband; and there the duke of Suffolk, with much ſolemnity, told his daughter, that the late king had left his crown to her, by the conſent of the privy council, and that the magiſtrates and citizens of London approved what had been done. Then both he and Northumberland kneeling, paid their homage to her as queen of England. The poor lady aſtoniſhed, without being moved by their reaſons, or elevated by ſuch unexpected honour, anſwered, That natural right, and the laws of the kingdom declaring for the king's ſiſters, ſhe would not burthen her conſcience by wearing a yoke that belonged to them: that ſhe was ſenſible of the infamy of violating the right of others to gain a ſcepter; and that it was mocking God and deriding juſtice, to ſcruple the ſtealing of a ſhilling, and not the uſurpation of a crown. She then obſerved the dangers with which her wearing of the crown would be attended, and concluded with ſaying, "I will not exchange "my peace for honourable jealouſies, for magnificent and "glorious fetters. And if you love me ſincerely, you will "rather wiſh me a ſecure and quiet, though mean fortune, "than an exalted condition, expoſed to the wind, and fol-"lowed by a diſmal fall." However the exhortations of her father, the entreaties of her mother, the artful perſuaſions of Northumberland, and the earneſt deſires of her huſband, whom ſhe tenderly loved, at length prevailed on her to yield an unwilling aſſent, and with a heavy heart ſhe ſuffered herſelf to be conveyed by water to the Tower, which ſhe entered with all the ſtate of a queen, attended by the principal nobility, and her mother, the ducheſs of Suffolk, ſupporting her train. About ſix in the afternoon ſhe was proclaimed, and the ſame day aſſuming the regal title, proceeded afterwards to exerciſe many acts of ſovereignty. Mary, however, was no ſooner proclaimed, than the duke of Suffolk, who then reſided with his daughter in the Tower, went to her apartment, and in the ſofteſt terms told her, that ſhe muſt lay aſide the dignity of a queen; to which, with a ſerene countenance, ſhe anſwered, that ſhe received this meſſage with greater ſatisfaction than her former advancement to royalty; that by her obedience ſhe had ſinned and offered violence to herſelf, and now willingly reſigned the crown.

Thus ended the reign, but not the misfortunes of this unhappy lady. She was ſent to the Tower, and ſaw her huſband's father, with all his family, and many of the nobility and gentry brought thither, for ſupporting the claim ſhe did not approve; and her concern was encreaſed by his being ſoon after brought to the block. Before the end of the month ſhe ſaw the duke of Suffolk, her own father, in the ſame circumſtances with herſelf; but her mother not only remained exempt from puniſhment, but had ſuch intereſt with the queen, as, on the laſt day of the month, to procure the duke's liberty. On the 3d of November, 1553, the lady Jane, and the lord Guilford Dudley, her huſband, were carried from the Tower to Guildhall, where, being tried and convicted of high treaſon, they had ſentence of death paſſed upon them. However, in December, the ſtrictneſs of their confinement was mitigated by their being permitted to take the air in the queen's garden, and other little indulgences, which might give them ſome gleam of hope; but her father being engaged in Wyatt's rebellion, the miniſters perſuaded the queen, that ſhe could not be ſafe, while lady Jane and her huſband were alive; and it was not without much difficulty that Mary was brought to take them off. The 9th of February was the day fixed for her death; the bitterneſs of it was paſſed, and ſhe was prepared to meet her fate, when Dr. Feckenham, abbot of Weſtminſter, came to her from the queen, who was very deſirous that ſhe ſhould die a papiſt. The lady received him with much civility, and with ſuch calmneſs and ſweetneſs of temper, that he could not help being moved at her ſituation, and therefore procured a reſpite of her execution till the twelfth. But when he acquainted her with it, ſhe told him, That far from deſiring her death might be delayed, ſhe expected and wiſhed for it as the period of her miſeries, and her entrance into eternal happineſs. She heard him patiently, and anſwered all his arguments in defence of popery, with ſuch ſtrength and clearneſs, as plainly ſhewed that ſhe had ſtudied her religion with the utmoſt care. On Sunday evening, which was the laſt ſhe was to ſpend in the world, it is ſaid ſhe wrote a letter in the Greek tongue, on the blank leaves at the end of the New Teſtament in the ſame language, which ſhe bequeathed as a legacy to her ſiſter, the lady Catharine Grey. The next morning the lord Guilford earneſtly deſiring the officers to allow him to take his laſt farewel of her, they conſented; but upon notice, ſhe ſent him word, that ſuch a meeting would rather add to his afflictions, than confirm that tranquility which had prepared their ſouls for the ſtroke of death, adviſing him to remit the interview to the other world, where friendſhips were happy, and unions indiſſoluble. All ſhe could do was to give him a farewel out of a window, as he paſſed to his ſcaffold on Tower-hill, where he ſuffered with much Chriſtian meekneſs. She alſo beheld his dead body wrapped in linen, as it was brought back under her window to the chapel.

The lieutenant led this noble and excellent lady about an hour after to a ſcaffold oppoſite the White-tower, where ſhe was attended by Feckenham, but without paying any regard to his diſcourſes, ſhe kept her eyes fixed on a book of prayers ſhe held in her hand. After a ſhort recollection, ſhe ſaluted thoſe who were preſent with a compoſed countenance: then addreſſing herſelf to Dr. Feckenham, ſhe ſaid, "God will abundantly requite you, good Sir, "for your humanity to me, though your diſcourſes gave "me more uneaſineſs than all the terrors of my approach-"ing death." She then made a plain and ſhort ſpeech to the ſpectators; after which, kneeling, ſhe repeated the Miſere in Engliſh. Then riſing, ſhe gave her two women her gloves and handkerchief, and her Prayer Book to the lieutenant of the Tower. In untying her gown the executioner offered to aſſiſt her, but ſhe deſired him to let her alone; and turning to her women, they undreſſed and gave her a handkerchief to bind over her eyes. The executioner then kneeling deſired her pardon, to which ſhe anſwered, "Moſt willingly." In ſhort, the handkerchief being bound cloſe over her eyes, ſhe began to feel for the block, and being guided to it by one of the ſpectators, ſhe ſtretched herſelf forward, and crying, "Lord, into "thy hands I commend my ſpirit;" her head was inſtantly ſeparated from her body at one ſtroke. Soon after her death a work was publiſhed in quarto, intitled, The Precious Remains of Lady Jane Grey.

GRIBALDUS (MATTHEW) a learned civilian of Padua, left Italy in the ſixteenth century, in order to make a public profeſſion of the proteſtant religion. After having been for ſome time profeſſor of the civil law at Tubingen, he was obliged to make his eſcape to avoid the puniſhment he would have incurred, had he been convicted of differing from Calvin, with reſpect to the doctrine of the Trinity; but he was ſeized in Berne, where he would have met with very ſevere treatment, had he not pretended to renounce his opinions, and as he relapſed again and openly favoured thoſe who had been driven from Geneva, and particularly Gentilis, whom he entertained at a country ſeat he poſſeſſed in the neighbourhood, he would certainly have been put to death, had he not died of the plague in September, 1664. He wrote ſeveral works, which are eſteemed by the public; theſe are, 1. Commentarii in Legem de rerum miſtura et de Jure fiſci: 2. Commentarii in Pandectas Juris: 3. Commentarii in aliquot præcipuos digeſti; Infortiati novi, et Codicis Juſtiniani: 4. Hiſtoria Franciſci Spiræ: 5. De omni Genere Homicidii: 6. De Methodo ac Ratione ſtudendi in Jure Civili.

GRIBNER (MICHAEL HENRY) a learned civilian of Germany, was born at Leipſic in 1682. His father, who was miniſter of that city, dying three years after, the celebrated Mencke married the widow, and took great care of his education. Young Gribner, at length, after writing ſome time in the Journal of Leipſic, was made profeſſor of law at Wittemberg, whence he paſſed to Dreſden, and was at laſt recalled to Leipſic to ſucceed M. Mencke. He was learned, charitable, laborious, and was of great ſervice to the univerſity. Beſides ſeveral academical diſſertations, he wrote 1. Principia proceſſus Judiciarii: 2. Principia Juriſprudentiæ naturalis, a ſmall work much eſteemed. 3. Opuſcula Juris publici et privati, and died in 1734.

GRIERSON (CONSTANTIA) diſtinguiſhed by her poetical genius, and her uncommon learning, was born in the county of Kilkenny in Ireland, and not only became well verſed in Greek and Roman literature, but in hiſtory, divinity, philoſophy and the mathematics. At about eighteen years of age ſhe ſtudied midwifry; afterwards marrying Mr. Grierſon, a printer, ſhe gave a proof of her knowledge of the Latin tongue, by her Dedication of the Dublin edition of Tacitus to the lord Carteret, and by that of Terence to his ſon, to whom ſhe likewiſe wrote a Greek epigram. Both theſe works were printed by her huſband, and ſhe herſelf corrected the ſheets for the preſs. She wrote very elegantly in verſe and proſe; ſeveral of her poems are inſerted by Mrs. Barber among her own. The lord Carteret, when lord lieutenant of Ireland, obtained a patent for Mr. Grierſon to be the king's printer, and as a reward for her uncommon merit, had her life inſerted in it. This ingenious and learned lady was alſo diſtinguiſhed by her virtue and piety; but did not live long an ornament to her country; for ſhe died many years before her huſband, in 1733. at the age of twenty-ſeven.

GRIFFENHAGEN, a town of Germany, in Pruſſian Pomerania, ſeated on the river Oder. Long 20. 10. E. Lat. 53. 17.

GRIFFIER (JOHN) an agreeable painter, called the Gentleman of Utrecht; was born at Amſterdam in 1645, and put apprentice to a carpenter; but not liking that buſineſs he quitted his maſter, and was ſent to ſchool, when getting acquainted with a boy who was learning to paint earthen-ware, he was ſtruck with the art, though in a rude form, and inſtead of going to ſchool, paſſed his time in aſſiſting his friend, returning home regularly as if he had been there. This could not be long concealed from his father, who prudently yielded to the force of the lad's genius, and bound him to the ſame maſter with his friend the tyle-painter, with whom Griffier improved ſo much, that he was placed with a painter of flowers, and then inſtructed by one Roland Rogman, a good landſcape painter. He alſo received occaſional leſſons from Adrian Vandevelde, Ruiſdale, and Rembrandt. Griffier chiefly employed himſelf in landſcapes, which he executed with richneſs and neat colouring, and enlivened with ſmall figures, cattle, and buildings. Soon after the fire of London he came to England, married and ſettled here. He drew ſome views of London, Italian ruins, and proſpects on the Rhine; for ſuch mixed ſcenes of rivers and rich country were his favourite ſubjects. He therefore bought a yatcht, and embarking with his family and pencils, paſſed his whole time on the Thames between Windſor and Graveſend. Beſides theſe views, he excelled in copying Italian and Flemiſh maſters. Having ſtaid here many years, he ſailed in his own yacht to Rotterdam, where being tempted by a pilot, who was coming to England, he embarked again, but was ſhipwrecked and loſt his whole cargo, except a little gold his daughter had wrapped up in a leathern girdle. He then ſtaid ten or twelve years in Holland; but at length returning to England, he ſtruck upon a ſand-bank, where he was eight days before he could get off. He now lived ſeveral years longer in England, and died here in 1718, at above ſeventy years of age.

GRIGNIAN, a town of France in Provence, on the confines of Dauphiny, Long. 5. 0. E. Lat. 44. 25. N.

GRIMALDI (JOHN FRANCIS) an eminent painter, was born at Bologna in the year 1606, and ſtudied under the Caracci, to whom he was related. Innocent X. employed him at Rome in painting the Vatican, and other places; and cardinal Mazarine, hearing of his fame, ſent for him to Paris, ſettled a large penſion on him, and employed him three years in embelliſhing his palace, and the Louvre by order of Lewis XIII. Grimaldi afterwards returning to Rome was employed by the popes Alexander VII. and Clement IX. who honoured him with their friendſhip. His colouring is freſh and vigorous, his touches light and beautiful; his ſites are pleaſant, his freſco admirable, his leafing enchanting, and though his landſcapes are ſometimes too green, they may ſerve as models to thoſe who intend to apply to that branch of painting. He underſtood architecture, and etching, he having etched forty-two landſcapes in an excellent manner. Grimaldi was as amiable in his manners, as he was ſkilful in his profeſſion; for he was generous without profuſion, reſpectful to the great without meanneſs, and charitable to the poor, of which we ſhall give the following inſtance, which may ſerve to illuſtrate his character. A Sicilian gentleman during the troubles of his country had left Meſſina with his his daughter, and was ſo reduced as to be in want of bread. As he lived over-againſt Grimaldi, he was ſoon informed of his diſtreſs; and in the duſk of the evening knocked at the Sicilian's door, and on its being opened, threw in money and returned. This being ſeveral times repeated, the Sicilian longing to know his benefactor, hid himſelf behind the door; and thus diſcovering him, fell on his knees to thank him for this generous relief. On which Grimaldi was filled with confuſion, and offering him his houſe, continued his friend till his death, which happened at Rome in 1680. He left a conſiderable fortune among ſix children, of whom the youngeſt, named Alexander, was a pretty good painter.

GRIMAUDE, a town of France in Provence, near the Mediterranean and gulph of Grimaude. Long. 6. 41. E. Lat. 43. 50. N.

GRIMBERGEN, a town in the Auſtrian Netherlands, in the province of Brabant, fifteen miles from Bruſſels. It is ſeated on a rivulet, half a mile from the canal, which reaches from Bruſſels to Antwerp, and has a caſtle and an abbey. Long. 4. 15. E. Lat. 51. 12. N.

GRIMPERG, a city of Germany, in the circle of the Lower Rhine, ſeated ſeventeen miles ſouth-weſt of Triers, with a biſhop's ſee, and is ſubject to the elector. Long. 6. 34. E. Lat. 49. 10. N.

GRIMSBY, a town in Lincolnſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays and Saturdays, ſaid to be the ſecond corporation in England, with a fair on June 17th, for ſheep, and September 15th, for horſes. It is a large town with ſeveral ſtreets, and a church which looks like a cathedral. It formerly had a caſtle, built for its ſecurity, near the harbour which is now almoſt choaked up. However, it is ſtill a corporation, and enjoys ſeveral immunities, and ſends two members to parliament. It is governed by a mayor, two bailiffs, a recorder, eleven aldermen, twelve common-councilmen, a high-ſteward, two coroners, a town-clerk, and three ſerjeants at mace. The two members of parliament are elected by the freemen. It had likewiſe two monaſteries and a nunnery, which are now quite demoliſhed. It drives a conſiderable trade, which is now principally in coals and ſalt. It is thirty-five miles from Lincoln, and one hundred and ſixty-ſix from London.

GRIMSTON (Sir HARBOTTLE) an eminent lawyer, and maſter of the Rolls in the ſeventeenth century, was deſcended of an ancient family, and born at Bradfield-hall, near Manningtree, in Eſſex, about the year 1594. In what ſchool he received his education, or whether he was ever a member of either of our univerſities, is uncertain. He ſtudied, however, the municipal laws of the land, at Lincolns Inn, with ſuch diligence and ſucceſs, that he became, at length, a very able practitioner. In 1638 he was choſen recorder of Colcheſter; and, upon the meeting of the long parliament in 1640, was elected one of the repreſentatives for that borough. When the parliament, or rather the army, proceeded to the diſſolution of the government, and the murder of the king, he broke off all connexions with them, and even exerted his utmoſt intereſt for the ſervice of the royal cauſe. Upon the death of king Charles the Firſt, he travelled into foreign parts; and returning to his native country, was, in 1660, choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons in that parliament which reſtored the king, and eſtabliſhed the conſtitution. As a reward of his ſervices, he was appointed maſter of the rolls; which honourable office he diſcharged for above twenty-three years, with equal ability and uprightneſs. He never publiſhed any thing of his own; but he aſſiſted Dr. Burnet in compiling his Hiſtory of the Reformation. He died on the 21ſt of December, 1683, at about the ninetieth year of his age.

GRINDAL (EDMUND) archbiſhop of Canterbury, was born about the year 1519, at Cowpland, or Copland in Cumberland, and educated at Cambridge. In 1548 be was proctor of that univerſity, and the next year was made Lady Margaret's public preacher. In 1551 he was collated to the chantorſhip of the cathedral of St. Paul's, and the ſame year was appointed one of the king's chaplains. In 1552 he had a grant of a prebendary of Weſtminſter for life, but upon the death of king Edward VI. in 1553, he retired into Germany, where he was employed in collecting the writings and accounts of the ſufferers in England for the proteſtant religion, and aſſiſting Mr. John Fox in his Martyrology. However, upon the death of queen Mary, he returned to England, where he was engaged in the reformation of religion, and the next year was promoted to the ſee of London. In 1570 he was tranſlated to the archbiſhoprick of York, and in 1575 was advanced to the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, but the ſame year fell under her majeſty's diſpleaſure, and was ſequeſtered from his office, on account of his favouring the exerciſes, or prophefyings, in which the miniſters of a particular diviſion met together in ſome church belonging to a market-town, and there each in their order explained ſome particular portion of ſcripture allotted them before, and after all of them had done, a moderator, who was one of the graveſt and moſt learned amongſt them, made his obſervations upon what the reſt had ſaid, and determined what he apprehended to be the true ſenſe of the place. However, in 1582, his ſequeſtration appears to have been taken off, but in the latter end of the ſame year, having loſt his ſight, the queen, at his deſire, gave him leave to reſign his archbiſhoprick, granting him a penſion for life. He died on the 6th of July, 1583, aged ſixty-three, and was interred in the chancel of the church of Croydon, where a monument was erected to him. This learned divine wrote Animadverſions upon Juſtus Velſius's Chriſtiani Hominis Norma: and a Dialogue between Cuſtom and Truth, printed in Fox's Acts and Monuments.

GRINSTEAD (EAST) a town in Suſſex, a with market on Thurſday, and two fairs, on July 13th, for horned cattle, and on December 11th, for cattle and pedlars ware, and there is a market for cattle on the laſt Tueſday of every month. It is a borough by preſcription, and has ſent members to parliament ever ſince the firſt year of Edward II. who are elected by about thirty-five burgage-holders, and is generally the place for the aſſizes. The returning officer here is the bailiff, who is choſe by a jury of burgage-holders, at the duke of Dorſet's court leet. It is thirty miles ſouth of London. Long. 0. 2. E. Lat. 51. 8. N.

GRIPSWALD, a ſtrong and conſiderable town in Germany, in Pomerania, formerly imperial, but now ſubject to Sweden. It has a good harbour and a univerſity, and is ſeated near the ſea fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Stralſund, and fifty-five north-weſt of Stetin. Long. 13. 53. E. Lat. 54. 12. N.

GRISSANT (WILLIAM) an Engliſh phyſician and mathethematician about the middle of the fourteenth century, who publiſhed ſeveral works.

GRISONS, a people of Italy, allied to the Swiſs, and ſeated among the Alps. The country is divided into three parts, or leagues, which are the Leagriſe, the League of Caudee to the ſouth, and the League of the Ten Communities to to the north. It is ſeventy-five miles in length, and is very populous; the government is democratic, and each community is governed by its own laws, and forms a kind of ſovereignty. The principal affairs are decided by the diets, which are held once a year. The Griſons are either proteſtants or Roman catholics, which laſt are governed by the biſhop of Coire, and the abbot of Diſſentis, in ſpiritual affairs. They are lively, bold, courageous, haughty, and jealous of their liberties. The likewiſe poſſeſs the territory of Bormio, the Valteline and the diſtrict of Chiavenne.

GRIVE (JOHN DE LA) an eminent geographer of the city of Paris, was born at Sedan, and early diſcovered a great taſte for mathematics. Having finiſhed his firſt ſtudies, he came to Paris, where he entered the congregation of the prieſts of St. Lazarus, who ſent him into Poland to be profeſſor of theology at Cracovia. He returned ſoon after, and at length quitted the congregation of St. Lazarus, to give himſelf up entirely, and with more liberty, to deſigning, ſurveying, trigonometry, levelling, engraving, and every thing that has a relation to practical mathematics In 1728 he publiſhed a plan of Paris, but being diſſatisfied with the engraving, deſtroyed the plates, and reſolved to engrave all his works himſelf, which he afterwards performed. Being made geographer of Paris, he was employed to exhibit the courſe of the river Seine, from its ſource to its mouth. He afterwards laboured with M. Caſſini, in determining the meridian of Paris, and at length undertook a very exact and circumſtantial typographical view of Paris; but when this work was much advanced de died in April, 1757, at ſixty-eight years of age. The moſt eſteemed of his other works are: His Environs of Paris; his Plan of Verſailles; his Gardens of Marly, &c. He alſo wrote a Manual of Spherical Trigonometry, publiſhed in 1754.

GRODNO, a conſiderable town of Poland, in Lithuania, and the palatinate of Troki, remarkable for the ſtructure where the general diet is kept every three years, and for its ſtrong citadel. It was taken by the knights of the Teutonic order in 1283. It is built partly in a plain, on the Niemen, and partly on a mountain, ſeventy-five miles ſouth-weſt of Trochi, and one hundred and twenty-five north-eaſt of Warſaw. Long. 22. 52. E. Lat 50. 48. N.

GROLL, a town of the Netherlands in Guelderland, and the territory of Zutphen. The French took in 1672, and rendered it back after they had demoliſhed the fortifications. It is ſeated on the river Slinſt, fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Zutphen. Long 6. 39 E. Lat. 52. 20. N.

GRONINGEN, one of the ſeven United Provinces, including the Omlands, is bounded by the German ocean on the north, by the river Ems and the Dollart bay, which ſeparates it from Embden, or Eaſt Frieſland, on the east; by the province of Overyssel on the south, and by the province of Friesland towards the west. It extends upwards of thirty miles in length from east to west, and twenty miles in breadth from north to south, and is usually divided into proper Groningen and the Omlands. The chief towns in the former are Groningen and Winschoten, and in the Omlands, Appingadam or Dam. This province strictly speaking, is included in Friesland, but is now a separate state, and has its peculiar jurisdiction and laws. It is a small country but very populous, and breeds a great number of cattle. It is full of canals, which enrich the land with excellent pasture. The air is sharp but more healthful, than that of the southern provinces.

GRONINGEN, the capital city of the province of the same name, is very ancient It was formerly one of the Hanse towns, and had like to have been surprised by William I. prince of Orange in 1568; and was afterwards compelled to submit to the States General. It is a large, handsome, and populous city, is adorned with very good public, and private buildings, and is of a round figure, encompassed with high earthen ramparts, and deep wet ditches. The outworks are reckoned very strong, having been contrived by the great Cohorn. The town gates are seven in number, six of which are at the end, and it has many fine streets. There were formerly twelve churches, but the government has converted nine of them to other uses. The chief church dedicated to St. Martin, is an excellent structure, with a high steeple, from the top of which you may see twenty miles round. There is likewise a large number of hospitals and almshouses, three spacious market-places, and about twenty-seven handsome streets. There is a university, with a library well stocked with books. It is seated at the confluence of two rivers, called the Aa and Hunes which parts the town in two, and empty themselves at some distance into the sea. There are likewise several canals, which have a communication, with the river Ems, the ocean and the neighbouring countries; by which means they carry on a trade in beer, butter, horses and oxen. It is ten miles from the sea, twenty-seven east of Lewarden, fifty-five north-by-east of Deventer, and eighty-six north-east of Amsterdam. Long. 6. 31. E. Lat. 53. 23. N.

GRONOVIUS (JOHN FREDERIC) a very learned critic, was born at Hamburgh in the year 1613, and having travelled through Germany, Italy, and France, was made professor of polite learning at Deventer, and afterwards at Leyden, where he died in 1671. He published 1. Diatribe in Statii & Poetæ Sylvas: 2. De Sestertiis: 3 Observationum, Libri tres: 4. Correct Editions of Seneca, Statius, T. Livy, Pliny's Natural History, Tacitus, Aulus Gellius, Phædrus's Fables, &c. with notes, and other works.

GRONOVIUS (JAMES) one of the most learned men of his age, and the son of the preceding, was born at Deventer, on on the 20th of October, 1645, where he learned the elements of the Latin tongue. His father removing to Leyden, he prosecuted his studies in that university, and made a prodigious progress in polite literature, and also applied himself to the study of the civil law. About the year 1670 he came to England, visited the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, consulted the curious manuscripts, and formed an acquaintance with several great men. After some months stay in England, he returned to Leyden, and afterwards travelled through France. In 1672 he attended Mr. Paets, ambassador extraordinary from the States General to the court of Spain; from that kingdom he went to Italy, and stopping in Tuscany, the grand duke gave him a professorship at Pisa, with a very considerable stipend. Two years after he left Tuscany, visited Venice and Padua, and having passed through Germany, returned to Leyden. Having received many advantageous offers from several princes and states, all of which he declined accepting; he was in 1702 appointed geographer to the university of Leyden, where he died on the 21st of October, 1716, aged seventy-one. His principal works are the treasure of Greek antiquities in thirteen volumes in folio, and a great number of dissertations and editions of ancient authors.

GROS (PETER LE) a famous sculptor who was born at Paris, and died at Rome in 1719, aged fifty-three. Several of his excellent performances are to be seen both at Rome and Paris.

GROS (NICOLAS LE) a learned doctor of divinity, of the university of Rheims, where he was born in December, 1675. Though he had poor and obscure parents, he discovered in his infancy such surprizing abilities, that the religious of St. Genevieve, who supplied the parish of St. Denis at Rheims, took upon themselves the care of his education. He learned Latin, Greek, philosophy, and theology with surprizing facility, and in 1702 was made doctor of divinity; and after several preferments, was, in 1704, made canon in the cathedral of Rheims. M. le Gros had been entrusted by M. le Tellier with the government of the little seminary of St. James, in which about thirty young men were educated gratis. He forgot nothing to form their minds for piety, and the sciences necessary to an ecclesiastic; but after M. le Tellier's death, which happened in 1710, the direction of this seminary, and the liberty of preaching and confessing, were taken from him. At length being excommunicated by M. de Mailli, who had succeeded M. le Tellier, he went to Paris, and proceeded from thence to Holland. After the death of Lewis XIV. the proceedings carried on against him at Rheims were annulled, and M. le Gros returned to that city in 1716; and being deputed by the other canons to go to Paris, he there obtained a decree against M. de Mailli; but in 1721, the last mentioned gentleman obtained against him a letter de Cachet, by which he was banished to St. John de Luz; but he avoided the effects of it by keeping himself concealed, sometimes at Paris, and sometimes in Provence, during four or five years. In 1728 he went into Italy, to observe what had passed in a council held at Rome, and in 1726 retired to Holland, where he spent the twenty-five last years of his life, except his once visiting England. He was chosen by the archbishop of Utrecht, professor of divinity, in the seminary of Amersfort, and died at Rhinwick, near Utrecht, on the 4th of December, 1751, at seventy-six years of age. His principal works are the following, in French. 1. The Overthrow of the Liberties of the Gallican Church, in the Affair of the Constitution Unigenitus, two volumes, duodecimo 2. Conversations of the Priest Eusebius, and the Advocate Theophilus, on the Part the Laics ought to take in the Affair of the Constitution, duodecimo. 3. The Holy Bible, translated from the Original, with Observations on the Differences between that and the Vulgate, of which M. Rondet gave a new edition in 1756, in five small volumes, duodecimo. 4. Meditations on the Agreement of the Gospel, three volumes, duodecimo. 5. On the Epistle to the Romans, two volumes, duodecimo. 6. On the Canonical Epistles. 7. Memoirs against M. de Mailli, archbishop of Rheims, quarto, &c. 8. Dogma Ecclesiæ circa Usuram Expositum & Vindicatum, with several other pieces in Latin against Usury, 4to.

GROSSA, an island of Dalmatia, in the gulph of Venice, about fifty miles in circumference, and belongs to the Venetians.

GROSSETTO, a small town of Italy, in Tuscany, with a good castle, and a bishop's see, seated near the sea, ten miles south-west of Sienna. Long. 11. 15. E. Lat. 42. 50. N.

GROTIUS (CORNELIUS) in Flemish, de Groot, i. e. the Great, was born at Delft, on the 25th of July, 1544. He went through his first studies in that city, after which he applied himself to philosophy at Louvain, and at Paris, and afterwards studied the civil law at Orleans. Being returned to his native country, he devoted himself to the bar; when the city of Delft appointed him counsellor and echeven at the same time; and he giving shining proofs of his virtue, integrity, and erudition, prince William created him master of the requests, which employment he discharged till the year 1575, when he was appointed professor in the university newly established in Leyden. He there taught philosophy for some years, and afterwards the civil law. He was so well pleased with this employment, that he could not be prevailed upon to quit it for that of counsellor of the supreme council, which was offered him several times. He died in 1601, without issue.

GROTIUS (HUGO) or HUGO DE GROOT, one of the greatest geniuses in Europe, was born at Delft, on the 10th of April, 1583, and was nephew to the former. He made so rapid a progress in his studies, that he composed verses before he was nine years old, and was not above fifteen when he wrote his Martianus Capella, with notes. In 1598 he accompanied the Dutch embassador into France, and was honoured by king Henry IV. with several marks of his esteem. At his return to his native country he applied himself to the bar, pleaded before he was seventeen years of age, and was not quite twenty-four when he was appointed attorney-general. In 1613 he settled at Rotterdam, and was nominated syndic of that city, but did not accept of the office till a promise was made him, that he should not be removed from it. This prudent precaution he took from his foreseeing that the quarrels of the divines on the doctrine of grace, which had already given rise to many factions in the state, would occasion revolutions in the chief cities. The same year he was sent into England, on account of the divisions that reigned between the traders of the two nations, on the right of fishing in the northern seas; but he could obtain no satisfaction. He was afterwards sent to England, as is thought, to persuade the king and the principal divines, to favour the Arminians, and he had several conferences with king James on that subject. On his return to Holland, his attachment to Barnevelt involved him in great trouble, for he was ſeized in Auguſt, 1618, and on the 18th of May, 1619, was ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment, and to forfeit all his goods and chattels, and on the 6th of July was confined in the caſtle of Louveſtain; but after having been treated with great rigour, for above a year and a half in that caſtle, he was delivered by the advice and artifice of his excellent wife, who having obſerved that his keepers had often fatigued themſelves with ſearching and examining a great trunk full of foul linen, which uſed to be waſhed at Gorkum, but now let it paſs without opening it, ſhe adviſed him to bore holes in it to prevent his being ſtifled, and then to get into it; he complied with this advice, and was carried to a friend's houſe in Gorkum, where, dreſſing himſelf like a maſon, and taking a rule and trowel, he paſſed through the market-place, and ſtepping into a boat, went to Valvec, in Brabant. Here he made himſelf known to ſome Arminians, and hired a carriage to Antwerp. At firſt there was a deſign of proſecuting his wife, who ſtaid in the priſon, and ſome judges were of opinion that ſhe ought to be kept there in her huſband's ſtead; however, ſhe was releaſed by a plurality of voices, and univerſally applauded for having by her wit and contrivance procured her huſband's liberty. He now retired into France, where he met with a gracious reception from that court, and Lewis XIII. ſettled a penſion upon him; but having reſided there eleven years, he returned to Holland, on his receiving a very kind letter from Frederic Henry, prince of Orange; but his enemies renewing their perſecution, he went to Hamburgh, where, in 1634, queen Chriſtina of Sweden made him her counſellor, and ſent him embaſſador into France. After having diſcharged the duties of this office above eleven years, he returned, in order to give an account to queen Chriſtina of his embaſſy, when he took Holland in his way, and received many honours at Amſterdam. He was introduced to her Swediſh majeſty at Stockholm, and there begged that ſhe would grant his diſmiſſion, in order that he might return to Holland, which it was with difficulty he obtained, and this princeſs gave him many teſtimonies of her high eſteem for him. But as he was returning, the ſhip in which he embarked was caſt away on the coaſt of Pomerania, and being now ſick, he continued his journey by land, but was forced to ſtop at Roſtock, where he died, on the 28th of Auguſt, 1645, aged ſixty. His body was carried to Delft to be interred in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors. It is worthy of remark that Grotius's memory was ſo prodigious, that being preſent at the review of ſome regiments, he remembered the name of every ſoldier. Notwithſtanding the embaſſies in which he was employed, he compoſed a great number of excellent works, the principal of which are, 1. A treatiſe, De Jure Belli & Pacis, which is eſteemed a maſter-piece. 2. A Treatiſe on the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion. 3. Commentaries on the Holy Scriptures. 4. The Hiſtory and Annals of Holland. 5. A great number of letters. All which are written in Latin.

Peter Grotius, his ſon, was one of the moſt able miniſters of the ſeventeenth century, and acquired great reputation by his embaſſies.

GROTSCAW, a town of Turky, in Europe, in the province of Servia, where a battle was fought between the Germans and Turks, in the year 1739, in which the Germans were forced to retreat with loſs. It is twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Belgrade. Long. 21. 0. E. Lat. 45. 0. N.

GROTSKAW, a ſtrong town of Germany, capital of a province of the ſame name, in Sileſia. It is very agreeably ſeated, in a fruitful plain, twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Breſlaw, and thirty north-eaſt of Glatz. Long. 17. 35. E. Lat. 50. 42. N.

GROVE (Henry) a learned and ingenious preſbyterian divine, was born at Taunton, in Somerſetſhire, on the 4th of January, 1683. Having obtained a ſufficient ſtock of claſſical literature, he went through a courſe of academical learning, under the reverend Mr. Warren, of Taunton, who had a flouriſhing academy, and having there gone through a courſe of philoſophy and divinity, he removed to London, and ſtudied ſome time under the reverend Mr. Rowe, to whom he was nearly related. Here he contracted a friendſhip with ſeveral perſons of merit, and particularly with Dr. Watts, which continued till his death, though they were of different opinions in ſeveral points warmly controverted among divines. After two years ſpent under Mr. Rowe, he returned into the country, and began to preach with great reputation; when an exact judgment, a lively imagination, and a rational and amiable repreſentation of Chriſtianity, delivered in a ſweet and well-governed voice, rendered him generally admired, and the ſpirit of devotion which prevailed in his ſermons, procured him the eſteem and friendſhip of Mrs. Singer, afterwards Mrs. Rowe, which ſhe expreſſed in a fine Ode on Death, addreſſed to Mr. Grove. Soon after his beginning to preach he married, and on the death of Mr. Warren was choſen to ſucceed him in the academy at Taunton, which obliging him to reſide there, he preached for eighteen years to two ſmall congregations in the neighbourhood, and though his ſalary from both was leſs than twenty pounds a year, and he had a growing family, he went through it chearfully. In 1708 he publiſhed a piece, intitled The Regulation of Diverſions, drawn up for the uſe of his pupils; and about the ſame time entered into a private diſpute by letter with Dr. Samuel Clarke; but not being able to convince each other, the debate was dropped with expreſſions of great mutual eſteem. He next wrote ſeveral papers printed in the eighth volume of the Spectator; theſe were Numb. 588, 601, 626, and 635. The laſt was republiſhed by the direction of Dr. Gibſon, biſhop of London, in the Evidences of the Chriſtian Religion, by Joſeph Addiſon, eſq. In 1725, Mr. James, his partner in the academy, dying, he ſucceeded him in his paſtoral charge at Fulwood, near Taunton, and engaged his nephew to undertake the other parts of Mr. James's work as tutor, and in this ſituation Mr. Grove continued till his death. His great concern with his pupils was to inſpire and cheriſh in them a prevailing love of truth, virtue, liberty, and genuine religion, without violent attachments or prejudices in favour of any party of Chriſtians. He repreſented truth and virtue in a moſt engaging light, and though his income, both as a tutor and a miniſter, was inſufficient to ſupport his family without breaking into his paternal eſtate, he knew not how to refuſe the call of charity. Beſides the above pieces, he wrote, 1. An Eſſay towards a Demonſtration of the Soul's Immortality. 2. An Eſſay on the Terms of Chriſtian Communion. 3. The Evidence of our Saviour's Reſurrection conſidered. 4. Some Thoughts concerning the Proof of a future State from Reaſon. 5. A Diſcourſe concerning the Nature and Deſign of the Lord's Supper. 6. Wiſdom the firſt Spring of Action in the Deity. 7. A Diſcourſe on ſaving Faith. 8. Miſcellanies in Proſe and Verſe. 9. Many ſermons, &c. This worthy and learned divine died on the 27th of February, 1738, and after his deceaſe his poſthumous works were publiſhed by ſubſcription, in four volumes, octavo, with the names of near ſeven hundred ſubſcribers, among whom were ſome of the beſt judges of merit in the eſtabliſhed church.

GRUBENHAGEN, a town and caſtle of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and duchy of Brunſwick. There are mines of ſilver, copper, iron, and lead, in the adjacent mountains, which are all covered with wood, being part of the remains of the foreſt. The people of this and the neighbouring country are all miners. It is forty-five miles ſouth of Hanover, and ſixty ſouth-weſt of Brunſwick. Long. 10. 1. E. Lat. 51. 54. N.

GRUNSTADT, a town of Germany, in the palatinate of the Rhine, it belongs to the territory of Linanges, and is very fruitful. Long. 8. 15. E. Lat. 49. 31. N.

GRUS, in Grecian antiquity, a dance annually performed at Delphos, by the young Athenians, about the altar of Apollo, on the feſtival obſerved in honour of that god; the ſteps and figures of this dance were deſigned to expreſs the turnings and windings of the labyrinth in which Theſeus killed the minotaur.

GRUTER (James) a learned philologer, and one of the moſt laborious writers of his time, was born at Antwerp, on the 3d of December, in the year 1560. He was but a child, when his father and mother being perſecuted for the proteſtant religion by the ducheſs of Parma, governeſs of the Netherlands, carried him into England. He imbibed the elements of learning from his mother, who was one of the moſt learned women of the age, and beſides French, Italian, and Engliſh, was a complete miſtreſs of Latin, and was well ſkilled in Greek. He ſpent ſome years in the univerſity of Cambridge, after which he went to that of Leyden, to ſtudy the civil law; but afterwards applied himſelf wholly to polite literature. He travelled to ſeveral of the countries in Europe, and was at length profeſſor in the univerſity of Wittemberg, and afterwards at Heidelburgh, near which city he died, on the 10th of September, 1627. He had a fine library, which was plundered at the taking of Heidelberg. He wrote many works. The moſt conſiderable of which are, 1. A large Collection of ancient Inſcriptions. 2. Theſaurus criticus. 3. Deliciæ Poetarum Gallorum, Italorum, et Belgarum, &c.

GRUYERS, a town of Swiſſerland, in the canton of Friburg, with a pretty good caſtle. It is famous for its cheeſe, which are all its riches, and is ſeated fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Friburg. Long. 7. 23. E. Lat. 46. 35. N.

GRYLLUS, the ſon of the celebrated Xenophon, though mortally wounded, in fighting with great bravery at the battle of Mantinæa, in the 363d year before the Chriſtian æra, he had the courage to give a mortal wound to Epaminondas, the Theban general, and died ſoon after. The news of his death being carried to Xenophon, while he was ſacrificing, he he took the crown of flowers from his head; but being informed, that his ſon had killed the Theban commander before he died, he replaced the crown, ſaying, That his ſon deſerved rather marks of joy, than grief and mourning.

GRYNÆUS (SIMON) a learned writer in the ſixteenth century, was the ſon of a peaſant, in Suabia, and was born at Veringen, in the county of Hohenzollern, in 1493. He was the friend of Luther and Melancthon, and taught the languages and ſciences at Baden, Heidelberg, Tubingen, and Baſil. He died of the plague in the laſt mentioned city, on the firſt of Auguſt, 1541, aged forty-eight. He aſſiſted the year before at the conference at Worms. We are obliged to him for the editions of ſeveral ancient authors. He was the firſt who publiſhed the Almageſt of Ptolemy in Greek, to which he added a preface, concerning the uſe of that author's doctrine. He alſo publiſhed a Greek Euclid, and Plato's Works, with ſome Commentaries of Proclus.

GRYPHIANDER (JOHN) profeſſor of poetry and hiſtory, in the univerſity of Jena, died in December, 1652. He wrote in Latin, 1. A Treatiſe concerning iſlands 2. Commentarius de Weichbildis Saxonicis ſive Coloſſis Rulandinis Urbium, quarundam Saxonicarum; and other works.

GRYPHIUS (SEBASTIAN) a celebrated printer of Lyons, was born at Reuthlingen in Sweden, and acquired immortal reputation by the beauty and correctneſs of his impreſſions. One of his fineſt editions is the Latin Bible, printed in 1550, in two volumes, folio. He printed the Hebrew in the utmoſt perfection, and not only employed able correctors, but being a learned man, he alſo read the proofs himſelf. He died on the 7th of September, 1556, aged ſixty-three. Anthony Gryphius, his ſon, continued his father's profeſſion in the ſame city with honour.

GRYPHIUS (ANDREW) a celebrated German poet, born at Glogaw, in 1616. He became a ſyndic of the ſtates of Glogaw, and acquired ſuch reputation by his theatrical pieces, that he was called the Corneille of the Germans, and was conſtantly eſteemed one of the firſt rank among their tragic writers. He likewiſe compoſed ſome ſmall farces, which are extremely agreeable and amuſing, and include a fine criticiſm and delicate ridicule on the ancient German comedies. He died in 1664, at forty-eight years age.

GRYPHIUS (CHRISTIAN) one of the greateſt wits of Germany, was the ſon of the former, and was born at Frauſtadt, on the 29th of September, 1649. After his becoming well ſkilled in the languages and polite literature, he was made profeſſor of eloquence at Breſlaw, then principal of Magdalen college, in the ſame city, and, at length, librarian. He was a good orator and hiſtorian, and an excellent poet in the German language, which he conſiderably improved. He died on the 6th of March, 1706, at fifty-ſeven years of age, after having cauſed to be played an excellent piece of poetry, which he had wrote and ſet to muſic, in which he admirably expreſſed the conſolations with which the death of our Saviour furniſhes the dying. His works are, 1. A Hiſtory of the Orders of Chivalry, in German. 2. German Poems, particularly Paſtorals. 3. A Treatiſe on the Origin and Progreſs of the German Tongue, in German. 4. Faſciculus . . . Luſuum ingenii, ex præſtantiorum Poetarum recentiorum Moribus, & Scriptis excerptorum. 5. Diatribe de Scriptoribus Rerum Galliæ & Lotharingiæ ſæculi præſertim XVII. 6. Diſſertatio de Scriptoribus Hiſtoriam Seculi XVII illuſtrantibus, in octavo. 7. Obſervatio de exterorum, præcipuè Gallorum, Erroribus Geographicis in the tenth volume of Miſcellanea Lipſienſia.

GUACOSINGO, a town of North America, in New Spain, thirty miles ſouth-eaſt of Mexico. Long. 100. 25. E. Lat. 19. 40. N.

GUADAGNOLO (PHILIP) a learned profeſſor of Arabic and Chaldee, in the college Della Sapienza at Rome, was born at Magliano, about the year 1596, and his genius leading him to the ſtudy of languages, he acquired the Greek, Hebrew, Perſian, and Arabic tongues; but chiefly excelled in the Arabic. He was employed with the archbiſhop of Demaſcus, and by the congregation de Propagandi Fide, in tranſlating the Holy Scriptures into that language. He afterwards publiſhed in Arabic, 1. An Apology for the Chriſtian Religion, againſt the Objections of Ahmed Ben Zin Alabedin, which is eſteemed. 2. Breves Inſtitutiones, Linguæ Arabicæ. 3. Conſiderations againſt the Mahometan Religion, in Arabic; and other works. He died at Rome on the 27th of March, 1656.

GUADALAJARA, a town of Spain in New Caſtile, and territory of Alcala, ſeated on the river Henares, in a very fertile country, which produces corn, wine, oil, flax, and hemp. Their butter is made of goats milk, which the inhabitants of this town are very fond of. The mountains about the town are covered with wood, of which they make a large quantity of charcoal, ſufficient to ſerve the neighbouring towns. It is fifteen miles from Alcala, and thirty north-eaſt of Madrid. Long. 3. 56. W. Lat. 40 35. N.

GUADALAJARA, a conſiderable town of Mexico, in North America, and capital of a rich and fertile province of the ſame name, with a biſhop's ſee. It was built by Nuno Guſman, in 1531, and is two hundred and twenty miles from Mexico. Long. 108. 20. W. Lat. 20. 20. N.

GUADALUPE, one of the largeſt of the Caribbee iſlands, placed between St Domingo, Marigalante, Deſiada, and Montſerrat. The middle of it is about 16. 30. min. north latitude, and in about 61. 20. weſt longitude. It is divided into two parts, by a narrow ſtreight, called the Salt River; and at this place the land on each ſide is not above four miles broad: by this ſtreight, the ſea on the north-weſt communicates with that on the ſouth-weſt. The north-weſt part is ſixty miles in length, twenty-four in breadth, and one hundred and forty-eight in circumference. This is divided into Baſſeterre and Cabeſterre; which laſt is ſo called, becauſe it lies open to the trade-wind, while Baſſeterre is under the wind. The eaſtern part is named Grande Terre, though it does not contain more land than the former. The French began to ſend colonies to this iſland in 1632, and ſince that time they have been continually improving and fortifying it; and yet it was taken by Great Britain in 1759; but it was reſtored to the French by the treaty of peace in 1763. It is generally ſaid to be the beſt of the Caribbee iſlands; the ſoil being exceeding good, and every where well watered by rivulets that fall from the mountains, eſpecially in Cabeſterre. It yields prodigious quantities of ſugar, and the vegetables, fruit, and trees, are much the ſame as in the neighbouring iſlands. The moſt remarkable curioſity in Guadalupe is a burning mountain, in the ſouth part of Cabeſterre. The Pike, which riſes above the reſt of the mountain, is twenty-four yards high, and one hundred and ſixty in circumference, conſiſting of a head of large white calcined ſtones, and on the top is the mouth of the volcano, which is about thirty-ſix yards in diameter, and from thence proceeds, from time to time, clouds of ſmoke and ſparks of fire.

GUADALUPE, a handſome town of Spain in Eſtramadura, well built, and in a very agreeable ſituation. The valley which ſurrounds it is fertile in wine, oranges, figs, and other delicious fruit; and has ſo many trees, which bear them, that it reſembles a large foreſt. But that which enriches the ground ſtill more, is the concourſe of three or four ſmall rivers, which falling from the neighbouring mountains, wind along this valley. Their names are Guadalupe, Ibor, Ruezas, and Vieja. But nothing renders this town ſo conſiderable as the miraculous image of the Virgin Mary, in one of the convents; it ſtands in the middle of the city, is built like a citadel of a magnificent ſtructure, and is exceeding large. There is an infirmary for their ſick, an hoſpital for ſtrangers, two colleges, a room full of apothecaries medicines, and ſeveral cloiſters adorned with fountains and delightful gardens, planted with citron and orange trees. Theſe are all within the convent. It is ſaid the image of the Virgin was found about four hundred years ago, in a marble tomb, where the Chriſtians had hid her, during the domination of the Moors. The miracle is, that being made of corruptible wood, it continued entire during ſo many ages. She ſtands on the great altar, holding a little Jeſus in her arms, in a white robe, and on each ſide two angels are ſuſpended, of gilt ſilver. The walls of the church are embelliſhed with paintings, in freſco, wherein are deſcribed the miracles pretended to be done by this image. The columns are loaded with offerings of diverſe kinds, which have been brought there out of gratitude. This altar is ſurrounded with an hundred ſilver lamps, and the church grows more rich every day, by the concourſe of people which flock hither in pilgrimage, who never come with empty hands. It is ſeated on a rivulet of the ſame name. Long. 3. 50. E. Lat. 39. 15. N.

GUADALQUIVER, one of the moſt famous rivers in Spain, which has its ſource about the confines of Granada, runs through Andaluſia, and Murcia, and waſhing the walls of Baeſa, Andaxa, Cordoua, Seville, and St. Lucar of Barrameida, falls ſoon after into the Gulph of Cadiz.

GUADIANA, a river of Spain, which ariſes in the middle of New Caſtile, and running ſouth-weſt, by Calatrava, and Cividad Real, paſſes on to the city of Merida, in Eſtramadura, and entering Portugal, near Elvas, runs ſouth through the provinces of Alentejo, and Algarva, diſcharging itſelf into the Atlantic Ocean at Aymonte.

GUADILBARBER, a river of Africa, which riſes in the mountains of Atlas, and runs from ſouth to north, through the kingdom of Tunis, falling into the Mediterranean Sea, near Bona.

GUADARAMA, a town of New Caſtile in Spain, in the mountains of Toledo, on the ſide of a rivulet of the ſame name. It is remarkable for its trade in cheeſe, and nouriſhes riſhes great numbers of cattle. It is twenty-five miles north-weſt of Madrid, and fifteen ſouth of Segovia. Long. 2. 2. W. Lat. 40. 43. N.

GUADIX, a city of Spain, in the province of Granada. It is an ancient place, is very large, and ſeated on the declivity of a hill, in the midſt of a large plain, ſurrounded by high mountains, and watered by four rivulets. The houſes are but ill built; and there is nothing very conſiderable, but the convents and the cathedral church. The air is ſo cold here, on account of the neighbouring mountains, that the country produces neither orange nor olive trees; but there are other good fruits, fine corn, and excellent wine; and the valleys, at the foot of the mountains, produce good paſtures, which nouriſh a great number of cattle. It is a biſhop's ſee, and was taken from the Moors in 1252. They retook it ſome time after, but Ferdinand the Catholic became maſter of it in 1489. It is thirty-five miles north-eaſt of Gramada, fifteen ſouth-weſt of Baza, and forty-eight north of Almeria. Long. 2. 12. W. Lat. 37. 5. N.

GUAGNINI (Alexander) a native of Verona, naturalized in Poland, rendered himſelf famous both by his ſword and pen. He diſplayed his valour in the wars of Livonia, Moldavia, and Muſcovy; was made a noble Pole, and governor of the fortreſs of Witebeſk, where he commanded fourteen years. He at laſt devoted himſelf to literature, and drew up a Hiſtory of Poland in Latin. He died at Cracow, in 1614, aged ſeventy-ſix.

GUALATA, a kingdom in Negroland, bounded on the north by Derveches, on the ſouth by the river Senegal, on the eaſt by a chain of mountains, and on the weſt by the river of St. Anthony, and by the Ludages. The inhabitants are Negroes, and are ſaid to receive ſtrangers with great hoſpitality; and the country ſeems to be the ſame now, known by the name of the Grand Jolloiſs. They have much the ſame inclinations as the people that live in the deſerts, and are fond of mares milk and horſe-fleſh. What religion they have is Mahometaniſm.

GUALDO (Galeasso) a celebrated hiſtorian, was born at Vienna, of a noble family, originally from Italy, and became hiſtorian to the emperor. He rendered himſelf famous by his hiſtorical works, which are written in Italian, in a very agreeable manner. The principal of theſe are, 1. The Hiſtory of the Wars of Ferdinand II. and Ferdinand III. from 1630 to 1640, in folio; 2. The Hiſtory of Cardinal Mazarine's Miniſtry, which is much eſteemed, and has been tranſlated into French; 3. The Life and Qualities of the ſame Cardinal; 4. On the Peace of the Pyrenees, the beſt edition of which is that of Cologne, in 1669. This work is eſteemed, and has been tranſlated both into Latin and French. 5. The Hiſtory of the Troubles of France, from the Year 1648 to the Peace of the Pyrenees. Gualdo died at Vienna, in 1678.

GUALEOR, a large and ſtrong town of Indoſtan, and capital of a province of the ſame name, with a ſtrong fort. It is fifty miles ſouth of Agra. Long. 69. 25. E. Lat. 25. 45. N.

GUALTERUS (Rodolphus) a divine of Switzerland, and the ſon in-law of Zuinglius, was born at Zurich, in 1529. He ſucceeded Bullinger, and died in 1586, aged ſixty-ſeven. He wrote a Commentary on the Bible, and other works.

GUAM, one of the Ladrone Iſlands, in the Pacific Ocean, where the Spaniards and other nations uſually touch for proviſions, in their voyages from Aſia to America. The Spaniards have a ſmall port here, which has a garriſon of about thirty ſoldiers. The ſoil of this iſland is reddiſh, dry, and indifferently fruitful. Its productions are chiefly rice, pine-apples, water-melons, muſk-melons, oranges, limes, cocoa-nuts, and a ſort of fruit called by the ſailors bread-fruit. The cocoa-nuts grow by the ſea-ſide, to the weſt of the iſland, in groves three or four miles in length, and two broad. This tree is ſhaped like a cabbage-tree, but is fuller of branches, and the nut grows at the head of the ſtem, in cluſters of ten or twelve each. The nut is generally bigger than a man's head, and the outer rind is near two inches thick before you come to the ſhell, which is thick and hard, and well known here in England. It generally contains a pint of liquor, more or leſs, like milk. The cavity is full of a ſweet ſort of matter, of the nature of a kernel, which ſticks round the inſide, and is ſoft like cream; when the nut is ripe it increaſes and becomes hard. If one of theſe nuts is planted in the earth, a tree will proceed from it. The ſap of this tree is called toddy, and looks like whey; is ſweet and pleaſant at firſt, but will grow ſour in twenty-four hours; but ſome diſtil arrack from it, of the ſame ſort known in England by the name of Goa arrack. Some make oil of the kernel, as well for burning in lamps as for frying. The ſhell is uſed in the Eaſt Indies for cups, diſhes, ladles, ſpoons, and, in ſome ſenſe, for all eating and drinking veſſels. The huſk of the ſhell is ſtringy, and is of great uſe to make cables; and, in ſome places, they make a ſort of coarſe cloth with the ſame, which is uſed for ſails. The lime is a ſort of baſtard lemon, and is very well known, but not the buſh that bears it; for it is prickly like a thorn, and full of ſmall boughs. The bread-fruit grows on a large tree as high as an apple-tree, and has a ſpreading head, full of branches and dark leaves. The fruit grows on the boughs like apples, and is as big as a penny loaf when corn is cheap. It is of a round ſhape, has a thick, rough rind, and, when ripe, is yellow and ſoft; likewiſe the taſte is ſweet and pleaſant. The natives of this iſland uſe it for bread, baking it in an oven when it is full grown; then they ſcrape off the black cruſt and the outſide, and what remains is like the crum of fine bread; there being neither ſeed nor ſtone in the inſide. The natives of this iſland are ſtrong-bodied, large limbed, and well ſhaped, with a dark complexion, like other Indians. Their hair is black and long, and their noſes pretty high, with full lips, and indifferent white teeth. They have long faces and a ſtern look, notwithſtanding which they are affable and courteous; they are generally healthy; but in the wet ſeaſon, which begins in June, and ends in October, the air is unwholeſome, and produces fevers. They are extremely ingenius in making boats or prows, and take great delight therein. The inhabitants of Guam have neat little houſes, covered with palmeto thatch, and live together in villages near the ſea. Long. 139. 35. E. Lat. 13. 25. N.

GUAMANGA, a conſiderable town in South America, and capital of a province of the ſame name in Peru, and in the audience of Lima. It is remarkable for its trade in ſweetmeats, its manufactures, and its mines, eſpecially thoſe of quickſilver. It is eighty miles from Piſco, and one hundred and ſeventy from Lima. Long 70. 55. W. Lat. 13. 0. S.

GUANIHANI, or St. Salvador, now called Cat Iſland, is one of the Bahama iſlands in North America, and was the firſt land diſcovered by Columbus, in 1492, on the very day that the Spaniards deſigned to put him to death, thinking they were got into a boundleſs ocean, where no land was to be found. Long. 75. 5. W. Lat. from 24. 10. to 24. 40. N.

GUANZAVELICA, a town of South America in Pera, and in the audience of Lima. It is rich, and abounds in mines of quickſilver. It is a hundred and fifty miles from Piſco. Long. 71. 59. Lat. 12. 40. S.

GUANUCO, a rich and agreeable town in South America, capital of a territory of the ſame name, in the audience of Lima. It produces every thing neceſſary for life, and has thirty thouſand tributary Indians. It is one hundred and twelve miles north-eaſt of Lima. Long. 72. 55. W. Lat. 9. 55. S.

GUARDA, a city of Portugal, in the province of Beira, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſtrong both by nature and art, and is built in a place difficult of acceſs, ſurrounded with good walls, and has alſo a caſtle. It is forty miles ſouth-eaſt of Viſcu, and one hundred and thirty-five north-eaſt of Liſbon. Long. 5. 17. W. Lat. 40. 20. N.

GUARDAFEU, a cape or promontory of Africa, on the coaſt of Abyſſinia, on the eaſtern ſhore of the kingdom of Adel, at the entrance of the Streights of Bab el Mandel. Long. 50. 12. E Lat. 11. 10. N.

GUARDIA Alferez, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and territory of Moleza, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſix miles north-weſt of Larino. Long. 14. 53. E. Lat. 41. 50. N.

GUARGALA, a town of Africa, capital of a ſmall kingdom of the ſame name, in Biledulgerid, to the ſouth of Mount Atlas. The inhabitants live upon dates, and the fleſh of camels and oſtriches. It is three hundred and twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Algiers. Long. 9. 55. E. Lat. 28. 0. N.

GUARINI (Battista) a celebrated Italian poet, born at Ferrara, in 1538. He was great grandſon to Guarino of Verona, and was ſecretary to Alphonſo, duke of Ferrara, who entruſted him with ſeveral important commiſſions. After the death of that prince, he was ſucceſſively ſecretary to Vincenzio de Gonzaga, to Ferdinand de Medicis, grand duke of Tuſcany, and to Francis Maria de Feltri, duke of Urbino. But the only advantage he reaped under theſe various maſters, was great encomius on his wit and commpoſitions. He was well acquainted with polite literature, and acquired immortal reputation by his Italian poems, eſpecially by his Paſtor Fido, the moſt known and admired of all his works. This poem Aubert le Mire ridiculouſly placed in the number of pious works, believing that it was a treatiſe on the duty of paſtors.

Guarini, a native of Verona, ſtudied under Emanuel Chryſoloras, and was one of the firſt who revived polite literature in Italy, in the 15th century. He was well ſkilled in the Latin and Greek tongues, and taught them very ſucceſsfully; firſt in Venice, and afterwards in Ferrara, where he died on the 14th of December, 1460. He tranſlated into Latin the ſeventeen books of Strabo, the Life of Evagoras goras from Iſocrates; and the Life of Homer. He alſo wrote, Erometa Guarini cum multis Additamentis, which is extremely ſcarce.

GUARINO (BATTISTA) ſon of the former, gained great glory by his ſkill in the learned languages, which he taught with applauſe for a long time at Ferrara. He was the firſt who publiſhed Servius's Commentary on Virgil, which he printed at Ratiſbon in 1471, in folio. He alſo publiſhed a Treatiſe on the Epicurean ſect; another, De Ordine docendi; another, De Regno adminiſtrando; Notes on Ovid's Faſti; and on Catullus; Orations, Letters, Verſes, and a Tranſlation of ſome of Demoſthenes's Orations, and of St. Gregory Nazianzen, &c. He was living in 1494.

GUASTALA, a city of Italy, in the duchy of Mantua, ſeated ſouth of the river Po, famous for a victory gained in this neighbourhood by the French and Sardinians over the Imperialiſts in 1734; it was ceded to the duke of Parma at the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. Long. 10. 33. E. Lat. 44. 55. N.

GUATIMALA is the capital of a large country, it ſtretches out along the coaſt of the Pacific Ocean, between twelve and fifteen degrees of north latitude. It is ſeated in a valley, near three miles in breadth, being cloſe to high mountains; but it is very long and level, advancing towards the South Sea. The two mountains neareſt the city are volcanos. The old city was one of the fineſt in New Spain, and was intirely deſtroyed by a hurricane in the year 1541, attended with a dreadful earthquake, in which 120,000 Spaniards loſt their lives. The new town, which is not only the capital of this province, but alſo of the audience, where the preſident and royal courts reſide, is the centre of commerce in theſe parts; for the citizens carry on a great trade through all the provinces of Mexico, and into Peru. The chief commodities are hides, cochineal, indigo, cocoa, &c. This town is ſecond to none, in plenty of fruit, ſallad herbs, fiſh, beef, mutton, veal, goats fleſh, wild-game, rabbits, quails, partridges, pheaſants, wheat, and Indian corn. There are about five thouſand Spaniſh families in the city, without reckoning the Indians, who live in the ſuburbs. The fineſt ſhops and the beſt buildings are in Dominic-ſtreet, where there is a ſmall herb and fruit market every day; about about four o'clock in the afternoon, the Indian women bring all ſorts of proviſions which the country affords. The province of Guatimala is ſeven hundred and fifty miles in length, and three hundred and fifty miles in breadth, it abounds in cocoa for making chocolate, which is made uſe of by ordinary people inſtead of money. The Indians, who are ſubject to the Spaniards, profeſs the Chriſtian religion, but they are very ignorant and add many of their own ſuperſtitions thereto. They are very fond of dancing and ſtrong liquors. The city of Guatimala lies under long. 91. 30. S. and 14. N. lat.

GUAXACA, a Province of North America, in New Spain. It is very fertile in wheat, Indian corn, cochineal and caſſia, and has mines of gold, ſilver and cryſtal: Antequara is the capital.

GUAYAQUIL, one of the moſt conſiderable towns in Peru, is advantageouſly ſituated between Panama and Lima, and is, properly ſpeaking, the port of Quito, though it is at a conſiderable diſtance from it. It is pretty large, and divided into the old and new town. The houſes are only ſeparated from each other by their partitions, and they are all built of wood. It is ſeated thirteen miles from the ſea, on the weſtern bank of a broad and deep river, in a very boggy ground, and in winter the ſtreets are extremely dirty.

GUAYRA, a diviſion of the province of la Plata, in South America, having Braſil on the eaſt, and Paraguay on the weſt.

GUAZZI, or GUIZZO (MARCO) a celebrated Italian, born at Padua, diſtinguiſhed himſelf both in arms and in letters, and died in 1556. He wrote, 1. A Hiſtory of Charles VIII. 2. A Hiſtory of his own Time; 3. A Chronicle of the Men of Letters; 4. An Abridgement of the War between the Turks and the Venetians; 5. ſeveral Poems, &c.

GUBEN, a pretty town of Germany, in Lower Luſatia, ſeated on the Nieſſe, and belonging to the houſe of Saxe-Merſeburg. It is twenty-five miles ſouth of Frankfort on the Oder, and ſixty-two north-eaſt of Dreſden. Long. 14. 59. E. Lat. 51. 55. N.

GUBER, a kingdom of Africa, in Negroland, on both ſides the river Senegal, which divides it into eaſt and weſt: A town of the ſame name is the capital.

GUBIO, a town of Italy in the ſtate of the Church, and duchy of Urbino, with a biſhop's ſee. It is thirty-five miles ſouth of Urbino, ſeventeen north-eaſt of Peruſa, and eighty-five north of Rome. Long. 12. 41. E. Lat. 43. 18. N.

GUENGA, a great river of India, on this ſide the Ganges, in Aſia, which riſes in the mountains of Balagate, and running north-eaſt, falls into the weſt branch of the river Ganges in Bengal.

GUERAND, a town of France, in Brittany, in the territory of Nantz. There are very conſiderable ſalt-works here, from which they get very fine white ſalt. It is three miles from the ſea, twenty weſt-by-north of Nantz, and two hundred and fifty ſouth weſt of Paris. Long. 2. 22. W. Lat. 47. 20. N.

GUERCHE, a town of France, in Tourain, with a caſtle, which is ſeated on the river Creuſe, ten miles ſouth-eaſt of la Haye. Long. 0. 57. E. Lat. 46. 48. N.

GUERCINO DA CENTO, was named Guercino from his having a caſt in one of his eyes, his true name being Franceſco Barbieri da Cento, was a celebrated painter, born near Bologna in the year 1590. He was taught the principles of his art by a common Bolognian painter; but afterwards ſtudied the works of Michael Angelo da Caravaggio, and the Caracci, into whoſe academy he entered, and made an extraordinary progreſs. His deſigns were correct and graceful, he was an admirable colouriſt, and was famous for his happy invention, freedom of pencil, and the ſtrength, relievo, and becoming boldneſs of his figures. But he began in the decline of life to alter his ſtyle for one more gay, neat, and pleaſant, yet by no means ſo grand and natural as his former guſto; but in this he acted contrary to his own judgment, in order to pleaſe the multitude, who were fond of Guido's and Albani's manner. Pope Gregory XV. ſent for him to Rome, where having painted two years with univerſal applauſe, he returned to Bologna, from whence neither the invitations of the king of England, nor the French king could draw him. Chriſtina, queen of Sweden, could not prevail on him to leave that city, though, in her paſſage through it, ſhe not only paid him a viſit, but deſired to take him by the hand; "That "hand, ſaid ſhe, which has painted one hundred and ſix "altar pieces, one hundred and forty-four pictures for "people of the firſt quality in Europe, and has beſides "compoſed ten books of deſigns." This great painter, who was as much eſteemed for his exemplary piety, prudence, and morality, as he was for his ſkill in his profeſſion, died a bachelor in the year 1666, very rich, though he had expended vaſt ſums in building chapels, founding hoſpitals, and other acts of charity.

GUERET (GABRIEL) one of the greateſt wits and moſt judicious critics of his time, was born at Paris in 1641, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his merit and his works; the principal of which are, 1. The Seven Sages of Greece; 2. Converſations on the Eloquence of the Bar and the Pulpit; 3. Parnaſſus reformed; 4. The War of Authors; 5. The Journal of the Palace, written in conjunction with Claudius Blondeau; 6. A Map of the Court, &c. All his works diſcover an excellent taſte, and true criticiſm.

GUERETTE, a town of France, in the Upper Marche, ſeated on the river Gartampe, thirty-five miles north-eaſt of Limoges, and one hundred and ſixty-four ſouth of Paris. Long 1. 56. E. Lat. 46. 10. N.

GUERNSEY, or GARNSEY, an iſland in the Engliſh Channel, on the coaſt of Normandy, twenty-two miles weſt of Cape la Hogue, in Normandy, and fifty-eight ſouth of Portland, in Dorſetſhire. It is about ten miles long, and as many broad containing ten pariſhes. It is naturally ſtrong, being ſurrounded with rocks, and is well ſituated for trade in time of peace, and to annoy the French in time of war with its privateers. It was anciently a part of Normandy, and is ſtill governed by the Norman laws; The natives ſpeak French, but are ſubject to England.

GUESCLIN (BERTRND DU) conſtable of France, and one of the greateſt captains of his time, was born in Brittany in 1311. He gave early proofs of his courage, and having taken ſeveral places from the Engliſh, and ſignalized himſelf in many battles, Charles V. made him conſtable of France in 1370. He took Poitou, Rouergue, Limozin, and ſeveral places in Normandy and Brittany; he had nevertheleſs the misfortune to be taken priſoner at the battle of Aurai, on the 29th of September. 1364, and at the battle of Navaret, on the 3d of April, 1367. He died on the 13th of July, 1380, aged ſixty-nine.

GUETARA, a town of Spain in the province of Guipuſcoa, with a caſtle, and a good harbour. Long. 2. 23. W. Lat. 43. 26. N.

GUEVARA (LOUIS VALEZ DE) a Spaniſh comic poet, who by his humour and pleaſantries recommend himſelf to the court of Philip IV. He was born at Ecija, in Andaluſia, and is ſaid to have poſſeſſed the talent of diſſipating, in an agreeable manner, the deepeſt and juſteſt grief. He wrote ſeveral comedies, and an humorous piece, entitled, El Diabolo cojudo, Novela de la otra Vida. He died in 1646.

GUGLIELMINI (DOMINIC) a learned phyſician and mathematician, born at Bologna, on the 27th of September, 1655. He was profeſſor of mathematics and hydrometry at Bologna, and afterwards at Padua, where he alſo taught phyſic. His principal works are, 1. A Treatiſe on Hydroſtatics, droſtatics, in Latin; 2. a large work entitled, Della Natura de Fiumi, which paſſes for his maſter-piece; 3. A Diſſertation de Sanguinis Natura & Conſtitutione, &c. He died at Bologna in 1710, aged ſixty-four.

GUI of Sienna, a famous painter in the thirteenth century, was born at Sienna, and finiſhed an excellent picture of the Holy Virgin, holding an infant Jeſus in her hands. This picture was drawn in 1221.

GUIANA, a large country in South America, between the rivers Oronooko and the Amazons, to the eaſt of Peru. The inward parts of this country are not known, only that there are a great number of ſavages of different languages, and that they build their huts in the trees. The French poſſeſs a great part of the coaſts, which is called Equinoctial France, and the Dutch are maſters of another. There is a perpetual ſpring in this country, which abounds with ſugar-canes, and has no venomous beaſts.

GUIBERT, a famous anti-pope, born at Parma, was chancellor to the emperor Henry IV. who cauſed him to be elected archbiſhop of Ravenna, and afterwards pope, in 1080. Guibert took the name of Clement III. and died miſerably in 1099.

GUICCIARDINI (Francisco) a celebrated hiſtorian, born at Florence on the 16th of March, 1482. He profeſſed the civil law with reputation, and was employed in ſeveral embaſſies. Leo X. gave him the government of Modena and Reggio, and Clement VII. that of Romagna and Bologna. Guicciardini was alſo lieutenant-general of the pope's army, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery on ſeveral occaſions; but Paul III. having taken from him the government of Bologna, he retired to Florence, where he was made counſellor of ſtate, and was of great ſervice to the houſe of Medicis. In ſhort, he at length retired into the country to write his Hiſtory of Italy, which he compoſed in Italian, and which comprehends what paſſed from the year 1494 to 1532. This hiſtory is greatly eſteemed, and was continued by John Baptiſt Adriani, his friend. He died in 1540, in the fifty-ninth year of his age.

We ought not to confound with him Lewis Guicciardini, his nephew, who died at Antwerp on the 21ſt of March, 1589, and wrote in Italian an excellent Deſcription of the Low Countries; and Memoirs of what paſſed in Europe from 1530 to 1560.

GUICHENON (Samuel) a judicious hiſtorian of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Macon. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his works, and was loaded with favours by the duke of Savoy, on account of his excellent Genealogical Hiſtory of the Royal College of Savoy, in 2 vols. folio. He died on the 8th of September, 1664, after his having embraced the popiſh religion. Beſides the above Hiſtory, he wrote, 1. A Continuation of the Chronology of the Biſhops of Belley; 1. The Hiſtory of Breſſe, and of Bugey, in folio; 3. The Hiſtory of the Principality of Dombes, which is ſtill in manuſcript; 4. Bibliotheca Sebuſiana.

GUIDI (Charles Alexander) a famous Italian poet, born at Pavia on the 14th of June, 1650. He acquired the eſteem of the duke of Parma, queen Chriſtina of Sweden, pope Clement XI. and of the wits and great lords of his time, and died, loaded with wealth and honour, at Freſcati, on the 12th of June, 1712, aged ſixty-two. He wrote a great number of poems, which are much admired by the Italians. His Life is written by Creſcimbeni, who made a collection of his printed poems and manuſcripts, which was publiſhed at Verona, in 12mo, in 1726.

GUIDO Reni, an admirable painter, was born at Bologna, 1575, and firſt learned to paint under Denis Calvert, a Flemiſh maſter, who taught in that city, but left him, to enter the academy of the Caracci. He chiefly imitated Ludovico Caracci, and yet always retained ſomething of Calvert's manner. He alſo borrowed what pleaſed him from Albert Durer, but accommodated what was good in him to his own manner with ſuch grace and beauty, that he got more money and reputation than his own maſters. He was charmed with Raphael's pictures, yet his own heads are not inferior to Raphael's. He was extremely handſome and graceful in his perſon, and ſo very beautiful in his youth, that Ludovico, in painting his angels, always took him for his model; and afterwards, his works were ſo much admired, that when the pope aſked Gioſeppino his opinion of Guido's performances; he anſwered, "Our "pictures are the works of men's hands, but theſe are "made by hands divine." Yet Michael Angelo da Caravaggio, perhaps moved by envy, is ſaid to have ſpoken very contemptuouſly of his performances. His chief pictures are in the cabinets of the great; but the moſt celebrated of them, is one he painted in concurrence with Domenichino in the church of St. Gregory. It is obſervable, that there are ſeveral deſigns of this great maſter in print, etched by himſelf. He was of a modeſt, gentle, and obliging behaviour, and lived in great ſplendor both at Bologna and at Rome. But in his latter days, abandoning himſelf to gaming, all the money he could get by his pencil, or borrow upon intereſt, was too little to ſupply his loſſes, and he was at laſt reduced to ſo poor and mean a condition, that his reflections on his preſent circumſtances, and his former reputation and ſplendor, threw him into a languiſhing diſtemper, of which he died in the year 1642, aged ſixty-ſeven.

GUIELME, or Guillelme, a young man of great learning, born at Lubec. He wrote Queſtiones Plautinæ, and other works, which are greatly commended by Juſtus Lipſius, M. de Thou, and other learned men. He died at Bourges in 1584, where he was going to ſtudy under Cujas.

GUIENNE, a province of France, bounded on the north by Saintonge, Angoumois, and Limoſin; on the eaſt by Limoſin, Auvergne, and Languedoc; on the ſouth by the Pyrennees, Navarre, and Bearne; and on the weſt by the Ocean. It is two hundred and twenty-five miles in length, and two hundred in breadth. It is divided into the Upper and Lower. The Upper comprehends Quercy, Rouergue, Armagnac, the territory of Cominges, and the diſtrict of Bigorre. The Lower contains Bourdelois, Perigord, Eginois, Condomois, Bazadois, Landes, Proper Gaſcony, and the territory of Laboure. The principal rivers are the Garonne, Adour, Tarn, Aveiro, and Lot. Bourdeaux is the capital.

GUIJON (James) a good Latin poet, was born at Autun, in 1542, and was advocate in the parliament of Dijon. His works were publiſhed by Monſ. de la Mare, with thoſe of his three brothers. He died in 1625, aged eighty-three. His tranſlation, in Latin verſe, of the beginning of Dionyſius the Areopagite is particularly admired.

GUILANE (St.) a town in the Auſtrian Netherlands, in Hainault, in the provoſtſhip of Mons, which it defends by its ſluices. The French took it in 1678, and it was given to Spain by the treaty of Nimeguen. It was taken by the allies in 1708, and was given to the houſe of Auſtria. The French took it in 1746, but reſtored it back. It is ſeated in a marſhy country, upon the river Maine, five miles from Mons. Long. 3. 54. E. Lat. 50. 25. N.

GUILDFORD is a very ancient borough, in Surry, that received its firſt charter of incorporation from Henry I. It was reincorporated by Henry VII. by the name of mayor and approved men, to conſiſt of a mayor, ſeven magiſtrates, and fifteen bailiffs. The members of parliament are elected by the freemen, freeholders, and inhabitants within the borough, paying ſcot and lot. This place was formerly noted for the clothing trade, which is now quite loſt. Since the Reformation, it produced George Abbot, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who founded a fine hoſpital here, Robert Abbot, biſhop of Saliſbury, and Sir Maurice Abbot, lord mayor of London, three ſons of a clothier of this town. Here is a fine free-ſchool founded by Edward VI. to which one Haymond has ſince been a great benefactor. The aſſizes for the county are ſometimes held in this town. It had formerly a royal palace and caſtle, and ſome part of the laſt is yet ſtanding. It has three pariſh-churches, a great market on Saturdays, particularly for wheat, and two fairs, on May 4 and November 22, for horſes, cattle, ſheep, and hogs. It is ſeated on the navigable river Wey, and ſends a great quantity of corn, meal, timber, &c. to London. Here the treacherous Godwin, earl of Kent, received Alfred, the ſon of king Etheldred, heir to the crown of England, with the moſt ſolemn aſſurances of friendſhip and fidelity; but, contrary to all his vows and engagements, he ſurpriſed the ſix hundred men who attended the prince, and put many of them to death, delivering the prince himſelf into the hands of Harold the Dane, who cauſed his eyes to be put out, loaded him with irons, and impriſoned him during life. It is forty-three miles north-eaſt of Portſmouth, and thirty ſouth-weſt of London.

GUILLELMA of Bohemia, the head or chief of a ſect which ſtarted up in Italy in the thirteenth century, impoſed ſo effectually upon the world by a ſpecious ſhew of extraordinary devotion, that ſhe was not only reputed holy at her death, which happened in 1281, but revered as a ſaint a conſiderable time after, and had three feſtivals annually ſolemnized to her honour. However, her frauds being at laſt diſcovered, her body was dug up and burnt in 1300.

GUILLELME. See Guielme.

GUILLET (Pernette du) a lady of diſtinguiſhed learning and accompliſhments, who flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century. To all the virtues of her ſex ſhe joined all its charms. A lively and attractive countenance, a ſweet and raviſhing voice, which ſhe accompanied with ſeveral inſtruments, and was extremely well ſkilled in muſic. The Latin, Spaniſh, and Italian tongues were almoſt as familiar to her as the French. Theſe talents would, however, have ſcarcely made her known to poſterity without that of poetry, in which ſhe excelled. She wrote many pieces, which are printed and dedicated to the ladies of Lyons.

GUILLET DE ST. GEORGE (GEORGE) firſt hiſtoriographer of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture at Paris, was born at Thiers, in Auvergne, about the year 1625. He made himſelf known by his ſeveral works ſome of which are much eſteemed, and died at Paris, on the 6th of April, 1705. He had great diſputes with M. Spon, on the antiquities of Athens.

GUILLIM, or AGILLIAMS, (JOHN) was of Welch extraction, and born in Herefordſhire. He was educated at Oxford, and upon his leaving that univerſity, retired to Minſterworth, in Glouceſterſhire, but was ſoon called from thence, and made one of the Society of the College of Arms, in London, by the name of Portſmouth, and, on the 26th of February, 1617, was appointed Rouge Croix, purſuivant of arms in ordinary. He publiſhed the Diſplay of Heraldry at London, in 1610, in folio, and died on the 7th of May, 1621.

GUIMARIENS, a town of Portugal, in the province of Entre Duero e Minho, in the Comarcas. It is a large handſome place, ſeated on the river Ave, defended by a citadel, and adorned with handſome buildings, eſpecially a palace, where the ancient kings of Portugal took up their reſidence. The ſoil is as good as any in Portugal, and it produces corn, wine, fruits, ſheep, and all manner of game. They make very fine thread and linen here, which is carried to ſeveral parts of Europe. It is ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Braga, and twenty-five north-by-eaſt of Porto. Long. 7. 49. W. Lat. 41. 25. N.

GUINEA, a country of Africa, ruuning along the coaſt, which is the only part that is well known. It is divided into three parts, one of which is near the rivers Senegal and Gambia, which is called North Guinea; another near the equator, called Upper Guinea; and a third beyond the equator, called Lower Guinea, or Congo. But it is more commonly divided into the Malagueta Coaſt, the Tooth Coaſt, the Gold Coaſt, and the kingdoms of Whidah, and Great Arden. The air is exceeding hot, and very unhealthy, and their ſeaſons are the rainy and the dry ſeaſon. The dry, or ſummer ſeaſon begins in September, and continues till March or April, and then the rainy ſeaſon, or winter begins, which alſo continues ſix months. In the dry ſeaſon the nights are cool, and temper the exceſſive heats of the day. The ſoil is fertile, and produces rice, Indian corn, millet, barley, Guinea pepper, ſugar-canes, and ſeveral ſorts of excellent fruit. Its trade conſiſts in gold duſt, wax, gum ſeneca, mats, hides, elephants teeth, and ſlaves. There are mines of gold, different kinds of animals, and uncommon birds. The ſheep of this country have hair inſtead of wool. The Europeans carry on a great trade here, eſpecially the Engliſh, Dutch, and French, who have forts and factories on this coaſt. The Dutch drove the Portugueſe entirely from thence, after they had poſſeſſed the whole coaſt for a hundred years and upwards. The natives are all black, with woolly heads, flat noſes, and thick lips, and they go almoſt naked, both men and women, from one end of the coaſt to the other. There are abundance of little territories and ſtates, whoſe governors are ſtyled kings by the ſailors who frequent the coaſt. Thoſe who live near the ſea are continually at war with the inland country, in order to take priſoners, which they ſell to the Europeans for ſlaves. Others purchaſe men and women in diſtant countries for the ſame purpoſe, or ſteal them and bring them down to the coaſt to make money of them. Many will ſell their neareſt relations if they have an opportunity; and it is very common for many of them, even the kings themſelves to ſell their wives upon the leaſt diſguſt.

GUINEA (NEW) is a large continent, as is ſuppoſed, to the ſouth of Aſia, and eaſt of the Molucca iſlands; but this country is very little known.

GUINCAMP, a town of France, in Brittany, and the duchy of Penthievre, two hundred and fifty-ſix miles weſt of Paris. Long. 2. 56. W. Lat. 48. 34. N.

GUIPUSCOA, a ſmall province of Spain, bounded on the eaſt by Baſques, on the north by the Ocean, on the weſt by Biſcay, and on the ſouth by Navarre. It abounds in all things except wheat; and Toloſa is the capital.

GUISARD (PETER) an able doctor of phyſic, of the faculty of Montpellier, was born at Salle, in the Cevennes, and was educated in the proteſtant religion. M. Marcot conceived ſuch an eſteem for him, that having invited him to come to court, he employed him in teaching for him in the medicinal ſchools, which he performed to great ſatisfaction. Some time after, M. Marcot propoſed to reſign his profeſſorſhip to him; but as he could not enjoy it without being a catholic, he would not accept of it on that condition; but at length making a ſerious enquiry into the catholic religion, he communicated his doubts and difficulties to the moſt able miniſters of Geneva; and they, in their anſwers, not giving him all the ſatisfaction he expected, he reſolved to change his religion. In 1742, he went to Paris; but he ſoon after retired to Montpellier, where he performed gratis a courſe of experimental philoſophy, and formed a deſign of erecting at Montpellier, a profeſſorſhip for that branch of learning, but did not ſucceed. He died on the 13th of September, 1746, at about forty-ſix years of age. He wrote the Practice of Surgery, or a Hiſtory of Wounds, a work, which is eſteemed. The beſt edition is the third, printed, in 1747, in two volumes, duodecimo; and an Eſſay on the Venereal Diſeaſe.

GUISE, a town of France, in the province of Picardy, with a ſtrong caſtle. It was beſieged by the Spaniards to no purpoſe in 1650. It is ſeated on the river Oiſe, fifteen miles north-eaſt of St. Quintin, twenty-five ſouth-eaſt of Cambray, and ninety-four north-by eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 42. E. Lat. 49. 54. N.

GUISE (CLAUDE of Lorrain, duke of) the ſecond ſon of Renatus, duke of Lorrain. After having attempted in vain to exclude Anthony his elder brother from ſucceeding to his father's honours and eſtates, he went and ſettled in France, where, as he was a man of great bravery, and exalted merit, he gained prodigious eſteem. He married a princeſs of the blood, and became ſo powerful by the favour of his brother, cardinal John of Lorrain, that he raiſed a family, which was in danger of dethroning the lawful ſucceſſors. In his favour, the earldom of Guiſe was erected into a duchy and peerage. in 1527. He ſignaliſed himſelf on ſeveral occaſions, particularly at the battle of Marignan, and died in 1550, leaving ſix ſons, and four daughters, the eldeſt of whom married James V. king of Scotland.

GUISE (FRANCIS of). See FRANCIS of Lorrain.

GUISE (CHARLES of). See CHARLES of Lorrain.

GUISE (HENRY of Lorrain, duke of) one of the braveſt and moſt eloquent men of his time, was the eldeſt ſon of Francis of Lorrain, duke of Guiſe, and was born on the 31ſt of December, 1550. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Hungary and France by his valour and prudence in ſeveral ſieges and battles, commanded the rear-guard at the battle of Jarnac, in 1569, and was ſurnamed Gaſh-Facedon, on account of a wound he received in his cheek near Chateau Thierri, in 1575. His perſonal accompliſhments engaged the affections of Margaret of France, on which Charles IX. who intended to marry that princeſs to the king of Navarre, reſolved to get him diſpatched, which the duke being informed of, took away all cauſe of ſuſpicion from the king by marrying Catharine of Cleves, the daughter of Francis of Cleves, duke of Nevers. He gained ſeveral victories over the Calviniſts, and entered Paris as it were in triumph. He had entertained very great deſigns, when Henry III. cauſed him to be murdered at Blois, during the ſitting of the ſtates, on the 23d of December, 1588, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. Thus periſhed this ambitious prince, after having made the king his maſter and the lawful ſucceſſors to the crown tremble. The cardinal de Guiſe, his brother, was maſſacred at Blois the next day.

GUISE (CHARLES of Lorrain, duke of) was the eldeſt ſon of Henry, duke of Guiſe, was born on the 20th of Auguſt, 1571; he was ſeized, with many others, on the day of the execution of Blois, and confined in the caſtle of Tours, from whence he made his eſcape, in 1591. He was received at Paris with great acclamations of joy, by the partizans of the league, who made bonfires in all parts of the kingdom, and the pope gave public thanks to the Almighty for it, and, in ſhort, the leaguers, would have choſen him king, had it not been for the jealouſy of his uncle, the duke of Mayenne. However, they made him the chief of the league, and lieutenant-general of the crown of France, when his power differed but little from that of an abſolute monarch. This young prince deprived the league of one of its champions, by killing the brave St. Pol, with his own hand. He ſubmitted to Henry IV. in 1594, and obtained the government of Provence. He held ſome employments by ſea and land, under Lewis XIII. but cardinal de Richelieu, who feared the power of that family, obliged him to leave France, on which he retired to Florence, and died at Cuna, in the Sienneſe, on the 30th of September, 1640.

GUISE (LEWIS of Lorrain, cardinal of) the third cardinal of that name, was the ſon of Henry of Lorrain, duke of Guiſe, who was killed at Blois. He was born in 1575, and was of ſo martial a diſpoſition, that, though an eccleſiaſtic, a cardinal, and archbiſhop of Rheims, he breathed nothing but war. He followed the king in his expedition to Poitou, in 1621, and ſignalized himſelf among the braveſt and moſt intrepid in the army, at the attack of a ſuburb, at the ſiege of St. John de Angeli; but falling ſick ſome days after, he ordered himſelf to be carried to Saintes, and died there, on the 21ſt of June, 1621.

GUISE (HENRY of Lorraine, duke of) the youngeſt ſon of Charles of Lorraine, duke of Guiſe, and of Henriette Catharine de Joyeuſe, was born on the 4th of April, 1614, and was one of the moſt accompliſhed lords in France, as being handſome in his perſon, ſkilful in exerciſes of every kind, witty, and courageous. Being deſtined for the church, he he was provided with a great number of abbeys, and had even the archbiſhoprick of Rheims: but having given a promiſe of marriage to the princeſs Anne of Mantua, the cardinal de Richelieu deprived him of all his benefices. The duke of Guiſe retired to Bruſſels, where he married the counteſs de Boſſu, but left her ſoon after to return to France. He there fell into a freſh diſgrace by the ſhare he had in a treaty which the count de Soiſſons, the duke de Bouillon, and ſome other malecontents, concluded with Spain. He was tried as a criminal, and, in 1641, was condemned for for non-appearance, but made his peace in 1643. The year following he made a campaign with the duke of Orleans, at the ſiege of Gravelins. He went ſome time after into Italy, and was at Rome when the Neapolitans made an inſurrection, and invited him to be their leader. He accepted of their offers, and was received at Naples with extraordinary teſtimonies of joy, when the Neapolitans ordered that he ſhould be ſtyled generaliſſimo of the army, and defender of their liberties, under the protection of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, with the ſame honours the prince of Orange enjoyed in Holland. The duke of Guiſe diſcovered much ſpirit and courage in the diſcharge of this new dignity, but not being aſſiſted by France, he fell into the hands of his enemies, who carried him to Segovia, in Spain, where they kept him priſoner for a conſiderable time; however, he recovered his liberty in 1652. In ſhort, he died at Paris, on the 2d of June, 1664, leaving no children, and all his brothers died before him. Some Memoirs are publiſhed under his name, in which he deſcribes his enterprize at Naples; but it is ſuſpected, that they were written by Saintion his ſecretary, by whom they were publiſhed.

GUISE (WILLIAM) a very learned Engliſh divine, the ſon of John Guiſe, eſq; at Abland's-court, near Glouceſter, was born in 1653, educated at Oxford, and was very eminent for his ſkill in oriental learning. In 1667, he took the degree of maſter of arts, and ſoon after entered into holy orders. He tranſlated into Engliſh Miſnæ Pars Ordinis primi Zeraim Tituli ſeptem, which he alſo illuſtrated with a Commentary, and was engaged in preparing for the preſs Abulfeda's Geography, when he died at Oxford, on the 3d of September, 1683, and was interred in the chancel of St. Michael's church, in that city, where a monument was erected to his memory by his widow.

GUNDLING (NICHOLAS JEROME) one of the moſt able civilians and greateſt critics Germany has produced, was born near Nuremberg, on the 25th of February, 1674. Having ſtudied at Altorf, he became ſucceſſively profeſſor of philoſoſophy, eloquence, and ethics, at Hall. His capacity was ſo well known at the court of Berlin, that he was frequently conſulted on public affairs, and his ſervices on various occaſions procured him the title of privy counſellor. He was very laborious, and had an excellent memory, much wit, vivacity, and eloquence; but it were to be wiſhed, that his writings, which are very numerous, were leſs ſatirical and had more moderation and politeneſs. He died while rector of the univerſity of Hall, on the 16th of December, 1729, at fifty-nine years of age, leaving a great number of his works, which are eſteemed. The principal are, 1. New Converſations. 2. A Project for a Courſe of literary Hiſtory. 3. Hiſtoria Philoſophiæ moralis, octavo. 4. Otia, or a Collection of Diſcourſes on various Subjects, philoſophical, moral, political, and hiſtorical, three volumes, octavo. 5. De Jure oppignorati Territorii, quarto. 6. Status naturalis Hobbeſii in Corpore Juris Civilis defenſus & defendendus, quarto. 7. Gundlingia, in German. 8. Obſervationes Hallenſes, an excellent work, in eleven volumes, octavo. 9. Via ad Veritam, or a Courſe of Philoſophy.

GUNFLEET, one of the channels by which ſhips enter the mouth of the river Thames.

GUNNING (PETER) biſhop of Ely, was born at Hoo, in Kent, on the 11th of January, 1613, and completed his education at Clare hall, in Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowſhip. Having taken orders, he had the cure of Little St. Mary's preſented to him by the maſter and fellows of Peter-houſe, and became an eminent preacher. He now diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal for the church and king, which at length rendering him obnoxious to the ruling powers, he was firſt impriſoned, and on his refuſing to take the covenant, was deprived of his fellowſhip, which obliged him to leave the univerſity; but he firſt wrote a Treatiſe againſt the Covenant. He now removed to Oxford, and during his reſidence there, officiated two years at the curacy of Caſſington, near Oxford. Soon after he became tutor to the lord Hatton and ſir Francis Compton, and then chaplain to ſir Robert Shirley, who was ſo pleaſed with his behaviour in ſome diſputations with a Romiſh prieſt, that he ſettled upon him an annuity of one hundred pounds. Upon ſir Robert's deceaſe, he was miniſter to a congregation, at the chapel of Exeter-houſe, in the Strand, where he conſtantly made uſe of the liturgy of the church of England. On the Reſtoration, he was reſtored to his fellowſhip, preſented to a prebend in the church of Canterbury, created doctor of divinity, and ſoon after obtained two rectories, was made maſter of Corpus-Chriſti college, in Cambridge, and lady Margaret's profeſſor of divinity. In a few months after, he obtained the regius profeſſorſhip of divinity, and the headſhip of St. John's college, Cambridge. In 1669, he was promoted to the biſhoprick of Chicheſter, which he held with his regius profeſſorſhip till the year 1674, when he was tranſlated to Ely; but having enjoyed that ſee ten years, died a bachelor on the 6th of July, 1684. His character is variouſly drawn by authors of different principles; but it is univerſally allowed that he was a perſon of great erudition, of an unblemiſhed life, and of moſt extenſive and exemplary charity. He wrote, 1. A Contention for Truth, in two public Diſputations upon Infant Baptiſm. 2. Schiſm unmaſked. 3. A View and Correction of the Common Prayer. 4. The Paſchal or Lent Faſt apoſtolical and perpetual, quarto.

GUNSBURY, a town of Germany, in the circle of Suabia, and territory of Bourgo, ſeated on the eaſt-ſide of the Danube, ſixteen miles north-eaſt of Ulm. Long. 10. 15. E. Lat. 48. 35. N.

GUNTER (EDMUND) an excellent Engliſh mathematician and aſtronomer in the ſeventeenth century, was born in Hertfordſhire, in the year 1581, and ſtudied at Weſtminſter ſchool, from whence he removed to Oxford, where he took the degree of maſter of arts on the 2d of July, 1606, and afterwards entered into holy orders. In 1615 he took the degree of bachelor of divinity, but being peculiarly eminent for his knowledge in the mathematics, he had two years before been choſen profeſſor of aſtronomy in Greſham college, London, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his lectures and writings. He invented a ſmall portable quadrant, and alſo the famous line of proportions, which, after the inventor, is called Gunter's Scale, and publiſhed Canon Triangulorum; and a work entitled Of the Sector, Croſs-ſtaff, and other Inſtruments. This laſt was publiſhed with an Engliſh tranſlation of his Canon Triangulorum, in 4to. by Samuel Foſter, profeſſor of Greſham college. Mr. Gunter died at that college on the 10th of December, 1626, in the forty-fifth year of his age.

GUNTHER, a celebrated German poet of the ſeventeenth century, was born in Sileſia, and had all the talents which characteriſe a great poet; but his works are incorrect; for as he lived an irregular life, and was expoſed to all the inconveniences of want, he was ſometimes obliged to write verſes for his ſubſiſtence. At Dreſden he was preſented to Auguſtus II. king of Poland, to be poet to the court, but when he appeared before his majeſty, he was ſo drunk that he was ordered to retire. The poet Kenig, who then enjoyed that poſt, is ſaid to have made him in that condition. He died poor at twenty-eight years of age.

GURIEL, a ſubdiviſion of Georgia in Aſia, bounded on the north by Imeretta, on the eaſt by mount Caucaſus, on the weſt by the Black Sea, and on the ſouth by Turky. The inhabitants go under the denomination of Chriſtians, but they are little better than Pagans.

GURK, a town of Germany in the circle of Auſtria, and duchy of Carinthia, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Gurk, twenty-five miles from Clagenfurt. Long. 14. 12. E. Lat. 47. 10. N.

GURTLER (NICHOLAS) a learned proteſtant divine, born at Baſil in 1654. He was ſucceſſively profeſſor at Herborn, Hanau, Bremen, Deventer, and Franeker. It is obſervable with reſpect to this laſt place, that the States of Frieſland having invited the illuſtrious Werenfels to fill the divinity chair, vacant at Franeker, he refuſed it, obſerving in his letters to the curators, that he was ſurpriſed at their having caſt their eyes upon him, who was almoſt a ſtranger in Holland, while they had at Deventer, in their own neighbourhood, a man of ſuch extraordinary merit as M. Gurtler, whom he did not bluſh to name his maſter with reſpect to theology. Upon receiving this letter they invited M. Gurtler, but he excuſed himſelf. However, two years after, the curators made a ſecond attempt, and propoſed ſuch conſiderable advantages that he accepted of it. He took poſſeſſion of the theological chair at Franeker in 1707, and died in 1711. His principal works are, 1. Lexicon Linguæ Latinæ, German. Græcæ & Gall. 2. Hiſtoria Templariorum. 3. Origines Mundi, 4to. A work of prodigious erudition. 4. Syſtema Theol. Propheticæ, 4to. This ſyſtem paſſes for the beſt work that has appeared of this kind. All the writings of Gurtler are learned performances, and much eſteemed.

GUSTAVUS VASA, king of Sweden, was the ſon of Eric Vaſa, duke of Gripſholm, and was deſcended from the ancient kings of Sweden. Chriſtiern II. king of Denmark, laying claim to the crown of Sweden, was ſupported by the clergy; but the crown being elective, the nobility and reprerepreſentatives of the people choſe an adminiſtrator, who attacked the Danes on their landing near Stockholm, in Auguſt, 1517, and gained a complete victory, in which Guſtavus, who was ſtandard-bearer of the kingdom, greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his conduct and bravery. Two years after the Danes laid ſiege to the capital, on which the Swedes marching againſt them, they retreated to their ſhips, when great part of their rear were cut to pieces, and many, who eſcaped the fury of their purſuers, were drowned in attempting to ſwim to their veſſels. But this was not their only misfortune; for being detained by contrary winds, the want of proviſions obliged them to make frequent deſcents to ſupply their neceſſities; but they were perpetually driven back to their ſhips by the Swediſh cavalry under the command of the brave Guſtavus. At length the Daniſh fleet was reduced to the utmoſt extremity, and the king himſelf was in danger of periſhing. To deliver himſelf from ſo miſerable a ſituation he ſent a meſſenger to the adminiſtrator to propoſe a truce for ſome days, under pretence of treating about the ranſom of the priſoners, and afterwards to inſinuate that it would not be impoſſible to change the truce to an eternal peace between the two nations. The adminiſtrator was not ignorant of the extremity to which Chriſtiern was reduced; but in hopes of procuring a ſolid peace, conſented to the truce, and generouſly ſent boats laden with proviſions for the uſe of the king and the troops on board. Chriſtiern pretending to be overcome by his generoſity, propoſed an interview between the adminiſtrator and himſelf on board the fleet; but the adminiſtrator was prevented from complying by the ſenate, on which Chriſtiern propoſed an interview in the city of Stockholm, offering to repair thither with ſome of his council, provided Guſtavus and ſix other lords ſhould be delivered as hoſtages for the ſecurity of his perſon. With this propoſal they complied. Guſtavus and the other hoſtages appeared on the ſhore, and were immediately ſurrounded by the Daniſh admiral and a conſiderable number of officers, who preſſed them to go on board to ſalute the king who was coming to viſit the adminiſtrator. Guſtavus endeavoured to avoid going on board till the king was landed, but finding ſo many Danes about him, at length complied, and being carried before the king, he ordered him and the other hoſtages to be arreſted, and then ſent word to the adminiſtrator that unleſs he would fulfil the orders he ſent, he would cauſe them to be beheaded. Steno, the adminiſtrator, incenſed at the baſeneſs of this treachery, inſtantly manned all the boats and ſhips in the harbour, and the noblemen in the city, particularly the friends and relations of the priſoners, leaped into the firſt boats, and the prince went on board a frigate, reſolving to attack the Daniſh men of war, and either to releaſe the hoſtages or to periſh in the attempt; but the enemy was not to be found, Chriſtiern had taken advantage of a favourable gale, and ſet ſail for Denmark. He now left no means unattempted to corrupt the fidelity of Guſtavus and his companions; but finding that they could neither be frightened nor flattered into a compliance, gave orders to put them to death. But the Daniſh officer entruſted with the commiſſion prevailed on the king to be ſatisfied with impriſoning them in the caſtle of Copenhagen, where they were treated with ſuch cruelty that ſome of them died. At length Eric Banner, a Daniſh lord, pitying Guſtavus, to whom he was related, prevailed on Chriſtiern to ſuffer him to be confined in the caſtle of Calo in Jutland, of which he was governor, on condition of his paying ſix thouſand crowns of gold for his ranſom, if he could not produce him upon demand; and taking him to Calo, treated him with the greateſt friendſhip and reſpect, allowing him the liberty of walking abroad and of taking the diverſion of hunting. Mean while Chriſtiern's thoughts were conſtantly fixed on the conqueſt of Sweden, and in 1519 ſent Otho Crumpein with an army into Weſt-Gothland, where he obtained a victory over the Swedes, in which the adminiſtrator was ſlain; and after over running the country, cauſed a meeting of a few noblemen who repreſented the ſtates, in which he procured Chriſtiern, to be declared king of Sweden, and promiſed that Guſtavus ſhould be releaſed without ranſom.

Guſtavus alarmed at the diſmal news of the ruin of his country, and extremely afflicted at the adminiſtrator's death, now made his eſcape, aſſuming the diſguiſe of a peaſant. Banner purſued him, and taking him at Lubeck, charged him with baſely expoſing his friend and benefactor to the indignation of his ſovereign, and the forfeiture of a conſiderable ſum. Guſtavus, in the mildeſt and moſt obliging terms, endeavoured to pacify him, vindicated what he had done, and aſſured him that he ſhould never forget the obliging treatment he had received at his houſe, and would ſend the ſum the king required for his ranſom; on which Banner, convinced by his reaſons, returned. Guſtavus then made himſelf known to the governors of Lubec, and ſhewed the advantages they might derive by aſſiſting him to reſtore the liberty of Sweden, but in vain: they however promiſed to provide a veſſel to carry him to Sweden, and at his departure aſſured him, that if he could form a party ſtrong enough to take the field, the regency would infallibly declare for him.

Guſtavus was ſet aſhore near Calmar, which ſeemed ſtill to adhere to the intereſt of Chriſtina, the adminiſtrator's widow. He therefore diſcovered himſelf to the governor and principal officers of the garriſon, but theſe conſiſting of foreign mercenaries refuſed to obey him, and even threatening to kill him, he was obliged to fly, and to have recourſe to his former diſguiſe: but ſoon hearing that the Danes were informed of his arrival, and had ſent out parties to apprehend him, he hid himſelf in a waggon laden with ſtraw, and thus paſſed through all the quarters of the Daniſh army, to a caſtle that belonged to his father in the province of Sudermania; whence he wrote to his friends to join him with their vaſſals, and afterwards march to the relief of Stockholm, which was beſieged by the Danes; but they being afraid to engage in ſo hazardous an enterpriſe, he went about the neighbouring villages in the night, and even appeared publicly on feſtival days to excite the peaſants to take up arms; but their courage was ſunk, and all their reſolution cooled. Guſtavus, equally vexed and ſurpriſed, knew not where to ſeek for ſafety, but at the head of an army. The Danes were ſtill in queſt of him, and he could neither continue long in one place, nor make frequent removes without expoſing himſelf to unavoidable dangers. At laſt he reſolved to attempt to reach Stockholm, hoping that his preſence would inſpire the burghers and garriſon with freſh reſolution, and that by a brave defence he might prevail on the hanſe towns to ſend him a ſeaſonable relief. He travelled for ſome days through by-ways, and ſpent the night in ſolitary cottages. But notwithſtanding all his caution, he was once in ſuch danger, that the enemy came but an hour too late; when finding it impoſſible to proceed without falling into the hands of the Danes, he returned by another road into the province of Sudermania, and retired to the houſe of a peaſant, who had been an old ſervant in his family, where he lay concealed for ſome time.

In the mean while, Chriſtiern, after having taken Stockholm, and being crowned king of Sweden in that city, put to death ninety four lords, among whom was Eric, Guſtavus's father, beſides the conſuls and magiſtrates, and cauſed the ſoldiers to maſſacre a prodigious number of the citizens. He ſeized the fortune of the adminiſtrator's widow, ſent her to Denmark with Guſtavus's mother and ſiſter, and the reſt of the Swediſh ladies whoſe huſbands had periſhed in the maſſacre, and threw them into different priſons.

Guſtavus, who had privately ſent to Stockholm the old ſervant at whoſe houſe he lay concealed, heard at his return of the death of his father, and of all the ſenators. The loſs of all his family and friends, deprived him of almoſt every means and hope of ſafety. He was encompaſſed with Daniſh troops, a reward was offered for diſcovering him, and it was death to conceal him. In this exigence he ſet forward, in the diſguiſe of a peaſant, for the mountains of Dalecarlia; but when after a long and fatiguing journey, he had entered them, he was abandoned by his guide, who went off with all the money he had provided for his ſubſiſtence. He then wandered up and down thoſe dreadful mountains, not daring to own his name, and in order to be concealed, went to work in the copper mines, from whence the people of thoſe parts have their chief ſubſiſtence.

But at length, a woman in whoſe houſe he lodged, perceived under his labourer's habit, a ſilk robe, embroidered with gold, and ſoon carried the news to the whole village, on which, the lord of the place coming to ſee him, was ſurpriſed to find Guſtavus, with whom he had ſpent his youth at the univerſity of Upſal, and invited him to his houſe, where he gave him all poſſible aſſurances of his ſervice and friendſhip. Guſtavus ſtaid with him ſome time; but finding that he was deterred from taking arms by his fears, he left him, and after ſeveral days journey through the woods, came to the ſeat of a gentleman named Peterſon, whom he knew in the army, and who promiſed to engage the chief perſons in that neighbourhood to take arms in defence of their country. But ſoon after, pretending to go abroad for that purpoſe, he went to one of king Chriſtiern's officers, who immediately marched thither, at the head of a party of ſoldiers, and inveſted the houſe. But Guſtavus had made his eſcape the night before; for the traitor's wife, prompted by pity, had diſcovered her huſband's plot, and had him conducted to a clergyman, who was one of her friends. The prieſt, who was a ſincere lover of his country, hid him in a part of the church of which he alone kept the key, and having prepared the people, Guſtavus appeared before them in a dreſs ſuitable to his quality, and having harangued them on the miſeries of their country, and the neceſſity of taking arms in their own defence; he was anſwered with ſhouts of applauſe, and their ſwearing to revenge the death of their countrymen. Guſtavus reſolving to take advantage of their ardour, ſurpriſed the caſtle belonging to the governor of the province, and in a few days almoſt the whole province declared in his favour, and many Swediſh gentlemen who were out-lawed by Chriſtiern, and had fled thither for refuge, repaired to his army, and were raiſed to the rank of officers. He ſecured the paſſes of the mountains; aboliſhed the exorbitant taxes which Chriſtiern had laid upon the people; eſtabliſhed commiſſaries to receive the ordinary contributions, which he appropriated to the ſubſiſtence of his forces, and diſpatched private emiſſaries through the whole kingdom, to diſpoſe the nobility and peaſants to appear in arms on his entering their provinces. Hence his progreſs was rapid, and his army daily encreaſed. Chriſtiern not daring to leave Denmark, where the people, exaſperated by his cruelties, were ready to rebel, wrote to his viceroy in Sweden to march againſt the rebels, and ſent word to Guſtavus that his mother and ſiſter ſhould ſuffer the moſt cruel torments, if he again appeared at the head of the rebels. But Guſtavus, deſpiſing his threats, continued ſtill to advance, drove the viceroy before him, and defeated the archbiſhop of Upſal, who had taken arms againſt him; on which Chriſtiern cauſed his mother and ſiſter to be tied up in a ſack, and caſt into the ſea. In ſhort, Guſtavus at length gained poſſeſſion of the whole kingdom, and was proclaimed king in the year 1523. But being obliged at his coronation to ſwear to obſerve the rights of the clergy, he deferred that ceremony, in order to promote the reformation; he therefore encouraged the Lutheran divines to preach in all parts of his dominions; ſeized the crown lands in the poſſeſſion of the clergy, and humbled that body, which had always diſturbed the government, and oppoſed the authority of the prince. At length, finding that moſt of his ſubjects had changed their religion, he declared himſelf a Lutheran, and was crowned on the 12th of January, 1528. During his reign he encouraged trade, erected citadels on the frontiers of his kingdom, and palaces in ſeveral places, with a magnificence till then unknown in Sweden; reigned without favourites or miniſters, and made his own glory and the happineſs of his ſubjects the object of all his views. He rendered the government, which was before elective, hereditary in his family, and died on the 29th of September, 1560, in the ſeventieth year of his age. He was ſucceeded by Eric his eldeſt ſon.

 before

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS II. ſurnamed the Great, king of Sweden, and one of the moſt celebrated warriors of his time, was born at Stockholm, in 1594, and ſucceeded Charles his father in 1611. He recovered all the country which had been conquered by the Danes, made conſiderable conqueſts over the Muſcovites, and gained great advantages over the Poles. He took Riga on the 16th of September, 1621, and at length made an alliance with the proteſtants of Germany againſt the houſe of Auſtria. He ravaged the Palatinate, Suabia, and Bavaria, and gained victories upon victories, the moſt celebrated of which was that of Leipſic; by which means he became formidable to all Europe, but was killed at the battle of Lutzen, which he gained over the Imperialiſts, on the 16th of November, 1632, aged thirty-eight. Puffendorff aſſerts, that this great prince periſhed by the hand of Francis Albert, duke of Lawenbergh, one of his chiefs, who was corrupted by the Imperialiſts. He left his only daughter Chriſtina, the heireſs of his dominions, who was then but five years of age.

The heroic courage and refined politics of Guſtavus Adolphus rendered Sweden formidable, which had been hitherto overlooked in the political ſyſtem of Europe. This great man, ſays Mr. Granger, ſeemed to be riſing apace upon the ruins of the empire, which was extremely weakened by his victories. He made as rapid a progreſs in his conqueſts as his ſucceſſor Charles XII. and being a much more profound politician, and his deſigns impenetrable, held almoſt all Chriſtendom in anxious ſuſpence. The Life of Guſtavus Adolphus was lately publiſhed by Mr. Walter Harte, canon of Winſor.

GUSTROW, a town of Germany, in Lower Saxony, and the duchy of Mecklenburg, twenty miles eaſt of Schwerin. Long. 12. 43. E. Lat. 53. 57. N.

GUTSKOW, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, and in Swediſh Pomerania, twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Stralſund. Long. 13. 57. E. Lat. 54. 4. N.

GUTTEMBERG (JOHN) a citizen of Mentz, was, according to ſome authors, born at Straſburg, and rendered his name immortal by the invention of printing. This admirable art he invented about the middle of the fifteenth century, in conjunction with John Fauſt, a citizen of Mentz, and Peter Schoeffer, a ſervant, and afterwards the ſon in-law of Fauſt.

GUYON (JANE MARIA BOUVIERS DE LA MOTHE) a lady celebrated by her writings and her diſgraces, was born at Montargis, on the 13th of April, 1648. She was left a widow in 1676, with great wealth, when ſhe ſettled at Paris, where ſhe contracted an acquaintance with M. d'Aranthon, biſhop of Geneva, who prevailed on her to go into his dioceſe, and place herſelf in a convent, on which ſhe gave up her fortune to her children, reſerving only a moderate annuity for herſelf; but not approving of the convent in which ſhe was placed, ſhe removed to ſeveral others, and compoſed her Short and Eaſy Method of Prayer, and another book entitled Solomon's Song, interpreted according to the myſtical ſenſe. Theſe works involved her in great trouble, for returning to Paris in 1687, the king, by the advice of the phyſicians, ordered her to be confined among the nuns of the Viſitation in St. Anthony's-ſtreet, but by the application of ſome perſons, ſhe was ſome time after ſet at liberty. She then contracted a friendſhip with M. de Fenelon, afterwards archbiſhop of Cambray, the duke de Chevreuſe, the duke de Bouvilliers, the ducheſs de Bethune, and ſeveral other perſons diſtinguiſhed by their merit; but in ſpite of theſe connexions, ſhe was ſtill perſecuted, on which ſhe ſubmitted her writings to the examination of Monſ. Boſſuet, who having examined them with Noailles, Fenelon, and Tronſon, drew up thirty articles, as an explication of her maxims on the ſpiritual life, to which M. de Fenelon added four others. Theſe articles ſhe ſigned, but this did not put a ſtop to the ſtorm. She, together with M. de Fenelon, was accuſed of quietiſm, and confined in the caſtle of Vincennes. Afterwards ſhe was placed among the nuns of St. Thomas at Vaugirard, and at length was put into the Baſtile, where ſhe underwent many rigorous examinations; but M. de Fenelon's Maxims of the Saints being condemned, and he having ſubmitted, ſhe was ſet at liberty, on which ſhe retired to Blois, where ſhe died, twelve years after, on the 9th of June, 1717, aged ſixty-nine. She alſo wrote her own life, and a conſiderable number of myſtical pieces.

GWYNN (ELEANOR) better known by the familiar name of Nell, was originally a plebeian of the loweſt rank, and ſold oranges in the playhouſe; but nature ſeems to have qualified her for the theatre; for though her perſon was below the middle ſize, it was well turned, ſhe had a good natural air, and a ſprightlineſs that qualified her for ſhining in comedy. She was inſtructed by Hart and Lacy, who were both eminent actors, and in a little time became an excellent comedian. She acted the moſt ſpirited and fantaſtic parts, and very ſeldom appeared in tragedy, though ſhe acted the part of Almahide, to which lord Lanſdown alludes in his Progreſs of Beauty:

And Almahide once more by kings ador'd.

She ſpoke a prologue or an epilogue with admirable addreſs. At length the pert and vivacious prattle of the orange-wench, was, by degrees, refined into ſuch wit, as pleaſed king Charles II. It was indeed ſometimes carried to extravagance, but even her higheſt flights were ſo natural, that they rather provoked laughter, than excited diſguſt. She is ſaid to have been kept by lord Dorſet before ſhe was retained by the king, and to have been introduced to the latter by the duke of Buckingham, with a view of ſupplanting the ducheſs of Cleveland. She continued to hang on her cloaths with her uſual negligence, when ſhe was the king's miſtreſs, as ſhe did before; but whatever ſhe did, became her; and as ſhe knew how to mimic every thing ridiculous about the court, not only ſecured the regard of her merry ſovereign, but retained a conſiderable place in his affections, till the time of his death. She had no avarice; for when her power encreaſed, ſhe ſerved all her theatrical friends. She ſhewed particular gratitude to Dryden, and valued eminent writers, as Otway, Lee, &c. Endowed with natural ſagacity and wit, ſhe made no ill uſe of them at court, paid no attention to miniſters, nor ever acted as their creature. She was remarkably charitable, and what was ſingular, piqued herſelf on her regard for the church of England, which was then contrary to the genius of the court. Once as ſhe was driving up Ludgate-hill in a ſuperb coach, ſome bailiffs were hurrying a clergyman to priſon; ſhe ſtopped, ſent for the perſons whom the clergyman named as atteſtators to his character, and finding him a juſt ſubject for pity, paid his debt inſtantly, and ſoon after procured him a preferment. In ſhort, ſhe was the moſt popular of all the king's miſtreſſes, and moſt acceptable to the nation. She did not long ſurvive the king, but died in 1687.

GYGES, an officer and favourite of Candaules, king of Lydia. That prince boaſting of his queen as having the moſt beautiful perſon in the world, inſiſted, that to convince him of this truth, he ſhould ſee her naked. This, Gyges with great earneſtneſs oppoſed; but the king inſiſting on being obeyed, he was obliged to ſubmit, and was placed where it was ſuppoſed that he might have a full view of her, without being being ſeen by the queen; but ſuddenly turning her head, ſhe ſaw him, and was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion. Her reſentment againſt the king for thus expoſing her, afterwards induced her to perſuade Gyges to kill the king, marry her, and aſcend the throne, which he did, in about the ſeventy-eighth year before the Chriſtian æra.

GYLIPPUS, a famous Lacedæmonian captain, was ſent into Sicily to aſſiſt the Syracuſans, in the four hundred and ſixteenth year before the birth of Chriſt. He defeated Demoſthenes and Nycias, the Athenian generals in that iſland, in ſeveral battles, and at length took them priſoners. Gylippus afterwards accompanied Lyſander at the taking of Athens, when that general truſted him with all the money he had got on plundering the city, and deſired him to carry it to the ephori, but Gylippus appropriated ſome of it to his own uſe, the baſeneſs of which action he was afterwards ſo ſenſible off, that he puniſhed himſelf by going into a voluntary baniſhment.

GYMNASIARCH, γυμνασιαρχης, in antiquity, the director of the gymnaſium, who had two deputies under him, the one called gymnaſtes, who preſided over all the exerciſes except the athletæ, and the xyſtarch, who had the direction of the athletæ, or wreſtlers.

GYMNASIUM, γυμνασιον, in antiquity, a place appointed for the performance of exerciſes. Theſe were firſt uſed at Sparta, and were afterwards very common in all parts of Greece, and were even imitated at Rome. The gymnaſia were compoſed of ſeveral buildings united, and were ſo capacious as to hold many thouſand people at once. Having room ſufficient for philoſophers, rhetoricians, and the profeſſors of all other ſciences, while the wreſtlers, dancers, &c. exerciſed themſelves at the ſame time, without the leaſt diſturbance or interruption.

GYMNOSOPHISTS, an ancient ſect of philoſophers, thus called by the Greeks from their going naked. Some of theſe were of Africa, but the moſt famous were in the Indies. The former inhabited a mountain of Ethiopia, near the Nile, where they did not live in community, but each ſacrificed apart, and had ſmall habitations, where they performed apart their exerciſes and their ſtudies; and lived upon the fruits the earth ſpontaneouſly produced.

The gymnoſophiſts of the Indies were divided into Brachmans and Germanes. Of theſe Strabo relates ſome very ſingular circumſtances. They began ſo early to take care of their ſcholars, that they ſent learned men to the mother as ſoon as they knew that ſhe had conceived: theſe gave her their bleſſing, that ſhe might have a happy delivery, and inculcated their doctrines; when, if ſhe was pleaſed with their diſcourſes, it was conſidered as a good omen for the child. As the children grew up, they went through the diſcipline of different maſters. The Brachmans lived in the woods, led a very rigid life, ſlept on the ſkins of beaſts, ate no fleſh, nor had any commerce with women. They ſpent their time in inſtructing thoſe who came to hear them: but none of their hearers were allowed either to ſpit or to ſpeak before them; and whoever did, were turned out for that day. When a man had ſpent thirty-ſeven years in their ſociety, he was allowed to leave it, and was permitted to marry, and to eat ſuch beaſts as do not labour for man. The Brachmans ſaid, that our life ought to be conſidered as a ſtate of conception, and death as a birth to a true and happy life, for thoſe who had philoſophized well; that the incidents of human life are neither good nor evil, ſince the ſame things pleaſe ſome, and diſpleaſe others, and are even agreeable or diſagreeable to the ſame perſon at different times. They believed that the earth had a beginning, and would have an end; that it was round, and that God, who made and governs it, penetrated it every where. They alſo believed the immortality of the ſoul, and a ſtate of rewards and puniſhments.

The Germanes were the other ſort of gymnoſophiſts in the Eaſt; the moſt conſiderable of whom were called Hylobians, from their living in the woods, where they ſubſiſted upon ſallads and wild fruits; forbore wine and women, and anſwered the queſtions of princes by meſſengers ſent to them. They had phyſicians among them who pretended to cure barrenneſs, and not only ſo, but to procure either boys or girls

GYSHORN, a town of Germany, in Lower Saxony, and the duchy of Lunenburg, forty-five miles north-eaſt of Hanover, ſubject to the elector. Long. 10. 49. E. Lat. 52. 36. N.

END OF THE FIRST VOLUME.